It is manifest that the blessings of political liberty cannot be fully enjoyed under a system which permits monopolies and monopolistic practices to rob the people of the fruits of their toil, reducing them to a state of economic vassalage. We favor the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law, with any clarifying and strengthening amendments that may be needed to enable us to cope with present-day conditions.

4. RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

The making of reciprocal trade agreements under our most-favored-nation policy, whereby we gain concessions from one country while making concessions to many, does not meet with the approval of the Grange. These trade treaties should be ratified by the United States Senate before becoming effective. If this safeguard is not provided, the Reciprocal Tariff Act of 1934 should be repealed.

5. LAND UTILIZATION

The goal of any long-time policy for land utilization should be the preservation of the family and medium-sized farm unit. Corporation farming is un-American and fatal to both our democracy and our type of agriculture. The very large farm should not receive encouragement from the Government. Following is a concise outline of Grange policy on this question:

(a) If, under prevailing conditions, new land is brought under cultivation at public expense, the Government should purchase and retire from agricultural production a much greater amount of submarginal land.

(b) Submarginal agricultural land should be utilized for pasture, timber production, recreational uses, game preserves, or other purposes.

(c) The most precious inheritance that we have received from the distant past is the fertile soil. The Grange heartily endorses the work now being done by the Soil Conservation Service, which is of inestimable importance to the future of our country.

(d) We favor the restoration of the Bureau of Soils as a separate entity under the Department of Agriculture.

(e) It is in the national interest that there be retained in the Department of Agriculture the complete management of the national forests, the Soil Conservation Service, and the Biological Survey. Nationally owned lands of primary value for timber production, water and soil conservation, and grazing, including lands administered under the Taylor Grazing Act, should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture.

6. TAXATION

The mounting deficits sustained by the Federal Treasury emphasize the need of economy in governmental expenditures. Every effort should be made to balance the Federal Budget at the earliest practicable date.

The present situation calls for the continuance of heavy income and inheritance taxes in the higher brackets, especially upon high and excessive salary incomes, together with excessive corporation profits. The gift tax must be high enough to prevent tax evasions.

We reaffirm our vigorous opposition to the imposition of a general sales tax, because such a tax ignores the principle of ability to pay and is levied upon the necessities of the people.

We oppose the further issuance of tax-exempt bonds and securities, together with unreasonable tax exemptions in any form.

We favor the appointment of a Federal commission to make a study of our whole system of taxation, Federal and State, with a view to securing a more just and equitable distribution of the burdens of government and greater economy in the assessment and collection of taxes.

7. TARIFF POLICY

Following is an outline of the tariff policy adopted by the National Grange:

(a) So long as the American protective policy is maintained, we favor such rates of import duty as will insure the American market to the American farmer upon farm commodities that can be produced advantageously in any part of our country.

(b) Since it is well understood that producers of surplus crops receive no direct tariff benefits, equality and justice demand that import duties on commodities which the farmer must buy should be fixed at fair and reasonable levels.

(c) We advocate that growers of crops of which we produce an exportable surplus shall be accorded benefits to equalize tariff costs, as provided under the export debenture plan.

(d) Because the natural resources of the country should be wisely used and conserved for the benefit of this and succeeding generations, we affirm that it is contrary to sound public policy to impose tariffs for the protection of such resources as cannot be renewed when they are once exhausted.

(e) In no case should tariff rates be granted which breed monopoly, enriching the few at the expense of the many, and which encourage inefficiency rather than efficiency in American industry.

(f) We reaffirm the long-established policy of the Grange in demanding "tariff for all or tariff for none."

8. RAILROADS

Railroads should cooperate to reduce competitive expenses; unnecessary services should be abandoned; metropolitan terminals should be consolidated and circuitous haulage should be eliminated. We believe that the railroads should be permitted to engage in motor transportation under proper conditions, and we favor the elimination of some of the restrictions on railroads which were necessary when they had a monopoly of land transportation.

The Grange is unalterably opposed to the proposal for the repeal of the long- and short-haul clause of the Transportation Act, which provides that railroads may not charge more for a short haul than for a longer one.

9. MOTOR TRANSPORTATION

We approve of the appropriations made by the Federal Government for highway construction, including the allocation for a just proportion of such funds for the improvement of farm-to-market roads. The attitude of the Grange regarding the regulation and taxation of motor vehicles is as follows:

(a) The interest and safety of the public require enforcement of proper restrictions regarding the size, weight, and speed of all motor vehicles moving over the public highway.

(b) Such regulations should be uniform as between the several States, and there should be reciprocity between the States, based on such uniformity.

(c) The power to regulate is a police power lodged with the States. As a basis for regulation, we commend to all the States adoption of the uniform code for the regulation of traffic, approved by the American Association of State Highway Officials and the United States Bureau of Public Roads.

(d) With respect to highway taxation, each motor vehicle should be taxed its fair share of the cost of the highways which it uses. The State should be the sole taxing agency.

(e) Every special tax collected for highway improvement should be conserved for that purpose alone. Consequently no gasoline tax diversion should be permitted.

(f) No taxation or regulation of motor vehicles should be permitted which has for its purpose any increase in cost or restriction in use in order to equalize competition between motor transportation and other forms of transportation.

(g) We advocate the repeal of the Motor Carriers' Act of 1935 on the ground that this legislation is not in the public interest.

10. INLAND WATERWAYS

Since the Federal Government, over a period of many years, has expended large sums of money for the development and improvement of our inland waterways, the Grange is opposed to the adoption of any policy which would destroy the value of this wise investment. Our water-borne commerce should not be hindered or restricted by unnecessary regulation and interference on the part of the Government, as is proposed in pending legislation on this subject.

11. AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

We commend the Farm Credit Administration for the excellent service it has rendered to agriculture during the past several years. It is of vital importance that interest rates on farm mortgages held by the Federal land banks be kept at the lowest level consistent with a sound loaning policy. We urge Congress to restore to farmer borrowers the right to name a majority of the directors of the land banks, as was provided under the original Farm Loan Act. The Governor of the Farm Credit Administration should not be permitted to dismiss without cause district directors of the land banks, as he may do under the Farm Credit Act of 1933.

12. MONETARY STABILIZATION

The Grange stands for an honest dollar, a dollar that will be fair to debtor and creditor alike. We advocate an amendment to the Banking Act of 1935, under the terms of which Congress will give a mandate to the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System to manage the currency in such a way as to restore the average price level obtaining between 1921 and 1929, and then to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar at that point. Congress should exercise the authority conferred upon it by the Constitution "to coin money and regulate the value thereof."

To save interest on the public debt we believe it would be sound policy for the Government to issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, not exceeding $3,000,000,000, in providing relief funds or financing any further public-works projects that may be undertaken. In issuing such currency definite provision should be made for its redemption at a given rate per year.

13. PRICES OF FARM MACHINERY

We favor congressional action directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate corporations engaged in the manufacture, sale, or distribution of agricultural implements and machinery to definitely establish whether or not unfair trade practices and price-fixing agreements are responsible for the continued unreasonably high prices demanded of farmers for such equipment.

14. AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

We approve of the additional appropriations authorized at the last session of Congress for the endowment of our land-grant colleges and for the further development of extension work in agriculture and home economics, together with more adequate funds for the support of State experiment stations. We likewise favor adequate appropriations for the support of vocational education. These appropriations represent an investment paying substantial dividends.

We recommend that the Smith-Lever Act be so amended as to forbid direct or indirect contributions to the agricultural Extension Service on the part of private citizens, chambers of commerce, farm organizations, or similar groups, so that extension workers shall be paid entirely from public funds, leaving them free to serve the people without favoritism or discrimination. In no case should the Extension Service be dominated by any particular farm organization.

15. PACKERS AND STOCKYARDS ACT

We advocate the amendment of the Packers and Stockyards Act to provide for the more effective regulation by the Department of Agriculture of the marketing of livestock. Direct buying by the packers merely in an effort to evade the law and depress prices must not be further tolerated.

Packers should likewise be prevented from engaging in large-scale feeding projects, either directly or through financial interest.

16. AGRICULTURAL RESEARCH

We favor continued Federal support of agricultural research, particularly with a view to discovering new uses for farm products and the utilization of surplus crops. Further experimentation in the manufacture of industrial alcohol from farm products would be especially helpful.

17. RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

We are in sympathy with the movement sponsored by the Government for rural electrification; but before electricity can be brought within reach of the average farm family, extortionate rates for service must be eliminated. In loaning Government funds, public power districts and nonprofit cooperative associations should be given the preference.

18. IMITATION DAIRY PRODUCTS

It is of vital interest to the dairy industry as well as to the consuming public that all legislation for the control and regulation of manufacturers of and dealers in imitation dairy products should remain in full force and effect. We emphasize our support of the essential features of a proper oleomargarine-control law, namely:

(a) Adequate licensing of manufacturers, wholesalers, and retail dealers.

(b) An inclusive definition of the imitation product, including color specifications.

(c) Clear provisions for labeling and notice to the buyer.

(d) License fees and tax sufficient to cover Government cost of enforcing the law, and to prevent unfair competition with the dairy industry.

(e) We ask for such legislation as may be necessary to prevent mail order or other interstate sales of oleomargarine which are in violation of such laws as are now in force or may hereafter be enacted.

19. UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

We advocate abolition of needless holding companies, which in most instances simply serve the purpose of hiding the excessive profits earned by public utilities.

20. PURE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

Nearly 30 years of experience in the administration of the Pure Food and Drugs Act has shown its great value, besides disclosing certain inadequacies to control present-day abuses. This legislation should be so amended as to bring collateral advertising within the scope of the act.

21. CONTROL OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

The results following the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, which speak for themselves, emphasize the need of doing everything possible to protect society against the ill effects of the liquor traffic. We are as much opposed to this demoralizing traffic as ever. The Grange position on this question is summarized as follows:

(a) We oppose the sale of intoxicants in the immediate vicinity of churches, schools, and colleges.

(b) We oppose the advertising of intoxicants over the radio, in newspapers or magazines, and in moving-picture theaters.

(c) The element of profit should be eliminated as much as possible from the manufacture, distribution, and sale of intoxicants.

(d) We favor the adoption of adequate measures by the Government to protect dry States from the shipment of intoxicating liquor across their borders from wet territory, fulfilling the pledge that was made by the advocates of repeal.

(e) We are opposed to excessive taxes on liquor, since excessive taxation will encourage bootlegging, official corruption, and general violation of the law.

(f) We recommend that granges throughout the land join with other organizations in promoting a campaign of education, calling attention to the evil effect of strong drink, exposing the fallacy of the idea that any nation can drink its way to prosperity, and emphasizing the truth that decency and sobriety are virtues that bring their own reward.

21. POOLING MINERAL WEALTH

We favor action by Congress that will promote and encourage the pooling of petroleum and other mineral resources underlying farm lands.

22. POSTAL REGULATIONS

We favor legislation that, while not interfering with the monopoly of the Government in carrying the mails, will nevertheless enable business and cooperative institutions to send bills, statements, checks, and similar matter to customers or members by messenger, without undue interference from the Post Office Department.

23. LAND OWNERSHIP

We favor legislation prohibiting land ownership or leasing in the name of minor children born in the United States of alien parents, when the latter are prevented by law from leasing or owning land.

24. REGISTRATION OF ALIENS

We favor legislation requiring that all aliens be registered by the Federal Government and compelled to pay a registration fee of from $5 to $10. Those who fail to become naturalized within a period of 10 years should be deported. We oppose any weakening of the present immigration laws.

25. OLD-AGE PENSIONS

While recognizing the obligations of society to the aged and needy, we reaffirm our opposition to any form of old-age pension which will discourage thrift and personal effort during the productive years of life.

26. REGULATING COMMODITY EXCHANGES

The Grange advocates needed legislation for the regulation of commodity exchanges, which, while not forbidding legitimate hedging, should prohibit pure gambling in agricultural products.

27. TRAIL SMELTER DAMAGES

We urge the Federal Government to do all in its power to secure speedy justice for those farmers in the State of Washington whose crops and livestock have been damaged and whose health has been impaired by the sulphurous fumes of the Trail Smelter, located across the boundary line in British Columbia. Any settlement of the case should make adequate provision for future control of the smelter fumes.

28. TAKING PROFITS OUT OF WAR

We reaffirm our position in favor of taking the profits out of war. Legislation should be enacted providing that in the event of future armed conflict wealth, as well as man power, should be conscripted. The manufacture of armaments and munitions for national defense should be taken over by the Government in time of war.

29. HONEST MERCHANDISING

We favor legislation for truth in fabrics, both for the benefit of agriculture and the protection of the consumer. Labeling shoes to indicate the materials used in their manufacture should likewise be required.

30. WORLD PEACE

We earnestly advocate that the Government of the United States continue to exert every effort to promote peace and good will among nations. Since disarmament on a purely national basis is not practicable, we cherish the hope that our Government may use its best endeavors to bring about reduction in armaments on an international scale.

We favor a sound neutrality policy that will save America from becoming entangled in foreign wars of greed, hatred, and aggression, and which are of no direct concern to us.

COURT OR CONGRESS?—ARTICLE BY HOWARD LEE M'BAIN

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the New York Times Magazine of last Sunday contained a most interesting and informative discussion of the recent Supreme Court decision on the Agricultural Adjustment Act by Howard Lee McBain, dean of the graduate faculties and Ruggles professor of constitutional law at Columbia University. I request unanimous consent to have it printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of Jan. 19, 1936]

THE ISSUE: COURT OR CONGRESS?—PROFESSOR M'BAIN SEES BASIC QUESTIONS ARISING AS A CONSEQUENCE OF THE A. A. A. DECISION

By Howard Lee McBain

The Hoosac Mills case will live to torment the defenders of judicial supremacy long after the issue of farmers' relief has become a historical episode. It may ultimately have some profound effect upon American institutional development than all of the New Deal experiments rolled into one.

At the moment this possibility is obscured. So much heat has already been engendered over the New Deal that clear thinking on public questions and especially on constitutional questions is now at high premium. The decision is naturally damned by the pro-New Dealers and hailed by the antis. And that seems to be about all there is to it.

Probably not many in either camp have read more than the headlines. Almost certainly not all of those who have read the decision have understood it, which is not wholly their fault, for it is not easy to understand. But I predict that in a more sober hour it will be read and analyzed by far larger numbers than at present and that it will live on into the years to plague its begetters.

It will not only be grist for the mill of the liberals and radicals who have long opposed the institution of judicial supremacy as such; it will weaken or shatter the faith of many who, though they have sometimes greatly deplored specific results of the Court's power to declare laws void, have, nevertheless, believed in the general beneficence and wisdom of judicial review as an institution.

The plight of the farmer, not only in itself but also in its relation to the national economy as a whole, is of great importance. No doubt it will be somehow met, though probably by no scheme that will not enlist wide and substantial opposition. The A. A. A. was not the only possible solution that might have been attempted. At most it was far from perfect. So much was frankly admitted by most of its intelligent supporters. Many intelligent persons who opposed it thought it positively pernicious.

But the judges of the Court had no business to concern themselves with this fact of disagreement or to be influenced in the slightest degree by their own personal views concerning the wisdom or unwisdom of the policy under review. Their function was to determine, not whether Congress had acted wisely and intelligently in enacting the law, not whether the A. A. A. was good or bad, but whether Congress had the power to enact it even if the policy it embodied was, in their economic opinion, thoroughly vicious.

As usual, the Court in this case protests its innocence in this regard: "This Court neither approves nor condemns any legislative policy." This has become, as it were, a kind of juristic ritual, solemnly recited in all such cases by way of introduction as the procession of the Court's thoughts moves toward the statutory death chamber. It is, if one may so put it without undue respect, a sort of "whistling in the moral dark" in the final dread hour of a law's execution.

I have often wondered why the Court thinks this protestation requires such constant reiteration. It is, after all, merely a maxim of proper judicial conduct, a standard for the Court's own governance. Why, then, should it not be taken for granted that both the public and the litigants will assume that the Court is performing its judicial duty with scrupulous propriety?

Apparently, however, the dissenting judges did not take this protestation of the majority at its full face value, as many others outside the Court have refused to take it in times past, and will refuse again in this instance. For the dissenters went further than merely to disagree with the majority's arguments. In language so strongly phrased and pointedly directed that its inferences can scarcely be avoided, the minority appear to accuse the majority of not restricting themselves to their judicial duty as prescribed by this oft-avowed and here reiterated rule of conduct.

This accusation was, of course, not made in so many direct words. The proprieties of the bench as well as the manifest necessity for a continuance of close association among the judges impose exactions upon a judge's freedom of speech where the seemliness of his colleagues' conduct is involved. Vigorous and argument-shattering dissents are by no means unknown. Sarcasm and irony are not wholly novel. But never before that I can recall has a dissenting minority gone quite so far toward calling into question the motives of the majority and clearly implying that they have abused their judicial prerogative.

Let one or two of Mr. Justice Stone's expressions speak for themselves:

(1) "The suggestion that it (the power of the purse) must now be curtailed by judicial fiat because it may be abused by unwise use hardly rises to the dignity of argument. So may judicial power be abused."

Now, "fiat" is no soft word. True, Justice Stone does not expressly declare that the opinion of the majority is mere fiat—that is, a command established, as it were, by judicial omniscience and therefore without any necessary reference to the Constitution, which is the only source of the Court's competence. Likewise, he does not specifically say that this particular opinion of the Court is an abuse of judicial power. But are not both implications fairly unavoidable? And surely any line of reasoning that does not rise to the dignity of argument is in itself an abuse of judicial power.

(2) "A tortured construction of the Constitution is not to be justified by recourse to extreme examples of reckless congressional spending."

Here, again, there is no direct assertion that the construction put upon the Constitution by the majority is tortured. But what other inference can possibly be drawn from this declaration? And what possible motive could prompt a tortured construction except a determination to annul the law at whatever cost to constitutional reasoning?

(3) He goes on to assert that suppositions based upon these extreme examples of congressional spending "must leave unmoved any but the mind accustomed to believe that it is the business of courts to sit in judgment on the wisdom of legislative action." Once more, be it said, he does not explicitly declare that he here refers to suppositions indulged in by the majority. Yet the majority opinion contains such suppositions at considerable length, and the implication is almost unescapable that he accuses them, at least to that extent, of being motivated and controlled by their views concerning the wisdom of the law.

The foregoing quoted excerpts from the minority opinion indicate more than a mere disagreement among the judges over the meaning and application of constitutional words. They justify the deduction that the minority intended them to mean something more—intended them to challenge the motives that prompted the decision of their colleagues and to charge the majority with having stepped outside their proper function as guardians of the Constitution and usurped the role of arbiters of legislative policy.

This is a grave charge, coming as it does from critics who have opportunities not open to the rest of us for discovering the mainsprings of thought that lie beneath and behind judicial action and utterance. For these critics have not only read the opinion that was written but have also, unlike the rest of us, sat around the table and exchanged arguments—no doubt hot arguments—with him who wrote and those who subscribed to that opinion.

It may be said, however, that, even though its pronouncement by a judge is unique, there is nothing new in the charge that the Court, in declaring a law unconstitutional, often gives expression to what is in fact, no matter how disguised in judicial rhetoric, merely the personal judgment of the judges concerning the wisdom of the law. This is true; such a charge has frequently been made. Moreover, the charge itself is also true; decisions have been made upon this basis. Indeed, in construing and applying certain vague phrases of the Constitution, it is difficult to see (barring the possibility of a court of superjudges) how the result could be otherwise.

Take the phrase "due process of law." Except as a very general adjuration that decency and fairness must be observed in matters of procedure affecting personal and property rights, the phrase is practically meaningless. But the Court early gave it a violent twist that made it apply to and cover not only procedural requirements but also substantive law; that is, statutes that attempt to establish public policies by regulating the conduct of individuals in their economic and social relations to one another as well as to the Government.

This twist enormously expanded the scope of due process; but as an indication of what the Government might or might not concretely do in the matter of fixing policies, the phrase was still utterly meaningless. The courts have supplied out of their own consciousness the only meaning that it has.

In the course of the years a good many tests of what is and what is not due process have been handed down by the courts. "Handed down" is an apt term, for these tests have had their origin not in the meaning of the constitutional phrase itself but wholly in the political and social philosophies of the judges, however acquired.

Now, in this slow and still incomplete process of etching, line by painful line, the meaning of this manifestly meaningless phrase, it has been inevitable that the views of judges concerning the wisdom of legislative policies have played an important, perhaps a controlling, part. For not many judges are able or willing, as was Justice Holmes, for example, so to detach themselves from their personal views and predilections as to refuse to join in annulling a law under due process, even though they have no sympathy for or belief in the wisdom or efficacy of its policy. Many of their opinions prove conclusively their incapacity to perform this difficult intellectual feat.

But if it be conceded that, at least so far as due process is concerned, this practice is not wholly uncommon of determining the constitutionality of a law by applying the Court's views of its goodness or badness, its wisdom or unwisdom, in what respect, if any, does the Hoosac case differ?

Does not that case also merely construe and apply for the first time in our judicial history another vague and hitherto undefined phrase of the Constitution, to wit, the phrase "general welfare"? Under the institution of judicial supremacy, was not the Court compelled, whether it wished to do so or not, to give meaning and specific application to this phrase? And if, in giving this meaning and application, the Court was swayed by its convictions in respect of the wisdom of the law, well, what of it? Is this not merely following the sometime practice of the Court in construing that other vague phrase, "due process"?

The parallel seems striking; indeed, almost perfect. And it would be perfect in fact if the Court had done what it might have done and what many persons, with or without reading the opinion, appear to think that it did do. Had the Court merely said that the Constitution empowers Congress to levy taxes "to provide for * * * the general welfare", but that in its opinion (supported by whatever line of reasoning it chose to pursue) this law was not for the general welfare, the analogy of the Hoosac case to many of the due-process cases would have been indisputable.

But, despite what appears to be a widespread impression to the contrary, this is precisely what the Court did not do. On the contrary, it declared most emphatically: "We are not now required to ascertain the scope of the phrase 'general welfare of the United States' or to determine whether an appropriation in aid of agriculture falls within it. Wholly apart from that question another principle embodied in our Constitution prohibits the enforcement of the Agricultural Adjustment Act."

In the Hoosac case, therefore, the general-welfare clause was put wholly aside. The other "principle" with which the Court found the law to be in conflict was that "the act invades the reserved rights of the States." This was the point and the only point upon which decision in the case was reached.

In applying this principle one important aspect of the matter seems to have escaped the attention both of the majority and the minority. What right of the States, it may be pertinently asked, did the law of Congress invade? Well, the Court held that the A. A. A. was a law controlling agricultural production; so it must have invaded the right of the States to control agricultural production.

But whoever heard of a State's exercising any such right? A more ludicrous policy for any State to attempt on its own could scarcely be imagined. How its sister States would chortle! Apparently, nevertheless, it was to preserve this precious theoretical right of the States, a right which for obvious practical reasons they would never dream of exercising in isolation, that the law of Congress was held to be fatally defective. It would be difficult to discover a more inappropriate subject of law as a text for the Court's spread-eagle remarks on the danger of destroying the local self-government of the States and "obliterating the constituent members of the Union."

Be that as it may, the Court proceeded to apply this principle of States' rights by a specious course of reasoning, the very core of which the dissenting judges justly assert "is contradictory and destructive of the power to appropriate for the public welfare and is incapable of practical application."

In these circumstances and wholly irrespective of the fate of the A. A. A., an unbiased mind, jealously interested in the proper functioning of our institutions, including the institution of judicial control, is driven almost in spite of itself to suspect that the Court was not prompted and governed, as it should have been, solely by the desire and purpose to apply to the law a rational interpretation of the Constitution. This suspicion would be justified even if the dissenting judges had been less accusatory in their implications. Such an unbiased mind can hardly escape the conclusion that the Court was determined to kill this law no matter what sacrifices of logic and reasoning was necessary in the process of torturing the Constitution to that end.

Why was the "general welfare" clause avoided? Possibly because it would have been palpably absurd to declare that Nation-wide relief for the distress of agriculture was not for the general welfare, but possibly also because of the magnitude of the implications of such a doctrine as applied to numerous other laws of Congress, involving both in retrospect and prospect untold billions of dollars. In avoiding the Scylla of these implications, however, the Court ran head-on into the Charybdis of others equally grave, as was amply demonstrated in the dissenting opinion.

There will be many who will call this decision political. Some will employ the uglier word—partisan. Not all of these will be pro-New Dealers or persons who believe in the soundness of the A. A. A. as an economic policy. There will be those who will seriously question whether the decision, had it been handed down 18 months ago, would have been identical in tone and result though the Constitution is not supposed to change with the season.

Almost certain it is that had the decision been rendered at that time there would have been an immediate, widespread, and powerful movement either to wipe the decision off the books by amending the Constitution or to destroy or otherwise cripple the power of the Court to declare laws of Congress unconstitutional. In the present hour the tide has run and is running so strongly against the New Deal that no such movement is politically possible.

It is, however, in the possibility of a movement at perhaps no very distant date to curb the power of the Court in this regard that the Hoosac case seems to me to be of principal importance. In such a movement it will play a conspicuous role. Decisions of the Court sometimes gain in import with the passage of time. Marbury against Madison, one of the most famous cases of our history, aroused no comment whatever at the time of its rendering because its political significance had disappeared. Its institutional significance appeared at a later day and established its fame.

The immediate political significance of the Hoosac Mills case will likewise disappear. But its institutional significance will, in my judgment, increase with the lapse of years. It is a shining and warning example of judicial supremacy at its worst.

In considering judicial supremacy as an operating institution of vast importance in our scheme of government, the interested public does not always distinguish between the power of the Court to declare laws of Congress void and its power to declare State laws void. The institution operates far more frequently upon State than upon national laws.

Sometimes the annulment of a State law attracts much wider attention and invokes far greater criticism than the annulment of some national law. For example, Lockner v. New York, involving a State 10-hour bakeries law, was long a veritable firebrand in the hands of those who would without further ado ruthlessly raze the whole tabernacle of judicial control.

On the other hand, most people never heard of the O'Donoghue case, which less than 3 years ago held void a provision of an appropriation act of Congress in its application to the salary of a lower Federal judge. In other words, the degree of public interest that is enlisted by a case in which the Court vetoes a law is determined by the subject of the law rather than by the question of its State or National origin. In consequence, the critics and opponents of judicial control usually assail the system, branch and root.

There is, however, a distinction. It was voiced by Mr. Justice Holmes when he said in 1913: "I do not think the United States would come to an end if we lost our power to declare an act of Congress void. I do think the Union would be imperiled if we could not make that declaration as to the laws of the several States."

He meant that in a Federal system such as ours there must be some national authority empowered to prevent the individual States from encroaching not only upon national powers but also upon the powers of one another. He was manifestly right; and probably no authority more appropriate than the Supreme Court could be devised for this purpose.

But the control of the Court over State laws does not end with keeping them in leash to the Federal idea. The due-process ogre, for instance, has no bearing whatever upon Federalism. Nor have most of the cases in which the Court's defeat of State laws has been severely criticized had any such bearing.

Judicial annulment of acts of Congress has developed very slowly in practice. Only two laws were voided in the first 75 years of our history. In the 35 years from the Civil War to the close of the century only 23 laws fell. In the next 33 years, or down to the administration of the present Roosevelt, the number was 41. This gradual increase was natural; for Congress was expanding its powers, doing more things than formerly. Even so, many of these laws were of trivial or transitory importance.

Perhaps the only acts in our entire history antedating the New Deal that marked high spots of judicial annihilation were the Missouri Compromise over slavery, the Legal Tender Act (promptly overruled), the Civil Rights Act of the reconstruction era, the Income Tax Act of 1894, the act of 1898 prohibiting interstate carriers from discriminating against labor unions, the first and second child-labor acts, the Minimum Wage Act for the District of Columbia, the Federal Corrupt Practices Act as applied to senatorial primaries, and an act requiring senatorial confirmation of Presidential removals from office. In all, only 10 laws of first-rate significance!

But in 2 short years the Court has already struck down eight acts of the New Deal Congress, five of which (the hot-oil provision, the Railway Retirement Act, the N. I. R. A., the Farm Mortgage Act, and the A. A. A.) were of very great importance. Even the gold-clause resolution was only partly salvaged from destruction. And the end is by no means yet. Other important acts are awaiting almost certain slaughter at the hands of the Court.

In its operation upon acts of Congress prior to the New Deal era the institution of judicial control, tested by the small number of important instances in which its destructive gavel has fallen, seems scarcely to justify the vehemence and scope of the attacks it has provoked. This is no doubt explainable in large part by the already-mentioned failure of its critics to distinguish always between the two uneven barrels of its gun, the one aimed at national laws, the other at laws of the States. The totality of its restraints has given rise to a cumulative and undiscriminating opposition.

Yet, strangely enough, most of the proposals that have been put forward to curb the power of the Court have been directed to the end of protecting only acts of Congress, not laws of the States. These proposals have included (1) the complete withdrawal of this power from the Court; (2) an amendment providing that the reenactment of a law held unconstitutional shall operate to override the Court's veto (much as a Presidential veto may be overridden); and (3) the requirement of an extraordinary or even a unanimous vote of the judges to render a law inoperative on the grounds of unconstitutionality.

The suggestion that, if Congress increased its membership and the President appointed additional judges, the Court might thus be "packed" to sustain a program of questioned laws may doubtless be dismissed as politically chimerical at this or almost any other time. This would be a high-handed procedure and at most only a palliative.

No one of these proposals should be—and, needless to say, in normal times no one of them will be—adopted without wide discussion and studied consideration. That judicial control has objections may be admitted. But there are likewise objections to each of these proposed "cures."

A movement to adopt some such remedy, however, may gain headway in the course of time—perhaps at no distant date. We have recently witnessed and experienced swift changes in our political thinking. Swift changes may occur again. If and when the time arrives, a decision such as that in the Hoosac case will certainly give impetus and power to any movement directed toward the destruction or the emasculation of the institution of judicial supremacy.

Mr. Justice Roberts, the spokesman of the majority, expresses grave concern over the danger that Congress may obliterate the States and thus destroy our Federal system. Most people will concede that serious dangers inhere in a too great centralization of power in Washington, though how to avoid this in the years ahead will be no problem for children. But the danger that both Congress and the people may some day make Hoosac cases impossible is in fact a danger far more imminent than anything approximating a complete smashing of the States by Congress. Moreover, Congress alone, without resort to amending the Constitution, has more power to put brakes on the Court than many people suspect.

It was doubtless with some such thought in mind that Mr. Justice Stone was led to answer his alarmed colleagues in a powerful concluding paragraph that ought to be read and pondered by every American who is genuinely and thoughtfully concerned about the institution of judicial control:

"Courts are not the only agency of government that must be assumed to have capacity to govern. Congress and the courts both unhappily may falter or be mistaken in the performance of their constitutional duty. But interpretation of our great charter of Government which proceeds on any assumption that the responsibility for the preservation of our institutions is the exclusive concern of any one of the three branches of Government, or that it alone can save them from destruction is far more likely, in the long run, 'to obliterate the constituent members' of 'an indestructible union of indestructible States' than the frank recognition that language even of a constitution may mean what it says."

INDUSTRIAL DISPUTES AND PRODUCTION CONTROL—PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, a few days ago I introduced a joint resolution, being Senate Joint Resolution 185, proposing an amendment to the Constitution. At that time the joint resolution was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I now desire to make a few remarks as to the necessity for some amendment to the Constitution and to make some references to the recent decisions of the Supreme Court.

The amendment to the Constitution which I propose is as follows:

ARTICLE —

SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power in the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, and within the Indian tribes, to provide by such law as the Congress shall deem necessary or desirable for—

(1) The conciliation, arbitration, and settlement of industrial disputes of all persons, corporations, or other business associations of whatever description and their employees, farmers excepted, whose products may move in or affect interstate or foreign commerce; and

(2) For the regulation and control of the production of any agricultural, mineral, or manufactured product of whatever description which may move in or affect interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. President, the time has come in the history of our constitutional form of government when we should examine its foundation and learn whether it is in need of such repairs as may be necessary to support the superstructure which has been erected upon it. This foundation is the Constitution framed in the beginning of our national life, and it, with such amendments as have been adopted from time to time, is the only support of our national life as a republic. If the foundation shows defects, not because of inherent infirmities but because the superstructure has grown too large or has taken such form as makes it impossible for the foundation to support it, there is no reason why we should allow the superstructure to fall, but, instead, we should broaden the foundation so that it will be sufficient to support the economic conditions of the Nation. Such broadening of the foundation was provided for by the framers of the Constitution when it was originally submitted to the States for ratification. It has been necessary from time to time to enlarge the powers of the Federal Government so that the life of the Nation could be extended, and it is meet that we pause in this era to make a careful survey of the situation to determine whether additions to the Constitution should be made through the process of orderly amendment. This has been brought sharply to the attention of the Congress and the people by reason of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

I have no criticism of the Supreme Court to offer or suggest. In its recent opinions it has but adopted one theory of constitutional interpretation which has been advocated from the foundation of the Government as against the other theory of interpretation which apparently was fathered by Chief Justice Marshall. Either theory of interpretation which may have been followed by the Supreme Court would have caused disagreement with the opinion on the part of those who believed that the other theory should have been followed.

If the Supreme Court has denied to Congress power which that body thought it had, or which it does have if the other theory of interpretation should have been followed, the people are not without remedy if they disagree with the interpretation which has been placed upon the Constitution.

If Congress does not have the power to enact such laws as are necessary for the continuation of national life, then there is but one place to go to obtain such power, and that is to the States or the people. If they approve the interpretation of the Supreme Court, the matter will be ended, but if they agree that Congress should have additional power, such power may be conferred and the old controversy ended. If the people determine the matters against their best interest, the fault will be with them and not with the Congress, and if, as a result of such determination, our national life comes to an end, no one has any reason to complain, as constitutional government must be in the hands of the people.

I do not believe that it would be wise to attempt a settlement of these important questions by limitation of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It would perhaps be unwise to interfere at all with the power of the Supreme Court as it now exists. Necessarily there must be some tribunal to interpret the Constitution, and the judicial branch of the Government can do that much better than the legislative branch. It is true that the Congress may be changed by the people if its interpretation of the Constitution does not meet with their approval, but the Supreme Court cannot be changed if its interpretation does not meet with the approval of the people.

Our national life cannot be continued except through the separation of the three branches of government as far as it may be done. One branch must not be allowed to usurp the powers of another branch. Congress should not interfere with the functions of the judicial branch of the Government except within strictly constitutional limitations. It is equally true that the Supreme Court should not be allowed to usurp the powers of Congress. Of the two, the usurpation of power by the Supreme Court would be more dangerous than the usurpation of power by the Congress. In one instance the body is subject to the will of the people, while in the other it is not.

It may be that the Supreme Court has not trespassed upon the powers of Congress; but, looking at the situation without passion or prejudice, it appears to my mind that the Supreme Court has a tendency to trespass upon the powers of the Congress; and if that is true, and the Congress should supinely allow such trespass, it would be failing in its duty to the Republic.

A dictatorship in this country could not be established or maintained by the executive branch of the Government. Neither could a dictatorship or an oligarchy be established by the Congress as long as the people are allowed to give free expression of their will through the ballot box. A dictatorship or an oligarchy could be established by the Supreme Court if it should usurp the powers of the executive and legislative branches of the Government.

I do not mean to intimate that the Supreme Court will intentionally usurp any of the powers belonging to either of the other branches of Government. I only intend to convey the idea that the Supreme Court could assume the power to usurp and that the people would be without remedy. If such a time should ever come and the people could not control the situation or prevent such usurpation, difficulties of the worst kind would not be hard to imagine.

Since there must be a determination of all controversial questions, there is no better way for their settlement than by the decisions of the Supreme Court, which are now, and have always been, binding upon other branches of Government and the people as well. It is true that differences over the interpretation of constitutional provisions led to the War between the States, and the question in controversy was settled by war rather than by peaceful determination. As a result of that forced interpretation of the Constitution amendments were adopted so that the Constitution would conform to that which had been attained by force of arms, and the Government continued its existence. If the people had spoken in an authoritative manner before the civil strife began and the Constitution had been amended to conform to the ideas that eventually prevailed, the War between the States might have been averted.

Our form of government, when established, was something new among the nations. Perhaps the only new thing in it was the Federal idea. The creation of sovereign States within a sovereign Government meant eventual difficulties in drawing the line between the State sovereignties and the sovereignty of the Federal Government. We are prone to forget that originally each of the Thirteen Colonies became a sovereign and independent State. Each possessed all the power of a sovereign State. In order to adopt a Constitution, the States surrendered a part of their sovereignty to constitute a Federal Government. The framers of the Constitution attempted to define the powers granted to the Federal Government.

At that time the United States, then in process of formation, consisted of 13 States, thinly populated, with little means of communication with each other, and what now constitutes the vast domain of the United States was then unexplored regions, uninhabited and without any kind of government. It was rarely that a citizen of one State found his way into the territory of another State. The means of transportation and communication that existed then made it necessary for the States to retain the larger part of their sovereignty. There were no railroads, no steamboats, and few highways, and the commerce among the States was carried on, if at all, through crude methods of transportation. The people necessarily resided in their own communities, for the very good reason that they had no means of going elsewhere. Occasionally the bolder spirits among them sought new country to conquer. Commerce among the States was of no great importance to the people generally.

The framers of the Constitution realized that the Nation must develop, and that many conditions would arise requiring adjustment of the power of the Federal Government and the power of the State governments. The Federal Government is supreme touching all matters delegated to it by the States. The States are supreme touching that power reserved by them or reserved to the people. Hardly had the Constitution been adopted before a well-defined division was discovered in the minds of statesmen over the interpretation of the provisions delegating authority to the Federal Government. The strict constructionists, such as Madison, and the liberal constructionists, such as Hamilton, found themselves in disagreement in the very beginning of the Government.

Before many years had elapsed it was discovered that the Federal Government was well-nigh impotent if the strict constructionists should have their way. Then it was that Chief Justice Marshall became the dominant figure in the interpretation of the Constitution. His masterly mind enabled him to well understand that the Nation could not exist without a more liberal construction of the Constitution than was placed upon it by Madison and those who adhered to his theory of interpretation. Had it not been for the extension of the doctrine of implied powers by Marshall to meet the economic life of the growing Nation, perhaps the history of our Nation would be altogether different. He strengthened, by his opinions, the powers of the Federal Government. There was continuous opposition to his interpretation of the Constitution and the attacks upon his opinions were bitter. It was charged that the Supreme Court was usurping power reserved to the States. The same charge has been made from time to time during our entire national history. Now there is some criticism of the Supreme Court on the ground that it is denying the Federal Government power that it has.

There is a twilight zone between the powers of the States and the powers of the Federal Government, and the line must be drawn by the Supreme Court; and, when it has been so established, if power that Congress should have falls on the side of the States, Congress may obtain that power through necessary amendments to the Constitution. If the States refuse to grant the power, nothing can be done about it. There is no way to get around the Constitution in a time of emergency any more than at any other time. No emergency, however great, will justify the assumption by Congress of power that it did not have prior to the emergency. It is true that the States might have conferred upon Congress extraordinary powers to meet emergencies, but this was not done. The Constitution remains the same during emergencies as at other times.

It is my opinion that there should be found in every constitution power to insure the perpetuation of the life of the nation. Such was conferred upon Congress by the Constitution appropriate to the age in which it was adopted. For one to say that necessary power remains the same under all conditions is to state that which the framers of the Constitution did not believe. Conditions change and the Constitution must be amended to meet changing conditions.

In the beginning the economic life of the Nation could be compressed into the territory of the independent States without bringing about disaster, but civilization has become so complex in all respects that the economic life of the Nation cannot be compressed within the separate limits of the 48 States. The necessity for existence and happiness has overflown State boundaries, and many of the great social questions that must be solved cannot be solved by 48 States acting independently. Agriculture in one State affects the life of the citizens in every other State. Mining touches every citizen of the Nation, and the same thing is true of manufacturing. Laws to bring about the happiness and prosperity of the man who labors cannot be left exclusively within the power of the separate States with conflicting ideas of right and wrong. The power which Congress needed to legislate for the general welfare in the days of the oxcart cannot be the same as the power needed in the days of the high-powered motor vehicle. If, however, the Supreme Court cannot find such elasticity in the Constitution as to enable Congress to legislate uniformly for the regulation of manufacturing, mining, labor, and agriculture, Congress can secure the power only through an amendment to the Constitution. Only such power is needed as will enable Congress to legislate touching matters that affect the interest of the citizens of the Nation as a whole.

The taxing power of Congress has not been interfered with by any opinion of the Supreme Court, to my knowledge, except where it has been held that the power exercised was not for the legitimate purpose of raising revenue, but had for its object the regulation of business within the States. An attempt, therefore, to regulate industry through the taxing power where the prime purpose is regulation and not the raising of revenue, will not be allowed because the power to regulate is one of the reserved powers. If, therefore, manufacturing, mining, and agriculture cannot be regulated except through the States, although production may be intended to be transported in interstate commerce, Congress is without the power to enact regulatory laws until the production begins moving in interstate commerce. Transportation and commerce, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, are synonymous; and if the Court has definitely settled that question—and it has—Congress needs additional power to regulate the production of commodities to be moved in interstate commerce.

So long as there is doubt as to the proper interpretation of important provisions of the Constitution Congress is left in the position of not knowing what may or may not be held constitutional by the Supreme Court; and there is no way in which it can find out other than by the enactment of legislation which calls for a decision on its constitutionality by the Court. The members of the Court divide on the proper interpretation of provisions of the Constitution; and Congress does not know, and has no means of knowing, whether one group or another within the Court will be in the majority. A situation such as this ought not to exist; but it will continue to exist as long as there is doubt as to whether certain powers have been delegated to the General Government or whether they are reserved to the States. Neither the Court nor Congress can clear up these matters permanently. Clarification must come from the people.

The Child Labor case—Hammer against Dagenhart—was a milestone in establishing the Madisonian doctrine of dual federalism. The act was declared invalid in an opinion concurred in by five of the members of the Court and opposed by four members. The opinion announced that the act was not a regulation of commerce among the States, and was, therefore, an invasion of the powers reserved to the States. Justice Holmes, who wrote the dissenting opinion, took the position that the power to regulate commerce, as well as other constitutional powers delegated to the General Government, could not be qualified or limited by the fact that it would interfere with the carrying out of a domestic policy of any State.

The majority opinion and the minority opinion in Hammer against Dagenhart well illustrate the difficulties that Congress has in the enactment of laws within constitutional limitations. If one of the five Justices who agreed to the majority opinion had agreed with the minority, the power of Congress to regulate commerce would have been greatly broadened and extended.

Within a short time after the opinion in the Child Labor case the Supreme Court sustained the Reed bone-dry amendment to the Post Office Act of 1917, which prohibited interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors into States forbidding the manufacture and sale of such liquors. The Court, in that opinion—United States against Hill—held that Congress may exercise such authority over interstate commerce in aid of the policy of the State if it sees fit. It would seem to mean that if a State legislates on a particular question relating to commerce Congress may join with the State in such regulation, although it would not otherwise have the power to deal with the subject. That is difficult to understand; and especially is that true when the opinion contains the further announcement that the control of Congress over interstate commerce may not be limited by State laws.

The Motor Vehicle Theft Act—Brooks against United States—was upheld as a valid exercise of power by the Congress, and some reference is made in the opinion to the radical change that has taken place in transportation, leaving clearly the impression that such radical change in the means of transportation had some bearing on the mind of the Court, inducing it to uphold the act.

I mention these cases—and might mention others—to show how difficult it is for Congress to know what the Supreme Court may or may not do about the validity of any legislation enacted where its constitutionality is called in question. No criticism should be made of the Court because of this confusion, as it is caused wholly because of disagreement as to what powers were delegated to Congress; and, as I have said, under changing conditions the Court is called upon to find in the Constitution dormant powers, the necessity for the use of which has not theretofore arisen.

When the Roosevelt administration came into power in the spring of 1933 it found an unendurable condition prevailing throughout the country, foreboding disaster and perhaps destruction. Something had to be done without delay; and it is to the everlasting glory of Congress that it acted expeditiously to quiet the fears of the citizens of the Nation and to bring about conditions which would enable men to live until normal conditions could return. It was found that manufacturing had largely been subsidized throughout the years by the protective-tariff system, and it was not thought, perhaps, that it would be wise to deny that subsidy. The result had put things all out of joint and made them lopsided. The farming population of the Nation was in the greatest distress. Debts were too burdensome to bear longer. The products of the farm had to be sold at less than the cost of production. The farmer could not realize sufficient money for the products of his farm to pay his interest, much less his debts, or to keep up necessary repairs, or to buy necessary farm equipment, or properly to support his family.

It was determined that the farmer was entitled to relief so that he might be equalized so far as possible with the manufacturer; and, as the manufacturer had been favored by the Government, it was thought that the appropriate way to adjust the relationship betwen these two great industries was that the farmer should also receive special benefits from the Federal Government. Hence, the enactment of the agricultural-adjustment program. But the laborer would have living costs increased; and to equalize him with manufacturing and agriculture it was necessary that he have a fairer wage.

It was determined, therefore, that labor should have better wages and that unfair practices should be eliminated. This resulted in the enactment of the National Recovery Administration Act. With the relationship between the manufacturer, the farmer, and the laborer adjusted, the Nation would be placed again on a solid foundation; but there were others—the unemployables, the aged, the crippled, and the blind—who were left out of the plan to care for the three great groups of the Nation. To provide for them, the social-security legislation was enacted. Under the stimulation given along all lines by this legislation, the country speedily recovered, and prosperity returned in a large measure.

No one will dispute the fact that all of these questions affect the general welfare of the Nation as a whole; but the Supreme Court, in its opinion in the agricultural-adjustment case, has said that Congress does not have the power to carry out this program. It may be that much can be done toward carrying it out within the limitations prescribed by the Supreme Court; but it can never be carried out fully until the Constitution shall be amended so that power shall be clearly conferred upon Congress to deal with these questions.

It seems to me that the most valid criticism which may be leveled against opinions of the Supreme Court within the past few years is that the Court, at least to my mind, has invaded the powers of Congress. I desire to refer to some of the opinions where the Court has made its decision turn upon the question of an assumed fact. It seems to me that the determination of the facts which give rise to the necessity for legislation is within the power of the Congress and not within the power of the Supreme Court. In the Agricultural Adjustment Act opinion the Court, unfortunately, I think, stated that a law for the welfare of the farming population was not for the general welfare of the Nation, but was a matter of local welfare. I do not know where the Court obtained the power to determine the meaning of general welfare or of local welfare. The definition of general welfare should be for Congress to decide and not one for the Supreme Court to determine. It is a question of fact, and the Court would not have the power to take judicial knowledge of a disputed fact.

The Court assumed that relief to farmers was a matter of local welfare. If the definition of welfare is dependent upon evidence to be submitted, then the determination of whether a law was constitutional or not would be dependent upon the state of facts presented to the Court, and the facts as presented might induce the Court to uphold he validity of an act in one case and to hold it invalid in another.

Congress has the power to regulate intrastate commerce if it directly affects interstate commerce. The Supreme Court assumes that it has the power to determine what directly affects interstate commerce, but it can reach a conclusion on the question only through the assumption of a fact, and such an assumption is beyond the power, in my judgment, of the Supreme Court. The opinions of the Court in their interpretation of the commerce clause of the Constitution afford illustrations of the incursions of the Court into the realms of congressional power.

Congress cannot prohibit interstate commerce, so the Court has said, but that rule could not be adhered to. Consequently there was a modification of it, and the earlier opinions have been modified to the extent of holding that good commerce may not be prohibited by Congress among the States but that bad commerce may be prohibited. Who is to determine what is good commerce and what is bad commerce? The Supreme Court has assumed the power to determine the question itself. If the article shipped in interstate commerce is bad for the citizens of the State into which it is shipped, the Court says that Congress has the power to prohibit such shipment; but it reserves to itself the power to determine what is detrimental to the welfare of the people of the State into which the article is shipped. The determination of the question of fact which justifies legislation is a matter for the determination of Congress, or at least should be. When Congress has determined that intrastate commerce directly affects interstate commerce, or that certain articles constitute bad commerce, or that certain things may be done for the general welfare, the question is concluded so far as the facts are concerned. Such matters are legislative and not judicial. Since the Court has assumed the power to pass on these things, it follows that Congress does not have the power; and, as the decisions of the Supreme Court are conclusive of the questions, there is no means of vesting that power in Congress except through a constitutional amendment. Through the extension of this power by the Supreme Court it could, if it so desired, pass upon the necessity of every appropriation made by Congress, and if extended to its logical conclusion the Court could deny the power of Congress to enact nearly any kind of legislation unless the Court should agree with Congress in the necessity for it.

The amendment to the Constitution which I have proposed would delegate to Congress the power to legislate about matters that the Supreme Court has held are not within its power at this time.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 459) to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes", which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution just laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I submit an amendment, which I desire to have agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 19, it is proposed to strike out the words, "Funds allocated to be expended in Bexar County shall be expended in connection with historic purposes only", so to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Texas Centennial Commission established by the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes", approved June 28, 1935, is authorized, in its discretion, to allocate funds from the appropriation made to carry into effect the provisions of such joint resolution, to the Texas Centennial Commission, the Commission of Control for Texas Centennial Celebrations, the Texas Centennial Exposition, and to any executive department, independent office, or establishment of the Government for the purchase of historic papers and paintings by contract or otherwise without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, the construction and erection of monuments, statues, markers, buildings, and other structures or any part thereof, including purchase of sites, the restoration of historic structures, and the purchase of land in connection with historic structures. The funds so allocated may be expended by such State bodies and Government departments or establishments in any part of the State of Texas in accordance with the allocation by the Commission.

SEC. 2. Monuments, statues, markers, buildings, and other structures, erected or constructed, and lands, historic papers, and paintings purchased from funds allocated as herein provided shall become the property of the State of Texas, except that in such cases as the United States Texas Centennial Commission deems it desirable and in the public interest, any such erection, structure, land, or article shall become the property of such organization, or public or private agency as it may designate, subject to such requirements as the Commission may deem necessary or appropriate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CONNALLY. I move that the Senate insist on its amendment, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. NORBECK conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I feel that it is not inopportune or improper to invite the attention of the Senate, and particularly the members of the Committee on Immigration—and I am a member of that committee—to certain conditions in Germany which have most serious and tragic consequences.

I appreciate that there are boundaries which should not be crossed in discussing the conduct of other nations and particularly the actions of executive officials in other governments. The people of every country have the right to set up that form of government which they regard as best suited to their conditions, and it necessarily follows that they have the right to determine their own domestic and internal affairs. But it is the view of many that this position rests upon the assumption that justice shall be administered, that conditions which existed in primitive societies shall not persist and that cruel and ruthless persecutions shall not be inflicted upon the nationals of any country.

Humanitarianism is an essential concomitant of civilization. We measure the progress of the human race by their advancement fro mprimitive conditions and their growing regard for the recognition of the rights not only of classes and groups but of individuals. The ghastly pages of history are replete with recitations of savage and barbarous cruelties inflicted upon minorities within nations. The world today is too much saturated with the spirit and influence of sectional and provincial teaching and primitive passions. There have been in too many countries cruelties and brutalities resulting from ignorance, intolerance, and racial prejudices. It would seem that in this day of civilization there would have been an emancipation from the evil conditions of the past, and that mankind would have reached that high mark of civilization in which there would be a proper understanding of life and in which there would be freedom from racial prejudices, atavistic propensities, and tragic ancestralisms. Those who have a proper attitude toward life must regard themselves as a part of a great movement guided by a moral purpose which seeks a goal within the reach of man where there will be found freedom, peace, and justice under the reign of law. Tribal conditions gave way to higher forms of life, and slowly out of the mists and darkness of the past civilization emerged, and yet our so-called civilization has a long road to travel before it brings humanity the fruits and treasures of peace and culture and spirituality, essential to happiness and world unity.

A genuine spirit of tolerance is essential to the development of the spirit of democracy; indeed, democracy rests upon an enlightened public opinion and a profound sense of altruism which regards the burdens of others as a part of the burdens of all. Unfortunately, the world is still torn with strife, and we are made conscious of obstacles and barriers in the highway leading to higher forms of civilization which are as obvious as the jagged rocks which protrude in the harbor when the tide ebbs out to sea. It has been said that the supreme question is whether there shall be established a brotherhood of man and that God created a brotherhood, but the responsibility rests upon us to acknowledge the validity of that which He created.

In the confusion of the hour some have lost their ideals and hopes for a redeemed world. Attention is called to the condition in Germany and the forces which exercise oppressive rule in many lands. But there must be no abandonment of the contest for justice, equality, liberty of conscience, and the enjoyment of those rights and privileges which are the product of a true civilization.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the letter of resignation of Hon. James G. McDonald, high commissioner for refugees—Jewish and others—coming from Germany. This communication challenges attention to the persecution of hundreds of thousands of German nationals, and to tragic conditions in which the Jewish citizens of Germany have been placed. It may be thought by some that the conditions referred to by Mr. McDonald are of no concern to the people of the United States, or, for that matter, to the people of any country.

As I have indicated, there must be extraordinary circumstances to justify criticisms of other governments. I recognize, as I have stated, the right of the people of any country to devise and maintain such government as they may desire, and yet the conduct of governments may not escape examination and, indeed, condemnation; and immunity from comment or criticism may not be asserted under all circumstances.

The peoples of the world are being drawn closer together, time and space are being annihilated, and the cries of the oppressed in any corner of the world today are heard around the world. International conferences, participated in by many nations, are held. A league of more than 50 nations of the world has been formed, having for its object the amelioration of the conditions of the world, the elimination of war, the protection of minorities, the preservation of peace, and the furtherance of justice and righteousness in every land. History is replete with examples of the barbarous treatment accorded to minorities. Racial prejudices, differences in religion, or ethical concepts, have been the basis for ruthless and inhuman treatment of human beings. With the progress of science one would suppose that the records of the past—records of blood and cruelty and oppression—would awaken in the hearts of all peoples of this age a feeling of humiliation that such pages should have been written and inspire a determination that in the future no such foul and bloody pages should be written, but rather that the history of this hour and of the future should be illumined by evidences of good will, national and international peace, absence of racial prejudices, bigotry, intolerance, and the triumph of evil forces that have wrought such sorrow in the past.

Our Government has not been indifferent to wrongs perpetrated in other countries against their own nationals.

When the people of Greece, at a time when their country was a part of the Turkish Empire, were protesting against Turkish misrule and the injustices and cruelties to which they were being subjected, our Government, through the President of the United States and eminent statesmen, lifted its voice in behalf of the Greeks. The President of the United States, among other things, in speaking of Greece, stated that it was the object of "our most ardent wishes that Greece might obtain the rank of an independent nation." He also transmitted to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State with various documents which dealt with the condition and future prospects of the Greeks.

Daniel Webster presented a memorial to the House of Representatives asking Congress to assure the people of Greece of the deep interest felt by the people of the United States in the contest which they were carrying on against the Turkish Government, and, as I recall, he later offered a resolution upon which he spoke at some length. I recall that he stated in support of his resolution that it was difficult upon any occasion that called the attention "to a spot on the globe connected with such associations and recollections as Greece to avoid some degree of warmth and enthusiasm."

Senators will also recall the attitude of our Government when Latin American countries, because of the inhuman and cruel treatment to which they had been subjected by the Spanish Government, revolted and endeavored to set up governments under which they might enjoy freedom and justice. Not only was the Spanish Government condemned but a policy was adopted in behalf of the people struggling for liberty which not only gave them support but constituted a shield for their protection. It will not be forgotten how the people of the United States were stirred when Kossuth and his supporters valiantly struggled to obtain the rights to which they believed they were entitled. The American people did not hesitate to express their sympathy for the revolutionists and their condemnation of the Austrian Government.

Citizens of the United States are not of one race or of one creed, nor are they driven from our shores because of their race or creed, or their political or economic views. The American people find no warrant for civilized states denying their citizens freedom of speech or religion or the right of conscience, nor can they find justification for expelling nationals because of racial differences.

The rights of minorities, regardless of race, creed, or condition, are as sacred as the rights of majorities. This is the basis of freedom and of progressive civilization.

Mr. President, within the United States are millions of people who were born in other lands. Many fled from persecution to enjoy the liberty guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States and by the institutions of this Republic. They and their descendants have aided in developing this Nation. They have been and are loyal to the flag and have given patriotic support to the institutions of this country. Among them are many Jews, and they in this land, as in other lands, have made important contributions to the cultural, industrial, and economic life of the same.

Our attention to the conditions in Germany is being challenged by reason of the laws there enacted, and the policies which are being carried into effect, which result in the banishment of tens of thousands of Germans of Jewish blood from Germany. Those who have been expelled and those to whom banishment will soon come are making piteous appeals for places of refuge in other lands. They have made appeals for relief from the persecutions to which they have been subjected in Germany. They have lifted their eyes to this and other lands praying that they may find some place on earth where they may have rest and be free from discriminatory laws and despotic rule.

The situation in Germany is being brought to our attention by reason of the appeals which are being made for modification of our immigration laws which restrict immigration and under which but a limited number of German nationals and the nationals of other countries may be admitted to our shores. The Immigration Committee of the Senate may be called upon to consider this question in the near future. I have received suggestions that in view of the serious condition of the Jews in Germany there be some relaxation of our immigration laws so that an additional number of German nationals may be admitted to our shores.

Mr. President, the League of Nations has taken congizance of conditions in Germany and it appointed Mr. James G. McDonald, an American citizen of high standing, to "negotiate and direct an international collaboration necessary to solve the economic, financial, and social problem of the Jewish and other refugees." He was appointed on October 26, 1933, to undertake a most important and humanitarian work. The Jewish nationals of Germany were prior to that time being harrassed and persecuted by the Nazi Government, and so serious had become the Jewish problem that the League of Nations felt constrained to adopt some plan to mitigate the sufferings of the refugees. It seemed apparent that the German Government was determined to continue its persecutions of not only Jews but also of the "non-Aryan Christians treated as Jews and the Protestants and Catholics who in obedience to their faith and conscience dared to resist the absolute will of the national socialistic state." I am quoting from Mr. McDonald's letter in the statement just made. It was obvious that the persecutions of Jews in Germany would continue until they were all banished from Germany. The question arose as to where these persecuted people were to find refuge. Countries adjacent to Germany have their social and economic problems, including that of unemployment. They likewise have immigration laws which are restrictive of immigration. That adjacent nations have proved sympathetic to the refugees is conceded. France has received a large number of refugees, as have a number of other countries, but it became evident that homes must be found in other countries for the refugees banished and to be banished.

One can scarcely conceive of Germany striking at the so-called non-Aryans in such a cruel and ruthless way. Germany, as well as other countries, has been the recipient of important contributions to its cultural and economic life at the hands of the Jewish race. If time permitted, reference could be made to the great philosophers, poets, writers, painters, scientists, philanthropists, and financiers of Hebrew blood who contributed in no small degree to the development and progress and achievements of Germany. It seems incredible that great writers and scientists, such as Einstein, should be driven from a civilized country. Not only Germany but the civilized world has been enriched in every field of endeavor by the Jewish race. Under their great prophets of ancient times the foundation of monotheism was laid. And from Palestine came the precepts and teachings and philosophy of the Great Master which inspired men and nations and spread the gospel of universal brotherhood and world peace.

Mr. President, we learn that a person of supreme authority in Germany, in a book written before he came to power, predicated his course, in part at least, upon active persecution of the Jews. And so, under the present regime, that announced doctrine has been inculcated, and its cruel policies have been put into effect. The so-called non-Aryans in Germany constitute a minority, and I may add in passing that treaties entered into following the war between Germany and the Allied Powers contain provisions for the protection of minorities. My recollection is that the German Government has invoked the provisions of some of the treaties referred to in behalf of German minorities in Poland, Memel, and, as I recall, several other countries. German minorities must be protected in the Polish Corridor and Czechoslovakia, Lithuania, and in other countries; but minorities in Germany may not invoke the protection, the rights, and privileges of German citizens and German nationals because of their race.

Senators will remember that the greatest American of our day, Woodrow Wilson, when the treaties following the war were being written, insisted upon protection for minorities; and subsequent events have justified his sense of justice and broad humanitarianism in seeking to protect the weak against the strong, the minorities against powerful majorities.

Mr. President, Mr. McDonald undertook the task before him and has discharged with fidelity the important trust. He has, however, felt constrained to resign the position which he was chosen to fill. His letter of resignation reveals the cruel and merciless course which has been pursued by the Nazi Government in dealing with hundreds of thousands of Germans—men, women, and children—not only Jews but, as I have indicated, also non-Aryans, who were treated as Jews, and Protestants and Catholics who, in obedience to their faith and conscience, "dare to resist the absolute will of the National Socialist State."

Mr. President, I read a number of paragraphs from Mr. McDonald's letter resigning his position, and shall ask that the paragraphs not read be inserted in the RECORD. I read from his letter:

On October 26, 1933, the president of the Council of the League of Nations did me the honor to appoint me high commissioner for refugees (Jewish and other) coming from Germany, to "negotiate and direct" the "international collaboration" necessary to solve the "economic, financial, and social problem" of the refugees. I herewith beg to submit through you to the Council of the League my resignation from this office, to become effective as of December 31, 1935.

2. In the period of over 2 years since the establishment of the office conditions in Germany which create refugees have developed so catastrophically that a reconsideration by the League of Nations of the entire situation is essential.

I mentioned a moment ago that this catastrophic situation has led to hundreds of thousands of the Hebrew people trying to find some place under the sun where they might live in peace and make their contribution to the development and progress of the countries in which they were permitted to reside.

The intensified persecution in Germany threatens the pauperization or exile of hundreds of thousands of Germans—men, women, and children—not only Jews but also the non-Aryan Christians treated as Jews, and Protestants and Catholics who, in obedience to their faith and conscience, dare to resist the absolute will of the National Socialist State.

3. Apart from all questions of principle and religious persecution, one portentious fact confronts the community of states. More than half a million persons, against whom no charge can be made except that they are not what the National Socialists choose to regard as "Nordic", are being crushed. They cannot escape oppression by any act of their own free will, for what has been called the membership of non-Aryan race cannot be changed or kept in abeyance.

Tens of thousands are today anxiously seeking ways to flee abroad, but except for those prepared to sacrifice the whole or greater part of their savings, the official restrictions on export of capital effectively bar the road to escape, and the doors of most countries are closed against impoverished fugitives. Nevertheless, if the present pressure is not relieved, it is inconceivable that those who can flee will remain within Germany.

I may say in passing that under the policy of the present German regime they will be forced out of Germany.

The task of saving these victims calls for renewed efforts of the philanthropic bodies. The private organizations, Jewish and Christian, may be expected to do their part if the governments, acting through the League, make possible a solution. But in the new circumstances it will not be enough to continue the activities on behalf of those who flee from the Reich. Efforts must be made to remove or mitigate the causes which create German refugees. This could not have been any part of the work of the high commissioner's office; nor, presumably, can it be a function of the body to which the League may decide to intrust future administrative activities on behalf of the refugees. It is a political function, which properly belongs to the League itself.

4. At the last meeting, on October 16, 1935, of the permanent committee of the governing body of the high commission, at which my intention to resign was fully discussed, action was taken to liquidate the office of high commissioner at the end of January 1936 or sooner if before that date the Council of the League had made other provisions for the coordination of the activities on behalf of the refugees coming from Germany. It was the expectation of the permanent committee that the committee of experts provided for by the assembly of 1935 to study the reorganization of the activities on behalf of the German and of the Nansen refugees would complete its investigations in time to present a plan for consideration, and it was hoped for action by the Council at its meeting in January 1936.

It has been the sense of the governing body that the work of assistance in the countries of refuge could be better carried forward by an organization directly under the authority of the League. It is now clear that the effectiveness of the high commissioner's efforts was weakened from the beginning by the compromise which was agreed upon at the time his office was set up—that is, the decision to separate it definitely from the League. This compromise was accepted in order to avoid the veto of Germany, which was then an active member of the League.

5. Progress has been made during the last 3 years in settling the refugees from Germany. Of the more than 80,000 who have already left the Reich, approximately three-fourths have now found new homes, more than half of these in Palestine. * * *

Permit me to state, Mr. President, that a few years ago I visited Palestine and while there endeavored to ascertain the resources of that small country. It will be recalled that the Senate of the United States had signified its approval of the so-called Balfour declaration, under which it was hoped that a national home for many Jews might be found in Palestine. It was my opinion from my investigation that in time Palestine might be able to support a population of perhaps 2,000,000 inhabitants. The area of Palestine is not much more than 10,000 square miles. Most of the land is arid, and many of the hills and mountains have been denuded of their timber and vegetation. Its resources are small, and only by large expenditures and heroic toil and labor may the lands be reclaimed and a larger population supported. Probably if manufacturing industries were developed and markets found for the products of factory and mill a population greater than I have indicated might be sustained, and if the Trans-Jordania region were developed homes might be found there for several hundred thousand additional persons. However, when I was there there were between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and seventy-five thousand Jews residing in Palestine. Many of them had migrated from Russia, Rumania, and Poland during the preceding 20 years.

By their thrift and industry they had greatly improved the country. They had built a number of cities and towns, drained swamps, and brought several thousand additional acres of land under cultivation. In my opinion, the further development of Palestine is dependent upon large expenditures, and it is apparent that it is not adequate to receive and care for all the unfortunate German refugees.

I should add that there are perhaps six or seven hundred thousand Arabs in this small country, and Senators are aware of the attitude of this population toward the advent of additional immigrants.

Recurring to Mr. McDonald's letter:

This accomplishment has been primarily the work of the refugees themselves and of the philanthropic organizations—Jewish and Christian—whose devoted labors have been ceaselessly carried on in many parts of the world. Probably not more than 15,000 refugees now remain unplaced.

That is, of the 80,000 who, through various circumstances, have been expelled or driven out of Germany.

6. The care and the settlement of these remaining thousands of refugees could and would be borne by the already heavily burdened private organizations, were they not fearful that the number of refugees may be increased many times by new flights from Germany.

The facts which arouse these apprehensions are indisputable. They are evidenced clearly in the German laws, decrees, judicial decisions, and party pronouncements and practices during the last 2 years. The culmination of these attacks on the Jews, the Christian non-Aryans, and the political and religious dissenters was the new legislation announced at the party Congress at Nuremberg last September. The core of that enactment was the law limiting citizenship to those who are "of German or cognate blood" and who also conform to the National Socialist conception of loyalty to the state. As the direct result in Germany not only the Jews, who now number about 435,000, but also tens of thousands of Christian non-Aryans, who are classified as Jews, lost their citizenship, were disfranchised, and made ineligible to hold public office. Indirectly through this new law a constitutional basis was laid for unrestricted discriminations against all those whom the party may wish to penalize.

The denationalization by the German Government of thousands of German citizens has added to the hardships both of those remaining in Germany and of the refugees, and it is an increasing burden on states which have admitted the refugees while in possession of German nationality.

7. Relentlessly the Jews and non-Aryans are excluded from all public offices, from the exercise of the liberal professions, and from any part of the cultural and intellectual life of Germany. Ostracized from social relations with Aryans, they are subjected to every kind of humiliation. Neither sex nor age exempts them from discrimination. Even the Jewish and non-Aryan children do not escape cruel forms of segregation and persecution. In party publications, directly sponsored by the Government, Aryan children are stirred to hate the Jews and the Christian non-Aryans, to spy upon them, and to attack them, and to incite their own parents to extirpate the Jews altogether.

8. It is being made increasingly difficult for Jews and non-Aryans in Germany to sustain life. Condemned to segregation within the four corners of the legal and social ghetto which has now closed upon them, they are increasingly prevented from earning their living. Indeed more than half of the Jews remaining in Germany have already been deprived of their livelihood. In many parts of the country there is a systematic attempt at starvation of the Jewish population. In no field of economic activity is there any security whatsoever. For some time it has been impossible for Jewish businessmen and shopkeepers to carry on their trades in small towns. The campaign against any dealings with Jews is now systematically prosecuted in the larger towns. Despite the restrictions upon migration from the provinces into the few largest cities where Jewish economic activity is not yet completely excluded, the Jews are fleeing to those cities because there only can they hope to escape, at least for a time, from the more brutal forms of persecution.

This influx has exhausted already the resources of the Jewish philanthropic and educational institutions in Germany. The victims of the terrorism are being driven to the point where, in utter anguish and despair, they may burst the frontiers in fresh waves of refugees.

That is the reason why I am receiving communications asking that something may be done to permit those who are driven from Germany to find a resting place under the flag of this Republic, and that is a question the Senate Committee on Immigration may be called upon to consider.

Paragraph 9 of this letter I ask to insert in the RECORD without reading, and because of its importance I hope all Senators will read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

Paragraph 9 is as follows:

9. Again, as so often during their long, heroic, and tragic history, the Jewish people are used as the scapegoat for political and partisan purposes. The National Socialists level against them charges of the most outrageous and untenable kind. They ignore all of the facts of the continuous loyalty of the Jews in Germany; for example, during the Empire when Jews helped to unify Germany and to make it strong; during the war when a percentage of Jewish youths as high as that of any other religious community in the Reich gave their lives for the Fatherland, and Jewish scientists and men of affairs helped so notably to enable Germany to prolong the struggle; and under the Republic when Jewish leaders aided in saving Germany from some of the worst effects of defeat. Instead, it has been found useful to attribute to the Jews the responsibility for the misery and dejection which the German people suffered during the last years of the war and the decade that followed. Though less than a one-hundredth part of the total population, the Jews are held responsible for all the adversity which the German people had to undergo. As in the Middle Ages, when they were massacred and expelled from the German States as the cause of the Black Death, so today they are eliminated from the economic and cultural life of Germany and degraded on the ground that they were the cause of the German humiliation. So far does this hatred extend that even the Jewish war veterans who fought and were wounded in the front-line trenches have been forced from their positions in the public services, and the names of the Jewish war dead may no longer be engraved on war memorials.

10. The attitude of the German Government is based not only on the theory of Nordic-race supremacy and the desire to eliminate foreign racial elements in the life of the country; it rests also on the conception of the absolute subordination of the individual to the state. An influential section of the party is actually promoting a revival of neopaganism which sets itself against both the Old Testament and parts of the New Testament. The conceptions of blood, race, and soil, propagated with fanatical enthusiasm, menace not alone the Jews but all those who remain defiantly loyal to the old ideals of religious and individual freedom.

Party leaders violently attack religious freedom in the state and threaten the church with political domination. Outstanding thinkers of the two great Christian communities in Germany and abroad raise their voices and protest against this attack which threatens to increase the number of refugees.

Mr. KING. Mr. McDonald discusses the minority question and the minority provisions in treaties. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read them, but ask that they may be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

11. The developments since 1933, and in particular those following the Nuremberg legislation, call for fresh collective action in regard to the problem created by persecution in Germany. The moral authority of the League of Nations and of states members of the League must be directed toward a determined appeal to the German Government in the name of humanity and of the principles of the public law of Europe. They must ask for a modification of policies which constitute a source of unrest and perplexity in the world, a challenge to the conscience of mankind, and a menace to the legitimate interests of the states affected by the immigration of German refugees.

12. Apart from the Upper Silesia Convention of May 1922, Germany does not appear to be expressly bound by a treaty obligation providing for equal citizenship of racial, religious, or linguistic minorities. But the principle of respect for the rights of minorities has been during the last three centuries hardening into an obligation of the public law of Europe. That principle was recognized in some of the most important international instruments of the nineteenth century. I may refer to the provisions of the Congress of Vienna, the treaty of guaranty following upon the union of Belgium and Holland, the collective recognition of the independence of Greece, the creation of the autonomous principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia. It was affirmed at the Congress of Berlin in 1878 in relation to newly recognized states. It was deliberately reaffirmed in the peace settlement of 1919 and in a series of special minorities treaties as a vital condition, both of international justice and of the preservation of the peace of the world. In the case of newly created states its express recognition constituted a condition of admission to the League of Nations.

Neither was the attitude of Germany in this matter open to any doubt. During the peace conference the German delegation, in urging the adoption of the principle of protection of minorities for the German population in the territories detached from Germany, declared spontaneously that "Germany on her part is resolved to treat minorities of alien origin in her territories according to the same principles." The Allied and Associated Powers expressly took note of that declaration. From the moment of her admission to the League Germany took the lead in securing the effectiveness of the principles of international protection of minorities.

13. The Assembly of the League in 1922 adopted a resolution which expressed the hope that "states not bound by specific legal obligations in the matter of minorities will nevertheless observe in the treatment of their own minorities at least as high a standard of justice and toleration as is required by the treaties in question." The Assembly in 1933, when considering the question of the persecution of Jews in Germany in connection with the discussion on minorities, reaffirmed that resolution; and in order to dispel doubts whether it applied to the Jews in Germany, voted, with the single dissent of Germany, in favor of a further resolution that the principle "must be applied without exception to all classes of nationals of a state which differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion."

The German Jews, although not claiming or desiring to be a minority, are within the scope of this principle because, as was stated at the Assembly, as soon as there is legal discrimination a minority exists within the meaning of modern law.

14. It is not within my province to state to what extent the practice in this matter of the community of nations in the last hundred years and of the League of Nations has become a rule of customary international law; neither am I called upon to judge how far the declarations and the conduct of Germany prior to 1933 are in themselves sufficient to establish legal presumptions. But both, I believe, are sufficient to establish an appeal to those broad considerations of humanity and of international peace which are the basis of the public law of Europe in the matter of racial and religious minorities.

The growing sufferings of the persecuted minority in Germany and the menace of the growing exodus call for friendly but firm intercession with the German Government, by all pacific means, on the part of the League of Nations, of its member states, and other members of the community of nations.

Pity and reason alike must inspire the hope that intercession will meet with response. Without such response, the problems caused by the persecution of the Jews and the non-Aryans will not be solved by philanthropic action, but will continue to constitute a danger to international peace and a source of injury to the legitimate interests of other states.

15. The efforts of the private organizations and of any League organization for refugees can only mitigate a problem of growing gravity and complexity. In the present economic conditions of the world, the European states, and even those overseas, have only a limited power of absorption of refugees. The problem must be tackled at its source if disaster is to be avoided.

This is the function of the League, which is essentially an association of states for the consideration of matters of common concern. The Covenant empowers the Council and the Assembly to deal with any matter within the sphere of activity of the League or affecting the peace of the world. The effort of the League to insure respect for human personality, when not grounded on express provisions of the Covenant or international treaties, has a sure foundation in the fact that the protection of the individual from racial and religious intolerance is a vital condition of international peace and security.

16. I am appending to this letter a comprehensive analysis of the German legislation, administrative decrees, and jurisprudence, as well as of their effects on the problem of refugees.

Mr. KING. Mr. McDonald further states:

17. I feel bound to conclude this letter on a personal note. Prior to my appointment as high commissioner for refugees coming from Germany, and in particular during the 14 years following the war, I gave in my former office frequent and tangible proof of my concern that justice be done to the German people, but, convinced as I am that desperate suffering in the countries adjacent to Germany and an even more terrible human calamity within the German frontiers are inevitable unless tendencies in the Reich are checked or reversed, I cannot remain silent. I am convinced that is the duty of the high commissioner for German refugees, in tendering his resignation, to express an opinion on the essential elements of the task with which the Council of the League entrusted him. When domestic policies threaten the demoralization and exile of hundreds of thousands of human beings, considerations of diplomatic correctness must yield to those of common humanity. I should be recreant if I did not call attention to the actual situation and plead that world opinion, acting through the League and its member states and other countries, move to avert the existing and impending tragedies.

Mr. President, may I employ the same spirit as my reason for calling the attention of the Senate to the conditions herein described? When human beings, 600,000 and more, are to be destroyed, I do not think that the niceties or the conventionalities of diplomatic usage compel one to remain silent in this Chamber.

These closing words of Mr. McDonald are addressed not alone to the League of Nations but to people in all the world who sympathize with the oppressed. It is to be hoped that the world is not so insensible to the sufferings and sorrows of human beings that they will be indifferent to the impending tragedy graphically portrayed by Mr. McDonald.

Mr. President, Mr. McDonald appended to his letter of resignation what he called an "Annex", consisting of nearly 30 pages of laws, rules, regulations, and opinions promulgated by the Nazi Government for the purpose of carrying into execution its cruel and merciless program aimed at the expulsion from Germany of the Jews and other German nationals.

The Annex also contains interpretative statements of the laws, rules, regulations, and so forth, just referred to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the able Senator from Utah, knowing him to be an active member of the Immigration Committee, as well as one ever interested in national affairs, has the American Government had brought to its official attention these mistreatments of which he has recited? Apart from the references of Mr. McDonald in a general sense, has our Government had its attention drawn to these injustices and has our Government taken any steps?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that I do not have the information to enable me to answer my friend. It seems to me, however, that the State Department must be cognizant of the oppressive and cruel policies of the Hitler regime. At various times our Government has had unofficial observers at Geneva who must have learned of the causes leading to the action of the League of Nations in which they sought to afford some degree of protection to the Jews. Moreover, there have been American representatives of organizations in the United States interested in world peace who were present at meetings of the League and various conferences at Geneva at which representatives of most nations of the world participated. The treatment of minorities by various nations, including Germany, has been the subject of serious discussion in the conferences referred to. Undoubtedly our State Department has received information through proper channels of the tragic situation of German nationals.

Mr. President, I cannot help but believe the attention of the State Department has been directly challenged by its representatives abroad to the situation described by Mr.

McDonald; but whether it has or not, I have felt like directing the attention of the Senate to the facts submitted by Mr. McDonald, the validity of which, in my opinion, has not been challenged.

Mr. President, while I should like to have the entire record here presented inserted in the proceedings of this day, I shall content myself by requesting that only a few excerpts from the record be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The following is the matter referred to:

SECTION 1. "1. A German national (Staatsangehöriger) is one who belongs to the protective association of the German Reich, to which he is therefore especially pledged.

"2. Nationality (Staatsangehörigkeit) shall be acquired in accordance with the prescriptions of the Reich and State nationality law.

SEC. 2. "1. He only is a citizen who is a national (Staatsangehöriger) of German or cognate blood and has shown by his behavior that he is willing and fit loyally to serve the German people and Reich.

"2. Reich citizenship shall be acquired by the bestowal of a letter of patent of Reich citizenship.

"3. A Reich citizen is the sole bearer of full political rights in accordance with the law.

SEC. 3. "The Reich Minister of the Interior, in cooperation with the deputy of the leader, shall issue the legal and administrative stipulations for the execution and completion of the law."

Even more ominous was the declaration of the German Chancellor to the Reichstag that the new legislation constituted an attempt of the Government at legal regulation of the Jewish problem so as to enable "the German people to find tolerable relations with the Jewish people." Should, however, the attempt at legal regulation fail, the Chancellor continued, then the problem must "be turned over to the National Socialist Party for a final solution."

The new legislation has altered the entire complexion of the refugee problem. At least half a million people have been deprived of political rights, their civil status has become that of guests or wards of the state, and a threat of even more drastic action against them has been pronounced before the Reichstag. It is inevitable that these outcasts should seek to emigrate from the land which has disowned them. They have become a reservoir from which more and ever more refugees will flow into neighboring lands. It is therefore imperative to examine the fundamental cause of the refugee problem, namely, the racial policy of the National Socialist Government.

A considerable number of persons have suffered persecution or been forced to emigrate for political reasons. They aroused the displeasure of the new rulers of Germany because of hostility to national socialism prior to 1933, when the latter strove to seize power or because they disregarded the doctrines of a strident nationalism and sought to further international cooperation and peace. Far more numerous, however, have been the victims of the racial policy of the new Germany—a policy which requires elucidation.

The racial policy is not a passing phenomenon. As far back as February 1920 the National Socialist Party proposed in its program that "none but members of the nation may be citizens of the State. None but those of German blood, whatever their creed, may be members of the nation. No Jew, therefore, may be a member of the nation."

This definition would deny German citizenship to persons of Jewish or of other non-German blood. The National Socialist program did not stop there. It demanded that "anyone who is not a citizen of the State may live in Germany only as a guest and must be regarded as being subject to foreign laws."

Thus having proposed the reduction of all German citizens of Jewish ancestry to an inferior status, the National Socialist program found no difficulty in urging the denial of all political rights to them, and, in particular, their exclusion from public employment.

This, however, has not been the final objective of the National Socialists with respect to the German Jews. They demanded in their program the immediate expulsion of all non-Germans who entered Germany subsequent to August 2, 1914, and had in view a similar fate for all persons of Jewish origin, no matter how long they or their ancestors had lived in the country, or how devoted and useful they had been to the Fatherland. Point 7 of their 1920 program reads:

"We demand that the State shall make it its first duty to promote the industry and livelihood of citizens of the State. If it is not possible to nourish the entire population of the State, foreign nationals (noncitizens of the State) must be excluded from the Reich." (Italics ours.)

In brief, then, the objective of the National Socialists, the present rulers of Germany, has been threefold: (1) To deprive all who have displeased them, and particularly Germans of Jewish ancestry, of citizenship and political rights; (2) to eliminate them from the political, cultural, social, and economic life of the country; and (3) to force them to emigrate. This objective has been pursued relentlessly by the present Government of Germany without regard either for the human suffering occasioned by their policies or for the welfare of the states in whose domains the victims have been obliged to seek refuge.

CHAPTER I

DISCRIMINATORY LEGISLATION: THE ARYAN DECREES

Herr Hitler, the leader of the National Socialists, became German Chancellor on January 30, 1933, but no legal action was taken immediately to realize the program of the party. The National Socialist leaders felt free to act only after the Reichstag, the deliberative and representative parliament of Germany, had been prorogued on March 23, 1933, and they had assumed dictatorial power. Then, however, decrees followed each other in rapid succession, and within a relatively short time liberals, pacifists, Jews, and Christians of Jewish ancestry were swept from public office, from Government employment, from the social services, and from the liberal professions.

The foundation of the entire structure of National Socialist legislative discrimination consists of sections 3 and 4 of the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, issued on April 7, 1933. Section 4, relating to political opponents, prescribes that "officials who, judged from their previous activity, do not warrant that they will always unreservedly exert themselves for their national country, may be dismissed * * *" and subsequent decrees applying this test to professions other than the civil service have made little effort to define or limit the meaning of this sweeping provision.

It is generally believed that the Jews are the only victims of this form of discrimination, but a mere glance at the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service indicates that such is not the case. Article 3, the basis of the racial disabilities, commences thus:

"(1) Officials who are of non-Aryan descent are to be retired (see section 8); as regards the honorary officials they are to be discharged from office."

It will be observed that the law speaks not solely of Jews but of non-Aryans, a more comprehensive term which has disqualified numerous persons who are Christians and have had no relations with the Jewish community. To understand this action we must recall the fact that numerous German Jews abandoned Judaism and espoused Christianity during the course of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Even more numerous, perhaps, was the class of Jews who had intermarried with German Protestants or Catholics, and they, or their children, had severed all affiliations with the Jewish group and had completely identified themselves with the Christian community. These persons regarded themselves and were regarded by others as Christians. But the National Socialist leaders have shown little respect for traditional Christianity. They have sought to render even faith subservient to the purposes of an exclusive racialism. Therefore legislation specifically directed against Jews would not have answered their purposes. It would have reached only the five or six hundred thousand Jews of Germany and not the additional hundreds of thousands of German Christians who are descended from Jewish stock. The National Socialists would include them all, those of the Christian as well as of the Jewish faith. For that purpose, "non-Aryan" appeared more satisfactory because it was more comprehensive and more in consonance with the racial theory.

But who is a non-Aryan? This question proved troublesome and the National Socialist legislators were compelled to issue a number of decrees defining arbitrarily this vague and elusive concept. First it was decreed that "a non-Aryan is one who is descended from non-Aryan, particularly Jewish parents or grandparents. It suffices if one parent or one grandparent is non-Aryan. This obtains especially if one parent or one grandparent belonged to the Jewish faith."

This definition was comprehensive enough, but it was soon discovered that some people had been left in doubt as to the purity of their Aryanism. The Minister of the Interior thereupon ordained that illegitimate descent from a non-Aryan did not remove the stigma which entailed an inferior status, and that Aryanism could not be acquired or assumed through adoption. On the other hand, an Aryan lost his privileged position if he married a non-Aryan.

"A person is not considered as of German or cognate blood if his paternal or maternal ancestors have Jewish or colored blood in their veins."

Even those who had held office uninterruptedly for nearly 20 years (since Aug. 1, 1914) and whose Aryan origin had not been questioned, must make the following statement:

"I declare officially herewith: I do not know of any circumstance—despite careful scrutiny—that may justify the presumption that I am not of Aryan descent; in particular, none of my paternal or maternal parents, or grandparents, was at any time of the Jewish faith.

"I am fully aware of the fact that I expose myself to prosecution and dismissal if this declaration proves untrue."

The State even provided for a racial expert to delve into the obscurities of Aryan antecedents and resolve doubtful cases.

"If Aryan descent is doubtful [read a decree of the Reich Ministry of the Interior] an opinion is to be obtained from the expert for racial research attached to the Minister of the Interior."

Thus, the aid of scientific research has been enlisted to make certain that not even a person of doubtful Aryanism would remain to contaminate the life of the new Germany.

The conscription law provided that "(1) Aryan descent is a presupposition for active military service. * * *

"(3) Only members of Aryan descent may be superiors in the Army.

"(4) Members of the Army and of the reserve of Aryan descent are forbidden to marry persons of non-Aryan descent. Contraventions bring about the loss of any higher military rank."

"The admission of lawyers who, according to the law for the restoration of the professional civil service * * * are of non-Aryan descent, may be canceled until September 30, 1933. * * *

"Admission to the bar may be refused to persons who * * * are of non-Aryan descent, even if there exists none of the reasons enumerated in the regulations for lawyers (Rechtsanwaltsordnung) * * *."

Even more startling was the application of racial and political tests to medicine and dentistry. German physicians and dentists were not, like the lawyers, driven at one stroke from their professions. Their elimination was achieved in a manner more ingenious, but in the long run no less effective. In the first place, provision was made that no new non-Aryan physicians or dentists be certified. An announcement made by the rector of the University of Berlin read:

"The Prussian Minister of Public Instruction has announced that non-Aryan medical students cannot expect to receive authorization to practice. But, according to present prescriptions, diplomas in medicine and dentistry may be granted only to foreign nationals, regardless of the question whether and when a German official authorization to practice is granted."

Physicians and dentists already in practice were not prevented by law from pursuing their callings, but, through expulsion from the national (and private) health-insurance service, they were deprived of their most numerous clientele and basic source of income. A decree of the Reich Minister of Labor read:

"The work of panel doctors of non-Aryan descent, as well as of panel doctors who engaged in activities of a communistic nature, must cease. Further admission of such physicians as panel doctors to the national health-insurance service is forbidden."

Similarly "the work of dentists and dental technicians in connection with the national health-insurance service * * * must cease if they are of non-Aryan descent or if they displayed communistic tendencies; such dentists and technicians are henceforth excluded from the practice."

These laws were put into effect by a number of decrees, the most noteworthy of which were the regulations concerning national health-insurance practice which were issued by the commissioner of physicians, Dr. Wagner. He declared that:

"Aryan physicians may be substituted by Aryan physicians only. * * * The same principle applies in the case of employing an assistant.

"Aryan physicians must assign their Aryan patients to Aryan specialists, physicians of hospitals, sanitaria, etc., and vice versa. Where local conditions render it absolutely necessary, Aryan physicians, especially those employed in hospitals, may accept assignments from non-Aryan physicians. * * *

"Common practice between Aryan and non-Aryan physicians is prohibited."

Thus collaboration, substitution, and consultation between Aryan and non-Aryan physicians were prohibited. Apparently a specialist's superior knowledge or surgical skill must be dispensed with in order further to segregate the non-Aryans.

One decree of the Reich Minister of Labor, that of February 3, 1934, is especially revealing as to what the molders of the new Germany consider essential in the training of a health-insurance officer. After announcing that employment in the national health-insurance service and promotion could be secured only on the basis of competitive examinations, the Minister went on to direct that the "subject matter of the examination in addition to the general and professional attainments must be civics (National Socialist view of life), as well as racial theory and eugenics.

"The national health-insurance service must see to it that all officials, employees, and laborers, even if they are not to pass an examination, acquire the necessary knowledge of civics, racial theory, and eugenics."

The Nationalist Socialists were also greatly concerned about the welfare of the press. Scandalous elements were to be eliminated and the independence of the press was to be furthered by subordination to the Minister of Propaganda, and by ordering that—

"Only he may be an editor:

"(3) Who is of Aryan descent and not married to a person of non-Aryan descent.

"(7) Who possesses the qualities requisite for a task involving the exercise of a spiritual influence upon public opinion."

Even more rigorous were the requirements for publishers, stockholders of newspaper firms, the members of boards of directors, and employees. These must prove "their own Aryan descent and that of their wives * * * up to 1800." Newspaper publishing firms were suppressed if their newspapers reported "on events in a form not commensurate with their importance for the public and which is apt to give offense to or to prejudice the dignity of the press."

The cinema was regulated by the establishment of a temporary film chamber, membership in which was compulsory for all those who produced, sold, or presented films and for "film creators", a comprehensive term which included:

"Production managers, stage managers, composers, scenario writers, musical managers, musicians, managers of photography, architects, camera men, sound masters, stars and minor artists, supers, and the like."

The most far-reaching measure taken to bend the cultural life of Germany to the purposes of an exclusive racialism was the establishment on September 22, 1933, of a Reich Chamber of Culture, with subdivisions devoted to literature, the press, broadcasting, the theater, music, and the plastic arts. Membership was compulsory, for the Minister of Enlightenment and Propaganda ordered that "whoever participates in production, reproduction, spiritual or technical elaboration, dissemination, preservation, sale or commission of sale of a cultural product must be a member of a branch of the Reich chamber that appertains to his activity.

"Dissemination also means the production and sale of technical means for dissemination."

The legislation respecting the hereditary peasantry indicated the desirability of excluding non-Aryans from agricultural pursuits. In the law of September 29, 1933, regulating peasant holdings, it was decreed that "(1) only a person of German or cognate blood may be a peasant; (2) a person is not considered German or as having cognate blood if his paternal or maternal ancestors have Jewish or colored blood in their veins; and (3) the 1st of January 1800 is the day that decides whether the premises of paragraph (1) obtain. * * *"

The stock and produce exchanges were likewise purged of non-Aryans. The Völkischer Beobachter, after declaring that it was not the intention of the Government to decrease the number of brokers, went on to say:

"The paramount consideration was the purging of the German Stock Exchange of all foreign and non-Aryan intruders and making the vocation of brokers into a class of honest merchants who are suitable for their calling because of their national sentiments."

Finally, the intention of the Government with regard to non-Aryan business establishments was revealed in the regulations respecting the expenditure of the sums received by loyal Aryans as marriage loans. The Reich Minister of Finance ordered that "* * * as sales agencies are admitted, * * * only those whose owners warrant that they will always unswervingly support the National Socialist Government" a condition which could, of course, not be met by non-Aryans.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Hayden	O'Mahoney
Ashurst	Connally	Holt	Overton
Austin	Coolidge	Johnson	Pittman
Bachman	Copeland	Keyes	Pope
Bailey	Costigan	King	Radcliffe
Bankhead	Couzens	La Follette	Reynolds
Barbour	Davis	Lewis	Robinson
Barkley	Dickinson	Logan	Russell
Benson	Dieterich	Lonergan	Schwellenbach
Bilbo	Donahey	McAdoo	Sheppard
Black	Duffy	McCarran	Shipstead
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Smith
Borah	Frazier	McKellar	Steiwer

Byrnes	Guffey	Murray	Vandenberg
Capper	Hale	Neely	Wagner
Caraway	Harrison	Norbeck	Walsh
Carey	Hastings	Norris	White
Chavez	Hatch	Nye

Mr. LEWIS. I again announce the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VAN NUYS], who are necessarily detained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in a matter of such great interest, not alone to the shipping interests of our country but to the freight-paying individuals of America, it is heartbreaking that we can not have more Members of the Senate here to give serious thought to the matter before voting.

This bill, if it shall be enacted into law, will reduce the toll charges of the oil tankers and of the private carriers like the Bethlehem Steel Co. It will increase the toll charges upon the common carriers, the ships which carry the products of the West—the apples and other fruit of Oregon and Washington and the citrus and other fruits of California—through the Canal to the east coast. It will also increase materially the rate on cotton carried through the Canal to the Orient and the Pacific coast and will increase the tolls upon traffic from the Atlantic coast to the west coast and the Orient.

This is not a matter which is without concern to the American producer or the American taxpayer. It is a matter of vital concern to all those who are interested in fairness of governmental regulations, and in the establishment of rates upon freight as low as can possibly be charged.

A day or two ago I heard criticism made of the minority report. Frankly, I do not consider that it was fair criticism. In my judgment, the minority report is well founded in its facts and conclusions. Since, however, it has been challenged, I desire to quote from the testimony of the witness of the Panama Canal organization who represents here, through his office as assistant comptroller and legal adviser, the Canal administration. I am taking, therefore, a witness who must be favorably inclined toward the proposed legislation, because this measure has been a pet of the Canal Zone authorities for many years.

As was stated, repeated efforts have been made to impose upon shipping this scheme of measurement of vessels. It has been before this body several times since I have been a Member of the Senate. Indeed, 6 years ago I served as a member of a subcommittee to give consideration to the scheme of the Governor of the Canal Zone to impose upon the shipping and upon the country his pet idea about how ships should be measured.

I may say in passing that it is a very interesting fact that the arguments which were made 6 years ago by the proponents of the measure are not the same arguments which are used today. Argument was made then about the impropriety of permitting deck loads, cargo piled upon the deck, to escape charges for transit through the Canal. Since that time, according to the testimony brought out, some vessels have found a way of evading the clear letter and spirit of the law by using for cargo certain space which should not be used if the proper measurement system were applied.

I desire to be as logical and orderly as possible, so I revert now to the testimony of Mr. Smith, found on page 3 of the hearings.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONERGAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves the subject to which he was previously referring I desire to ask, for my own information, a general question. Is there no way to correct these occasional flagrant circumventions of the rules except by such legislation as we are here asked to pass?

Mr. COPELAND. That is a very pertinent and a very proper question, and one which ought to be answered; and I shall leave the argument I had in mind to reply to it now, because I had intended to touch upon it.

There is a way to correct these circumventions. If Senators will refer to title 48 of the Code of Laws, to section 1318, found on page 2192 of the latest edition, it will be found that the law now permits effective dealing with this deviation from the spirit and intent of the regulations which are now in force. I read it:

> The President is authorized to make and, from time to time, amend regulations governing the operation of the Panama Canal and the passage and control of vessels through the same or any part thereof—

And so forth.

The only thing the President cannot do is set forth in a section just before this, section 1315, where a limitation is placed upon any change in the tolls charged. The President must fix those tolls as follows:

> The tolls shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton nor be less than 75 cents per net registered ton.

That is one thing the President cannot change, except within the limitations prescribed.

Adverting now to the matter mentioned by the Senator from Michigan, no one can condone any act which has for its deliberate purpose the improper evasion of the regulations of the zone or of the laws of the United States. Yesterday very much was made of the fact that certain Japanese vessels had evaded the law by manipulating the structure of the vessels, as indicated by the picture of the tub on the wall. Yesterday the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] said—and I quote from page 816 of the RECORD, first column:

> I am merely pointing out what can be done by taking advantage of structural changes by having openings made in the decks of certain of the Japanese ships.

The Senator goes on, and I wish to speak about this somewhat in detail:

> I understand they have engaged the services of a gentleman by the name of Ryan, who is advising the nations of the world, which use the Panama Canal, how they can alter the structure of their ships in order to take advantage of our peculiar situation and get a much lower rate.
> I have here a list of 14 Japanese ships which are mentioned at page 105 of the Governor's annual report as having been recently constructed to take advantage of the rules which are now in existence and which ships passed for the first time through the Panama Canal during the year 1935.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] yesterday said that there are 38 such ships. There are 5,000 ships that use the Canal. To answer now directly the question of the Senator from Michigan, if there are 38 ships or 8 ships or 2 ships which are doing something violative of the spirit of the regulations, there is power to deal with that matter, and that evil can be overcome without the passage of this bill. The bill proposes to drive a tack with a 16-inch shell. A tremendous bill is set up, and the excuse for it this year is that 38 ships, most of them Japanese, have violated the spirit of the law by cutting into space and making changes which are improper.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. The Senator has again attributed to me the statement, based on what I said yesterday, that there are 38 ships transiting the Canal and paying tolls on less tonnage than they ought to pay on, and he has just remarked that a large number of them were Japanese ships. I tried on yesterday to set the Senator from New York right on that point. I told the Senator from New York on yesterday that there were 38 such ships, of which I had a list on my desk, which belonged to five American concerns. There was not one Japanese ship among the number.

The Senator from New York on yesterday, and again on today, appears determined to put into my mouth a statement that there were only 38 such ships. I will enlighten the Senator on that point. During the fiscal year 1934 there were 336 American ships transiting the Canal and taking advantage of this device to reduce their own tolls on their own vessels. There were 86 American ships of the same character which did not take advantage of this device.

Of foreign ships passing through the Canal in 1934 there were 729 which resorted to this device—I will not say to this trick—in order to reduce their own tolls and to diminish the revenues which the Government of the United States should have received from the service it rendered those ships. There were 729 foreign ships in 1 year, and there were 334 foreign ships in this category which did not avail themselves of this device to reduce their own tolls for the service rendered them by the Government of the United States.

I hope the Senator will not again, through inadvertence or otherwise, state that my declaration was that there were only 38 ships passing through the Canal which availed themselves of this device and that a large percentage of those were Japanese.

I wish to say at this point that the Japanese have been the least grievous offenders of all the nations which sail the seas. I have here a statement that not until last year did they commence vigorously to emulate the Christian nations of the earth in this regard. Until last year they have been paying on 94 percent of the tonnage on which they ought to pay. England paid on 90 percent and other countries paid on 80 percent, but within the last year it has gone down below 70 percent. Vessels of all nations pay on less than 70 percent of the tonnage on which they ought to pay tolls to the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, Mr. President, I have no desire to impute to the Senator from Oklahoma any statement which he did not make; and if I misquoted him, or if he thinks I did, I am sorry, and I apologize.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Oklahoma did not comment, however, on the statement made by the Senator from New York that there does exist a present statutory power to correct this situation without additional legislation, and I should be very much interested in his comment upon that proposition.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I dislike to interrupt at this point, but I shall be glad to illuminate that subject. That is the very point involved in this whole controversy.

The statute cited by the Senator from New York—section 5 of the original Panama Canal Act, the act providing for the opening of the Canal—authorized the President to fix tolls upon vessels transiting the Canal, but provided that the tolls should not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton and should not be less than 75 cents per net registered ton. Within those limits the President could fix the tolls. But the Attorney General held that the words "net registered tons" referred to the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of Navigation. So that is a limiting factor.

I do not know how familiar the Senator from Michigan is with this matter, but I will say that there are two systems of measuring ships, one known as the United States rules of measurement, the other known as the Panama rules of measurement, and, as I stated on yesterday, the United States rules have been developed with a view to cutting down port charges on our vessels when they go to foreign ports. There is a constant tendency to reduce the tonnage, because foreign governments impose harbor charges on our vessels, and they accept the United States measurement in making those charges.

The Attorney General held that the words "net registered ton" related to the measurement known as the United States rules. The average ship, measured according to the United States rules of measurement, measures about 70 percent of the tonnage which it measures when the Panama Canal rules are applied. There are some instances where a vessel measures 40 percent less under the United States rules than under the Panama Canal rules.

I think I can instance a case with reference to one of the tank ships about which we hear so much. When that ship passes through the Canal loaded it pays tolls upon 5,398 tons. That is what it measures under the United States rules, 5,398 tons. It pays tolls on that tonnage at the rate of $1.25. When it returns in ballast the same ship pays on 6,550 tons, pays on 1,100 tons more when it goes through in ballast than when it goes through loaded, because when it goes through in ballast it is measured by the Panama Canal rules and when it goes through loaded it is measured under the United States rules.

The Senator realizes it is a very complicated subject; it is very difficult to present it in perspective. The trouble is that this $1.25 referred to by the Senator from New York is a limiting factor, and when the tonnage of the ship ascertained by the United States rules is multiplied by $1.25, if that amount be less than the amount secured by tonnage of the ship measured by the Panama Canal rules multiplied by $1.20, then the smaller toll prevails. In other words, whichever toll is the smaller governs the payment, and the decision of the Attorney General heretofore referred to has thrown the whole thing into pot; it is not a system now at all. The same ship passing through at different times, by slightly changing its structure, pays an entirely different rate.

If the pending bill be enacted, every ship passing through the Canal will pay a fixed toll on its earning capacity, on its tonnage, as ascertained under this proposed law. But under the existing plan the tolls vary with respect to sister ships owing to these trifling devices referred to on yesterday. I should be glad if the Senator from Michigan would ask me a further question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Michigan desires information as to whether or not under the Load Act of 1935 the practice of reconditioning the ships and changing the structure of ships must end.

Mr. GORE. Oh, no; it has no necessary bearing upon the subject at all, because that very law has been applicable to foreign ships passing through the Canal since 1929, and to our own ships engaged in foreign commerce. Since 1929 this campaign of owners reducing the tonnage of their ships by resorting to these devices has been under way, and has been accelerating all the time. That relates to the load-line law, and that law was applied to our own coastwise vessels in August of last year, as the Senator suggests; but it will have no more effect in preventing the resort to this device by our vessels in the future than it has had in preventing foreign vessels from resorting to this device. Let me say to the Senator from Michigan that it allows these vessels in a large measure to fix their own tolls.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I do not desire to trespass further on the time of the Senator from New York. I simply wanted to know whether the Senator from Oklahoma agreed with the Senator from New York that under the general Presidential power to which he has adverted and read from the statute, there is existing authority to correct the situation.

Mr. GORE. No; there is not. That is due, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, to an opinion by the Attorney General which gave the words "net registered tonnage" a meaning which the Congress did not have in its mind when it passed the law, and but for that opinion of the Attorney General the contention of the Senator from New York would have been correct, and the President governed by circumstances and changing conditions could from time to time have changed the tolls in order to meet those changing conditions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator from Oklahoma agree with the Attorney General's opinion?

Mr. GORE. Oh, no. The hearings clearly indicate that the opinion of the Attorney General did not correspond with the purpose which Congress had in mind when it passed the law, and that is evidenced by the testimony.

I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the President promulgated the rules governing tolls in 1913, fixing the rate at $1.20 for laden vessels, and 72 cents for vessels in ballast. There was no complaint at the rules or at the rate of the tolls. But the Attorney General held that when the $1.20 per ton based upon the Panama Canal measurement exceeded $1.25 times the tonnage measured under the United States rule, then the limitation of $1.25 prevailed and limited the collection of tolls to that.

When Congress passed the law it had in mind pretty much what is in the pending bill. The President was given a free hand in his discretion to fix the Panama Canal tolls at any price between $1.25 and 75 cents. But this technical ruling that "net registered tons" meant tonnage ascertained under the United States rules of measurement threw the whole thing awry. It is not a system now at all. It puts it in the discretion of shipowners as to what toll they will pay the Government, instead of allowing the Government itself to fix the tolls under this plan. The original plan of Congress was to have a fixed toll per ton so that every vessel when its tonnage was ascertained would know exactly how much toll it would have to pay. That is not the case now. In the case of sister ships, as I indicated yesterday, one by cutting a slot in the weather deck 4 by 18 feet one may take out 2,000 tons from the payment of tolls, and yet the space may be every inch of it loaded, whereas its companion ship in whose deck the hole has not been cut will be obliged to pay for the entire space between the weather deck and the lower deck, although it has not got a pound of freight.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am very much obliged to Senators for the addition they have made to my speech, but I hope this colloquy will not be taken out of my time.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senator's time be extended.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I had hoped to make an orderly speech. I really had an outline which I thought might produce such a speech in a limited time. But, of course, I welcome all these illuminating additions to the speech or to the subject and will proceed in all good nature.

The Senator from Oklahoma has referred to the opinion of an Attorney General. I have been long enough in public life to discover that attorneys general are sometimes wrong. Even the courts decide that their opinions are wrong. The Senator from Oklahoma has defended the weakness of his bill by saying that the problem cannot be dealt with because an unnamed, and to me unknown, Attorney General has said it cannot be. I am not satisfied with that offhand disposal of the problem. I do not know anything about law, but I know something about the English language; if I can read the English language and comprehend it, the law of the Nation prescribes a way to do away with an evil which is graphically pictured by the chart upon the wall.

I should like to state further that I gathered, as I listened intently to the colloquy, that the Senator from Oklahoma agrees with the position which I have just expressed. It is the law, and there is a way of dealing with it, and our rights under the law have not yet been exhausted.

I now desire to return, if I may, to my "muttons."

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Does the Senator suggest that the Panama Canal authorities should ignore the opinion which was handed down by the Attorney General and follow the system which he says is illegal?

Mr. COPELAND. Which who says is illegal?

Mr. DUFFY. The Attorney General ruled, and they are now operating under that ruling, and have been ever since it was made.

Mr. COPELAND. I can only say what I would do if I were the authority in charge of the Panama Canal. I would follow the law regardless of some ancient and dust-covered opinion by an Attorney General.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Of course, the Senator knows that when the head of a department calls on the Attorney General for an opinion, and he renders that opinion, it governs the conduct of the head of that department. I will try to insert in the RECORD a statement by President Wilson on that very point.

Mr. COPELAND. I remember very well that my old friend Governor Flower, of New York, once said to me, "I hire a lawyer to give the kind of an opinion I want, and if I do not get that kind of opinion from him I fire him and get another lawyer." It would seem to me that if the Canal authorities would inquire of the present able Attorney General there might be another opinion rendered. Until our rights under existing law have been exhausted I think it is absurd to come here and ask that the rules be changed by legal enactment.

I desire to finish what I have to say and then the Senator from Oklahoma can reply. It has been stated that there is no desire or need to increase the revenue of the Canal. I think the proponents of this bill have said that the proposed law will not give any more revenue. Then the only purpose of the proposed law, as I see it, is that because somebody has cut a hole in the deck or added a scupper we must bring out the artillery and plug up the deck with 16-inch shells.

Mr. President, I am going to speak about that pretty soon, and had intended at the very beginning to do so. I must now complete the discussion as it has been changed by the question and comments just made.

I now want to refer to a positive statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY]. The Senator from Wisconsin said:

> I understand that they have engaged the services of a gentleman by the name of Ryan—

Who is advising about the change of the structures.

I know Thomas Fortune Ryan; and I know Joe Ryan, who is the able head of the longshoremen; and I know Major General O'Ryan, and I know Ryan Duffy; but I never heard of this particular Ryan until yesterday, when his name was mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin. I saw this Mr. Ryan last night; he came to my office heartbroken, apparently much disturbed over the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin. The Senator from Wisconsin may say that this man was not the Ryan he meant. I said he mentioned some Ryans, and I know some Ryans; but this man said he was the Ryan.

He told me he is a naval architect with the full name Michael J. Ryan, of my city. I shall tell the Senate what Mr. Ryan said about the comments of the Senator from Wisconsin. This is his statement:

> Concerning the remarks made by a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I must not let the statement go unchallenged that an expert by the name of Ryan was engaged by foreign shipowners to cut holes in decks and split with them on a 50–50 basis of the earnings saved by these tonnage manipulations.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Do I understand correctly that that statement is being attributed to me in the remarks made by me yesterday?

Mr. COPELAND. I think this Mr. Ryan has put together what the Senator from Wisconsin said and, perhaps, what others have said. I am reading from his letter to me.

Mr. DUFFY. I am sure the Senator will agree with me that I said nothing about him splitting with anybody else.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator did not, but he did say——

Mr. DUFFY. I did say that he advised with foreign governments, that is, with shipbuilding concerns particularly of different countries, as to how to beat this game; and that is my information.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. The Senator from Wisconsin can have a row with Mr. Michael J. Ryan, but he cannot have one with me.

Mr. DUFFY. I ask the Senator not to attribute to me something that I did not say.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not attributing anything to anybody except to Mr. Michael J. Ryan, and I am reading from his statement. He may not have been referring to the Senator from Wisconsin in what he says; I am not advised as to that; but Mr. Michael J. Ryan is a free and independent citizen of the United States, and if an attack is made upon him, he has a right to have somebody, especially a Senator from his own State, say something in his behalf. So I am giving information which he has given to me.

Mr. DUFFY. The Senator from Wisconsin has no objection to that, except that I do take exception to the statement of the Senator from New York first attributing certain remarks to me and then reading this statement right afterward to make it appear that it was all attributable to the remarks I made yesterday.

Mr. COPELAND. Anyway, whoever said it, Mr. Ryan says:

> No Japanese company has ever employed me to cut holes in their decks.

So that is the answer.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more? I did not intend to say that he was a mechanic and cut holes in himself, if that is what he is trying to make a fine point on. I said he was an adviser and had given advice to various shipowners as to how they could lessen their tolls by changes in the structure of their ships.

Mr. COPELAND. Suppose I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, was he talking about Mr. Ryan advising the Japanese in this matter?

Mr. DUFFY. I was advised by statements made to me by the Canal authorities and by an article in a maritime magazine—I think it was the Nautical Gazette; and I believe that the article in the Nautical Gazette was written by Mr. Ryan—as to the methods that could be used and which he advised various shipowners to use in order to cut down their tolls on ships going through the Panama Canal. The Japanese have just this last year started on that practice.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Whether Mr. Ryan advised the Japanese is something I know nothing about; but it is a fact, is it not, that somebody advised the Japanese, or they devised on their own motion and by their own methods, a system by which under the present scheme of measurement they have defeated the purpose of the United States by cutting holes in the decks of their ships and by other devices?

Mr. COPELAND. I might say now, to quote Mr. Ryan——

Mr. CLARK. Let me say to the Senator from New York it does not make any difference to me whether Mr. Michael J. Ryan advised the Japanese or who advised the Japanese, if it be a fact that these various devices have been taken advantage of, as the War Department and the Bureau of Insular Affairs contend, to defeat the true purposes of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Once more, if I may quote Mr. Ryan——

Mr. CLARK. Very well.

Mr. COPELAND. He says:

> This committee alleges the Japanese vessels are taking advantage of our rules, when actually the Japanese steamship owners are reluctant to make any changes to their vessels that would in any way cause embarrassment to their diplomatic relations with our country, even though their national tonnage rules are similar to ours.

But, anyway, Mr. Ryan says:

> No Japanese ship company has ever employed me to cut holes in their decks—

And so forth.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to split hairs or to indulge in any sort of nonserious discussion of this matter; it is too vital to our people for that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Ryan disclaims in the letter that the Japanese Government ever employed him. I do not think anybody has ever suggested that any government ever employed him, but only foreign shipping concerns. As suggested by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], it may be that no Japanese concern has employed him; and I will say, as I said a moment ago, that the Japanese are the least grievous offenders. But Mr. Ryan, so far as the Senator has read his letter, does not disclaim that Italian concerns have employed him to advise them how to cut down their toll charges. I will say to the Senator that this practice has been under way for 10 or 15 years; it is growing worse year by year; but nobody until recently has undertaken to lift out of the payment of tolls more than one deck—the shelter deck under the weather deck. It has been repeatedly stated that by cutting certain holes in the weather deck the space between that deck and the deck below may be taken out and rescued from the payment of tolls. Nobody has undertaken to go to the deck lower down than that until Mr. Ryan, as I am reliably informed, recently counseled an Italian concern with a view to exempting an additional deck by making certain holes in its decks or walls. There is a letter, I am informed by the Department, addressed to the agents of an Italian concern in which they say that "your Mr. Ryan" has been in conference in regard to your proposal to exempt an additional deck; and the Department advised the Italian shipping concern that as a measure was pending in the Senate they would delay ruling on that point and they would await the action of the Senate and the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. My defense of Mr. Ryan related only to the Japanese. I will see him this evening, probably, and then I will find out about the Italians, so that when we resume this debate we will know what he has to say about his advice to the Italians. I have not heretofore heard about them. I do not believe that was previously in the RECORD.

Mr. President, the purpose of this bill, I judge from the earnestness of its author, is to correct the evil which is portrayed by the chart on the wall. I have forgotten the number he has given me, but, whatever the number is, it seems there are many ships that are evading the letter of the law in some improper manner. I do not condone that.

I should like to say to the Senate that, in response to a responsibility placed upon the Commerce Committee by the Senate, a subcommittee is studying the question of safety at sea. This investigation was founded in the first place on those dreadful disasters, the Morro Castle and the Mohawk. One of the things the subcommittee has done is to bring into being an advisory group of experts on shipping construction—shipowners, naval architects, merchant marine architects and others who are informed, the American Bureau of Shipping, and several other groups. We have brought together many persons who are experts, and they have already advised that in the construction of ships hereafter they shall be constructed with, at least, compartments. In the case of the Mohawk, which happened to be a two-compartment ship, the penetration of the side of the ship in the collision permitted water to rush in and cause the ship to overturn. The experts are now proposing that there shall be three compartments, and that hereafter in the construction of ships the compartment idea shall be used. In the placing of cargo necessarily it will have to be placed with reference to that improved method of construction of the ship.

A good many ships are antique; and when we speak about the American merchant marine I may say that practically all of our ships are antique; and unless we find some way to upbuild the American merchant marine in 10 years our flag will be off the seas. At present a tremendous majority of our ships are more than 16 or 17 years of age. The economic life of a ship is 20 years. So it is easy to see that in 5 or 10 years we will be practically without ships—certainly safe ships.

It may well be that in these times of depression there has been anxiety on the part of some American operators—I am not advised and I am taking now at par what the Senator from Oklahoma says—and it may well be that some of our American operators have sought to increase the carrying capacity of their ships in the manner indicated. Whether that was done with a view to defeating the Canal authorities in the collection of a proper amount of tolls I do not know.

It might well be that it was for a more noble and worthy purpose than the one indicated. But at any rate existing law prescribes how the practice may be overcome. I do not believe the Senate should proceed seriously to the consideration of the enactment of a general law which applies to all ships passing through the Canal for the sake of reaching a limited number of ships, which undoubtedly will be out of commission very soon, because of their evasion of the spirit and letter of an existing law.

Having said that, I shall return almost to the place of the beginning of my remarks. The effect of the proposed law—that is, if the Gore bill is enacted into law—will be practically as follows. I refer now to page 3 of the record of the hearings and the testimony of Mr. Smith, the Assistant Comptroller and legal adviser of the Washington office of the Panama Canal. I read a question of my own in the hearings, as follows:

> I assume, Mr. Chairman, at the proper time there will be inserted in the record a schedule showing exactly how it does change the revenue relating to certain lines and ships that use the Canal?
> The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

And now we find in the record, "The information referred to is as follows", so I am quoting in this matter from an authority on the Canal, from the legal adviser and Assistant Comptroller of the Panama Canal Office in the District of Columbia. He recites what would be the effect of this bill if enacted into law. His statement is founded upon the theory that when the law is applied it will be at the 90-cent rate. If the rate is left at $1, the figures will be different, but the relative effect will be the same.

Referring to the table we find there would be a reduction in tolls as follows:

TANKER GROUP

The tanker group is that group of vessels carrying oil. In a sense they are like the trucks we see upon the highways. These ships are constructed with reference to the carrying of this fluid. There would be a reduction in tolls as follows:

For the Standard Shipping Co., which is the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, the reduction would be $135,000 annually; for the Standard Oil Co. of California, $85,000 annually; for the Sun Oil Co., $78,000; for the Union Oil Co. of California, $42,000; and for miscellaneous tanker lines, $238,000. That is a total reduction of $578,000 a year taken out of the receipts of the Canal and given as benefits to the oil carriers.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that at page 106 of the printed hearings it is shown that 970 vessels transited in ballast and of these 435, or less than 45 percent, were tankers, while 523, or 54 percent, were of the general-cargo group, the remaining 1 percent being passenger vessels; so the vessels would receive benefits not because they happen to be tankers but because they go through in ballast.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator has any comfort in that statement, I am glad of it.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GERRY. I was wondering if the Senator could tell me how many of all these vessels were of foreign companies and how many of the tankers were of foreign companies.

Mr. COPELAND. I think I can give the Senator some information on that matter in a moment, if he will bear with me.

Mr. GERRY. I do not wish to interrupt the trend of the Senator's remarks.

Mr. COPELAND. I will give the figures now. Of vessels of the United States registry the percentage of decrease in tonnage would be 17, and of the foreign vessels 19, so it is practically the same.

It is not alone the oil carriers which would benefit. On page 4 of the hearings, taking the statement of Mr. Smith, we find material reductions to the Calmar Line, which is a Bethlehem Steel industrial carrier. We find a further reduction to the Ore Steamship Co., which is also a Bethlehem Steel Line.

The point I am trying to make clear is that by the wording of the bill very large reductions in tolls will be given to the tankers, which are private concerns, and to vessels owned and operated exclusively in the private carriage of goods and not as common carriers.

In contradistinction to the benefits derived by the oil carriers and by the private carriers, we find a material increase in the tolls which we will charge the common carriers. For instance, according to this report, the Luckenbach Line, the American-Hawaiian Line, the Arrow Line, the Shepard Line, the Isthmian Line, the Argonaut Line, the Panama Pacific Line, the Grace Line, and the Dollar Line, and others, will be burdened, at a 90-cent rate, by additional tolls amounting to $706,000 a year. That is at a 90-cent rate.

The supposition of the application of a 90-cent rate is founded upon the letter in the record from the Secretary of War saying that if the bill is passed he will urge the President to fix the rate at 90 cents. No one knows that that will be done; but if it is fixed at 90 cents, these common carriers will have to pay $706,000 more than they have to pay today; and if it is a dollar rate, it will be about $800,000 or more.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Are these the same carriers which already are in such precarious financial condition that Congress is being asked for legislation in connection with them?

Mr. COPELAND. They are.

Mr. VANDENBERG. This will be an additional burden to be put upon them?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. Of course, we are not seeking to pay any subsidy to the intercoastal lines, the protected lines; but many of the ships in question are in the group mentioned by the Senator from Michigan. There would be then, if we ever passed a subsidy bill, the need of a somewhat greater operating subsidy, in view of the fact that some would suffer losses by reason of tolls paid.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So in that instance we would take money out of the Treasury to pay the subsidies, to pay it to the shipping lines so they could pay it back to the Treasury through increased tolls?

Mr. COPELAND. That is correct.

I have been quoting a witness brought here to defend this bill. His testimony indicates that the common carriers operating through the Panama Canal will have imposed upon them an additional burden of $700,000 or $800,000 a year. As a matter of fact, some figures which have been given me indicate that the figures will be very much greater; but anyhow, the additional burden will be in the neighborhood of a million dollars a year.

Just what does that mean to the shippers of the country? It means that on the products of the potato growers of New England and the apple growers of New York and the fruit producers of New Jersey and the cotton raisers of the South, representing all the Southern States where cotton is produced, and likewise on automobiles made in Detroit, or wherever they may be made, on all shipments made through the Canal in common carriers there will be additional tolls amounting to in the neighborhood of a million dollars a year. Of necessity that means that the rates upon freight will be increased.

I hasten to answer the question which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] is about to ask, which is, Has the Senator from New York seen any evidence of carriers lowering the rates when the tolls were decreased? Even though I answer that question "yes", I shall not fail to say that when there is some excuse for an increase in rates—and there certainly will be here—there is sure to be demanded an increase in freight rates; so that is the answer to the question the Senator has in his mind.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. The table which was put in the RECORD yesterday, appearing on page 819, as to the five American lines, showed, as the Senator said, that the tolls paid by them have been reduced over the course of a year some $710,000 as a result of reconditioning their ships. Does the Senator agree that it is a fair statement that if this law shall be enacted, and the 90-cent rate shall be put into effect as expected, the tolls charged to these American lines will not be as great as they were before the lines recently reconditioned their ships?

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps; but we are considering a rule that never works both ways. I am utterly opposed to the evasion of the law, if there is such. I do not want the law to be evaded. I cannot condone any evasion. I cannot excuse anybody who deliberately does it or attempts to do it; but I desire to know, and it has not yet been explained to me, whether the reason for the change indicated in the pictured tub shown on the wall was for the purpose of evasion of the tolls, or for the purpose of increasing the earning capacity of the ships.

I have not been told that; but, anyhow, no matter what has happened in the past, no matter whether or not there have been evasions, if this bill shall be enacted there will be an increase of freight rates upon general cargo, representing the products of the factory, of the farm, and of the plantation and of the garden and of the orchard. There will be increased freight rates, because there must be found a way to pay the tolls. That is inevitable.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, how much of an increase will there be?

Mr. COPELAND. In the neighborhood of a million dollars a year.

Mr. President, the witness to whom I refer is not my witness. This testimony is from the mouth or pen of a witness of the proponents of the bill.

It seems futile to discuss all the problems which are related to this question; but we might say a lot about earning capacity, which was emphasized by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] in his colloquy a little while ago. When it comes to earning capacity this bill is awfully good to the oil carriers and the ships of the great steel companies. That, of course, is merely a coincidence. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] a little while ago talked about cargo ships coming back in ballast. There are mighty few cargo ships that come back in ballast. They cannot afford to operate in that way. It takes a two-way traffic to make any sort of transportation a financial success; but this bill deliberately provides, on page 2, that the rate of tolls—

> On vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo shall be less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo.

Show me any vessels, common carriers, that go through the Canal, that have not passengers aboard. They may not have much cargo, but they have passengers. They do not get any relief; but the ships owned by the great oil companies of America and the great steel companies of America come back in ballast, of course. They are engaged in a one-way traffic, and they can make enough profit in a one-way traffic so that they do not care whether they bring back anything or not. That is not so of the common carrier. No man can run a railroad or an electric line or a bus if his traffic is all in one direction. He could not get enough revenue out of a one-way traffic to finance his operations.

So here we have deliberately written into the bill protection of these great companies so that they shall not be charged the maximum tolls when their vessels come back in ballast; but if a general cargo or a combination ship comes through the Canal, if it has one passenger aboard, it pays its toll; and those tolls run into enormous sums. Some of the lines running regularly through the Canal pay as much as a million dollars a year.

Nobody has complained about the receipts of the Canal. Nobody has asked for more income for it. The proponents of the bill do not contend that this measure would produce more income; but, forsooth, because somebody has a tub like that pictured over on the wall, and has resorted to some impropriety, all the shipping interests of the world, and particularly the shipping interests of our country, are to be penalized.

Mr. President, I am not going to say anything more. I have told the story, and I think I have told it accurately. I hope this bill will not pass. It is too bad that the arguments pro and con could not be absorbed by a Senate much occupied with other things. I do not blame any Senator for not being here when every measure is discussed. I know how busy my office is. I could be engaged in the public service every minute if I never came to the Senate Chamber, and I know Senators are actively occupied elsewhere. But it is not fair or just or statesmanlike to pass a bill, the effect of which is to relieve the burden of the private carriers of our country and impose a tremendous added burden upon common-carrier shipping which is already distressed.

I should be perfectly willing to do this. I am sorry the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is not on the floor. This bill has a second section to which I shall now refer.

This measure is remarkable in its approach to the subject. The first section sets up the new standard of measurement. The second section says:

> The President is authorized to appoint a special committee—

To study the rules for the measurement of vessels.

It would seem to me, having been brought up in the "horse and buggy" days of American history, that the cart is before the horse. If a study is to be made of this question, it ought to be done before the proposed legislation is enacted. I have no objection in the world to such a study, not because it would defer action, but because it is a subject which deserves study, and it needs study in the light of recent advances in shipping construction and operation.

No more vessels will be constructed of the type of the tub. That type of vessel is gone forever. We had to pass load-line laws to make sure that top-heavy arks of that type should not turn over or sink; but the vessels hereafter constructed in American shipyards will be built according to standards which make for greater safety at sea, and that ought to be done.

Those who travel in ships are always in danger of their lives.

Every precaution should be taken by every government, as I see it, to make certain that all common carriers are so constructed that the maximum of safety is provided for; and that is what will be done in the building of ships in the future.

Mr. President, let us enact the second part of the bill. I understand the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has offered an amendment proposing that we do exactly what I am suggesting here now, that we let the President appoint this committee to study the question. Then everything can be determined, not alone how the ships should be measured, but also the sort of ship which should be permitted to transit the Canal, and likewise the exact question of the tolls to be charged can be worked out so that the carrying charges of the Canal and the retirement of bonds and all that sort of thing may be provided for in detail.

Committees of the Congress have worked for years upon proposals like the one now pending, as I said in the beginning of my remarks, but we never got anywhere with the matter. If past bills have been as bad as the one before us, I am not surprised that the Congress got nowhere with the proposed legislation. But the Senator who has written the bill proposes in the second section a study of the question, and that is what I should like to see take place. If that study shows that the arguments which I have tried to present are wrong, and the committee so decides, I shall be glad to throw up my hands and say that I have been wrong. On the other hand, the committee may determine that such legislation would be an invasion of the rights of those who have freight to carry upon ships and those who operate the ships. In either event the committee would bring us the conclusions which would permit us to deal wisely with the problem.

I hope the bill may be amended so that this proposed study may be made and the facts determined, in order that we may proceed intelligently in the matter. Otherwise I would say that by all means the bill should be defeated.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	Hayden	O'Mahoney
Ashurst	Connally	Holt	Overton
Austin	Coolidge	Johnson	Pittman
Bachman	Copeland	Keyes	Pope
Bailey	Costigan	King	Radcliffe
Bankhead	Couzens	La Follette	Reynolds

Byrnes	Guffey	Murray	Tydings
Capper	Hale	Neely	Vandenberg
Caraway	Harrison	Norbeck	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Norris	Walsh
Chavez	Hatch	Nye	White

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH obtained the floor.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. The Senator from Washington has kindly yielded so that I may place in the RECORD, in connection with the discussion of the pending bill, a table which gives a list by name of the 22 Japanese vessels of the 385-foot type which use the Panama Canal, and which are now being or have recently been reconditioned in order to obtain a reduction in toll charges.

The first two ships on the list are the England Maru and the Aden Maru. The England Maru has already transited the Canal after being reconditioned. She formerly paid $5,335, but now pays $4,350, a saving on each transit of $985.

I ask unanimous consent that this table, giving the 22 Japanese ships by name, be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

List of 22 Japanese vessels of the 385-foot type using the Canal which are being reconditioned to secure reduction in tonnage and tolls charges

Vessel	United States equivalent before reconditioning	United States equivalent after reconditioning	Percentage decrease
1. England Maru	4,268	3,624	15.1
2. Aden Maru	4,234	3,628	14.3
3. Capetown Maru
4. China Maru
5. Denmark Maru
6. Holland Maru
7. India Maru
8. Italy Maru
9. Jufuku Maru
10. Norway Maru
11. Ohio Maru
12. Pacific Maru
13. Scotland Maru
14. Spain Maru
15. Sweden Maru
16. Thames Maru
17. Chile Maru
18. Glasgow Maru
19. France Maru
20. Kofuku Maru
21. Naples Maru
22. Belgium Maru

NOTE.—This shows that the reduction secured amounts to approximately 600 tons for each ship or approximately 15 percent. The first two have already transited the Canal after being reconditioned with the result as shown. That is the England Maru formerly paid on 4,268 at $1.25=$5,335; now pays on 3,624 at $1.25=$4,350, saving $985 every transit.

THE AMERICAN LIBERTY LEAGUE

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, on Saturday evening of this week there will take place here in the city of Washington for the first time a banquet of a national organization of which the American people have heard a great deal in the last year and a half. There will be as the guest speaker of that meeting a very distinguished American, and undoubtedly the meeting will attract attention throughout the country. In view of that fact, I have the feeling it may be desirable that we place in the RECORD of this body some of the facts concerning the membership of that organization, some of the sources from which its money comes, and some of the governmental activities of its most prominent members. I do this in order that when this organization on Saturday night pronounces in the radio broadcasts to the Nation its desire to save the Nation from the dire consequences of the efforts of this administration the people of the country may be able to determine whether or not the membership of that organization is sincere in the things it professes.

I have in my hand a little pamphlet which is entitled "Facts About the American Liberty League", an official document printed by the league, and from it I have taken a statement which, I believe, most favorably to the league, states the professed aspirations and hopes of the league itself. I quote it:

The American Liberty League, an organization of patriotic Americans, is a liberal, constructive body, formed to do its part in its attempt to solve our national problems to help bring about business recovery, reduce unemployment, and improve the living conditions of the average man. It holds that the preservation of human rights is necessary to the maintenance of any stable form of government. Its object is to provide for the rank and file of the American people an opportunity to offset the influence of selfish groups and to preserve for succeeding generations the principles of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution.

That is the self-serving declaration of the American Liberty League as to its purposes and objects. It was organized, according to this pamphlet, I believe, in August of 1934, and since that time it has printed for the American people and distributed through the mails and in various ways a large number of pamphlets. I think the last one issued was no. 91 or 92. I have read all the pamphlets as I have seen them from time to time, and I want to say that they are very well written, as they should be very well written, since the chief publicity man, the head of the organization, Mr. Jouett Shouse, received some $54,000 last year; and the assistant publicity man, a Mr. Murphy, received $1,166 a month; and his assistant, Mr. Kirby, $456 a month. I should say that the three gentlemen with all their ability and their talents should put out very fine high-class publicity, and they have.

Some of the subjects upon which this group, which says it desires to protect the American people against the interest of selfish groups, seeks to advise the American public can be seen from some of the pamphlets it puts out. I give a few examples. They write a pamphlet on economic security, one on the bonus, one on inflation, one on the holding-company bill—Price Control, the Labor Relations Bill, the Farmer's Loan Bill, the T. V. A. Amendments, the Revised A. A. A. Amendments, Potato Control, Consumer and the A. A. A., A. A. A. and Our Form of Government, the Duty of the Lawyer in the Present Crisis.

Those are just a few of the titles of the books which Mr. Shouse, at the rate of $54,000 a year, is publishing and distributing to the American people as coming from an organization which has as its purpose the preservation of the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

I think it is well, in view of the widespread distribution of this literature, that we should know who is financing this organization. During the year 1935 the organization received either in the form of direct contributions or of loans a total of $483,175.40 for their annual campaign fund.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. Is this Liberty League which the Senator is speaking about the same thing as the Association for the Support of Jouett Shouse?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. There has been some doubt, I might say to the Senator, just what would be the source of the living for Jouett Shouse if his old friends who were with him in the repeal of the eighteenth amendment had not formed this particular league. However, I do not think the Senator need to worry about Mr. Shouse. He is getting along very nicely on $54,000 a year.

What were the sources of the money—$483,000—during this last year? It is of particular interest that of that $483,000 a total of $270,548 came from the Du Ponts or their affiliates, the General Motors Corporation, or concerns or individuals having connections with the Du Pont organization. I wish to read some of the contributions and loans which were made to this organization during the last year.

Donaldson Brown, vice president of General Motors, $15,000.

R. R. M. Carpenter, vice president of the Du Pont organization, $15,000.

W. S. Carpenter, Jr., vice president of the Du Ponts, $2,334.33.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator have any information with respect to whether or not these contributions come from the individuals or from the corporations which the individuals represent?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The information I have, I may say to the Senator from Wyoming, comes from the reports which the organization has recently filed with the House. I am hopeful that some committee of this body will in the near future ascertain whether or not those individuals are actually putting up the money or whether the corporation behind them is. It does seem rather peculiar that the vice president of a corporation should have $15,000 extra money in 1 year to donate to a movement of this kind.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Does the Senator know whether or not these persons have been the beneficiaries of bonuses granted by the directors of the corporations they represent without the knowledge of their stockholders?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I will later go into the question of the bonuses which the officers of the Du Pont organization receive.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In other words, there is a possibility that the stockholders and possibly the patrons of these corporations are really the ones who unknowingly and unwittingly are financing this Liberty League movement?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I will say to the Senator that the Lobby Investigating Committee last year, for example, investigated the Associated Gas & Electric Co., which had spent almost a million dollars in the holding-company campaign, and found that all of that money for that campaign came out of the stockholders of the company, and not from the private fortunes which the officers of the company had amassed. I do not know whether the efforts to finance the movement now under discussion is on the same plane.

Going on with the list, we find Charles C. Copeland giving $15,000. He is a director of the Du Pont organization.

We find the du Pont family themselves very charitable and giving freely of their funds. Archibald du Pont, $2,500.

Henry du Point, $15,000.

Irénée du Pont, four contributions, one for $15,000, one for $5,000, one for $20,000, and one for $39,000 during the year 1935.

Mrs. Irénée du Pont, $1,000.

Lammot du Pont, $10,000.

Pierre du Pont, $15,000.

S. Hallock du Pont, $15,000.

William du Pont, $15,000.

Those are the contributions or contributions and loans of the Du Pont family during the last year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. BARKELEY. What is the total amount of the du Pont generosity in this respect?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The du Pont family itself, does the Senator mean?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. One hundred and thirty-eight thousand two hundred and fifty dollars came from the family. The difference between that and $270,000 is what other people connected with the Du Ponts or General Motors organization contributed or loaned to the fund.

William Knudsen, executive vice president of the General Motors, $5,000.

John L. Pratt, a director of General Motors, $15,000.

John J. Raskob, director of Du Ponts and of General Motors, and of the Bankers' Trust Co. of New York, $15,000.

The Bankers' Trust Co. of New York, $20,000.

John T. Smith, a vice president of General Motors, $15,000.

Making the amount of $270,584 which came directly from this one group, about which I want to speak later, out of the total amount of $483,000.

For the present I desire to discuss, however, two of the leading spirits of this organization, both of whom are very well known in this country, and both of whom have occupied prominent positions both in the industrial and the political life of the country. I refer to Pierre S. du Pont and John J. Raskob, and particularly I refer to a matter which is now of interest because of the claim of the United States Government concerning income-tax frauds which the Government alleges occurred in 1929.

The Members of the Senate are probably familiar with the fact that a few weeks ago the Treasury Department asserted its claim against Mr. Raskob and Mr. du Pont, alleging that many hundreds of thousands of dollars had been evaded in income-tax payments as a result of a transaction occurring in 1929 between these two very estimable gentlemen. It was described in the newspapers of the country on January 13 by Mr. Raskob as "cheap politics." At that time he gave out this statement:

> One could secure no better illustration of the tyranny which a Government bureau can inflict on a citizen than that presented in the United States Treasury Department attack on Pierre S. du Pont, in which my name is mentioned and in which we are both charged with making pretended sales of securities to one another.

Frankly admitting the mutual purchase and resale of securities after 60 days, Raskob said that—

> All these transactions were deliberately entered into for the purpose of definitely establishing losses in the only way that such losses could be established under the law.

From the statement which Mr. Raskob gave to the newspapers, one would assume that this effort to collect back income taxes from him and Mr. du Pont was started during the last few months as a sort of a prelude to the coming political campaign. I think it is of interest to know that the first notice which Mr. Raskob and Mr. du Pont received from the United States Government in reference to objections to their 1929 income-tax returns did not come in 1936 or 1935, or under the present administration, but that it was given as far back as December 8, 1932, under the prior administration, and that from December 8, 1932, down to the present date the record discloses one continuance after another sought and secured in an effort to delay the final determination of these questions. Those continuances were sought and secured by Mr. Raskob and Mr. du Pont, in order that they might avoid the payment of these taxes.

What was the transaction? I bring it up in connection with the American Liberty League because of the fact that these two men are, I believe, controlling figures in that organization, and that organization claims that it is attempting to influence government in order that the common people of the country, as they say, may be protected and the principles of the Declaration of Independence may be preserved.

What was the situation? It will be remembered that in October 1929 the bubble which had been created by the banking interests of Wall Street finally burst, and the Senate will remember also that both Mr. Raskob and Mr. du Pont were actively interested in the inflation of that bubble. I can never forget reading a few short months previously that when Mr. Raskob returned from Europe in the summer of 1929, at a time when all the evidence available showed that the boom which was then in process could not be continued, he advised the people of this country to continue their purchase of stocks upon the New York Stock Exchange. Mr. Raskob and Mr. du Pont found themselves in November 1929 faced with a very definite loss. The stocks which they had purchased had dropped in the market. As Mr. Raskob said, they could have put those stocks upon the market and taken their actual loss, and they could have honestly presented their case to the Government, and, having sustained a loss, they would have been entitled to a reduction in their income-tax returns; or they could have made an actual bona-fide agreement, one with the other, that one of them would sell to the other, and vice versa, and if they had had such an actual bona-fide agreement, there would have been no objection upon the part of the Government; but they did not do that. They decided that they were as they had previously claimed during the great era of prosperity, just a little smarter than anybody else. So they made a deal, according to which on November 13, 1929, Mr. Pierre du Pont purchased certain stocks from Mr. Raskob and Mr. Raskob purchased certain stock from Mr. du Pont; Mr. du Pont drew a check to Mr. Raskob for $4,606,000 and Mr. Raskob drew a check to Mr. du Pont for $4,582,750.

The record does not quite disclose the value of Mr. Du Pont's check, but it does disclose that the check drawn by Mr. Raskob to Mr. Du Pont for $4,582,750 was absolutely and unqualifiedly what we call a "rubber" check. At the time the check was drawn he did not have the funds in the Bankers' Trust Co.; yet this concern, which is today contributing $20,000 to the American Liberty League, this high-class Morgan banking institution of the city of New York, honored the check of Mr. Raskob for $4,582,750. The check was carried through that bank and was placed to the credit of Mr. Du Pont. Senators know what would happen to the ordinary man; they know what would happen to any individual who might be described in the language of the statement of the Liberty League as "an average man" or as one belonging to the "rank and file" of American citizens if he issued a check without any funds in the bank for $4.50 or for $45 or for $450. The law would take after him and he would land up in some penitentiary. Yet John J. Raskob, this man who says that the principles of the present administration are corrupt and dishonest, this man who organizes the American Liberty League so that we may do away with such laws as we have in the matter of the regulation of banks and security exchanges, this man issued a check for four and a half million dollars on the Bankers' Trust Co. of New York.

We probably are going to hear, Mr. President, on Saturday night over the radio some very considerable discussion by the distinguished gentleman who will there speak about the "baloney" dollar, but when he talks and thinks about "baloney" dollars I should like to have him refer just for a few minutes to the four and a half million dollar "rubber" check which his friend Raskob issued on the Bankers' Trust Co. in 1929.

Raskob and Du Pont decided that their November transaction did not quite satisfy them. So, on December 26, they put through another deal. Du Pont gave Raskob a check for $1,569,000 and Raskob gave Du Pont a check for $1,560,000; and so far as Raskob was concerned—I do not know about Du Pont—the second check was just exactly as valuable as the first check. At the time this check was drawn he did not have money in the Bankers' Trust Co. with which to cover it.

They went through with that transaction. I have said that if they had wanted to dump their stock upon the New York Stock Exchange and actually take their losses, nobody could have objected; it would have been perfectly honest and honorable, and everyone would have been satisfied; or if they did not want to do that, but did want to make a bona-fide deal, and had actually purchased each other's stocks and had kept them and disposed of them in the ordinary way, there would be no objection to that; but they did not have any intention of doing that from the beginning.

They go along until January 27, 1930, when they liquidate their accounts with each other. In the meantime each of them had drawn dividends as the result of their respective stockholdings. So some adjustment was required; but the net result, so far as the closing of the account in January 1930 was concerned, was that checks were given by Raskob to Du Pont for a total amount of $13,032,250. To balance there was an amount of $1,787,000, and there were $54,800 in dividends. So Du Pont received from Raskob a total of $14,883,400, and upon the same sort of basis Raskob received from Du Pont a total of $14,883,354, leaving a total difference of $46.86, which Mr. Raskob owed to Mr. Du Pont. So at that time Mr. Raskob gave Mr. Du Pont a perfectly good check for $46.86, drawn upon some bank in Wilmington, Del.

That is the type of man which composes the leadership of the American Liberty League, the organization which is taking unto itself the right to lecture to the American people, to issue, at an expense of over $400,000 a year, pamphlets and publicity, to hire by the hundreds lawyers throughout the country to go into court contrary to the first principles of legal ethics.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator did not state how the $14,000,000 transaction ended. Were there checks issued at that time also?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. When they had disposed of the checks, Raskob received from Du Pont $14,883,354 and Du Pont received from Raskob $14,883,400, so there was a total of $46.86 which Raskob owed Du Pont and which he paid by check.

Mr. BLACK. In other words, there was not an exchange of $14,000,000 checks? They simply balanced accounts, with the exception of $46.86, and the only check that passed was for $46.86?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That was the only good check so far as I can see. I do not know whether Mr. Du Pont had that much cash in the Bankers' Trust Co. or not, but so far as Mr. Raskob was concerned the only legitimate check he used in the whole transaction was for $46.86.

Mr. BLACK. Did I understand the Senator to refer to these as "baloney" checks?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. No; I said we would hear about "baloney" dollars. I referred to these as "rubber" checks.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator does not wish us to understand that these checks actually represented money, does he?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Why, no. Du Pont may have had that much money in the bank, but Raskob never did have that much money in the bank.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The point is, they made a form of writing checks, but no money was transferred?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. The checks were deposited with the Bankers Trust Co. of New York, but at the time the checks were given there was not that much money behind Mr. Raskob's account upon which the check might be honored.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But the only real money that passed was that which was represented by the check for $46.86?

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. There was an honest-to-goodness check for $46.86 which went through in a perfectly honorable and legitimate way. I think possibly it might be said that when gentlemen of this type are dealing with $46 items they are perfectly honest and perfectly honorable.

That is the leadership of the American Liberty League. We hear a great deal these days about the fact that American big business has reformed, that it has learned its lesson, that if given another opportunity without these checks which the administration has placed upon it by means of legislation, they will show that they have learned their lesson and, having reformed, would seek to put everybody to work and solve our economic problems. I think the fact that John J. Raskob, after all these years and all these lessons, comes out in the papers and attempts to defend this transaction, shows that at least so far as the leadership of the American Liberty League is concerned there has been no reformation.

In that regard I wish to state one thing further. It must be remembered that this income-tax transaction in 1929 did not involve any so-called unconstitutional measures of the present administration. It involved an income tax which was made constitutional by efforts of the country, I believe, some 19 years after the Supreme Court had declared the law unconstitutional. There was not any right or claim upon the part of either of those two illustrious gentlemen that there was anything unconstitutional about the law under which they were dealing. It was not any processing tax or any similar tax such as may have been imposed by the present administration.

Another thing: It was not for money which was being expended today. It was not for money expended in the ordinary course of American business. A very large part, an overwhelming percentage of the money which was paid in income taxes during the year 1929 went for the purpose of retiring the debt and paying the interest upon the debt which was incurred by this country during the war in 1917, 1918, and 1919. It certainly does not look very well to me to have Mr. Raskob and Mr. Du Pont, of the Du Pont interests, attempting to find measures by which they may evade the payment of any debt incurred as a result of these operations or these transactions, because during the period of the war which was largely financed for all countries by the United States, we find that the company out of which they gained their immense fortunes made a fortune such as never had been known in this country before. I think it might be interesting at this point to find out how much this organization, which is today furnishing about 60 percent of the money of the Liberty League, made out of the last war.

In 1914, prior to the time of the war, the Du Pont Co. had a surplus of about $5,000,000. In 1914 that company paid dividends of $3,155,000. In 1915, the first year they got into first-class operation after the war started, they paid dividends of $55,807,000. In 1916 they paid dividends of $62,500,000. In 1917 they paid dividends of $33,600,000, and in 1918 dividends of $18,950,000. At the end of 1918 their surplus, which at the beginning of the war had been $5,000,000, was $68,000,000. When we take the dividends they paid and the difference in their surplus between 1914 and 1918, we find that this company made a total profit out of the war, which it actually paid out in dividends to its stockholders, of $237,000,000 at the expense not merely of the people of the country who pay the taxes but at the expense of hundreds of thousands of our boys whom they sent overseas in order to protect us against what we were told were to be the ravages of a government in Europe.

The Du Pont Co. is very much interested in the American Liberty League. I fail to find, in going through the literature of the league, a single place in which they refer to the protection of foreign nations. It is an American organization. It starts out by saying it is composed of patriotic American citizens. We have today meeting in this city an organization interested in the cause of peace, attempting—it may be a futile effort, but we hope a successful effort in which every individual within the country is interested—to find those things that we must do and that we can do to protect the United States against participation in further wars.

It is my opinion that the most important piece of legislation which will be presented to this Congress is that involving the question of neutrality. Certainly no one can deny the fact that the last war in which we participated resulted in nothing for us but disaster and despair upon the part of our people.

Our Foreign Relations Committee is today struggling with a measure, our Munitions Investigating Committee has been struggling with measures for months, endeavoring to find the causes of war, endeavoring to work out for us legislation by which we may prevent war. If we even casually examine all of the suggestions in reference to that legislation we will find that in every one of them there is contained the principle of America keeping itself out of European affairs.

The question of neutrality is not even a debatable question, in my opinion, so far as Members of this body are concerned, as to the fundamental merits of neutrality and keeping ourselves out of European affairs. Our problem arises because of the difficulties which arise in that very effort itself. It would seem to me that any organization in this country, such as the American Liberty League, which endeavors to claim that its prime purpose is to forward the interests of American citizens should be primarily interested in keeping us out of European affairs.

I propound this question to the Members of the Senate: Is it possible for an organization, 60 percent of its money coming from a group dominated and controlled by manufacturers of munitions, to provide permanently for proper sources of information for the American people? I do not make this charge, but I make the very definite suggestion of the possibility that the Du Ponts, knowing that there may be conditions existing in Europe which they would desire to cause us to be involved in a war in order that they might get back to their old wartime-profit basis again, might be handing out a lot of literature now to the American people which would be attractive to them, so when that time came the American people would accept the propaganda of the Du Pont interests.

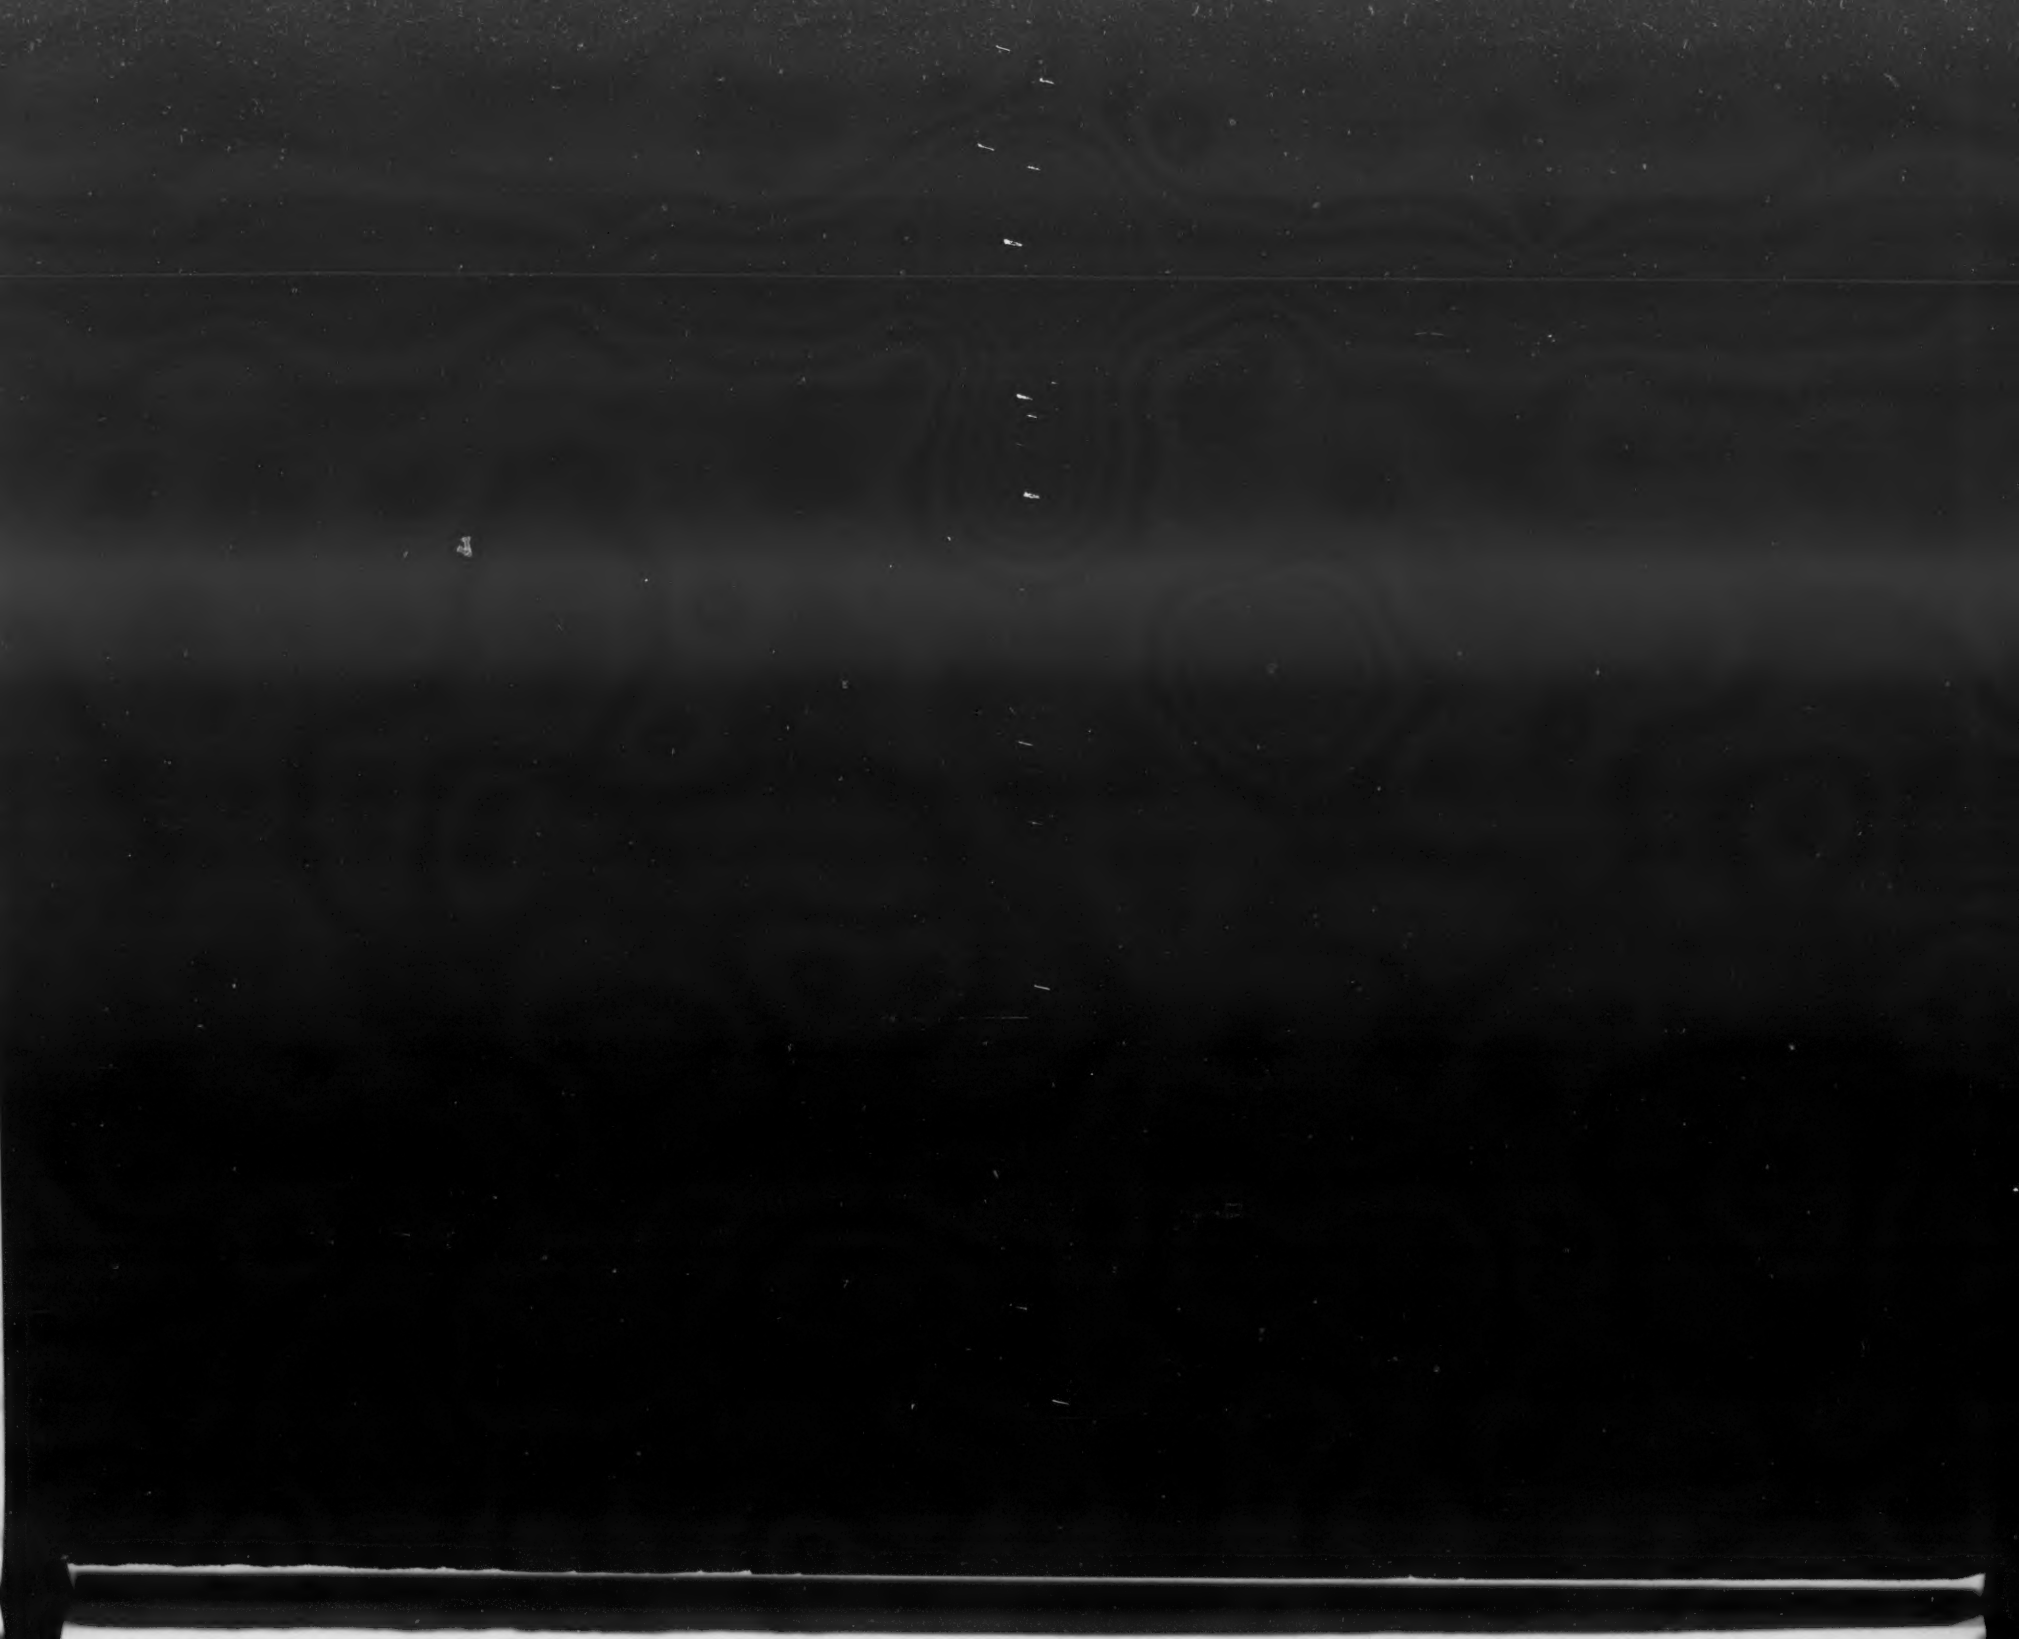
It is interesting to note the connection between the Du Ponts of this country and the various companies in similar business in other nations of the world. No matter what may be said upon the floor of the Senate and no matter what may be thought by Members of this body with reference to any particular activity of the Munitions Investigating Committee, the people of this country are always going to be under very definite obligations to them for some of the information which they have secured and made public to the people of the United States.

Probably one of the largest munitions companies in the world is the Imperial Chemical Industries, a British concern, a concern which extends its influence throughout the world. The records of our own Munitions Committee discloses that they have their investments in companies in Austria, Belgium, France, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Rumania, Spain, Hungary, Africa, Argentine, Australia, Canada, Chile, China, India, Japan, and some small investments in the United States. One cannot think of the possible sphere of war without including the great munitions companies in one of which the Imperial Chemical Industries has a controlling interest; and yet the Du Pont Co. as late as 1928 and as late as 1933, despite the realization it must have of the results, so far as the American people are concerned, of our participation in the last war, entered into agreements revealed by our investigating committee showing a division of the munitions business of the world as between the Du Pont Co., the Imperial Chemical Industries, and its various subsidiaries.

Can you imagine an American company entering into an agreement with an English company with all of its foreign ramifications, such as I have named, and agreeing that in certain spheres the English company could sell 70 percent and the American company could sell 30 percent of the total, agreeing that in other spheres the American company should have a monopoly and the English company would not participate, in return for a monopoly given by our company to them in other spheres? There was a complete and absolute division of the munitions business of the world as a result of these agreements made with this company, which is attempting to dominate government in this country through the donation of $270,000 to a so-called "liberty league", which claims as its purpose the preservation of the principles of the Declaration of Independence!

I have read you the statements of the Liberty League itself. I think, actually, however, as a matter of fact, the real slogan of the Liberty League was expressed not by that smooth and suave gentleman, Mr. Jouett Shouse, nor by that great constitutional lawyer, Mr. James M. Beck, but was really expressed in an article written in November of last year, appearing in the Public Utilities Fortnightly, a trade magazine devoted to public utilities, in which the writer describes the terrible condition in which our poor, defenseless, unprotected public utilities find themselves, and says:

> It is only in this way that a great industrial and business lobby can be created which will be heard effectively in the Halls of Congress and the executive departments, and even in the White House itself.



What is the way? It is very simple. The slogan which he proposes for the American Liberty League on behalf of big business in this country is:

> So I say, let's gang up!

That, in my opinion, is the slogan of the American Liberty League, because Mr. Hutton is one of the foremost contributors to the league, and one of the members of its executive committee, and one of its most active proponents, and most active in its efforts.

Who is Mr. E. F. Hutton? Getting back again to the reminder that it is desirable that the Members of this body and the people of the country should actually know who are behind this movement when they make their professions of patriotism for their country, which they say they want to protect and preserve for the average citizen, the members of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency will remember who Mr. E. F. Hutton is. They will remember that the 1934 report on stock-exchange practices by that committee contained this statement on page 41:

> The dissemination of information flattering to the stock in which the pool is operating is the fourth factor in bringing the operation to a successful conclusion. Although the nature and extent of the pool's own operations are shrouded in utmost secrecy, the participants make use of various channels to disseminate information subtly designed to excite public attention toward the security. A method commonly followed is to cause market letters to be sent by brokerage firms to their branch offices, which letters are made accessible to the investing and speculating public. Typical of this practice were the market letters distributed by E. F. Hutton & Co. with reference to American commercial alcohol stock from September 12, 1932, to May 12, 1933.

Then the committee goes forward and reveals the fact that E. F. Hutton & Co. had their analyst make an investigation of this company. He reported that the stock was not of permanent value. He reported that it was purely speculative in its nature. He reported that because of a number of reasons they should not advise the public to purchase the stock for the purpose of investment; and yet over a period of 6 months E. F. Hutton & Co. put out encouraging reports. The price of the stock was raised, as I remember, from twenty-something up to 69 or 70. They then unloaded the stock that E. F. Hutton & Co. had secured by secret option from the officers of the Commercial Alcohol Co., and pulled the plug, and the stock dropped down about half in half-a-day on the stock exchange. That is the Mr. E. F. Hutton who, on behalf of the American Liberty League, says:

So I say, let's gang up!

And that is typical of the group of men who control and dominate the American Liberty League because of the donations they have made to that organization.

Probably the outstanding example of corrupt and dishonest practice as disclosed to our Committee on Banking and Currency was the pool that was established in 1928 for the Sinclair Consolidated Oil Corporation. Out of that pool, which was purely a "phony" operation, in which exactly the same number of shares of stock were sold by the pool as were purchased by the pool, the pool itself made a profit of $12,200,109, and the trading syndicate made a profit of $418,383. Those profits were made by that pool by rigging the market; and, as I say, it is my opinion that it is probably the outstanding example of crooked and dishonest stock manipulation which was revealed to our committee.

What was Mr. Hutton's part in it? E. F. Hutton & Co. participated in it to the tune of $15,000,000, $12,000,000 of which they borrowed from the Chase National Bank of the City of New York. I state those facts in order that the Senate may have another example of the honesty and integrity of some of the gentlemen connected with the American Liberty League.

The record of the organization shows that it has certain officers. Mr. Jouett Shouse is the head of the organization. I think, as was indicated by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], that it is not necessary to say very much about Mr. Shouse. He is, to all who know him, a very suave and a very capable gentleman who always manages to keep himself upon some propaganda pay roll. I admire him and respect him for his ability to keep on a pay roll, and I wish there were many of us who had the same ability to get fifty or sixty thousand dollars a year by just handing out a line of suave bunk to the public; but I do not think there is anything very vicious about Mr. Shouse. He just likes to be on a pay roll and to live well.

The treasurer of the organization, however, is a man who might be of interest to Members of the Senate—a man by the name of Grayson M. P. Murphy. You may remember, over in the House, the public hearings of the Special Committee on un-American Activities appointed by the House in the Seventy-third Congress, which reported on December 29, 1934; and you may remember that Gen. Smedley Butler testified before that committee. He testified about a man by the name of MacGuire, who had come to him and told him what upon the face of it appeared to be a very weird story—a story about a fascist movement in America; a story to the effect that the business interests of this country had employed this man MacGuire, and that he had gone to Europe and studied various fascist forms of government there, and he had come to General Butler and proposed that they steal the national American Legion convention and lead a march upon Washington; that if Roosevelt would go along they would leave him in, but, if he would not, they would leave him as President but put in an assistant president, who would run the Government.

When I read the newspaper reports of that it did seem to me like a weird and impossible story; and yet when the committee continued its investigations, and called before it Mr. MacGuire, it proved that checks of $64,000, $20,000, and $18,000 were received by MacGuire from somebody in this country for the purpose of carrying on the campaign. At that point in the proceedings the Philadelphia Record and the New York Evening Post sent a reporter by the name of Paul C. French to investigate Mr. MacGuire; and where do you suppose he found Mr. MacGuire? Where was his office? His office was located in the office of the same Mr. Murphy who is the secretary of the American Liberty League; and MacGuire later admitted that Murphy had given him the money with which to finance this campaign, this effort upon the part of big business in this country, if they do not succeed in their efforts to defeat this administration, to force the establishment here of a Fascist dictatorship which will result in the complete abandonment of our American democratic system of government.

Mr. President, I have given these as a few of the outstanding examples of the leadership of the American Liberty League, a leadership very largely supplied during these precarious times, when the possibility of war is always hanging over us, by a financial interest which has made its fortune and is primarily interested in the business of war.

I wish to say just this in conclusion, Mr. President: There is one thing about this meeting on Saturday night which I do not like particularly, and that is the fact that the principal speaker is to be a man whom I in 1928 respected and almost revered as the leader of a liberal Americanism in this country. I was then, as I am now, just a humble, unimportant individual; but I think anyone within my State will recognize that I, more than any other individual in the State, made the speeches for Alfred E. Smith for President and carried his banner during that campaign.

I went around the State and told the people about the life of this man. I told them they could trust him because of the fact that he had such a humble beginning. I told them of his early life in the fish market in New York, of his struggle to gain prominence, of the fight he had made for social justice in the State of New York, and, as I have said, it is not with any feeling of delight that I refer to his part in this meeting on next Saturday night.

I remember that just about 2 years ago, on a trip to the eastern coast, I went up to New York, and, because I had never met this man whom I had so vigorously supported, I called on him and had an interview with him. I went into that great tomb of a deserted building, the Empire State Building, and found Governor Smith sitting in a big office all alone, with nothing to do except to try to rent offices in this building, in which his old friends, Du Pont and Raskob had persuaded him to invest the frugal earnings of an honorable and honest political career. I talked to him and found him a disappointed, discouraged man. I went away from there filled with a spirit of sadness.

I want to say just this in reference to the speech Governor Smith will make on Saturday night. His ears will be filled with the plaudits of an audience. He is going to be tempted to say to them things which will please them and attract the attention of big business throughout the country. I predict that every one of the lawyers here who make their business lobbying against the interests of the people will be there. I predict that all of the puppets the financiers have running their corporations will be there. They will all be there to applaud and to tell Al what a great man he is.

As he stands up before that meeting and faces the microphones, talking to the people of the country, the first real opportunity he has had to speak to the people of the country since 1928, I just wish to remind Governor Smith, as one who has gone out and fought for him and supported him against the criticism of many people, of that night of October 1, 1928, when from the convention hall of the Democratic State convention of the State of New York he put in a long-distance call to Warm Springs, Ga. I ask him to remember that in 1920, when he was first a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, there came to the convention platform at San Francisco to second his nomination a young man, straight, strong, vigorous, and active who pleaded his cause there; that in 1924 at Madison Square Garden, New York, they brought this self-same man in on the back of a truck, carried him up to the platform, and bolstered him up, but once again his friend Al had called him and came to his assistance.

Then, in 1928, down at Houston, in the midst of that convention, a little stronger, a little more vigorous than he was in 1924, this friend of Al Smith's coined the campaign slogan, "The Happy Warrior."

When Al Smith, on October 1, 1928, put in that call to Warm Springs, Ga., he knew that Franklin Roosevelt was there recuperating from the efforts he had made on Al Smith's behalf during that year. He knew that his doctors would advise against the course which he, Al Smith, wanted Franklin Roosevelt to take. He knew that if he did take that course it might imperil his very life. Yet Al Smith put in that call, I have no doubt, with the greatest of confidence, because he knew that Franklin Roosevelt was his friend, and that upon every occasion when he had called upon him, in season or out of season, Franklin Roosevelt had supported him; and he put in the call.

Al Smith wanted to be elected President of the United States. He knew that of vital importance in that election was the vote of the State of New York; he knew that his best chance of getting the vote of the State of New York was to have Franklin Roosevelt as a candidate for Governor of that State; and, despite the fact that it involved a risking of the life of his very best friend, he made that request, and Franklin Roosevelt again acceded, and again came to his support and to his rescue.

Mr. President, I want Gov. Alfred E. Smith on next Saturday night, when he is surrounded by the American Liberty League, to remember that the attacks he makes are upon the very best friend he ever had, and that the first principle of happiness in life is the remembrance of friendship; and, tempted, as he will be, to give way to the applause of that audience, induced, as he will be, to give way to the temptation to follow the advice of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, Mr. John J. Raskob, Mr. Pierre Du Pont, and all of the rest of these who control the American Liberty League, I say that Governor Smith should first remember that no man can successfully turn his back upon a friend.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to call up for consideration at this time the amendment offered by me on yesterday, which is printed and on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed, on page 1, beginning with line 3, to strike all down to and including line 24, page 2, as follows:

That section 412 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code, approved June 19, 1934, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Tolls on merchant vessels, Army and Navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, supply ships, and yachts shall be based on net vessel-tons of 100 cubic feet each of actual earning capacity, determined in accordance with the Rules for the Measurement of Vessels for the Panama Canal prescribed by proclamation of the President, November 21, 1913, and as may be amended from time to time by order of the President, and shall not exceed $1 per net vessel-ton so determined, nor be less than 60 cents per net vessel-ton so determined, on laden vessels, and on vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo shall be less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo: Provided, That tolls shall not be levied on a deck load, which is defined, for the purposes of this act, as cargo situated in a space which is at all times exposed to the weather and the sea and which space is not included in the net tonnage determined under the said Rules for the Measurement of Vessels for the Panama Canal, except on tonnage of such deck loads which is in excess of 20 percent of the net tonnage of a vessel so determined.

"Tolls on other floating craft shall be levied on displacement tonnage at rates to be prescribed by the President. In addition to the tolls based on measurement or displacement tonnage, tolls may be levied on passengers at rates prescribed by the President but not to exceed $1.50 for each passenger. The levy of tolls is subject to the provisions of article XIX of the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903, and of article I of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, proclaimed March 30, 1922."

On page 3, line 9, to strike out "1936" and to insert in lieu thereof "1937"; and on page 3, line 22, to strike cut "except that section 1 shall take effect on September 1, 1936."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senate for a few moments, I will state the import of the amendment.

The effect of the amendment would be to strike out section 1 of the bill and to leave therein section 2, and the consequence of such alteration of the bill would be, to begin with, to provide for the committee to investigate the subject, as contemplated in the bill and to leave the matter to the report of the committee to be made on the 1st of January 1937. As the bill stands, unamended, the President would undertake to have the questions investigated and would fix the rates for just a few months, then the door would be open, by way of investigation, for an alteration during the present year.

If an investigation is to be made, I propose that it shall be a real investigation. I do not see why there should be an investigation after the rates had been fixed. An investigation hereafter would be of what we may do today. It seems to me the intelligent and the logical thing to do, if we are to investigate the question of Panama Canal tolls, is not to complicate the investigation, not to upset the existing state of affairs pending the determination of the facts. So, if my amendment were adopted, the effect would be to refer the whole subject to a committee of three, to be appointed by the President, with instructions to report back by the 1st of January 1937. The delay would be only one of 11½ months.

Mr. President, I was moved to offer this amendment after reading the majority and the minority reports during the debate here yesterday morning. I think we will all agree, in the first place, that the subject is highly technical. It is complicated by the effect of the proposed changes in type of vessels, the cargo vessels and passenger vessels, and is further complicated by apparent consequences favorable to foreign vessels and unfavorable to domestic vessels. All that strikes me as being very serious.

If our country is committed to any special course with regard to our shipping, as a matter of the development of our commerce and also as a matter indispensable to our national defense, it is committed to every possible course looking to the upbuilding of our own merchant marine. It seems to me, Mr. President, we should not move precipitately into the legislation as proposed, fully aware as we must be both from the debate here and from the minority report, and also from the hearings, that the consequence of the legislation will be to transfer the burden of the tolls in an almost inconceivable degree from the tanker ships, which would be of no use by way of defense, and to a less degree, but still a serious degree, from foreign ships to our cargo-carrying ships and passenger-carrying ships, which are the only ships which would be of value to us in a matter of national defense—the only ships which would come within the national policy of building up our mercantile marine in order that there may be abundance of merchantmen, so indispensable in the time of war. I see no reason for haste in a matter so grave.

I may say here by way of parenthesis that I have a very warm regard for the chairman of the committee, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I share the unanimous admiration in which he is held in the Senate. I am naturally reluctant to pursue a course tending in any degree to contravene his efforts. I believe that with the passage of 11½ months of thorough and careful investigation—and we are confessedly going forward without an investigation—with the light thrown by experts upon this whole freight-rate structure on traffic through the Panama Canal, within 12 months of this hour he and I and all the other Senators who may now differ on the subject may find a common basis of agreement in legislation which will leave no doubt in our minds of its value and its wisdom.

Mr. President, the facts are not controverted. It is admitted that notwithstanding the fact that the total volume of tolls will not be increased by the proposed legislation—the volume now being at the rate of $24,000,000 a year, and the volume contemplated to be $24,000,000 a year after the enactment of the proposed legislation—notwithstanding there will be no change in the volume of the tolls, the sum being $24,000,000 in either case, the increase in tolls upon cargo-carrying ships and passenger-carrying ships will be from 20 to 22 percent, the increase on American bottoms 7 percent, and the increase on foreign bottoms 2 percent. Over against that we have the further fact that the oil-carrying tankers will get the advantage of a reduction of something more than $500,000—I think the figure is $580,000—and every dollar of that burden will be transferred from the tankers to the carriers of general cargo and the carriers of passengers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Last year, as I recall, the United States exported about one and one-half million or one million six hundred thousand bales of cotton. I imagine the greater part of it went through the Canal.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator means it was exported to the Orient?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I am talking about Japan. We exported about 1,600,000 bales of cotton to Japan, as I recall, and most of that cotton went through the Panama Canal. Does the Senator mean to say that the rates will be increased on such shipments of cotton hereafter if the bill shall be enacted into law?

Mr. BAILEY. They will be relatively increased. Let us understand about that.

The bill contemplates a general reduction in rates from a maximum of $1.25 to a maximum of $1; and, of course, all cargoes, cotton included, would get the benefit of that reduction. Senators, hear me: Notwithstanding the fact that that reduction is contemplated, it is intended that the volume of tolls shall be the same, $24,000,000, and every dollar of that sum will come from the general cargo-carrying ships and the passenger ships.

That gives Senators some idea of how great the transfer of the freight burden is. I am not saying that it is not right. I am not saying that it is not just. I am saying that from the evidence before me and the debate which has been had here I cannot see that it is either right, just, or wise.

I have heard the explanations, but the explanations do not satisfy me, of the policy of maintaining the tolls at the sum of $24,000,000 and at the same time very greatly reducing them on foreign ships and on oil-tanker ships, and therefore manifestly increasing them on the cargo ships and the passenger ships of our own merchant marine. That troubles me. I do not wish to commit myself to such a policy without seeing that it is necessary and just. I have heard the arguments made here during the past 2 days. The argument is that the American shipowners have learned how to cut holes in the decks of their ships, and therefore get lower rates than they are justly entitled to get.

That is a very strange way to put the matter. I do not imagine there is a shipmaster in America who is deliberately cutting holes in the deck of his ship. What are they doing? They are adapting the structure of the ship to the law as written, to the regulations as provided. Who is responsible for that law? That law was enacted under the Wilson administration, and those regulations and the ruling of the Attorney General were made under the Wilson administration.

I cannot imagine that we would be under the necessity of changing our whole system of tolls charged vessels passing through the Panama Canal in order to meet a situation brought about by cutting holes in the decks of ships. I think there is a better description for that practice. It revolves around the doctrine of the deck cargo, and the deck cargo is described in the law as the cargo on the deck and exposed to weather and the sea. So I assume that American shippers have learned how to ship with their cargoes exposed to the weather and the sea. There is nothing wrong about that. If they can do that successfully, they fall within the law in either case, and nothing can be accomplished by this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, these are the facts which have come to me from the consideration of this measure. I approach it with an entirely open mind. There are no shipping lines out of my State, though I hope there will be some day. I will confess that the matter found attachment in my thinking on the subject of cotton. When I read the report and found that the tolls on oil were to be greatly reduced and those on general cargo were to be cut to a point which would keep the volume of the tolls at the same figure, $24,000,000, I remembered the fact that 60 percent of the tobacco produced in my State was sold abroad, a large portion of it going to the Orient through the Panama Canal. I recalled the fact that the cotton of the South now to the extent of about 45 percent—and we hope yet to get back to the point where it will be 60 percent—either goes across the Atlantic to Great Britain and other European countries or through the Panama Canal to the Orient, and the Orient promises now by far to be our largest market.

I am interested, Mr. President, in the matter of developing the export trade for our southern farmers. More largely than any other class of people in America, whether manufacturers or farmers, the southern farmer must look to the markets of the world for the expansion of his acreage and the consumption of the produce of his labor. The South is an export section. I am unwilling to commit myself at this stage to a course which will enable the oil shipper, for some unknown reason, to get all the benefit of a great change in the toll system, while the general-cargo ship, which carries the cotton of the southern farmer, the tobacco of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, will carry the extra burden.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say. I submit the amendment with a great deal of deference to my good friend the junior Senator from Oklahoma. I am not asking for the defeat of this proposed legislation; I am not saying that ultimately we may not find that there is some justification for a change in the toll system. All my amendment calls for is an investigation by competent experts, appointed by the President, who are to report back with a view to legislation within 12 months from this hour. I say, in view of the prevailing confusion here, that is a reasonable, and I hope it will be found to be a wise suggestion.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate, particularly at this time, as I am very much in agreement with the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. There are one or two matters, however, which I should like to say, following up, so to speak, the discussion in which I took part yesterday.

The Senator from Oklahoma referred to the alterations in American general cargo and passenger ships by reason of which substantial reductions were effected in Panama Canal tolls in certain American intercoastal fleets. In connection with one of these lines he cited alterations made in 18 ships by reason of which tolls were reduced about 23 percent. He did not, however, mention the fact that the hearings before the Senate committee disclosed that in making these alterations the line in question reduced its weight-carrying capacity on an average of 1,362 tons per ship, while the United States net tonnage upon which the tolls are based was reduced by only 972 tons per ship.

Then, Mr. President, a good deal has been said not only by the distinguished chairman of the committee but by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], and reference was made a moment ago by the Senator who just preceded me to the matter of certain steamship owners cutting holes in the decks of their ships. I think that characterization has been very misleading. The openings are made in compliance with the United States law and in compliance with the regulations of the Bureau of Navigation. The openings are known as tonnage hatches. There is nothing mysterious about them; there is no subterfuge in connection with them at all. Anybody, in my humble judgment, who knows anything about maritime matters—and I do not pretend to be an expert—knows that to be so.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Are the so-called holes that are spoken of here as being cut in the decks of ships hatches through which by means of derricks and cables and other machinery freight is loaded and unloaded into the hold of the ship from the wharf or from whatever loading space is available?

Mr. BARBOUR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. And after the freight is put into the hold through the holes or hatches, then the openings are covered with lumber and canvas and other materials in order to protect the freight?

Mr. BARBOUR. The openings are battened down and made waterproof, as they ought to be.

Mr. BARKLEY. Are those the things that have been described here as holes cut in the decks?

Mr. BARBOUR. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am wondering, if that be true, how else the ship could be loaded.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BARBOUR. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is entirely mistaken. Ships have cargo hatches in their ordinary and regular construction through which the cargoes are let down to the deck below. Such hatches are a part of the construction of a ship. Around the sides of such hatches, which are some 15 to 20 feet square as a rule, there is a combing of from 2 to 4 feet high, and the hatches are battened down and made waterproof in the regular operation of the vessel.

The holes to which reference has been so frequently made are not cargo hatches at all. They are so-called tonnage hatches, tonnage openings, and they do not serve any useful purpose in the operation of the ship. They are put in the ship in order to conform with a technical rule, because when they are put in the ship then the deck becomes an open shelter deck.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is my point.

Mr. GORE. The regular cargo hatches are battened down with permanent cleats. The so-called tonnage openings or tonnage hatches have planks put over them in the same way as in the case of the regular cargo hatches, and tarpaulins are also put over them in the same way as in the case of the cargo hatches; but the cargo hatches have permanent cleats attached to the combing; wooden wedges are driven back of the cleats, and that makes the closure permanent.

On the tonnage hatches the combing is limited to a foot in height. The tonnage hatches are covered with planks, as are the cargo hatches. They are then covered with tarpaulins, as are the permanent hatches, but they have no cleats around the combing. A rope can be tied around them to make them as watertight as are the cargo hatches, or a steel band can be placed around them to make them as waterproof as are the cargo hatches, but the steel band can be taken off and laid on the deck. Therefore, that is construed to be a temporary closing, whereas the cargo hatches, having cleats attached to the combing, are called permanent fixtures. It is that technical distinction which takes the entire deck, the space between the deck in which the opening is cut and the deck below, entirely out of the toll-paying tonnage of the ship. That is all it is for.

Mr. BARKLEY. The temporary holes are made in compliance with some regulation or an opinion of the Attorney General, I understand. If they are made in compliance with a Government regulation I do not understand how it can be held they are put there in order to evade the payment of tolls. One or the other is a mistaken idea.

Mr. GORE. The openings are not required by law. They are not required by the rules and regulations. They are, however, permitted by the rules and regulations, and when they are put in they reduce the tonnage of the ship when measured by the United States rules. Let me give a concrete case.

The Senator will understand that we have two systems, the United States rules and the Panama Canal rules, for the measurement of ships. The original act referring to Panama Canal tolls placed a maximum of $1.25 and a minimum of 75 cents per net registered ton. In pursuance of that the President, who is authorized to fix tolls between those limits, issued a proclamation fixing the tolls at $1.20 per ton measured by the Panama Canal rules for laden ships and 72 cents for ships in ballast. The Attorney General ruled that in case of a conflict, if the $1.25 rate times the United States tonnage was less than $1.20 times the Panama Canal rules, the former should prevail.

Here is what happened. In other words, heads the ships win, tails the Government loses.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I am very anxious not to interrupt the Senator, but I believe I have the floor.

Mr. GORE. I appreciate the Senator's impatience, but ask his further indulgence for a moment.

Mr. BARBOUR. Very well; I shall be glad to yield further.

Mr. GORE. In the case of a ship which has 5,000 tons capacity measured by the Panama Canal rule, it would pay $1.20 per ton, or $6,000 toll; but that same ship, owing to these devices, has only 4,000 tons when measured by the United States rules. Multiplying $1.25 by 4,000 gives $5,000, so that by this device, in case of a conflict, the $5,000 controls instead of the $6,000, and that ship, by having put these holes in the deck, pays $5,000 to this Government instead of paying $6,000 as it should. That is the effect. That is the reason why these openings are put in the decks. That is the only purpose and that is the only effect.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, in describing the tonnage hatches and how they are treated, I think the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] really gave the answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. These are not merely holes bored in the ship. The impression was given to Senators that they were merely holes, and the word "holes" was used intentionally. It was said that there is some subterfuge about it when, as a matter of fact, it is done under rules and regulations issued by the Bureau of Navigation. I do not feel that the impression should be given that these so-called holes in the decks of vessels are on a par with portholes or windows or other apertures in a ship which admittedly can be readily opened and shut.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and other proponents of the bill have not pointed out the fact that in making these openings the draft of the ship is lessened and the freeboard, as has been testified in our hearings, is increased—that is, the part of the vessel above the water—and there is consequent loss in carrying capacity in proportion to the saving of the tolls. Any one of these freight lines would gladly not make the tonnage openings if they had freights which would load the ships down to where they could use this extra capacity. The fact is that these ships—American ships principally—transiting the Canal are not able to obtain cargo to their full weight-carrying capacity.

The distinguished Senator from Oklahoma yesterday referred to the fact that certain other types of ships have not made tonnage openings. The point is the types of ships as a whole which have not made tonnage openings are ships which have cargoes that load them to the full maximum draft, and if they made tonnage openings they would have to forego carrying some of the cargo which is available to them, as was testified in the hearings. In other words, the conflict which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has pointed out—if "conflict" is the right word—is a conflict between the ordinary type of passenger and freight vessel and the ore-carrying type of ship, the tanker and other industrially owned vessels which will be benefited.

Mr. President, the matter has been covered so thoroughly that obviously if we are going to do anything at all in respect to legislation it should be to vote for the inquiry by the proper authorities with technical knowledge, to have the investigation, and as a part of the resolution have a definite date fixed when the report shall be made. If at that time it is shown, which I feel has not been shown since the discussion began, that certain changes have to be made, I shall favor them. At the present time I am absolutely opposed to them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], of course, would defeat the purpose of the entire measure and would protract a delay which has gone on now for more than 21 years. The original tolls act was passed in 1912. The rules for the measurement of ships in connection with the assessment of tolls were promulgated in 1913. I say to the Senate that those rules and regulations promulgated by the President were based on an elaborate report made by Dr. Emory R. Johnson, an expert upon this subject. I believe the report comprised 1,000 pages or more. It is one of the most scientific investigations ever made and one of the most exhaustive reports ever submitted to the Government. On that report the President based his rules and promulgated the tolls to be assessed and paid.

Owing to the decision of the Attorney General, what was thought to be a scientific system at the time fell into an absurdity out of which all sorts of anomalies have flowed, which in effect have permitted vessel owners to assess their own tolls instead of allowing the Government of the United States to assess the tolls on the vessels availing themselves of the Canal.

As soon as the Attorney General promulgated his ruling which destroyed the system, a plan was undertaken looking to the legislation pending here today. President Wilson issued a statement upon the subject, adapting the policy to the rulings of the Attorney General, but recommending legislation upon this subject. President Wilson, 21 years ago, recommended the legislation involved in the bill now pending. The years have dragged by. Hearing after hearing has been had in each House. Every time this legislation is proposed, the shipping interests come flocking here and desire to be heard. Of course, every citizen has a right to be heard concerning any legislation affecting his interests; but hearing after hearing has succeeded hearing after hearing, an obvious filibuster on the part of the great shipping concerns which are availing themselves on these devices in order to reduce their own tolls. They come trooping here to Congress and plead in behalf of delay.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GORE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not quite understand what the Senator means by a filibuster.

Mr. GORE. I mean that every time a bill of this sort is introduced, the shipping interests desire to be heard over and over again, threshing the same straw over and over again. The Senators knows that to be true.

Mr. COPELAND. It may well be that it is straw, and worn-out and useless straw; and if the shipping interests are seeking to serve the people of the United States, they naturally resent anything which is going to increase their tolls.

My criticism of the shipping interests in this connection is that they have not presented their case. I have been quite resentful that I could not get any arguments from them or from anybody. I have had to deal with the matter from my general knowledge; and I desire to have it distinctly understood that, so far as I am concerned, I have not attempted to filibuster against this bill or any previous one.

Mr. GORE. I made no intimation of that sort. I said the shipping interests have filibustered.

Mr. COPELAND. This bill manifestly is not in the public interest; and yet I feel that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has presented a very wise plan. It would be very desirable for somebody to study the situation and find out what is wheat and what, on the other hand, may be chaff and straw. At the present time the Senate is quite befuddled, because it has not all the facts before it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as I stated, as soon as this anomalous situation arose, President Wilson recommended legislation to remedy it. That was 21 years ago. Every Secretary of War from that day until this has united in recommending the legislation embodied in the pending bill.

It may be that the present President of the United States has no understanding of this need, has no appreciation of the importance of the subject. It may be that he is precipitate in urging this legislation now, after 21 years have come and gone. In view of what the Senator from New York has said, I ask to have the President's letter read to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 6, 1936.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
Chairman, Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: The enactment of bill S. 2288 providing for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, which was favorably reported by your committee on May 15, 1935, is essential to the proper management of the Canal.

The existing unsatisfactory, unfair, dual system of measurement whereby tolls charges are based on one tonnage, and the limiting factor on another different and smaller tonnage subject to manipulation, should be abolished. Control over the amount of tolls charged should be regained, and the apparently endless reduction in tolls paid should be stopped. The enactment of the bill will result in the reestablishment of the system originally intended, which, through certain technicalities, has become ineffective.

There has already been too much delay in the enactment of this remedial legislation, attempts to secure which have been made for a good many years by those charged with the administration of the Canal.

The House has passed a similar bill on four different occasions, and I now urge that you make an earnest endeavor to secure its passage by the Senate at an early date.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, that letter clearly and succinctly summarizes the points in favor of the pending legislation, the points in favor of its enactment now, and the points against its further delay. As suggested by the President, measures of this sort have four times passed the House, but it has never proved possible to bring them to a vote in the Senate. Obstructions always have occurred.

Now, Mr. President, a word in answer to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] has said.

The original tolls act fixed a maximum of $1.25 per net registered ton and a minimum of 75 cents per net registered ton. Within those limits, the President could ascertain and proclaim reasonable rates. He did so proclaim in the fall of 1913, fixing a rate of $1.20 per net ton on laden vessels, and 72 cents per net ton on vessels passing through the Canal in ballast. The pending bill fixes the maximum at $1; 20 cents less than the President's proclamation and 25 cents less than the original act. The original act placed the minimum at 75 cents on ships in ballast. The President's proclamation fixed it at 72 cents. The pending bill lowers it to 60 cents per ton; so that in any event, the rates embodied in the pending bill are much less than those prescribed in the original act, and are much less than those fixed in the President's proclamation.

The pending bill merely fixes the maximum and the minimum charge on laden ships, which is to be not more than $1 and not less than 60 cents. That becomes a permanent statute. Within those limits the President, after such investigation as he may make or may cause to be made, will issue a proclamation fixing the exact toll per ton; but we desire to have this bill passed now in order to get rid of the confusion resulting from the dual system of measurement. We shall make no progress until that one thing shall have been accomplished.

We are not rushing precipitately into this action. Twenty years have elapsed; and even after this measure shall be passed, all it will do is to fix the maximum and the minimum tolls. The President will issue a proclamation fixing the exact toll per ton within those limits.

There are some instances where the tolls will be raised on certain ships. For instance, the Grace Line has reduced its own tolls to the extent of 33.9 percent by the manipulation of its structures through these trifling devices. If this bill passes, the Grace Line will pay higher tolls than it now pays, for the simple reason that it is now paying less tolls than it ought to pay. There are some vessels which have not availed themselves of this device. When this bill becomes effective, those vessels will pay less tolls than they now pay.

Senators are concerned about cotton. I share their concern. They are afraid this measure will raise the freight rates on cotton. I should like to have Senators mark this one point:

Certain ships now carrying cotton have reduced their own tolls by these openings in the deck. They pay less tolls than their competitors who have not cut these holes in the deck. The result is that they do not pass the reduction which they enjoy on their tolls either back to the shipper of cotton in a higher price for his cotton, nor to the purchasers across the sea who might buy the cotton at a less rate on account of the reduced tolls—nay, not at all. They are competing with ships which have not cut these holes and have not made this reduction in the tolls; so the present condition simply amounts to a subsidy on the part of the ship which has cut the openings in its deck as against its competitor that has not.

It pays less in tolls, but it does not charge lower freight rates. There is no reason why it should, because it is competing with ships which have not reduced their tolls and therefore cannot reduce their freight rates. So it amounts to a subsidy, pure and simple, to those who have resorted to this device as against their competitors who have not resorted to the device.

As I stated this morning, speaking of shelter-deck ships, 336 American ships have changed their decks and made openings in their decks and have availed themselves of this privilege. Eighty-six American ships of this particular type have not. Of the foreign ships of this particular type, the shelter-deck type, 729 have availed themselves of this device and 334 have not.

The benefit resulting to tank ships is not limited to tank ships alone. Tank ships, owing to their peculiar structure, cannot avail themselves of these devices and lower their tonnage. The result is that on the average they pay higher tolls in passing through the Canal than any other type of ship, higher tolls than any other type of ship, meaning the types which have cut the holes in the decks and availed themselves of this privilege.

On the other hand, as I showed this morning, the Southern Sun, a tanker ship, when it passes through the Canal loaded, pays tolls, under the United States rules of measurement, on 5,398 tons, but when it is returning in ballast it pays on 6,550 tons. If this bill is enacted, it will pay on exactly the same tonnage when it is laden as when it is in ballast, exactly the same number of tons, as it should. It will, however, pay a lower rate on its tonnage when passing in ballast than when it passes in cargo. That benefit will inure to the tank ships, but not to the tank ships alone; that benefit will inure to any ship which has not taken advantage of these openings and reduced its own tolls, legislating instead of Congress.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina will be defeated. Let the measure pass fixing the maximum at a dollar and the minimum at 60 cents. The bill does provide for an investigation by a commission in the meantime, adjourning the date when the dollar and the 60-cent rates should go into effect, raising a commission in the meantime to make a study and make a report to the President. After that report shall be submitted, then the President, based on the report, would formulate the rules and the tolls, would make the proclamation, and it would go into effect.

If the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is adopted the bill will simply raise a commission to study this subject, and the commission will take considerable time to make the study. We have no assurance that after it makes its report we will not grind around and around for 20 years longer trying to correct this anomalous situation and to put the assessment and collection of the tolls in the Panama Canal on a sound, scientific, and equitable basis, which does not now exist and will never be in effect so long as the existing confusion and dual system are permitted to continue.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. McNARY. If it is agreeable, I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Chavez	Hatch	Overton
Austin	Clark	Johnson	Pope
Bachman	Connally	Keyes	Radcliffe
Bailey	Coolidge	La Follette	Reynolds
Bankhead	Copeland	Logan	Robinson
Barbour	Costigan	Lonergan	Russell
Barkley	Couzens	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Benson	Davis	McCarran	Sheppard
Bilbo	Dickinson	McGill	Shipstead
Bone	Donahey	McKellar	Smith
Borah	Duffy	McNary	Steiwer
Brown	Fletcher	Maloney	Thomas, Utah
Bulkley	Frazier	Minton	Townsend
Bulow	George	Moore	Truman
Burke	Gerry	Murray	Tydings
Byrd	Gibson	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Gore	Norbeck	Wagner
Capper	Guffey	Norris	Walsh
Caraway	Hale	Nye	White
Carey	Hastings	O'Mahoney

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TYDINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF]. I am advised, however, that on this question he is specially paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. If present, the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay" and the Senator from Rhode Island would vote "yea" on this question. Being at liberty to vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER. Before the result is announced I wish to inquire whether the present vote contemplates treating the proposition as one amendment. It is all connected, I suppose, and treated as one amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; it is treated as one amendment.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. VAN NUYS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The result was announced—yeas 62, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—62

Adams	Borah	Connally	Fletcher
Austin	Brown	Coolidge	Frazier
Bachman	Bulkley	Copeland	George

So Mr. BAILEY's amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to further amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in connection with my reference to Mr. Ryan this morning, I desire to have printed in the RECORD a letter written by the Department of Commerce to the Italian shipping concern which Mr. Ryan represented, in which the Department refers to him as "your Mr. Ryan."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION AND STEAMBOAT INSPECTION,
Washington, February 27, 1935.

Mr. F. QUATTRONE,
New York, N. Y.

SIR: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of the 15th instant submitting plans of proposed changes in the space between D and E decks of the Italian vessels Orazio and Virgilio, apparently for the purpose of making D deck a shelter deck and automatically exempting the passenger spaces thereon from measurement for tonnage.

It seems that an opening on each side 14 feet long by 3½ feet high is proposed to be made in the shell plating near the after end of the vessels to accomplish this purpose. This opening is to be hedged off from the rest of the between-deck space by partitions which have the effect of confining any water that might enter the opening within the small portion of the between deck between the side of the ships and the partition.

There being no specific regulation nor precedent governing this kind of opening, pending the outcome of bills now before Congress with regard to safety provisions for ships, especially passenger ships, after discussing the details of the proposed opening with your Mr. Ryan yesterday morning, it was deemed advisable not to consider this change any further at this time.

Respectfully,

——— ———, Director.

Mr. GORE. The amendment just adopted by the Senate emasculates the bill. Nothing remains of the bill now except section 2, and section 2 does nothing except to raise a commission to investigate the subject. That was the proposition submitted to the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals when the hearing was in progress. It is exactly what the shipping concerns asked my committee to do—report a bill embodying no other proposition than that which now remains in the bill. They requested the committee to report a bill raising a commission to make a further investigation and to make a report. All they wanted was time. They wanted an investigation. They did not want substantive legislation enacted. Senators, unwittingly, no doubt, have carried out the will of the shipping concerns of this country in disregard of the recommendation of the President now and the President 20 years ago, and in disregard of the recommendation of every Secretary of War during the last 21 years.

Section 2 was included in the bill. It was recommended by the Department to be included as a concession to the shipping interests of the country. The Department officials told me that in the light of experience they did not believe the bill could pass the Congress unless it carried section 2. That is what the shipping interests wanted, and the Department officials' experience has led them to appreciate the difficulties of enacting this legislation against the protests of the shipping interests. Hence the representatives of the Government of the United States made this concession and put section 2 in the bill in the hope that we might be able to enact the legislation.

Not only that, but the pending bill fixes at $1 the maximum which the Government could proclaim as a toll; but the Secretary of War—and it seems to me that he humiliated himself when he did it, and I think he never ought to have done it—has announced that if the bill passed fixing the maximum at $1 per net ton he would recommend to the President that he fix 90 cents as the toll to be charged and collected. I am speaking by the card. I hold in my hand the minority report submitted by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. In this minority report he states that while the bill fixes $1 as the maximum at which the President could fix the rate, nevertheless, owing to the protests of the shipping interests, the Secretary of War has humbled himself, passed under the yoke in an effort to conciliate that interest, and has agreed in advance that he would recommend 90 cents. The Senator from New Jersey in the minority report states that he did that on account of the protests of the shipping interests.

However, after consideration of protests received from steamship lines, the Secretary of War advised the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House of Representatives, in May 1934, that if legislation similar to the bill were enacted he would recommend to the President the adoption of a toll on laden vessels of not more than 90 cents.

It turns out that that concession in the bill to the shipping concerns of the country has still failed to secure the enactment of this legislation, delayed for more than 20 years.

The amendment which has just been adopted has emasculated the bill. The enactment of the measure now would be a farce unworthy of the Senate of the United States. So far as I am concerned, I do not wish to play a part in the enactment of a farce upon this exalted stage. Accordingly, I move that the further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds further with his motion will he yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. As a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals let me confirm what the Senator from Oklahoma has said. The Secretary of War has called me on the telephone not only once but at least three times, to urge my support of the bill. I attended the hearings of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals for a whole day. I was not able to attend the entire hearings of the committee by reason of the fact that I was engaged in another committee at the time. Representatives of the War Department and representatives of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department were present to urge the passage of the bill as reported by the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

Mr. President, my views on the subject were so conclusive from the hearings of the one day which I attended that I authorized the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], to cast my vote for reporting the bill favorably. I do not wish to impugn anyone's motives, but it seems to me what the Senator from Oklahoma last said is entitled to very great weight in this body. That committee, of which I am a member, held hearings for 6 or 7 days. The argument made in behalf of the War Department was absolutely unanswerable. No one has yet opposed the argument advanced at that time with any argument worthy of any consideration in this body. At this late day, on the recommendation of one man, Mr. Ryan, it appears the Senate of the United States is about to reject the efforts of one of its committees.

I join with the Senator from Oklahoma in any recommendation he may make.

Mr. GORE. I referred to Mr. Ryan this morning. As soon as I left the Chamber Mr. Ryan came to me and desired to confer with me on the subject because I had made reference to him. I have just placed in the RECORD a letter bearing out my statement of his employment by an Italian shipping concern, in which they use his name in connection with the company's undertaking to get an extra deck lifted out of the tolls, a deck lower than anybody else had ever undertaken to get exempted.

However, I do not wish to enter into that discussion further. I merely wish to repeat that the Government, the Secretary of War, tried to propitiate the shipping concerns and said, "By your leave we will insert what you want to this extent: We will create your commission if you will let the bill pass. We will agree to reduce the tolls. In advance we will agree to reduce the tolls to 90 cents if we can only secure this legislation to correct the anomalous and ridiculous situation."

I have no criticism to make of Senators' motives, but I do appeal to Senators now to vindicate the honor of the Senate and let us not enact the role of undertaking to pass this emasculated farce into legislation.

I renew my motion that further consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I submit another question to the Senator?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the Senator believe that it would be better for the Senate to postpone the measure indefinitely than to pass it in its present absolutely emasculated form?

Mr. GORE. I think so. For my part—and I do not cast any reflection upon Senators—I am unwilling to go down on my knees and put my hand between the hands of the shipping interests of this country and take an oath of allegiance and say, "From here on I am your man." I think the Secretary of War compromised his dignity and humiliated himself when he agreed in advance to make the rate 90 cents instead of $1. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], in his minority report, stated that is the reason why it was done—on account of the protests of the shipping interests of the country. So far as I am concerned, I do not mean to yield, and I hope the Senate of the United States will not yield.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GORE. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. May I say to the Senator that, as another member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I am not willing to have the dignity of the United States Senate compromised in the way suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma. In view of the amendments which have been put upon the bill, I think the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma should be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma to postpone indefinitely further consideration of the bill. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.]

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has the floor.

Mr. GORE. I think the motion carried to postpone the bill indefinitely. I should like the Chair to announce the result.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did I claim the attention of the Chair before the result of the vote was announced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The result has not been definitely announced.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Is it in order for me to make a motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That depends upon the nature of the motion.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I desire to make a motion to recommit the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order at this time, as the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma takes precedence.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course, I am always anxious to obey the wish of the Senate; and if the bill is ultimately recommitted I advise the Senate in advance that I shall feel obliged to report the bill in its original form and to repeat the effort to secure substantial legislation on the subject. When the matter was pending before my committee I was not persuaded by the arguments of the shipping interests of the country that the bill ought to embody nothing but section 2. That question was considered by the committee, and that proposal was rejected.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, let me say just a word in explanation of the reason why I sought to make the motion.

I know there are a number of Members of this body who voted for the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] to strike out section 1 of the bill because they were not at all certain, in the present situation, what the exact results of the measure would be if section 1 were retained in it. They desire, and I know I desire, additional information—information which was not developed in either the majority or the minority reports; information which was not developed in the debate.

It was for that reason that many Senators voted to strike out section 1. I think it would be a very desirable thing to have an investigation, but I feel that the investigation should be carried on by the Senate and not by the executive department. I feel that the committee of which the Senator from Oklahoma is the very able chairman has done serious and excellent work upon this matter, and I feel that the Senate would appreciate it if the Senator from Oklahoma would consent to support a motion to recommit the bill, so that we may have the benefit of its further consideration by the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand the hearings held before the committee at this session. Hearings were held before the Senate Committee on Commerce in 1931. The House held hearings 2 years ago and again this year. Every time this subject is even hinted at a hearing is asked and held, and I do not object to that; but if this measure is recommitted, what will the status be?

I assume that my committee will feel almost in duty bound to respect this overwhelming vote of the Senate if we make any report at all. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote to make no report, or to report only this bill substantially as it was reported by the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The parliamentary situation, it seems to me, is that if the Senator's motion to postpone indefinitely the consideration of this measure shall carry, it will probably mean no further legislation or consideration of the subject at this session. To recommit the bill to the committee, which I should certainly prefer to see done to an indefinite postponement, will mean that it can be given further consideration at this session.

As one of those who voted in the affirmative on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY] because I felt a lack of sufficient information to enable me to determine what is the best thing to do at this particular moment, I hope the bill will be recommitted to the committee for such further consideration as it may be given.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, may I be permitted——

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is debatable.

Mr. CLARK. Then, Mr. President, it seems to me that the question of whether or not the bill ought to be indefinitely postponed should be debated at length; and for that purpose I claim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator from Oklahoma yielded the floor?

Mr. GORE. I will yield, if the Senator from Missouri desires to debate the subject.

Mr. CLARK. No; I do not wish to take the Senator from Oklahoma off the floor.

Mr. GORE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK. When the Senator gets through, I desire to take the floor. I shall be glad to have the Senator from Oklahoma retain the floor at this time.

Mr. GORE. No; I have nothing further to say. I was hoping my motion might prevail and that the matter might be disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, this is one of the most remarkable situations ever presented to the Senate during my membership in this body. The War Department, which has general jurisdiction over matters connected with the Panama Canal, and particularly the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which has more particularly the disposition of that matter, have from time to time made recommendations to Congress in favor of the bill now proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals held hearings for 7 or 8 days upon the particular proposition now recommended by the Senator from Oklahoma. We afforded every opportunity—I say "we" because I am a member of the committee, and it has very few members—to everyone who was really opposed to the changes proposed by the War Department to come in and be heard on the question.

I was greatly interested today in the statement of the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] that no substantive proposition was ever presented to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals laying down any opposition to this bill; and I think the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY], and the other members of the committee will bear me out in the statement that no such substantive proposition ever was presented to the committee.

We listened with great interest to the figures produced by the War Department, by the corporation operating the railroad in Panama, and by every other governmental agency, against the present system. We were shown how it was possible not only for Japanese ships or Italian ships but for corporations which operated American ships in conjunction with British ownership to cheat the American Government's regulations by changing passenger decks to cargo decks.

There was no argument made in the committee which appealed to the judgment of any member of the committee. Today we are met with the proposition of postponing the bill or recommitting it to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and that is a suggestion looking to a hamstringing of the bill by recommitting it to the committee.

Mr. President, I say that those who approve the recommendations of the War Department and the other officials of the Government who have been in favor of this legislation can vote in only one way, and those who approve the hamstringing of the proposed legislation for the benefit of the shipping interests, whether they be Japanese, or Italian, or American, or English, will vote the other way.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma should prevail. We have before us a measure the passage of which has been recommended by the President of the United States and also by the Secretary of War. I put into the RECORD yesterday extracts from the recommendation of every Secretary of War, Democrat or Republican, for some 20 years back, all recommending the proposed legislation. I understand that a measure similar to this, not word for word, but similar to it, has passed the House of Representatives time and time again. The Senate by such a large vote having decided to strike out the part of the bill which amounts to something, with the idea of having some sort of an investigation made, provision for which, I agree, should never have been attached to the bill at all, it seems to me to be utterly useless to try to do anything along a constructive line with this sort of a measure, at least at this time. Therefore, as one of the members of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, I say that we might just as well postpone the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, let me say that of course this will be the last session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and to recommit the bill or indefinitely postpone it is to kill it. I have been impressed with the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the other officials who have been concerned with this matter, so that I am not willing to postpone the bill indefinitely or to recommit it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have refrained from participating in this controversy. I voted against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. It occurs to me that perhaps it would be desirable to take a recess, and upon reconvening the Senate will probably be better prepared to resolve this question than it is just at this time. I will state that it is my intention to move a recess until next Monday when the business of today shall have been completed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the author of the bill, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who also reported it, has made a motion, which is now pending, upon which we are ready to vote, we should dispose of that motion before recessing until Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am not content to dispose of the motion this afternoon. I do not believe it is the best procedure, and I think the Senator from Oregon will probably agree with me, if he will reflect upon the subject for a moment.

I do not wish to move a recess or adjournment if the Senator from Oregon insists upon continuing the session, but in that event I shall find it necessary to address the Senate for a little while, and the Senate might escape that penalty if the course I am suggesting should be followed. I do not mean to imply that I wish to delay action in the Senate, but I am firmly of the opinion that the best procedure is that which I have suggested, and while I would not wish to make the motion over the objection of the Senator from Oregon, unless he does object, I shall make the motion to recess.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it seems unusual to me, from a parliamentary standpoint, when the Senator who has made a motion, the author of the pending bill, desires to dispose of it that anyone should object. If the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma should be agreed to, that would mean the final disposition of the bill, and the Senator earlier in the day told me he would like to have it disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that he withdraw his motion. The Senator can pursue whatever course he chooses, but I am so certain that the course I am suggesting is the wise one that I believe he will accept my suggestion.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if I thought there was any chance of the Senate reconsidering its action and pursuing a different course, I should be glad to see that brought about. I do not wish to foreclose that possibility, at least, and I, therefore, temporarily withdraw my motion.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be Acting Executive Director of the National Emergency Council.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am fully satisfied that Mr. Alverson is a suitable person for this office, and I am very glad indeed to withdraw the previous opposition I had to the confirmation of his nomination.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this nomination go over until tomorrow.

Mr. ROBINSON. There will be no session tomorrow, unless the Senate should choose to vote to hold a session.

Mr. McNARY. What is the request that has been made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is pending the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be Acting Executive Director of the National Emergency Council. The Senator from New York has withdrawn his objection. The Senator from Missouri has asked that the nomination go over.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know whether or not there is objection to the request. The Senator from Missouri asked that the nomination go over until tomorrow.

Mr. CLARK. I ask that the nomination go over until the next consideration of the Executive Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters in Minnesota.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at the request of the Post Office Department, I ask that these nominations go over until Monday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be passed over.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Jesse H. Jones, of Texas, to be a member of the board of directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles B. Henderson, of Nevada, to be a member of the board of directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of C. B. Merriam, of Kansas, to be a member of the board of directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Frederic H. Taber, of Massachusetts, to be a member of the board of directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Charles T. Fisher, Jr., of Michigan, to be a member of the board of directors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

SECURITIES AND EXCHANGE COMMISSION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of William O. Douglas, of Connecticut, to be a member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stewart McDonald, of Missouri, to be Federal Housing Administrator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] desires to have this nomination go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Samuel D. Sanders, of Washington, to be cooperative bank commissioner.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask that this nomination go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will go over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess of the Senate following today executive nominations may be received by the Secretary and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, January 27, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 23 (legislative day of Jan. 16), 1936

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Jesse H. Jones to be a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Charles B. Henderson to be a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

C. B. Merriam to be a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Frederic H. Taber to be a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Charles T. Fisher, Jr., to be a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 23, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray that Thy kingdom of righteousness and love may be established in all our hearts. Forgive us our sins and separate them from us forever. Break down every wall that sets us at variance with our fellow men. Losing sight of our own shadow, untouched by selfishness, make us a gracious influence for good. Draw near to any who may be suffering with any affliction and gather us all unto Thyself. Open our eyes to splendid visions and make us heirs of mighty hopes. Teach us how to grow strong through patience and grant that every difficulty may be rich in compensation. By the tireless ministry of the Congress may a new epoch be marked in the life of the Republic. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3245. An act to extend the time for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at Astoria, Clatsop County, Oreg.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee", disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. BAILEY, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. WHITE to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

JACKSON AND ROOSEVELT—A CONTRAST

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by a former Member of the House, Mr. James M. Beck.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address entitled "Jackson and Roosevelt—A Contrast", delivered over the Columbia Broadcasting System January 22, 1936, by James M. Beck, as follows:

My fellow citizens, in his eloquent and interesting address on Jackson's birthday, President Roosevelt suggested a parallel between his administration and that of Andrew Jackson. Having thus reminded himself of Andrew Jackson, a further parallel suggested itself to him last Sunday in his Theodore Roosevelt address, and possibly on Washington's Birthday the President may further remind himself of the first and greatest of his predecessors. The President would do well to follow those illustrious models, for all three had one policy in common which the President could profitably imitate, and that is the preservation of the public credit.

No one would suggest any resemblance between the personalities of Andrew Jackson and President Roosevelt. Our smiling, cultivated President, with his aristocratic lineage and Harvard College traditions, who now wanders like little Alice in a strange wonderland of socialistic policies, is the very opposite of the dour, grim-visaged backwoodsman from Tennessee, whose only concern was with the grim realities of life; there would seem to be no resemblance visible to the naked eye.

Between the administrations of the two Presidents there are points of comparison and contrast, which make the President's Jackson Day address one of great interest to the student of history. If I shall speak plainly about the Roosevelt administration, let no ardent New Dealer accuse me of treason, for it was Andrew Jackson himself who said on April 15, 1834:

"The President is also accountable at the bar of public opinion for every act of his administration. Subject only to the restraints of truth and justice, the free people of the United States have the undoubted right, as individuals or collectively, orally or in writing, at such times and in such language and form as they may think proper, to discuss his official conduct and to express and promulgate their opinions concerning it."

In two respects the President's suggested parallel is justified. Andrew Jackson was an honest but rabid partisan. He believed that a government was not so much a public trust as a party picnic. When on his inauguration day a boisterous rabble swept through the White House, ruined its fine carpets, and even smashed its costly chandelier, Jackson complacently said: "Let the boys have a good time once in 4 years." President Roosevelt has had the same tolerance for the vagaries of his hungry party adherents, for, like Jackson, he has greatly debased the civil service of the United States. To this end he made his Postmaster General his political chief of staff, so that Mr. Farley, with the traditions and practices of Tammany Hall and the power of the Post Office Department, could debase the public service for the benefit of the Democratic Party. Not only has President Roosevelt added over 200,000 employees to the pay roll—shall I say play roll?—but he has been careful to exempt most of them from the requirements of the civil-service laws.

There is another resemblance in the fact that his chief advisers are not the members of the Cabinet, who, according to the Constitution, are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, but an irresponsible kitchen cabinet. The kitchen cabinet of Andrew Jackson consisted of practical and experienced statesmen, while President Roosevelt has assembled a weird kitchen cabinet of visionary apprentices, without any previous experience in the Federal Government, and as a consequence the Frankfurters and the Tugwells, the Richbergs and Corcorans, the Moleys and the Cohens have been more potential in shaping the policies of this administration than the responsible heads of departments who constitute the Cabinet. The result has been a weird accumulation of unwise and unconstitutional legislation, which a future historian will include in the most valued incunabula of demagoguery.

With these points of resemblance, the comparison between the two administrations becomes a pathetic contrast. President Jackson made no promise that he did not keep. To him it would have been inconceivable to accept a party platform in order to secure an election and then promptly repudiate by his policies nearly every promise in that platform. One of President Jackson's greatest convictions was his belief in honest money. His belief in the value of the public credit was such that he would never have issued, early in his administration, $500,000,000 in bonds payable in gold of a certain fineness, and when the bonds were bought, in part by foreign investors, have devalued the dollar in order to take from the purchasers 40 cents on every dollar. President Jackson firmly believed that no country could spend itself into prosperity, and that the best statesmanship was to reduce the national debt by a wise and economical government. He believed that a nation in debt, like an individual in debt, could not be free. In the beginning of his administration the national debt was about $67,000,000. It had been as high as $127,000,000. President Jackson proceeded to reduce that debt, and before he retired he had virtually abolished it. It will make our mouths water to know that in the year of his retirement the entire national debt was only $37,000. The first Jackson banquet was to celebrate the payment of the national debt. The last was to celebrate its increase to stratospheric heights.

On the eve of the World War our Nation had a debt of less than two billions. Then earning each year a large surplus, it seemed probable that we would soon present the unique example of a great Nation that had no national debt.

President Wilson increased that debt to twenty-six billions, and when under the administration of Calvin Coolidge the debt had been reduced to sixteen billions, President Roosevelt, in the apparent belief that the more a nation borrowed the more prosperous it would be, doubled that debt, until today it is nearly thirty-two billions, and may well be forty billions before his term of office expires. All this would have been abhorrent to Andrew Jackson, for he would have realized, as the new Jackson apparently has not, that a debt of forty billions inevitably means a ghastly burden upon the sweat and toil of unborn generations of Americans for at least another century. If Andrew Jackson had owned, as he probably did, some gold that he had earned with his brawn and brain, and the Government had seized it without any compensation, no one would have been more intolerant than Andrew Jackson of such robbery under the forms of law. Still less would Andrew Jackson, with his sturdy sense of integrity and his religious belief in the public credit, have favored a silver purchasing act for the benefit of a small group of silver mine owners whereby the Treasury has acquired some 600,000,000 ounces of silver at prices far beyond their intrinsic value, and for which it has no use.

Andrew Jackson won the culminating victory in the War of 1812 which this Nation fought to vindicate the freedom of the seas. President Roosevelt's neutrality policy has abandoned this time-honored tradition, which, be it noted, our soldiers and sailors fought to vindicate in the World War. Andrew Jackson raised the American flag in territory hitherto unoccupied. President Roosevelt has pulled down the American flag in the Philippines and thus gone far to hand to Japan the control of the Pacific and Asia.

However, the greatest contrast between the two administrations is in their attitude to the Constitution of the United States. When Andrew Jackson took the oath of office to respect and defend that Constitution he considered it an obligation from which any escape was unthinkable. In his parting admonition to his countrymen, his farewell address of 1837, he said:

"It is well known that there have always been those among us who wish to enlarge the powers of the General Government, and experience would seem to indicate that there is a tendency on the part of this Government to overstep the legitimate boundaries marked out for it by the Constitution. Its legitimate authority is abundantly sufficient for all the purposes for which it is created; and its powers being expressly enumerated, there can be no justification for claiming anything beyond them. Every attempt to exercise power beyond these limits should be promptly and firmly opposed."

This was no theatrical gesture. He parted with many old-time friends and party colleagues on this issue. When the doctrine of nullification first raised its baleful head in this country and was about to be adopted by the Democratic Party as its rallying cry at a banquet in honor of Thomas Jefferson, it was Andrew Jackson who "scotched the snake" by raising his glass and looking significantly at John C. Calhoun, proposed the immortal toast, "The Federal Union, it must and shall be preserved." This was no unmeaning gesture. He and Daniel Webster did save the Constitution in a critical hour and the memory of that crisis remained with him to the end, for among the last things he ever said was an expression of regret that he had not hung John C. Calhoun for treason.

The future historian must record that President Roosevelt's attitude toward the great compact has been one of cynical and, indeed, flippant indifference. His one comment on the Constitution that will be remembered was his intimation that the great document, as authoritatively interpreted by the Supreme Court, belongs to the "horse and buggy" age. Had the spirit of Andrew Jackson been present at the recent dinner in his honor, at which the President reminded himself of Andrew Jackson, I think the august shade of Andrew Jackson would have again raised his glass and with a significant look at the New Dealers, then participating at $50 a plate at a new Belshazzar's feast, he would have said: "The Federal Constitution, it must and shall be preserved."

President Jackson undertook nothing that he did not carry out. He was a man of iron will. He had few convictions, but they were real convictions, and the greatest of all was his belief in the Constitution. The future historian will say of President Roosevelt's administration that it constitutes the ghastliest wreckage of our form of government in the history of our Nation. He always reminds me of what Sidney Smith said of a British Prime Minister, Lord John Russell: That his confidence in his own ability was such that he would undertake without preparation to rebuild St. Paul's Cathedral, maneuver the Channel Fleet, and operate upon a patient for a stone in the bladder and would be ignorant of the fact, when he had tried all three, that the patient with the stone had died, that the Channel Fleet had sunk, and St. Paul's Cathedral had tumbled into ruins. Similarly the President undertook to be the dictator of all trade and industry in the United States. No code agreement in any trade and industry had any validity unless he approved it, and if none were proposed that he could approve, he claimed the power—and the power was given to him by a subservient Congress—to impose any code for the conduct of business that he saw proper. The Supreme Court happily ended that un-American tyranny.

To find a true analogy for the follies of this administration, the nearest analogy is that of that eminent and smiling financier, Wilkins Micawber—always "waiting for something to turn up"—who had little concern for his mounting debts except when a process server was around the corner, and who then gave his creditor a promissory note with the pious ejaculation: "Thank God, that debt is paid." President Roosevelt, instead of reducing our national debt, as did Andrew Jackson, has given some 16 billions of promissory notes for future generations to pay.

Andrew Jackson did have violent prejudices as well as strong convictions, but one can search his public utterances in vain for any expression that savored of demagoguery. Probably this is true because only one draftsman ever wrote his utterances. It was either Andrew Jackson's homely but vigorous English, or it was the work of Edward Livingston, or Roger Taney's accomplished pen. In recent years our Presidents have adopted the method of composite ownership for public addresses, and the result has been a certain loss of both unity and sincerity.

Take, for example, the extraordinary address which the President, somewhat forgetful of the dignity of his high office and the equal dignity of Congress, made on January 3. That address, which never had any precedent in our history, and let us hope will never again be imitated, is reminiscent of the work of many hands. Portions of it sound like the "airy persiflage" of the eminent Professor Tugwell, other portions suggest the banalities of Professor Moley, but others suggest the subtle sinuosities of Professor Frankfurter. Much of it is pure Roosevelt. Whatever its authorship, the future historian will regard that address as the low-water mark of Presidential reports on the "state of the Union."

The historian may record one further contrast which is for the future to determine. Andrew Jackson not only succeeded himself but after two administrations named his successor. I venture to predict that Mr. Roosevelt will neither succeed himself nor name his successor. The American people have taken his measure, and its verdict is, "Weighed and found wanting."

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a short quotation from testimony taken before the Ways and Means Committee on the Social Security Act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, the depression has seen the development of many visionary and highly experimental plans for recovery, but the Townsend plan is the most fantastic of them all.

Naturally, when people are desperate they are quick to become advocates of these plans without giving to them any real thought beyond a surface survey and a glance at the end to be accomplished. If those placed in representative positions are inclined to follow the dictates of their hearts, instead of the reasoning of their heads, or surrender to motives of political expediency, they, too, may lend their support to such plans. But I cannot bring myself to believe that the Congress of the United States now or at any time in the future will sacrifice the whole economic and financial structure of our country upon the altar of political expediency.

I have long been an advocate of old-age pensions to take care of such of the old folks as find themselves, in the declining years of their lives, unable to provide themselves with the means of living. But in providing such pensions we must think of the means of sustaining it, not only for the comforts of today but for security for tomorrow as well.

The old people cannot be used as a vehicle by which an economic revolution is to be accomplished.

I am a member of the Ways and Means Committee, the committee before which the social security legislation came in the last session of Congress; at that time we gave the advocates of the Townsend plan and to Dr. Townsend such time as they desired to present their cause. We gave the plan a lot of thought, and anyone who gives it thought—thought as to the ultimate effect—must come to the conclusion that it is impracticable and would result in far greater harm and suffering in the end than now exists.

In the first place, the name of the plan is a misnomer—the Townsend old-age revolving pension fund. A revolving fund implies that the same fund is to be used over and over again for the same purpose. That, of course, here is not true, the statement of its founders and advocates to the contrary notwithstanding. Each month the obligation is to be met it will require additional funds raised by taxation imposed upon all the commodities used by the people. Not the same money but new and additional money each month.

There are approximately 11,000,000 of people in the United States over the age of 60. I believe we may be perfectly safe in assuming that at least 90 percent of them could and would qualify for a pension of $200 a month under the provisions of the bill. If they cease working, few of them would have sufficient income to sustain them and would therefore become pensioners.

We may assume that at least 10,000,000 would qualify for the pension, requiring a monthly expenditure of $2,000,000,000—$24,000,000,000 a year.

And is the money to be raised by imposing a tax upon those who can best afford to pay? It is not. It would come from the pockets of those who could least afford to pay it—those who work and labor and earn their "bread by the sweat of their faces."

Let us see just where and how we are to get this money. Section 2 of the bill provides:

> There shall be levied a tax of 2 percent upon the fair gross value of each transaction done within the United States and Territories; also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax equal to one-tenth of the tax levied upon all income under the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1934; * * * also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax of 2 percent upon the fair dollar value of all transfers of property by devise, bequest, or other testamentary disposition or legal descent and distribution of property; * * * and also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax of 2 percent upon the fair gross dollar value of every gift in excess of $500.

You will readily see that it is not a sales tax, but a tax on each transaction as it moves from one person to another.

What would such a tax mean with respect to the price of bread, for example? Let us analyze it.

To begin with, there would be a 2-percent tax on the materials which went into all the machinery from the time they came out of the earth until the machine was completed, and a 2-percent tax on the completed machine when it was sold—from the plow which plows the ground to the equipment which wraps the bread; a tax on the sale of the seed that produces the wheat that makes the flour; a tax on the small wages for the sowing, harvesting, and threshing of the grain; a tax on the grain itself—every time it moves in commerce—until it reaches the miller; a tax on the flour each time it is sold until it reaches the jobber, retailer, or baker; and in addition, a tax on the wages of every person who helped to process it, and finally a tax on the finished product, to be paid by the consumer. But, of course, the consumer will pay all the taxes, which will reflect themselves in the increased price of the bread.

Can you not see how this pyramiding process of taxation will increase the cost of every commodity for human use and for every human need, from the raw material to the finished product in the hands of the purchaser, as well as every transaction in property as it moves from one person to another?

What would be the economic effect upon the country if this beautiful dream should be realized?

Dr. Townsend frankly stated before the committee (p. 687) that they are more concerned with the economic effect than with the welfare of those whom they hope to benefit.

Question. I take it, of course, he would have to spend it in good faith, even though he spent it for luxuries. He could not go out and squander it in order to get rid of it that he may be eligible to receive $200 the next month.

Dr. TOWNSEND. Why not? We do not care what he does with it. That is immaterial. Let him have carte blanche. Let him buy whisky with it if he wants to kill himself off as quickly as he chooses. That is immaterial. It is commerce—business—we want in this country.

Question. Suppose a husband and wife qualified to receive this pension, they would be receiving $400 per month. Let us say they have a family of grown-up children. Would it be permissible for those children to live with them and be supported from the provisions supplied with this pension money in the home?

Dr. TOWNSEND. Certainly. Why not? Why not let the elders buy commodities and give to their children if they like. That is immaterial. The children are not going to lie down and do nothing because of this. The children are going to want money; they cannot get it. * * *

If the old folks can supply them with food and clothing, why cannot money be supplied as well, so that they may live in ease and comfort with a minimum effort?

If the good doctor is trying to create a spending agency for its economic effect, why not spread this vast sum around a little. Give some to the widows and the orphans; the afflicted and helpless; the younger generation for educational purposes.

I think it has been our experience that when folks are past 60, at least in the great majority of cases, they do not care for a great deal beyond the comforts of life, so a comparatively small amount of this enormous sum of money would go for durable goods or for substantial commodities of an enduring character.

Shall we become a Nation of spenders for the sake of spending alone; shall we become a Nation of consumers for the purpose of consumption alone, thus reducing our natural resources and endangering the existence of those who are to come after us?

Let not those who are interested in this plan be misled. The proposed tax would not raise nearly enough money to meet the obligation. The originators of the plan are proceeding upon a false premise as to the dollar value of the commercial transactions in the United States. It is their contention that in 1929 there was about one trillion three hundred million dollars in such transactions, whereas, as a matter of fact, there was little more than one-third of that amount. Thus it is readily seen that a 2-percent transaction tax is not sufficient but that it will require more nearly a 6-percent transaction tax.

We must realize that the pyramiding process of imposing these many taxes will cause a tremendous increase in the price of every commodity, probably beyond the reach of any of us. Not only that, but every person who knows anything about money knows that placing in circulation large sums of money that are not the result of production or labor—that is, earned money; and, economically, this pension is not—causes money to depreciate in value and the purchasing power thereof to be reduced.

It has been stated by eminent economists and by those who have given the subject thought that if the money were placed in circulation in the manner provided by this plan in 6 months or a year the purchasing power of the $200 would be reduced to not to exceed $40. If that is true, what would be the effect upon the millions who are working and earning salaries, many of them small salaries? This, of course, in addition to the increase in prices incident to the many taxes imposed. The question does not require an answer. It is too apparent.

We are told by the proponents of the plan that it will afford employment to additional millions of people.

I believe a study of it will convince you that the opposite will be true. Thousands of businesses will be forced out of existence because of the transaction tax. It would be necessary to avoid as many transactions as possible to keep down the cost of commodities. That would not only throw great numbers out of employment, but it would also reduce the revenue to be derived from the tax, necessitating an increase in the rate of the tax. Those who would build the structure would pull it down upon their own heads.

There are 120,000,000 or more of people in our country. Shall we destroy the economic and financial future of 110,000,000 of them in a futile effort to bring questionable benefit to the remainder? Shall we pauperize eleven-twelfths of our people to attempt to enrich one-twelfth of them?

There is a very grave doubt whether under the recent decisions of the Supreme Court the tax would be constitutional or enforceable.

We are often told by the more ardent advocates of this plan that unless we support it in Congress they will find those who will. No doubt there will be some who will be willing to do so, for the temporary success they may enjoy, but it will be short lived. It would be better to be defeated in the defense of our country's welfare than to win temporary success at the cost of that country's downfall.

We can take some from the many and give it to the few, but we cannot take all from the many, because it is not ours to take.

I have the utmost confidence in the ability of the American people to meet their problems and to analyze them before being carried away by promises of impossible things. They will realize the impossibility of this plan and act accordingly.

Let us do well that which we can do. Let us bring relief to the old folks who need it, but let us not destroy them, as well as all others, in our effort to do that.

EXCISE TAX ON CRUDE PETROLEUM

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I introduced H. R. 10483, relating to an excise tax on crude petroleum. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to place in the RECORD at this point the bill referred to as well as a statement relative to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

H. R. 10483

A bill to provide revenue from the importation of crude petroleum and its products

Be it enacted, etc., That the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, shall be further amended as follows:

"SECTION 1. (a) Add to section 630, as amended by the act approved June 16, 1933, the following: 'Nothing in this section shall apply to petroleum or petroleum products.'

"(b) Amend section 621 (a) (3), as amended by the Revenue Act of 1935, by adding the following sentence to (A) (ii): 'Nothing in this section shall apply to petroleum or petroleum products.'

"SEC. 2. (a) In Section 601 (c) strike out the paragraph marked '(4)' and substitute therefor the following: 'Crude petroleum, 1 cent per gallon; fuel oil derived from petroleum, gas oil derived from petroleum, and all liquid derivatives of crude petroleum, except lubricating oil and gasoline or other motor fuel, 1 cent per gallon; gasoline or other motor fuel, 2½ cents per gallon; lubricating oil, 4 cents per gallon; paraffin and other petroleum wax products, 1 cent per pound; and asphalt, natural or otherwise, $2 per ton. The tax on the articles described in this paragraph shall apply only with respect to the importation of such articles.'

"(b) Add to the last sentence of section 629, title IV, as amended by Public Resolution No. 36, approved June 28, 1935, the words 'except in the case of articles taxable under title IV, section 601 (c), paragraph (4).'

"SEC. 3. The daily average importation of petroleum and its products, including asphalt, natural or otherwise, is hereby limited to an amount not to exceed 4.5 percent of the quantity of crude petroleum, including asphalt, natural or otherwise, which is estimated by the Bureau of Mines to be the daily average demand for consumption in the United States and the demand for export from the United States during such reckoning periods as the President of the United States may determine. Crude petroleum or the products thereof imported and supplied to vessels at American ports shall be deemed imports.

"The President is hereby authorized and directed to provide for hearings in advance of each reckoning period to consider applications for quotas, make fair and equitable allocations, and establish, within the limits herein fixed, just and reasonable quotas of crude petroleum and the various products thereof, including asphalt, natural or otherwise, for persons desiring to import the same during the period, in proportion to their proven trade or manufacturing demand for such imports, over and above their customary and available domestic supply, if any.

"Quotas of particular products shall not be allowed to such extent as will, on the whole, increase the normal importation ratios of such products to the aggregate of crude and other products imported, except when the President finds a shortage in the domestic supply of such particular products, and should the allowed ratio of crude petroleum, fuel oil, gas oil, paraffin, and asphalt, natural or otherwise, in aggregate barrels, to all other products of petroleum allowed to be imported, fall below the average ratio which prevailed in the last 6 months of 1932, each barrel excess of such other products having a boiling point below 400° F. shall be deemed the equivalent of three barrels for the purpose of computing total allowable imports. Should the allowable crude oil production for the United States for any quarter be larger or smaller proportionately than that amount fixed for the first month of any quarter or should there be an overage or shortage of actual imports in comparison with the allowable imports in a quarter, as determined on above basis, such differences shall be adjusted up or down in subsequent quarters, and the final ratio of imports to such demand for consumption in the United States and the demand for export from the United States, reduced to a monthly basis in each instance, shall be 4.50 percent to the end of 1940 and thereafter until otherwise provided. Nothing herein stated shall prevent the importation of products with a boiling point above 400° F. or crude oil in different ratios to the aggregate than those which prevailed in the last 6 months of 1932.

"Under appropriate rules and regulations, the President may permit imports in bond for export, including manufacture in bond and including oil imported under a drawback application coupled with export of resultant products, and such imports shall not be charged against import quotas.

"When quotas are in effect under this section it shall be unlawful for any person, except as otherwise herein provided, to import into the United States crude petroleum or any product thereof in excess of his quota or without having been assigned a quota under this section.

"No tariff, duty, or excise tax now in force shall be affected by the provisions of this section.

"Section 4. This bill shall become effective 30 days after its approval."

Millions of dollars will be diverted from the foreign to the domestic petroleum industry, increasing the wages received by labor and the purchasing power of nearly half the States of the Union, without imposing burdens on the consumer, if Congress passes the bill which I am presenting herewith to regulate the imports of foreign petroleum and to increase certain taxes on such imports.

This bill eliminates the exemption from the excise taxes which was granted in 1933 to imported petroleum products used as supplies for vessels. These tax-free importations have mounted from a daily average of 6,835 barrels in the last half of 1932 to a daily average of 18,000 barrels in 1933, 21,000 barrels in 1934, and a daily average of 36,000 barrels in the first 11 months of 1935. There is no reason for this exemption, which benefits no one except a few importers who do not pass on to the public the low cost of their cheap imported foreign oil.

The excise taxes on imported crude petroleum and fuel and gas oil are increased from one-half cent per gallon to 1 cent per gallon and a new excise tax of $2 per ton is imposed upon imported asphalt, natural or otherwise. This proposed increase in these taxes is not sufficiently high to constitute any embargo upon these imports. Even with this increase, importers of these products will still have a considerable advantage over the domestic producer. These imports are free from the tremendous burden of local, State, and Federal taxes levied upon the domestic petroleum industry and are produced by labor receiving only a fraction of the American scale, although working much longer hours. American labor in the petroleum industry cannot hope to compete with the type of cheap labor used in the production of foreign petroleum and its products.

This imported petroleum has been taking a very considerable portion of the domestic market to the harm of the home industry and to the detriment of our employment programs.

Imported foreign asphalt, because of its lower production costs, has been taking the contracts for much of the construction work under the special appropriations made by Congress, which intended that domestic industry and domestic labor should be benefited by those appropriations. A very small number of importers of the foreign asphalt has been profiting greatly because of special regulations which have permitted this asphalt to take the market away from the domestic producer.

The bill, besides increasing excise taxes on crude petroleum and gas and fuel oil and levying a new tax on asphalt, amends the revenue act by striking out the expiration date, leaving these taxes stand until Congress shall repeal them. Additional millions of dollars' revenue will be brought into the Federal Treasury through these tax increases.

A definite limitation is placed upon the amount of petroleum and its products which may be imported into this country by the terms of the final section of this bill, which sets 4.5 percent of consumptive demand in this country as the ratio by which the amount of permitted imports shall be determined. The conservation of this valuable natural resource, promotion of the development of this industry in this country, the stabilization of the domestic petroleum market, the prevention of waste, security for the millions employed by this industry, and many other economic factors, all important to our return to prosperity, will be promoted by this limitation. The ratio as given in the bill is practically the same as that which was accepted by the importers themselves at the oil conference held under the auspices of the Interior Department in 1933, when plans were proposed to meet some of the more serious problems of the industry. It was commonly accepted throughout the industry that the certainty which would be afforded by having a definite proportionate limitation on imports would encourage the entire domestic petroleum industry and afford a sounder basis for financing its development.

The consumer of petroleum products will not be adversely affected either by these excise taxes or by this import limitation, since whatever advantage accrued from these importations has been largely absorbed by a few importing companies and has not been passed on to the consuming public.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION BILL, 1936

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10464) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold his motion?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, we do not withhold the request for the present. Pending the consideration of that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill proceed until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU], the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN], and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] have finished their remarks, and that then the bill will be read for amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the hurry in ending general debate?

Mr. WOODRUM. There has been no hurry. I may say to the gentleman that we had general debate all day yesterday, and, as a matter of fact, some general debate before that time. The gentleman from New York, I think, has given us his views on Government many times during this session of Congress.

Mr. FISH. I have not spoken on this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is the gentleman going to speak on the bill?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I am going to speak on the bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] had control of the time on that side, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] had requested time I am sure he could have been accommodated.

Mr. FISH. I have requested time, and I am told that there is not sufficient time. I desire to speak on this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. FISH. I should like to have 15 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is too much, because we want to pass the bill as soon as possible.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that the agreement was made yesterday that time in general debate was to be fixed at 4 hours. There is only 10 minutes left on that side at the present time.

Mr. FISH. If there is any hurry I will waive my request immediately, but I do not see why the rush.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman can secure time under the 5-minute rule, I am sure.

Mr. FISH. I cannot say what I desire to say in 5 minutes. I want to speak on the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. May I make this suggestion to the gentleman from Virginia? Why not set a specific time for general debate to end instead of stating that so many men shall speak? Let us know when general debate is going to terminate. I would rather the gentleman would do that than to state the number of men who are going to speak.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say that this is an unusual request, but general debate was supposed to have been concluded yesterday. We fixed the time and all of it was used. Other gentlemen came in requesting time and we are endeavoring to accommodate them. I am trying to fix a limit.

Mr. RANKIN. I thank the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I suggest 2 hours, to be equally divided?

Mr. TABER. That is satisfactory.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may continue for 2 hours, to be confined to the bill and to be equally divided between the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. RANKIN. That is better.

The SPEAKER. Is this to be in addition to the time remaining for general debate?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; in addition to the time remaining to the credit of each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate be extended 2 hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], and that the debate be confined strictly to the bill.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to say to the gentleman from Virginia that I cannot help but recall the statement he made the other day in reference to Budget estimates being one thing and what Congress appropriates being another, and I hope the gentleman from Virginia and the Members of Congress who are going to talk on this appropriaton bill will remember that what Congress appropriates is one thing and where you are going to get the money is another.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10464) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10464, the supplemental appropriation bill of 1936, with Mr. COOPER of Tennessee in the chair.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL].

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to page 30 of this bill, where there is an appropriation of $39,330 to the Department of State.

I am not surprised that the Department of State needs this $39,330. I am rather surprised they have not asked for more, in view of the purpose for which this money is to be used and in view of what is going on in the Secretary of State's office.

I wish to call the attention of the Members of the Committee to the fact that over in this Department of Government they are rewriting the tariff structure of our country, and it is being rewritten downward. When this Congress gave authority to the other branch of the Government to enter into these reciprocity agreements, we simply surrendered all of our authority in regard to the regulation and the writing of the tariffs of this country; in other words, we lodged this authority in the inherent enemies of the protective system.

There have been already, I am informed, agreements entered into with the following countries: Canada, Cuba, Haiti, Brazil, Colombia, and Nicaragua, and they are nearing the completion of agreements with Belgium, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, and some other countries.

I opposed strenuously the granting of this authority at the time it was authorized, and made the prediction then that if the authority were granted the United States would get the worst of the deal when these agreements were written, and, particularly, agriculture would bear the brunt of the whole procedure.

I want just briefly to call attention to some of the things that are going on that affect adversely particularly the agricultural industry of this country. Just as fast as the farmers of the United States learn what is being done in regard to breaking down the tariff wall and importing into this country foreign commodities and substitutes for domestic commodities they are seeing red. The American farmer is interested in having his American market protected for him.

I want now briefly to call attention to the treaty that was entered into with Canada, and I am going to bring to your attention what is being done with respect to this particular treaty, which was one of the first agreements entered into.

This agreement provides for reduction in the duty on veal calves from 2½ cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound for the first 51,933 live calves imported. Further, it provides for a reduction in the duty from 3 cents per pound to 2 cents per pound for feeder cattle weighing over 700 pounds for the first 155,799 cattle imported. The reduction in the duty on dairy cows is from 3 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound for the first 20,000 imported. Thus the duty is reduced approximately 50 percent on approximately 225,000 head of cattle from Canada. The largest number imported from Canada since the Tariff Act of 1922 was only slightly greater than this number. In other words, the quota allowed is practically high enough to take the largest number of cattle ordinarily brought in from Canada.

Perhaps the most dangerous feature of this is the fact that, under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy and what is called the good-neighbor program, Mexico now has definite assurance that presently similar concessions will be made to her. The record shows that in years like 1928 and 1929, before the tariff was increased in 1930, imports from Mexico were approximately 250,000 head of cattle each year. Southwestern farmers, especially Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, and that general area, may rest assured that within a relatively short period of time the duty will be reduced 50 percent and 250,000 head of cattle each year will come in from Mexico.

Under this same unconditional most-favored-nation policy and the good-neighbor treatment, Argentina already has approached the problem from the standpoint of shipping in chilled and frozen beef, inasmuch as live cattle could not satisfactorily be imported from Argentina. Since Argentina has as many cattle as Canada and Mexico, they expect that the meat from at least 500,000 head of cattle will be permitted entry with a reduction of 50 percent in the tariff. If these 500,000 head of cattle average 500 pounds each, this would represent 250,000,000 pounds of live meat, or 125,000,000 pounds of fresh, chilled, or frozen beef. Undoubtedly they will demand at least this as a minimum amount to be admitted into the New York, Philadelphia, and Boston markets, and American farmers will be deprived of that market.

Preliminary steps have already been taken in the case of Argentina. At the present time quarantine restrictions prohibit the importation of either live animals or meat unless these meats have been specially treated on account of the prevalence in past years of the foot-and-mouth disease, and so forth. A new quarantine treaty has been negotiated and has been approved by Secretary Hull and Secretary Wallace under which meats will be admitted into the United States provided they come from sections of Argentina where the disease is not prevalent. This quarantine treaty is now before the Senate for approval. After this has been approved by the Senate, Secretary Hull may proceed with the reciprocal trade agreement program and reduce the duty 50 percent and permit literally hundreds of millions of pounds of Argentine beef to enter the American market.

Even with the present rate of duty, were it not for the quarantine Argentina would be glad to supply great quantities of fresh, chilled, and frozen beef. She has been able to send in great quantities of treated beef, such as canned beef. Many millions of pounds of canned beef come from Argentina quite regularly. Not so many months ago it was found that the director of the C. C. C. camps was purchasing millions of pounds of canned beef from Argentina for use in the camps. This created such strong feeling among the farmers, when it was learned, that the administration decided to postpone any such further purchase from Argentina, at least until after the elections. This does not mean, however, that the canned beef is not at the present time being imported from Argentina, even with present rates of duty; and when these rates are reduced 50 percent, as they have already been in the case of the Canadian trade agreement, the protection which the farmers now have will be reduced accordingly.

There is also the subject of nuts, about which I wish to speak in this connection.

Farmers in the United States are known to produce five types of nuts which are most popular with American consumers. These are almonds, English walnuts, filberts, pecans, and peanuts. American consumers will consume only definite limited quantities of nuts, and if either of these particular species are imported, or if substitute nuts are imported, it either reduces the market for American nuts or forces the American farmer to reduce his prices in order to meet the new foreign competition.

In the trade agreement negotiated with Brazil we find a good illustration of the attitude of the administration. The duty on the black Brazil nuts, now sold in the market as "cream nuts", are reduced, with the result that in all mixtures of nuts, whether in the shell or mixed salted nuts, or nuts used in confections, we are finding constantly increasing quantities of the cheaper imported nuts and smaller quantities of the home-grown varieties.

Reading through the various trade agreements, at every turn we find reductions in duty on agricultural products from various countries. Many farmers along the Great Lakes have considerable revenue from production and sale of chicory, and yet the duty on crude chicory was lowered in the Belgian agreement, and then the duty on refined chicory was reduced in the agreement with Holland.

The duty on small peas—petit pois—was reduced so that our well-to-do or elite Americans, who could very well afford to pay the higher rate of duty, could get foreign peas for their tables rather than buy the ordinary peas grown by American farmers and canned in the United States.

Many other reductions can be found which result in displacement of American farm products. An illustration was the reduction in duty on castor beans from Brazil, thus encouraging the importation of seeds for the production of oils used both for medicinal and industrial purposes.

Another illustration of treatment in the trade agreements is binding items on the free list; thus the trade agreement with Holland enters into an agreement that the Congress and the President of the United States will for a period of 3 years not impose any excise duty or any tariff on tropical oils and starches. American farm groups have been asking for the American market for the American farmer, and have specifically been asking for excise taxes on certain tropical oils and on tropical starches, such as tapioca, cassava, and so forth, but in the trade agreement with Holland the State Department and the President entered into an agreement that for a 3-year period the United States will not impose any tariff, excise tax, or any other burden upon these items brought in from Dutch colonies.

During recent years starches made from tropical plants had been entering the American market in ever-increasing quantities, displacing starches made from American farm products, such as cornstarch, beet starches, and starch made from other farm products. Likewise, the tropical oils imported more and more displace oils produced from grains and seeds grown on American farms.

Until recently imports of perilla oil, for instance, never exceeded 10,000,000 pounds a year. Perilla oil is on the free list. During the last year imports amounted to approximately 100,000,000 pounds. It would require about 3,000,000 acres of land in the United States to grow the additional amount of flaxseed necessary to produce the equivalent of 100,000,000 pounds of perilla oil.

In other words, what is going on in this country since we gave this power of making tariffs to the enemies of the tariff is a constant breaking down of our protection of the American farmer, and what the American farmer is insisting on now, which would be most beneficial to him, is preserving the American market for the American farmer.

This administration has had much to say about being the best friend the farmer ever had, and I do not quite understand how this administration can undertake to sell itself to the farmers as their friend and permit the importations that are now coming into this country of farm products and substitutes, and at the same time, until quite recently, taxing the people of this country to cut down the production of such products here in America. This program to me just does not make sense, and the people of this country, as fast as they are enlightened in regard to this program, are going to reach the same conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I yield to no one in my admiration for the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. He is one of the most useful and one of the ablest Members of this House. In the esteem of his associates he holds a high rank at least equal to any one of a long line of eminent North Carolinians who have served in this Chamber. If North Carolina is alive to its interests, it will keep him in this Chamber as long as he lives, or send him higher.

One thing I admire the gentleman from North Carolina for greatly is that he takes such good care of his North Carolina constituents, including a large element known as the potato growers.

As a Member of Congress I agree in general with the political philosophy of my friend from North Carolina, but I cannot go along with him in respect to the amendment which he has given notice that he will introduce, the language of which I should like to read, as follows:

For the purpose of collecting and disseminating useful information and data with respect to potato production and marketing within the United States there is hereby appropriated and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture the sum of $1,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I feel responsibility, especially during the economic situation in which the country now finds itself, of doing all I can to hold down appropriations to the limit, and I think I can point out to the House, with your indulgence, an opportunity whereby we can save a million dollars by not adopting this amendment.

I do not think it is necessary in order to effectuate the purpose which the gentleman from North Carolina has in mind, even conceding that purpose should be effectuated, by spending a million dollars—or $1.

I oppose the proposed appropriation of $1,000,000 to gather statistics as a basis for enforcing the Potato Act for two reasons: First, because the Potato Act is definitely and positively on its way out; but, secondly, and more important, for the reason that I believe that all of the statistics, or virtually all, that would be required, even if the Potato Act were to survive, can be obtained through existing agencies without any additional appropriation being required. In fact, I believe the most of those statistics already are available.

The Bureau of the Census believes that it can furnish from the agricultural census taken last year nearly all the information required to enforce the Potato Act, and I am of the same opinion. At great cost that census has been taken, and it fortunately happens that the information gathered by it has been tabulated and is now ready to be offered to those in charge of enforcing the Potato Act. The last of its State reports—those for Wisconsin, Michigan, and Pennsylvania—will be printed about the 1st of next month. All of the figures and tabulations of the entire agricultural census of 1935 could be had for inspection and use by any governmental agency right now, if desired.

The scope of information about potatoes included in this agricultural census is very broad. It includes all varieties of Irish and sweet potatoes, whether grown for home use or for sale. It includes acres and fractions of acres harvested and the quantities harvested, and it is broken down minutely so as to include statistics not only for all of the counties in the United States but for all of the minor political divisions within counties. It is very sweeping and very complete and includes information about crop failures.

I am speaking now of the information contained in the regular agricultural census, which is available to everybody, including, of course, the officials of the Government who administer the Potato Act; but for the special benefit of those officials the Bureau of the Census has prepared and has sent to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration a special run of information which includes production of potatoes by size groups. This information covers brackets of production by six or seven groups based on acreage. One group, for instance, covers producers of 20 acres or less, another group includes a larger acreage, and so forth, so that there is presented a compendium of information by size groups.

For purposes of comparison the Bureau of the Census is able to offer to the Potato Section the comparable figures of the last agricultural census, which was a similar Government census taken 5 years ago. The Potato Section, I understand, feels that it has need of intermediate figures for the years 1932, 1933, and 1934; but for all of those years it has complete State estimates broken down by the various States, made during those respective years and recorded for future use. If we were to undertake now to go back and take a potato census for 1932, for instance, based on the hazy recollection of growers and the incomplete records of that time, we certainly would have a less reliable basis of information than if we were to accept the State estimates covering that period. The same is true of all of the intermediate years.

We already have various bureaus and agencies gathering information in regard to potatoes beside the Bureau of the Census; for instance, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the Bureau of Home Economics, and the Agricultural Adjustment Administration itself. Of the annual appropriation of about $6,000,000 for the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, about one-tenth, or $600,000, is spent to maintain the Division of Crop Estimates, which makes intensive investigations into all phases of potato production, acreage, yield, prices, stocks, consumption, and so forth.

If certain specialized information is required to enforce the Potato Act in addition to the enormous quantity of information already at hand, why not entrust some one of these existing agencies with the duty of securing this information, rather than set up additional costly personnel for that purpose?

There was a time when a million dollars was regarded as an enormous sum of money. Of recent years it has not seemed to be such a large amount; but as people become increasingly debt and tax conscious, I believe there will be a growing respect for the size of a million dollars; and here, I believe, is a chance to do a good turn for the taxpayers by saving a million dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration, the deficiency appropriation bill, H. R. 10464, contains an item of $100,000 for the purpose of transporting or repatriating Filipinos to the Philippine Islands, and I confine my remarks to that subject.

Mr. Chairman, on January 9 I introduced H. R. 9991, extending the time for applying for and receiving benefits under the provisions of an act to provide means by which certain Filipinos can emigrate from the United States, which was approved on July 10, 1935.

At the time of the enactment of this law providing for the repatriation of Filipinos it was contemplated that funds would be appropriated before the adjournment of the last session of Congress to put the act into immediate effect. With this in view, the time for making application for return to the Philippine Islands under the act was limited to December 1, 1936, and the termination date was December 31, 1936. The deficiency bill appropriating the necessary funds to carry the act into effect was passed by the House of Representatives but failed to pass in the Senate at the closing day's session. As a result, it has not been possible for the immigration authorities to carry out the purposes of the act. It is therefore imperative that the time limitation be extended for the period of 1 year. The present deficiency bill, H. R. 10464, contains an appropriation to carry out the purposes of the act.

In advocating the passage of this act during the last session of Congress I called attention to its humanitarian purpose, and that it received the full approval of the Department of Labor and of various Filipino organizations. Since that time President Quezon, of the Philippine Commonwealth, and both of the present Philippine Commissioners to the Congress of the United States have personally advised me of their approval and support of the measure.

I further called attention to the fact that thousands of Filipinos had been lured to American territory by selfish employers of labor, who offered higher wages than are paid in the Philippines, but wages which were much lower than the wage scale prevailing in the United States. Since the passage of this act employment agencies exploiting Filipino labor in the United States have been carrying on a campaign of false propaganda against the accomplishment of the humanitarian purposes proposed in the act. Contrary to many of the rumors which have been spread in some sections of the country this is not a deportation measure. No Filipino making application for return to the Philippines under this act is deported from the United States. He voluntarily asks that he be returned to his homeland, and the United States agrees to provide him passage and subsistence. He can return to the United States under the same conditions and in accordance with the same requirements that any of the other 13,000,000 Filipinos can come to the United States. These false reports have even been to the effect that any Filipino taking advantage of the provisions of this act would be required to reimburse the United States Government for his passage and subsistence. This is absolutely untrue. The United States Government does not require or expect that it will be reimbursed by these people to the extent of a single penny.

The purposes of this act are purely humanitarian. There are thousands of Filipinos in this country who find themselves out of employment and on relief rolls. They are in financial distress and want, thousands of miles from home and friends in an environment alien to that which they have been accustomed to all of their lives and among a strange people. They desire to be home among friends, but they have not been able to save the funds necessary to such a long journey. To facilitate their return the United States Government, through this legislation, offers to return them to the Philippine Islands free of all costs. Such a purpose is highly commendable. It furnishes an opportunity for these people to return to their own homeland where their social lives and ideals can progress along normal lines and in harmony. They should take advantage of it.

May I say that regardless of the fact that but few applications have been made at this time, due to the fact that money has not been available, yet when it is made available, an adequate sum—not the inadequate $100,000 provided for in the present bill—an intense campaign will be made, particularly on the west coast, and thousands upon thousands of those young men who are here destitute and on the relief rolls, will return to their native land.

At the proper time and place I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill increasing the amount from $100,000 to at least $250,000, and I hope it will be accepted by the Committee.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, there are several items in this deficiency appropriation bill to which I should like to refer, but I shall confine myself to a very few. I find on page 4 of the bill an item with reference to the Civil Service Commission. Of course, it is well known that with the help of Mr. Farley, acting in his dual capacity as chairman of the Democratic National Committee and chief patronage dispenser of the administration, the New Deal has practically put out of business the Civil Service Commission.

All we need to know is that in February 1933 there were on the Federal pay roll 563,487 people, and that in November 1935 there were 800,097, an increase in 2 years of nearly 237,000. Practically every one of them was appointed on the basis of political patronage, rather than merit, so that the civil service under the New Deal becomes a false alarm. Why make an elaborate appropriation for the support of something that is not functioning? On the other hand, I suppose it is necessary to keep these large items, because the employees of the alphabetical agencies must get their pay through patronage. It is perfectly apparent that an effort is being made to build up a great political machine through using these additional employees as a means to that end. In the old days we used to hear a great deal about the spoils system, but the present system has made it respectable in comparison.

It was very interesting, Mr. Chairman, the other night to be able to listen in on the radio—I was not eligible to attend—to the so-called Jackson Day dinner held here in the city of Washington at $50 per plate. That in itself would have excluded me to start with, but some of you patriotic Democrats, of course, had to cash up your $50—or else. I am only sorry that it did not all go into the cash drawer of the hotel, because I sympathize with the financial needs of my fellow hotelkeepers. I do not think the $45 that went to pay up deficiencies in Democratic bills was money well spent, except that everybody ought to pay his bill and balance budgets, even Democratic campaign committees.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. No; I am sorry, but I cannot yield in my 13 minutes to anyone and I should like that distinctly understood. I am glad, however, that the speaker of the evening, the President of the United States, compared himself to Andrew Jackson. If I read history correctly, Andrew Jackson originated the spoils system, and the New Deal is trying to perpetuate it; so I think the comparison was mighty well made. I do not know where the President could have brought in a better illustration than to compare himself with Andrew Jackson, in view of the spoils system under which he is operating.

I shall not refer in detail to the appropriation to carry out the Potato Act, because that has been so generally covered. Like many others, I had assumed that this measure had been invalidated under the A. A. A. decision rendered a few days ago. There may be in the mind of Secretary Wallace and his group of quack wet nurses some reason for making appropriations to carry out unconstitutional laws, but I don't think the users of potatoes or those required to secure licenses to raise them appreciate the spending of the taxpayers' money in this manner.

I note that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] has suggested an amendment substituting for the item carried in the bill an appropriation of $1,000,000 to inquire about potatoes. Has any subject been more generally referred to, studied, written about, and discussed than the growing of potatoes in this country? True, it is one of the great crops, and we want to know all we can about it, and if that million dollars will gain a particle of information I shall be glad to know about it to tell my people. However, it will secure a good many jobs for deserving Democrats. There is no question about that. I admire the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] for his courage in saying that the Potato Act is unconstitutional. That, of course, is a real admission, coming from the source it does.

The bill now before us provides an appropriation for carrying the Guffey Coal Act into effect, and is another instance of spending money to carry out unconstitutional legislation. The question of its legality has already been raised in the courts, and in due time it will also be added to the New Deal junk heap of unconstitutional laws.

Yesterday I was interested, also, to hear the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] refer to the constitutionality of this measure. He desires to have the Members of the House know that he considers the Guffey bill constitutional and that in view of certain action in the majority opinion in the A. A. A. case it may well stand the test of the Supreme Court. If he is correct in his judgment about the Guffey bill, and is himself a constitutional authority, of course, there is no need of further action on the part of the Supreme Court.

I want to be sure that I refer to one item which appears on page 36 of the bill. An appropriation is made for $200,000 for the purchase of the premises at 1724 F Street.

I made some inquiries about the leasing of buildings by the Federal Government, and this is an official document I hold in my hand.

Over a period of years we have spent hundreds of millions of dollars constructing and purchasing buildings in the city of Washington. I recall that when these appropriations have been suggested the one great thought was that it would do away with rents in the District of Columbia and save the Government a great amount of money. The New Deal has created so vast a bureaucracy here in Washington that these public buildings are now inadequate, and the Government is now renting over 100 private buildings. What do you suppose it is costing the Government extra for rent to house these alphabetical agencies and all these New Deal employees? Bear in mind the enormous floor space secured in the construction of these new buildings. The Federal Government rents today 2,637,188 square feet of space at a cost of $2,548,872.45 annually. Think of that! Two million six hundred and thirty-seven thousand square feet of space in addition to the area within the limitations of these new buildings. Some of the leased buildings are private residences and hotels. They even tried to turn out one of our own Members from his apartment in one of the hotels in order to rent it to the Government for $63,500 annually. That was the Arlington Hotel. They rent space in the Willard Hotel for $15,000. They rent a private residence on Massachusetts Avenue. They rent the Auditorium for $50,000. The Walker-Johnson Building, which I think they want to buy, is rented at another $50,000. Instead of inquiring into rents for private families in the District of Columbia, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] wants to do, we should inquire into why we must have all this extra space for Government, crowding people out of private residences, apartments, and hotels, and the Government buying them or condemning them. The Rochambeau, where some of our Members have resided, is costing the Government $115,625 per annum. If I owned hotels in the city of Washington I would be tickled to death to rent them to the Government under existing conditions.

The private residence to which I referred at 2000 Massachusetts Avenue is rented at a very low figure—$18,750. It was one of the finest residences in the city a few years ago, but recently has been unoccupied. I almost wish I was an employee of this great spoils system in order to have an office and be able to spend at least a little daylight time in such a magnificent residence as that is.

The next item to which I want to refer comes under the heading of the Treasury Department—expenses under the Silver Purchase and Gold Reserve Acts. I have been trying for some time to get detailed information relative to this subject without much success. I think it is time the Treasury Department made some accounting to the people regarding the effect of the gold and silver purchase programs.

I see a little item on page 35 that interests me. I do not know how much money is involved, but on page 35 of the bill there is an item included in the expenses for the Treasury Department for abrasions on gold coin. I think the definition of the word "abrasions" is "rubbing off." Formerly we had the pleasure of jingling gold coins in our pockets, and the Government made allowance for abrasion. Our pockets have now been stripped, but the allowance for abrasion still goes on. If the administration has taken all the gold in the country and stored it in the vault down in Kentucky, which has been built at a tremendous expenditure of Federal taxpayers' money, what earthly need is there for money to pay for any abrasions? How is it going to have the edges rubbed off of that gold sitting down there in that protected vault?

There are many of these little items which appear in this bill. I wish I had the time to discuss them more fully.

Let us take the Social Security Act. There is a large item carried in this bill for the upkeep of the Social Security Board. Parts of this act are just as sure to be declared unconstitutional as we are sitting in this House. I refer more particularly to titles II and VIII, setting up a compulsory Federal retirement system for employees in private industry.

Then, again, they are appropriating money under the Child Welfare Bureau and assigning it to different States. Why is it that many States are excluded from part of the funds? It is because there is a little language in the act providing for a partial distribution according to the "financial need of each State." How do you define that? I cannot define it.

According to the testimony of Miss Lenroot, Chief of the Children's Bureau, financial need is to be determined by the per-capita income of each State. Thus States whose population had a higher per-capita income than others would be excluded from part of the benefits.

Mr. Chairman, what has per capita income to do with the financial need of the State itself? The purpose of the allowance authorized by Congress is to provide for needy mothers and children, and I am unable to see why they should be discriminated against in States where the per-capita income may be higher than in other States.

The item carried in the bill for the Public Health Service involves the same proposition. The Social Security Act also authorized an appropriation to extend State public health services, and the United States Public Health Service has apportioned part of the funds on the basis of per-capita income. Again I ask, What has per-capita income to do with public-health needs?

According to the table on page 331 of the hearings, my own State and certain other States would be given no funds on this basis. To my mind, this is unfair discrimination. Our people in Massachusetts are just as much entitled to public-health services as are any other group. In view of the taxes we pay, we certainly are entitled to some consideration in the distribution of Federal funds.

If time permitted, I would again like to touch on certain matters having to do with imports and exports under the reciprocal tariff. We are told that we are going to benefit tremendously by the reciprocal tariff in our import trade. However, last night's Washington Star carried an item to the effect that the lowest favorable trade balance since 1910 is reported by the United States Chamber of Commerce, the lowest favorable balance slumping to $234,000,000 in 1935. It was less than half of the 1934 balance of $477,000,000. The imports total $2,047,000,000, an increase of 24 percent, largely due to the reciprocal tariff agreements that Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, has made, and concerning which he issued such a splendid letter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning, saying how good these reciprocal deals are, particularly the one with Canada. Let us wait until fall and see what the voters think of the agreement with Canada. I think they will speak in loud terms about that proposition when many of you gentlemen who favored that proposition report to your constituents and ask their authority to come back here.

I referred to the 24-percent increase in imports over last year. The Department of Commerce reports that exports increased only 7 percent, showing that under the trade treaties we are swapping our rich domestic market for lean foreign markets.

Let me read a further quotation from the news item:

> The favorable balance—excess of exports over imports—was reduced materially from that existing at the end of November by an unusual decline in December exports, while imports, which ordinarily decrease between November and December, increased.

The real purpose of the Trade Agreements Act is not to help our own people but to increase the purchasing power of other countries by letting them furnish the goods we need. This is becoming more and more clear from published statements of those in charge of the trade-agreements program.

The trade-agreements program is under the direct charge of Professor Sayre, the Assistant Secretary of State, who, as everyone knows, is the son-in-law of the late Woodrow Wilson, and who has his internationalistic viewpoint.

Professor Sayre recently set forth his views on the trade-agreements program in a pamphlet entitled "America Must Act", published by the World Peace Foundation, the same organization which published Secretary Wallace's great opus, America Must Choose. I was particularly interested in the following statement by Professor Sayre:

> If the purpose for which the act (the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act) was passed is to be attained, our methods must be broader than mere "horse trading." We must make of the act an instrumentality for throwing the weight of American power and influence against the disastrous world movement toward economic nationalism.

It is very evident from this statement that the administration's purpose is not to try to gain any net benefit for the United States as a result of these trade treaties but to have this country act the part of a martyr in leading the way toward world-wide free trade. Such an effort will only result in dragging our own standard of living down to the world level, not in bringing the world level up to ours.

The people are already beginning to realize the harmful effect of the trade-treaty program, and I venture to say that after the next election there will be no more money appropriated for its continuance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, we have just listened to one of the daily orations, gesticulations, gyrations, fulminations, and halucinations of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. He would regulate rents in the District of Columbia, the affairs of the Democratic National Committee, he would straighten out the Civil Service Commission, and make all crooked paths straight and all rough paths smooth. One of these days soon I shall attempt to reply to a radio speech he made recently, in which he stated that during the 10 years of Republican control—he did not say what 10 years, and for some reason omitted a 2-year period somewhere—that the public debt of the United States was reduced $10,000,000,000.

The reason I asked for time today primarily was to make a brief reply to some of the wild and unjustified statements that have recently been made with respect to the reciprocal trade agreements that have been negotiated with foreign countries by the State Department. On yesterday we had two speeches, one by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] and one by my esteemed colleague on the Ways and Means Committee the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED]. After listening to these speeches I decided they were the most extreme on the tariff that I had ever heard expressed. They out-Fordneyed Fordney, out-Cumbered McCumber, out-Smooted Smoot, and out-Hawleyed Hawley, and, if possible to do so on the tariff subject, out-Treaded Treadway. [Laughter.] I have never heard anything like it since I have been in this House. You would think by listening to the gentlemen that our tariff walls had been entirely broken down and that we had adopted a policy of absolute free trade, especially with respect to the dairy industry. I quote from the statement of the gentleman from New York, a man for whom I have very high esteem and admiration. I do not think this statement does justice to his usual fairness, intelligence, and accuracy. These were his words:

> The people of my State have built up the finest dairy business in the world, yet we are throwing our markets wide open to foreign countries with their lower labor costs and their low costs of water transportation and with their Government subsidies.

Throwing our markets wide open! And then he goes on to talk at length about the reduction of rates in the trade agreements on dairy products, and from his speech you would think that butter had been placed on the free list.

As a matter of fact, the rate of duty on butter has not been decreased at all in any of the trade agreements. If some of the gentlemen who have insinuated that the imports of butter may increase on account of a reduced duty would get their facts straight, they would know that nothing has been done with respect to butter in the trade agreements thus far concluded.

So far as I know, changing the rates of duty on butter is not under consideration.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. My time is limited, but I will yield for a short question.

Mr. TABER. The importation of 1,500,000 gallons of cream allowed to come in at reduced rates would certainly have an effect on the price of butter, would it not?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am coming to that. Of course, those gentlemen who exercised their lungs yesterday regarding the trade agreements will say that the maximum quota of 1,500,000 gallons of cream on which the duty of 56.5 cents per gallon was reduced to 35 cents will have a detrimental effect on the butter market. This amount is equivalent to about 125,000,000 pounds of milk, or about one-tenth of 1 percent of the total annual milk production in the United States; it is only eight-tenths of 1 percent of the production in the North Atlantic States, which receive most of the inconsequential imports coming into the United States. Actual imports from Canada in 1929 were almost twice as great as this quota permitted from all countries. This rate of 35 cents per gallon is still 15 cents greater than the rate on cream in the Fordney-McCumber Act. This, I submit, is far from free trade, yet they say this will have a detrimental effect on the butter market.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman has been a member of the Ways and Means Committee for many years. He recalls that we had a duty of 35 cents a gallon on cream and that it was subsequently raised to 56 cents in order to stop imports of Canadian cream into New England and New York.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was done, I suppose, under the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I think it was done under the Republicans.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; the gentleman is right. And what prices did the dairyman receive for his cream under the Smoot-Hawley tariff law?

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot get into a running colloquy in the limited time that has been given me. I wish the gentleman would compare the condition of the dairy industry and every other branch of agriculture under Republican rule and the Smoot-Hawley tariff law with present conditions under the Democratic administration.

Mr. ENGEL. Will not the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not yield and I do not propose to be drawn off into a running political debate.

Mr. ENGEL. What effect has the devaluation of the dollar had upon the tariff?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman can come to his own conclusions with reference to that. I will not discuss the effect of the devaluation of the dollar at this time.

Mr. ENGEL. No. They are buying American dollars for 59 cents.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am curious why the Representatives from New England States on the opposition complain about the reciprocal tariff agreement with Canada. Is it not likely that the New England States under this reciprocal tariff will do more business with Canada, for instance, than they would with the Southern States of the United States?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course that is true, and moreover, under this reciprocal trade agreement there are more benefits accruing to agriculture than to any other one industry because we export to Canada, so I am informed, more agricultural commodities than they export into our country.

Some of the gentlemen on the other side professed to be concerned about the reduced duty on cheese in a number of the trade agreements. Mention was made of the reduced duty on cheddar cheese coming from Canada. The United States duty on cheddar cheese in the Canadian agreement was reduced to 5 cents per pound but not less than 25 percent ad valorem. The rate was 7 cents per pound, but not less than 35 percent ad valorem. The agreement rate marks a return to the rate established under the Tariff Act of 1922. The average annual imports from Canada during the years 1925 to 1929 were 2,400,000 pounds, or less than 1 percent of the domestic production of cheddar cheese during those years. Imports have been considerably smaller in recent years. As a matter of fact, since 1932, as shown by the Department of Agriculture, the exports of cheddar cheese have exceeded imports. Even in 1935, when we have heard so much about the country being swamped with imports of agricultural products, the exports of cheddar cheese exceeded the imports for the months January to September, inclusive.

Notwithstanding all the wailings which we have heard regarding agricultural imports, the prices have steadily increased since 1932, when the voters retired the Republican Party from power. It is futile for the gentlemen on the other side to attempt to show that the present administration has not been, and will not continue to be, a friend of the farmers. The increase in the cash income of farmers from some $4,300,000,000 in 1932 to some $6,900,000,000 in 1935, an increase of over 59 percent, demonstrates what the present administration has done for the farmers of this country.

In connection with the effect the Canadian trade agreement will have on butter and the dairy industry, let me quote from the comments of one who is in a better position to know whereof he speaks than are the gentlemen who have attempted to speak for the dairy farmers here on the floor of the House. I now quote from the comments of Mr. W. F. Jensen, secretary-manager of the American Association Creamery Butter Manufacturers, who says:

I cannot see much of a threat in this treaty to the American dairy interest and, while I am a protectionist, believing that the American standard of living can be maintained only through the protective principle, I am also a believer in moderate tariffs and certainly in friendly relations and trade with other nations, especially such a one as Canada, which extends along our border for more than 3,000 miles.

In reference to butter—our tariff has not been lowered; it remains at 14 cents per pound if Canadian butter is brought into the United States.

The quota given to Canada on cream, 1½ million gallons per annum, is the equivalent of approximately 6 million pounds of butter per annum, not a large item, and the duty as it remains or will be, 35 cents per gallon, as a matter of fact is nearly 9 cents per pound in the equivalent of butter—certainly very good protection.

Some sweet cream for table use may enter Boston and a few other New England towns, and there may come times when cream for butter making from Canada may enter Buffalo, Huron, Detroit, and possibly Spokane, but not likely in any noticable volume or any time soon. In itself the duty of 35 cents per gallon on cream should be effective.

As to the importation of dairy cows and cattle, I can hardly venture an opinion. The maximum quota of 20,000 head is not large, and the duty under the treaty that remains, 1½ cents per pound, running from $10 to $15 per head, gives protection; although at times livestock from Canada has been marketed in the United States and, to some extent is being marketed through our well-equipped packing houses—especially this year, with the 1934 drought having left our domestic supply of livestock somewhat depleted.

There are times when New Zealand butter enters Vancouver, British Columbia, and when butter from eastern Canada is exported to London and other English markets, but the Canadian stock of butter in storage is not heavy—about 2,000,000 pounds less than a year ago, and the Canadian cheese stock is about normal.

I shall not look for any appreciable amount of butter and cheese to enter the United States from Canada after the treaty is in effect. The world markets which govern Canadian markets are much higher than they were a year ago. While we are experiencing much higher prices on butter and cheese in the United States this year than we have in other recent years, these higher prices are not just a happening in the United States; they seem to be a world condition. The world demand for dairy products has improved because times are getting better, and apparently world production of dairy products is not up to former years.

At least for a year or two, which is as long as any of us can look ahead, in my opinion we have nothing to worry about in the creamery industry by reason of this reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada.

We have, I believe, greater cause for worry in regard to the high prices on butter and cheese, which are driving away consumer demand; and, if prices go as high in our markets as they were last winter, we may again experience quite a heavy loss in consumer demand for butter and cheese, which is something to guard against.

It is not a good thing for the dairy industry to lose its customers—not in the long run.

It would be inferred from the arguments and the speeches made by those of the opposition that the men who administer our reciprocal trade law have no knowledge of the subject; and that they consult no one and have only the interest of foreign countries at heart rather than the interest and the welfare of our own country. In other words, these men are accused of ignorance, of lack of patriotism, and of not giving the general public an opportunity to be heard. Everyone familiar with the Secretary of State knows that he is one of the ablest, as well as one of the most patriotic, men in this country. Secretary Hull has made a lifetime study of the tariff question and has the interest and welfare of the American people at heart just as much so as the gentleman from Minnesota, the gentleman from New York, or any other Member of this House. I think it is a reflection upon the Secretary of State to say that he would permit trade agreements to be negotiated and policies to be adopted which were prejudicial to the welfare of the American people as a whole. The difficulty is that the people of some sections want legislation solely and purely for the dairy interests; the people in the New England States want legislation favorable to the particular industries in their section. Secretary Cordell Hull takes a Nation-wide view of the subject. He is familiar with every aspect and every phase of the question, and is acting in the interest of and for the welfare of all the people. Of course, it is more or less a give-and-take proposition. As everyone knows, we cannot expect to get all the benefits and give nothing in return.

Secretary Hull and those associated with him hold hearings just the same as the Ways and Means Committee of the House hold hearings when writing a tariff bill. He is assisted by the Tariff Commission, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, Department of the Interior, the Treasury, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by various and sundry agencies of the Government, each of which is in the best position to furnish facts and give evidence bearing upon these questions.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The reciprocal bill that was brought up for consideration before the Committee on Ways and Means, as prepared by the State Department, did not contemplate hearings. If hearings are being held in connection with these matters, the Republicans can be thanked for that, because we fought to have that amendment inserted in the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am glad there is one thing you Republicans can be thankful for, although I think you are mistaken about that, as you know the majority of our committee are Democrats.

Mr. KNUTSON. We did away with these star-chamber sessions.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman know that since the promulgation of these reciprocal trade treaties every agricultural organization in America, including the Grange, the dairying group, and every other agricultural association, has condemned these treaties in unqualified terms?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No, I did not know that. I do know, however, that the largest newspaper in the gentleman's home city of Oswego, N. Y., editorially stated:

The idea of all government is to accomplish something material for the welfare of the Nation as a whole, not for a single group. The more even flow of trade across the border in both directions cannot help but improve conditions.

Let us compare the price of farm products in March 1933 and 1935 and in January 1936. That is the best way to judge the effect of legislation enacted and conditions existing under the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, and under the policies of the present administration.

Let us take corn, for instance. In March 1933, when the present administration came into control, the price was 26 cents a bushel. In 1934, 48 cents a bushel. In 1935 the price was 81 cents per bushel, and 83 cents in January 1936.

Oats were 17 cents in 1933; 35 cents in 1934; 52 cents in 1935.

Rye was 40 cents in 1933; 61 cents in 1934; 61 cents in 1935; and 69 cents in January 1936.

Cotton bringing 4 and 5 cents in March 1933; and in 1935 12 and 13 cents.

Wheat, 55 cents in March 1933—the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] and others in the northwest are interested in wheat as well as in dairy products—89 cents in 1934; 96 cents in 1935; and $1.17 in 1936.

Steers—the cattle people in this country are interested in beef cattle as well as dairy cattle. I am a cattle raiser on a small scale myself and in 1933 we sold our best cattle under the Smoot-Hawley tariff law and under Republican control for 3 cents and 3½ cents a pound, while this last fall, under Democratic administration and under Democratic control we easily got 8 cents a pound for the same type of cattle.

Mr. KNUTSON. How about the drought?

Mr. DOUGHTON. How about the drought! Of course you always have some excuse. There is always something wrong. The drought is the reason we had to kill so many cattle and made necessary the slight increase in our imports and for lowering the tariff slightly on dairy cattle and feedstuffs. If the gentleman wants to discuss the drought that is a long story and, of course, you cannot make a political issue out of that. A drought does affect prices, more or less.

Butter 17 cents in 1933, 30 cents in 1935, and 33 cents in January 1936. Compare 17-cent butter under a Republican administration and the Hawley-Smoot tariff with 33-cent butter, or an increase of about 100 percent, under a Democratic administration. Yet we hear a constant political wail and howl and lamentation with respect to the effect that trade agreements are having on the price of butter.

Milk, per hundred pounds, 17 cents in 1933, 20 cents in 1934, and 24 cents in 1935.

So it is with respect to the prices of all farm commodities. They average today 50 percent higher under the present Democratic administration in comparison with prices under a Republican administration and the Hawley-Smoot tariff law, and yet our Republican friends have the effrontery, the audacity to attempt to raise the issue that the Democratic administration is pursuing policies that are injurious to the agricultural industry of this country.

No one will be deceived by such charges, especially coming from those who doubted the advisability of expanding our foreign trade, and, who only a few months ago said we were going on a wild-goose chase in search of markets that did not exist.

The American farmer and businessman will never subscribe to such a do-nothing policy. They well know the difficulties they have been facing, especially since the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot-Grundy tariff, in the problem of the disposition of their unsalable surpluses. They know that we must depend upon the expansion of our foreign markets for the sale of more than one-half of our cotton crop, a fifth of our wheat, two-fifths of our leaf tobacco, almost half of our lard, a third of our rice, and numerous other products of our farms, as well as the surplus production of automobiles, machinery, and other products of our mines and factories. The 7,000,000 of our cititzens who are dependent for a livelihood on our foreign markets will not be deceived by those who tremble at the mere mention of the word "imports."

Unhappily this is but a part of the story. What is of far more vital consequence is the disastrous effect of these unsalable surpluses on our domestic prices, wages, and employment.

Immediately following the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, our foreign trade began to steadily decline until it amounted to only about one-third that of prior years. Our own extreme tariff barriers led to defensive or retaliatory trade barriers in other countries, thus making the world a battleground of economic conflict.

None but extremists and special pleaders object to the negotiation of reciprocal trade agreements and a reasonable reduction of existing tariff barriers. The American people will not be misled by the imaginary fears of these extremists, or by their claims that we can increase employment by denying foreign markets to American agriculture and industry for their surplus output, as evidenced by the approval voiced by the press of the country of the program thus far carried out as so manifestly just, and the results so far obtained as being so obviously beneficial to the country as a whole, not alone the Democratic press but by three-fourths of the Republican press, including a large number from the New England States, which section has always been the citadel of high protective tariffs.

The agreements thus far negotiated refute such claims advanced by these special pleaders, and have already resulted in increased foreign trade of incalculable benefit to the country as a whole. They are a welcomed start toward undoing the commercial damage wrought by the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, and constitute a definite stride back to world sanity.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, if the request is in order at this time, and to include in the extension copies of resolutions of various agricultural bodies and other organizations of the United States protesting against these reciprocal tariff treaties.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that cannot be done in Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will invite the gentleman's attention to the fact he has not spoken on the bill, and such permission would have to be granted in the House rather than in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 13 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. DOUGHTON] went to considerable length to defend the Canadian reciprocity treaty. I am not prepared to say what effect this treaty will have throughout the United States until more time has elapsed and Canadian farm competition has been felt. I am prepared to say what effect it will have in my own congressional district, which happens to be the congressional district of the President of the United States.

The farmers of my district have been crucified by this Canadian Treaty. It is the most harmful reciprocal treaty that has been put into effect and the most serious act of any kind affecting the farmers of my district, not only the dairymen, which constitute my largest single industry, but the producers of poultry and vegetables as well. They all suffer equally by letting down the bars to the farm products from Canada, and I am even ready to say that what applies to my congressional district, applies equally to every congressional district in the United States within 400 miles of the Canadian border line. I know that it does not affect the Southern States or the State of North Carolina, from which the gentleman comes, but it does affect every State that touches upon Canada and practically every farmer who lives within 400 miles of that border line, from the west coast to the east coast. It affects not only the dairy industry but those who grow vegetables and fruit, such as apples and berries, raise hay and oats, or produce poultry. Already American merchants are buying millions of pounds of Canadian cheese.

I did not rise for the purpose of discussing this particular issue, but I could not let it go unanswered as far as my own congressional district is concerned, and as far as the party I represent. The President of the United States, when he was a candidate for office, made a solemn promise and pledge to the American farmers that he would not reduce or curtail any of the protection afforded American farmers.

That protection which they secured after years of effort from a Republican administration has been largely destroyed by this administration, and the President has deliberately repudiated his promise to the American farmer.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from North Carolina read market reports of agricultural products, but he gave no credit to the drought which necessitated the killing of hundreds of thousands of dairy cattle which naturally reduced the production in this country to a serious extent.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; I cannot yield. I have another subject which I wish to discuss in my limited time.

I take this opportunity, because of the item of expense for the administration of the Gold Reserve Act in the bill, to speak on a very dry issue and one which I do not believe Members will be much interested in.

Our gold reserve amounts to $10,000,000,000. In 1932, before we put through the Gold Reserve Act of January 30, 1932, we had $4,000,000,000 of gold in the Treasury. By that act we reduced the dollar to 59 cents, and thereby made a profit of $2,800,000,000. The Government spent $800,000,000 in paying off certain bonded indebtedness. It set aside $2,000,000,000 to go into the exchange stabilization fund. That added $2,000,000,000 to the $4,000,000,000 we already had, making a total of $6,000,000,000 of gold.

But today the Treasury balance sheet shows that we have in excess of $10,000,000,000 in gold. How did we get that money? How did we accumulate $4,000,000,000 in gold in the last 2 years? We have less than six billion in currency outstanding.

I want to point out the danger that arises from this policy of cornering or monopolizing gold.

Between France and the United States we have two-thirds of all the gold in the world. If we continue to monopolize gold by paying $35 an ounce and add to the stupendous sum of $10,000,000,000 at the rate we are going, we will soon have 60 percent of all the gold in the world and France will have another 20 percent, leaving the rest of the nations with only a very small gold reserve.

Then naturally or logically these nations that have no gold in all probability will change their medium of exchange. They will say, "We have no gold." Germany only has $36,000,000 in gold, whereas we have ten billion. Italy has only a small sum, and I will put all these figures in the RECORD.

These nations might say, "We have no gold, and therefore we are compelled to adopt a new medium of exchange, such as tin or copper or brass."

Today we are holding this enormous amount of gold and continuing to accumulate it. It is serving no purpose whatever. It does not draw any interest, and yet Congress is giving no consideration to it. We know nothing about the stabilization fund of two billion—it is a secret fund.

There has been no accounting to the Congress. We do not know whether it is still intact. Not a single Member of Congress, not even the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has the faintest idea what has happened to that fund, or how much money remains in the exchange-stabilization fund.

If we are to sell agricultural products abroad, our surplus wheat, our surplus cotton, our surplus foodstuffs, then those foreign nations must have gold with which to buy. How can we sell wheat and cotton to Germany, when Germany has only $36,000,000 in gold and practically no credit at all? How can we talk about selling our farm products to other foreign countries as their gold supply is vanishing? That is one of the troubles with which we are confronted in trying to help the southern and western farmer. If we are to solve the agricultural program so that our producers can sell their surplus to foreign nations, then we have to take some cognizance of the fact that we have $10,000,000,000 of gold in storage serving no useful purpose.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Are not the reciprocal-trade agreements an answer to the gentleman's question?

Mr. FISH. All these reciprocal-trade agreements do is to cause more unemployment in our own country, unemployment not only on the farms but in industry, and the unconditional most-favored-nation clause brings American labor at $3 a day into direct competition with Japanese labor paid 20 cents a day and European labor at $3 a week. If the gentleman is for any such program, then let him go back and explain it to his constituents, because mine will have none of it.

Mr. WHITE. If Germany cannot pay for exports with money, will we not have to take goods in trade?

Mr. FISH. The German people have to buy cotton for their own industries. They cannot pay for that cotton. We have got the cotton, and when they get the cotton they process it and manufacture it into articles and sell those commodities at a profit, and with those profits in cotton and textile goods they can pay for all the cotton they get from us. Germany is a great manufacturing and industrial country and its profits come largely from importing raw material and exporting the finished goods, and in that way to buy from us, but without gold and threfore almost without credit, she cannot buy our cotton or other products. I am not saying right now that we should loan any money to other nations, but I am not so sure that we should not put aside $1,000,000,000 out of the $10,000,000,000 dollars of gold as a revolving fund for those nations that need our cotton—Japan, Germany, and Italy—after the present war is over, and protect ourselves by guaranties and adequate securities, and use our own gold which is not being used today to sell products to foreign nations, with which they can accumulate profits and pay those profits back to us.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the gentleman give us any information as to whether or not Russia is shipping into this country each year now approximately $1,000,000,000 worth of gold which she is taking out of her own mines at a cost of $3 per ounce and selling to us at $35 per ounce?

Mr. FISH. Oh, not as much as that; because the total yearly production of gold in the world is less than a billion dollars. Russia only possesses about $800,000,000 of gold and probably produces less than one hundred million. We are one of the largest producers, and Great Britain is a very large producer.

Mr. WHITE. Seventy percent of the world's gold comes from the British Empire.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the amount of gold owned by the leading nations of the world at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Total (at $35 an ounce)	$22,300,000,000
United States	10,200,000,000
France	4,300,000,000
England	1,600,000,000
Russia (estimated)	800,000,000
Belgium	615,000,000
Switzerland	455,000,000
Netherlands	427,000,000
Japan	418,000,000
Italy (estimated)	350,000,000
Germany	36,000,000

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a considerable part of the debate yesterday centered on and against the Warren potato bill passed at the last session of Congress, and there were the usual charges of the regimentation of the farmers under the dictatorship of the Secretary of Agriculture. One listening to the debate and with no prior knowledge of the subject could only conclude that the Warren potato bill was sponsored by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of expanding his already alleged autocratic power over agriculture and farmers in the United States.

The Congress knows, or ought to know, and the country ought to be informed, that nothing could be further from the truth, and that in fact the Warren potato bill was enacted by the Congress against the wishes of the Secretary of Agriculture, and the subsequent history of the act is that its administration was undertaken by the Secretary with reluctance.

The history of the act is that after the adjournment of the last session of Congress, the Secretary of Agriculture, who was known not to be favorable to the bill, was reported in the press of the country as not intending to carry it into effect or to administer it. Following the publication of these reports, the representatives of the potato growers of the country and other farm leaders came to Washington and held a conference at the Department of Agriculture with the Secretary for the avowed purpose of having the law put into operation and of working out a tentative program to take care of a serious situation in the potato industry in this country, pending the necessary preparations and procedure for the execution of the Warren Potato Act.

I have said in my home State, and I want to repeat here, that the most valid criticism that could be made against the Warren potato bill is that it is class legislation at the behest of the class to be benefited by it, and I challenged critics to go before the farmers of Colorado and condemn this legislation on that ground. It may be true that in spots where the potato is a minor agricultural product and in the large industrial centers, where the major interest is jobs and pay checks, there is opposition to the Warren bill, but it is undeniable that the overwhelming majority of the potato growers of the United States and several of the large farm organizations sponsored this bill and were primarily responsible for its passage.

Colorado is not one of the major potato-producing States, but it is a heavy grower, and the Warren bill had the almost unanimous support of the potato growers of that State, as well as of the Farm Bureau. Resolutions of support were passed at mass meetings of growers in the counties. In one county the vote for the bill was 542 to 2. Not one protest against the bill came from Colorado. There is a reason. It has not been uncommon in the potato fields of Colorado that a bumper potato crop was not worth digging and haulage to town, to say nothing of the other costs of production, so they rotted in the ground. The potato cannot be stored like wheat, cotton, tobacco, and many other farm staples; it is a perishable commodity.

At a recent meeting of the directive heads of all the Federal agencies in Colorado, Mr. F. A. Anderson, the agricultural extension agent, of the opposite political faith, said the farmers of Colorado were practically unanimous for the Triple A, that the opposition was so small as to be negligible, less than 1 percent.

The Jones-Costigan Sugar Act, largely shaped by the Beet Growers' Association, has been accepted by the processors, the growers, and the workers. All have benefited by the act, with no appreciable increase in the cost of sugar to the consumer. Sugar is only $4.50 per hundred on the New York market today. President Charles Kearney, of the National Beet Growers Association tells me that nothing can replace the present Sugar Act. Let the opposition farm doctors scratch their heads over this.

What is true of the Potato Act and the Sugar Act is true of the Cotton and Tobacco Acts. It was common talk that neither of these bills were favored by the administration or by the Secretary of Agriculture, the man who is pictured as working to regiment the farmers of the United States and establish an autocratic or bureaucratic rule over them. The cotton bill was written by the cotton growers, and the tobacco bill was written by the tobacco growers. It is said that the tobacco growers have greatly benefited by the Tobacco Act. I know that tobacco does not cost me a cent more than it did before. I am an authority on that. And despite the Cotton Act, that industry is still faced with a tremendous surplus. With the fall of the Cotton Act, that great industry will face a new crisis. These four bills—cotton, tobacco, sugar, and potato—and other farm legislation of this administration have written a new chapter in American legislative history. For the first time in American legislative history the farmers of the country have written laws upon its statute books. They tried to write laws upon them during the 12 years preceding the administration of President Roosevelt, but their efforts were thwarted either here in Congress or by Executive veto. The McNary-Haugen bill is an example. Labor, being better organized, had already written some Federal legislation to better the condition of the workers, but the farmers had written nothing.

As a part of my personal platform in the campaign of 1932, I said, and I quote exactly:

> Farmers make up 40 percent of our population, but the combined farm organizations have never gotten a single farm measure on the Federal statutes. The Farm Board and the tariff have failed. Why not give the farmers' program a try? I will.

In compliance with that pledge I have voted for every farm measure which has passed Congress under this administration, whether it came from the administration or originated in the Congress. I did this, not as catering for personal or political reasons to a class, but in the conviction that the welfare of that great class was vital to the welfare of the Nation and with the knowledge that all other methods had failed to give the farmer even the cost of the production of his crops, to say nothing of a profit. I wanted to give him the opportunity to write his own ticket, even if some of the experiments undertaken were mistaken. It is my judgment that the conditions in this country today are due in no small part to the writing of legislation and the judicial interpretation and the executive administration of the laws of the country under the dictation of great special interests. I shall not fear for the institutions of this country under laws written by and administered for the benefit of the workers and farmers of the country. They produce its wealth, and they consume its wealth, but do they get the benefit of its wealth?

I wish all you gentlemen could read an article recently published in the Readers' Digest entitled "Chemistry Wrecks the Farm." This article shows that chemistry has already wrecked silk and predicts that it will wreck cotton and wool as well. It shows that synthetic milk may solve the dairy problem in the same way. That presents a situation which makes party politics seem pretty small.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Inasmuch as chemistry has wrecked agriculture, and I fully agree with the gentleman, if we examine the historical basis, we ought to call on chemistry to rehabilitate it, and yet there is a total lack of chemists in the agricultural administration cooperating with that Department in working out some long-range solution. Is not that true?

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Then we must supply that want, unless it be that the Department has already taught agriculture too much about increasing production.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday we passed by an overwhelming majority a bill that nearly every speaker took pains to say was endorsed by three organizations of veterans of the World War. The reports on that legislation stress and paramount organized support as the chief reason why Congress should pass the bonus bill. If Congress can pass legislation because it is demanded by three and one-half million veterans, why can it not and why should it not pass legislation demanded by 10,000,000 farmers?

Mr. Chairman, I learned of the adverse decision of the Supreme Court on the A. A. A. with feelings nothing short of distress. It cannot be denied that agriculture needs the aid of Government and it cannot be denied that the allotment plan and processing tax did aid agriculture and played a large part in rescuing it from the prostrate condition in which it was found when this administration came into power. Even if it be conceded, which I do not, that the method did not square with the constitutional powers of Congress, the results speak for themselves, and the need for continued Government aid is established by the fact that even opponents of the A. A. A. in Congress and in the country, the very bitterest critics of A. A. A., are busily engaged studying and proposing substitutes for it. Only the other day at Lincoln, Nebr., President Hoover, in a proposed farm program, included direct subsidies to agriculture. Gen. Hugh Johnson commended Mr. Hoover, going to the extent of stating that the former President had hit upon a better plan than domestic allotment and processing taxes, but at the same time taking occasion to suggest that Mr. Hoover, while President, had proposed no such thing to aid agriculture. He did, however, propose plowing under every third row.

General Johnson missed the point. Here is the outstanding fact, here is the significant fact, here is the disturbing and distressful fact, admitted by all proposed remedies, that agriculture in the United States cannot stand upon its own feet, cannot stand its own productive competition, to say nothing of the competition of other countries. Why? My answer is this, and it takes in more than agriculture: Permanent large-scale unemployment in industry and surpluses in agriculture are fixed conditions in our economic life. The sooner the American people face and admit these facts the sooner we may work out answers to these problems, which must be worked out, if our industrial and agricultural populations are not to remain just as they are today, dependent upon Federal aid raised by mortgaging the future. Unemployment was constantly increasing from 1921 to 1929, considered the greatest era of prosperity in this or any other country, and agriculture was already bankrupt when that prosperity reached its peak and the crash came in 1929. These are facts we cannot deny, and unless we are able to remove the causes of this decline we must face a future in which we will always have millions of workers supported in enforced idleness by their more fortunate brothers.

Nearly every day on this floor we hear it stated that there are still 10,000,000 idle workers in this country, and these 10,000,000 idle workers are used as a yardstick to measure the recovery program and prove its shortage and its failure. But no remedy is proposed, so far as I can discover, except the remedy of the American Liberty League and the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce to turn the hands on the clock back to March 4, 1932, and resume where we left off and let big business run the country again. Hand the farmers back over to unbridled competition in crop production and to the boards of trade and to the processors and traffickers in farm products; hand finance, commerce, and industry back over to the interests which wrote the most disastrous chapter in American history. Repeal the New Deal. This was the war cry of a group of Republican leaders held recently at Colorado Springs in my district at the call of one of the millionaire proprietors of the party in Colorado. It will not be repealed except with the consent of the workers and farmers of the country. I leave it to them. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words with reference to what Congress has been doing in recent years, and when I say "recent years" I mean during Republican rule as well as Democratic rule, in regard to passing legislation giving to officials of the Government the power to make appointments without any regard for the civil-service laws and regulations; and, in some instances, which even permits them to make appointments without regard to the Classification Act.

The other day the fiftieth anniversary of the Civil Service Act was celebrated. That law was enacted during the administration of Grover Cleveland. I realize that Members of Congress, myself included, receive hundreds and hundreds of requests from our constituents for positions. True, to be honest, some might take a different view if Members of Congress secured the positions we create, but you know and I know we do not get them. It may be all right to give an emergency agency or a temporary agency the right to make some appointments without regard to civil service. Under the civil-service law appointments are supposed to be spread among the various States of the Union, and it would be absolutely unfair to ask anybody to come from my State in the center of the country, to Washington at his or her own expense, to accept a temporary appointment in Washington which would only continue for 3 months, and then they would have to pay their way back home. But where there is a permanent agency set up, such as the Archives Administration, whose peak in several years is going to be 660 employees, according to the evidence before our committee, or the Water Power Commission, which is a permanent Government agency, and other Government departments or agencies, I think we are making a mistake and going a little too far in giving the appointive power to officials without any regard to the merit system.

Now, what has happened with reference to these emergency appointments without regard to civil service? As far as I can learn, not more than one-fifth have been appointed as the result of the recommendations of Members of Congress. I think an investigation will disclose that. In other words, where a Member of Congress has secured a place for one of his constituents four others have been appointed as the result of the law you passed, recommended by others. So if the Congress has passed that legislation with a view of being able to get jobs, they have found their recommendations are only one-fifth the value of people who are on the outside. We have simply paved the way for officials of the Government and others with influence with those in charge of appointments to name their friends, in many instances relatives. Men holding high positions with the Government have put their children, sons and daughters, in good jobs instead of spreading the appointments in homes where there is no earning power. I know what I am talking about when I say at least 50 percent of the appointments have gone to Republicans, if not more than 50 percent. I speak of the emergency agencies.

I do not feel that Republicans have any monopoly on intelligence, and I am willing that Democrats compete with them in examinations for positions. In this way I think Democrats would get a better break than they have received.

I am not entirely in accord with the methods of the Civil Service Commission. I had an argument with the new Civil Service Commission soon after it came into power, when it reduced the age limit in connection with its examinations. I spoke of that on the floor of this House when the Congress convened. But Congress was on vacation at the time, and when I could get no action from the Civil Service Commission I took the matter up with the President, and the President seemed to fully agree with me. He appointed the Secretary of Labor, Miss Perkins, as head of a committee to confer with the Civil Service Commission, with a view to increasing the age limit in the examinations. As the result of that conference, the age limit was changed in many examinations. I insisted that when one reached the age of 40, 45, 50, or 55 years he or she was still able to perform a good day's work.

The Civil Service Commission also has a very bad habit of requiring an applicant to show that he has a college education before he is eligible to take an examination. I do not agree with that. I say a man or woman with practical experience can be just as valuable to the Government of the United States as one who has been fortunate enough to secure a college education.

If the Constitution required that one must have a college education to qualify for service in Congress, hundreds and hundreds of men who have served in Congress and distinguished themselves would never have been here.

No examinations should bar an applicant who has had practical experience simply because he has not been fortunate enough to have had an opportunity to attend college. In the last few years hundreds of thousands of young men have been denied a college education because their parents have not had the money to send them to college. Unless the policy I speak of is changed those young men in many instances will be denied the right to take a civil-service examination. It is a matter that is worthy of most serious consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should be extremely careful in the future, especially in reference to the permanent organizations of the Government, in giving the officials of those permanent organizations the power to appoint without regard to civil service, and as I say, in many instances, according to the hearings before us, without regard to the Classification Act.

At times information comes to me that makes me fully agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that the Congress made a serious mistake in adopting the Classification Act, because the heads of bureaus or divisions of the Government were the ones who were really the beneficiaries under that act. Those in the lower brackets received little in comparison with what those in the higher brackets received.

I feel that the Civil Service Commission should pay more attention to the law which requires them to apportion civil-service employees among the States of this Union. They should forget for a little while those States which are close to Washington, where they are away above their quota at the present time. Think of some of the people who live in the Middle West and West.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman join with those of us who, for the last 2 or 3 years, have been fighting a provision which is contained in every single piece of legislation establishing a new agency, such as the Archives? I speak of that particularly because I spoke on that. That is a permanent institution, but there was the usual provision that the help should be selected without regard to civil service and without regard to the Classification Act.

Mr. COCHRAN. I shall be very glad to do so. When the Republicans are in power they do the same as the Democrats do when they are in power. At one time it is the Republicans protesting and at another time it is the Democrats making the noise.

Mr. MICHENER. Some of us tried to eliminate that, but my good friend from Kentucky, who is present on the floor, and myself had a controversy on that occasion, and we agreed at that time that possibly after this thing was set up legislation would be enacted placing all these people under civil service without an examination. The gentleman from Missouri would not sanction a thing like that, would he?

Mr. COCHRAN. No. I hope, however, they will not confine the civil-service examinations to those who have had college educations. I am with him; the gentleman and I will go along with the gentleman from Michigan with reference to permanent establishments of the Government. But I also want to repeat what I said before—that his own party is just as much responsible as my party for passing legislation which enabled Government officials to make appointments without regard to civil service. The last Republican Secretary of Agriculture not only succeeded in bringing dozens and dozens of employees here from my State and placing them in the Department of Agriculture without regard to civil service but he also succeeded, after his President was defeated at the polls in November 1932, in securing a lot of Executive orders from Mr. Hoover, which placed those employees under civil service without any regard whatsoever for any examination. Again I say it is the fault of both parties. I am not trying to lay it onto any one particular party. I try to get as many jobs as I can for my constituents, but I really think they would be better off if we had civil-service examinations for all permanent positions. We should think seriously before we include in the legislation a paragraph that will allow an official to appoint permanent employees without regard to civil service or the Classification Act.

Take the Archives as an example. The law setting up this agency does not state the tenure of office of the Archivist. We do not know whether he is to be there for life or only until a new President is inaugurated. Should that President happen to be a Republican, he would, if possible under the law, appoint another Archivist; and what could a new Archivist do? He could discharge the entire outfit who get less than $5,000 a year and put his own men in. Realize the condition that would exist.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman is making the speech I made a couple of years ago.

Mr. COCHRAN. No; I am not. I know nothing about any speech the gentleman made. I bet he did not make it when his party was in power. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time on the minority side.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from New York begins his speech will he kindly yield for a question?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. ENGEL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee refused to answer, and which he refused to permit me to complete. The Republican Party, at the request of the dairy farmers of America, increased the tariff on butter from 8 cents to 12 cents a pound and again from 12 cents to 14 cents a pound. The importer buys American dollars with which to pay his tariff. When that importer can buy American dollars at 59 cents, has not the devaluation of the dollar operated to decrease this duty of 14 cents a pound by 41 percent, making the present duty approximately 8 cents a pound?

Mr. TABER. I think the gentleman's statement is correct. In value of protection, it certainly is.

Mr. Chairman, I shall touch only a few of the high spots in this bill, because I have not time to discuss the different items in detail. Before starting this discussion permit me to say that, to my intense regret, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations is unable to be here today. This is the first of the appropriation bills since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] became chairman of the committee in the deliberation of which he has not been able to be present and take part. He has been very careful about the hearings on this bill, and the day before he was taken sick we were on hearings all day long, until 5 o'clock, going into the details of the estimates on items covered by this bill with the idea of saving what could be saved for the Government of the United States. It is my sincere hope that when the next appropriation bill comes along the chairman of the Appropriations Committee will again be with us.

With reference to this particular bill there are not many but routine items until we get to the item for the Federal Trade Commission on page 6; and there we have an item of $150,000 for an agricultural investigation in accordance with a resolution adopted by the House. This item, the Commission tells us, will cover the investigation of one agricultural commodity out of seven which they hope to investigate.

The next important new item is that for the National Labor Relations Board, line 12, on page 7. The appropriation for this item is $275,000.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I notice the gentleman passed the item for the Interstate Commerce Commission administration of the Motor Carriers' Act.

Mr. TABER. That is the item with reference to the motor-transport regulation and is based upon finishing up the year. It should require less money after this burden gets into operation than it does as they start, because they have to go into a great many things with reference to safety appliances that are required in the Motor Truck Control Act.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is what I should like to know from the gentleman for my own personal benefit. If the gentleman has not time to go into it now, however, I will not press it. Just how far along are they with the set-up of this organization from the gentleman's investigation?

Mr. TABER. They have advanced some funds out of their other appropriations, and I think they will be ready to go ahead when they get this money and put the act into operation somewhere around the 1st of April or the 1st of May, depending to a certain extent upon how rapidly this bill goes through the House. The next important item is that for the Social Security Board, on page 10.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Before the gentleman takes up the Social Security Board item, will he tell us something about the Railroad Retirement Board? That is in the same position as the Motor Truck Transportation Act, is it not?

Mr. TABER. No; that is farther along, I would say, in some respects. This is an appropriation, however, only for the operating expenses of the Board. I would say they probably had done almost everything they were supposed to do by this date. I do not think the Interstate Commerce Commission has, perhaps, done everything. They have done nearly everything. I would say that what work they have to do would be amply covered by what we have allowed for them. It does not look as though the Retirement Investigation Commission were going to function. It has been appointed, the Commission has met and organized, but they have done no work whatever; and whether or not there is to be any further enabling legislation which would continue this, no one knows, because, as I understand it, no such report has been brought in to date by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, as a member of that Retirement Commission, I may advise the gentleman that the Retirement Commission met for 2 or 3 days in December, organized, and made a report as required, to the President, and the President is presumed to have transmitted the report to Congress. The Commission is dead, however; it died automatically on January 1, and can do nothing further unless new legislation is enacted.

Mr. TABER. I understand that is the situation.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I notice in the item for "grants to States for old-age assistance", $24,660,000, is provided in this bill. This, I suppose, is for advancement to the States between the time the funds become available and the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. TABER. The time was figured from the 1st of February to the 30th of June.

Mr. WOODRUFF. It would be almost impossible for this bill to become a law prior to February 1.

Mr. TABER. I would think so.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Can the gentleman inform the Committee how many of the States have qualified for this particular appropriation; how many of the States have provided laws under which this money can be advanced?

Mr. TABER. Thirteen States, as I understand it, have filed certificates and documents which would show they were entitled to participate in this fund; and there are probably 16 or 17 additional States from which such a showing is expected.

Of course, frankly, our hearings were held 10 days or 2 weeks ago and many things might have happened since those hearings.

Mr. WOODRUFF. In other words, the gentleman means that the legislatures of some of the States, at least, are now engaged in passing the necessary legislation which will qualify the respective States to receive this appropriation?

Mr. TABER. They are in the process of doing that; yes. It was thought that this was enough money to take care of the matching of all funds that would be provided by those States which might qualify between now and the end of the year for the period in which they would qualify.

Mr. WOODRUFF. This appropriation will become available as soon as this bill is enacted into law?

Mr. TABER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Can the gentleman inform the Committee how soon approximately after the bill becomes a law the Social Security Board will be able to so arrange its own affairs as to advance this money to the several States? The reason I ask that question is because many of the States are already paying old-age pensions, and those old folks back in the States are looking forward to the day when they will receive the additional money involved in this appropriation.

Mr. TABER. As to those States which have filed their documents with the Commission, and the documents have been approved, I should say there should not be any delay whatever. As to those States which have not filed the documents to qualify them under the act it would depend on how quickly they file them and how quickly the mechanics can be gone through with. I would not think it would take over a week or 10 days to approve any of the qualifying documents where they are in satisfactory shape to be approved. There should be no delay whatever with reference to those 13 States which had been approved at the time the hearings began.

Mr. WOODRUFF. I may say it is my understanding that the State of Michigan was the first State in the Union to qualify for this appropriation.

Mr. TABER. I cannot say as to that.

Mr. WOODRUFF. With that in view, it certainly ought not to be more than 2 or 3 weeks after this bill becomes a law before those old folks back in Michigan are able to secure the money to which they are entitled under this particular section of the bill.

Mr. TABER. There should not be a delay of more than 2 or 3 weeks on account of the operation of the Federal Government. I cannot say how long it will take a particular State to act.

Mr. WOODRUFF. There will not be any delay in Michigan after the State receives the money.

Mr. TABER. I am glad to know that.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman desire some information on the same question?

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Yes; on the same subject.

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. How elaborate is this set-up for the administration of the Social Security Board? In other words, my question grows out of this situation. I do not know how much money has been appropriated heretofore or how far along this Board has gotten with its program.

Of course, we recognize that the Social Security Board has before it a great program which will call for the expenditure of a lot of money. There are many departments and divisions in this Board's work. I for one have never been able to find out, although I have never made a very diligent inquiry to ascertain the fact, as to how elaborate this set-up is now, how far along they are, or how much money they have already consumed.

Mr. TABER. They have consumed some money, but it does not amount to a very large item so far. I have not in mind the amount of money they have used up to this time. If the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has that information, I yield to him to answer the question.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Social Security Board so far has had no direct appropriation from the Congress. The appropriation, as the gentleman will recall, was in the deficiency bill which failed of passage. There was an allotment from the Works Progress Administration of $112,000, which they have been operating on until they could get the money provided in this bill.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. That is the information I wanted. Has the work of the Social Security Board been hampered seriously by reason of the failure of the deficiency bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. It has undoubtedly been very seriously delayed because they did not have their personnel and the necessary funds with which to operate, but they have made very substantial progress in their preliminary work and are ready to go ahead.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Is there any disposition on the part of the Board to go ahead and experiment or carry forward the work of one of these departments, or one of these divisions, before they undertake the others? For instance, I appreciate that the old-age assistance feature will be the most popular. The demands in connection with that division will be the most imminent and the most immediate. I am in favor of any program which they might have covering the matter of bringing aid to that particular group, but has anything come out in the hearings to the effect that there is not going to be enough money and therefore they will not be able to reach the crippled children or the blind?

Mr. WOODRUM. There has been no discrimination or partiality shown in the program. The preliminary work has been done. State plans have been submitted and many of them have been accepted and approved. On passage of this bill the work will go forward immediately.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I am glad to have that information and to know that the work is proceeding in a fair and impartial manner.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want it to appear as a matter of record that the people in those States where they already had an old-age assistance law, when the law was passed before last July, thought they would be entitled to these benefits which were to begin sometime last summer. They were told that a filibuster in the Senate prevented the funds' being raised, but the funds would be raised, of course, as soon as the Congress came into session. Is it not a fact that many States have increased the old-age assistance during the last several months, expecting Congress when it came into session to appropriate the money and make it retroactive?

Mr. TABER. Well, that I do not know, I am frank to say to the gentleman.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Can the gentleman tell us from the information that has been brought out before his committee just how elaborate the administration upon the part of the Federal Government will be? What I mean is whether it will pay this money out to the States upon the certification of the proper State officials or will the Federal Bureau insist upon checking up each individual pensioner certified by the State to determine his eligibility under the Federal legislation?

Mr. TABER. I think there will be more or less checking up, but I think, generally, it will be paid out on the certification of the State.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think the law is very clear that there will be a lump-sum payment to the State and the State has complete control in determining eligibility and payments thereunder.

Mr. TABER. That is so, provided they have a plan set up which complies with the requirements of the statute.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; but such plan does not have anything to do with control of the State agency as to determining eligibility, the amount to be paid, and all that sort of thing. This is a matter that the State will control under the law.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Then it is the gentleman's understanding that the Federal Government, or more specifically the Social Security Commission, will not go back of the facts certified to it by the States?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is right.

Mr. TABER. They have a set-up in here which would permit them to go into the States and assist them in establishing their set-up and following the matter through to a certain extent. There is a provision here for $1,000,000 for salaries for the Social Security Board.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is there any provision whereby a State that has no old-age pension law whatever can meet the requirements of our national act without ratification by the State legislature?

Mr. TABER. There is nothing in the Social Security Act which permits the payment of anything to any State or to anyone in any State without action by the legislature, which sets up a plan which complies with the requirements of Title I of the Social Security Act, and no payments can be made under the act to any State unless such a plan is previously filed. If they had a plan which did comply entirely with title I of the Social Security Act, they could be paid immediately, whether their legislature was in session or not, as of the 1st of February, but if they have no plan which complies, they could not.

Mr. GIFFORD. I must pursue my inquiry a little further. This act took effect August 14, 1935, and if immediately afterward there were filed by a State a plan which conformed to the provisions of this act, should they not be entitled to repayment from the time they conformed with the act?

Mr. TABER. That is a question I would say would depend on what was fair, everything considered. There is the question on the one side of whether payments should be begun to one State before they are granted to another where the opportunity did not exist as to the other State. I had rather assumed that the Appropriations Committee had gone about as far as it could go when it set up——

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I may say to the gentleman that payments to the States for the third and fourth quarters would seem to imply you are enacting a provision here cutting out entirely what may have been due certain States in the second quarter and part of the first quarter.

Mr. TABER. Unless we had that language in the bill no payments could be made for the third quarter, I may say to the gentleman, and we thought the Appropriations Committee was going about as far as it could with legislation in putting in that language. I believe I state the situation correctly.

There are some minor items with reference to the District of Columbia.

There is a large appropriation for soil conservation, amounting to about $6,000,000, going into a total, with the allotments that have been made out of the relief appropriation, of about $27,000,000.

There is a small item with reference to the sea-food inspectors under the Food and Drugs Act.

Then there is the Potato Act. In the Potato Act the Bureau of Internal Revenue proposed to spend out of a Budget estimate of $4,250,000, $1,750,000 to collect from two to three hundred thousand dollars of revenue. They told us this would probably be the annual estimate of what they might collect in tax. When the Commissioner of Internal Revenue went before the Budget, to start with, he asked for a total of approximately $11,000,000 and a force of over 3,000 men to enforce the collection of the potato tax, or 25 percent, as I remember the figures, of the total operating expenses of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. The Budget estimates were based on a set-up, as I recall the figures, of approximately 1,000 employees and, perhaps, an expense for the year of upward of $4,000,000. The committee cut the estimate to $1,250,000 with the idea that this might be the figure for 1936 through the months of February and March.

Frankly, I dissent from that operation. I do not believe that we should appropriate a single cent. I believe that we should wipe out every vestige of that act, because I believe the act is unconstitutional, and from every standpoint, including that of the potato farmers of whom I have a great number in my district, one of the great potato producers of the East, it is objectionable.

Mr. TOBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. TOBEY. Will the gentleman allow me to read a statement by the Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania?

Mr. TABER. I will.

Mr. TOBEY (reading):

CHARGES POTATO ACT A REPUBLICAN TRICK

COATESVILLE, PA.—The Federal Potato Control Act was pushed through Congress as a trick of the Republicans to embarrass President Roosevelt, Governor Earle charged at a Democratic rally. Earle said the act was placed in the deficiency bill in the closing days of Congress without the President's knowledge and that it was impossible for him to veto the law because the deficiency bill had to be passed.

Let me say to the Committee and the gentleman from New York that this statement is a gross misrepresentation of the truth. It is an attempt to deceive the people and to create prejudice. The Democratic Party itself is responsible for this bill. It was sponsored chiefly by leading Democrats. The bill had the support of the President. But as far as Republicans being for it, there were only five Republican votes for the measure when it came on the floor of the House, and every Republican member of the House Agricultural Committee but one signed a strong minority report against the bill.

There can be no excuse for such gross misrepresentations, and it only reacts on the Democratic Governor of Pennsylvania, who made this false statement.

Mr. TABER. There has been a failure on the part of the farmers to be willing to put their necks into the noose of the Agricultural Department.

Now there are items for the cotton-price-adjustment payment plan.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. With reference to the proposal of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] for a million dollars to gather statistical information. What is the gentleman's judgment as to the necessity of that?

Mr. TABER. They have all the data that they need. They have the set-up that they want. They want to make an allotment, and unless the allotments are made it is perfectly ridiculous to spend all that money.

There are three or four other items that I have not the time to go into. There is the cotton-price-adjustment payment plan, which will be worked out. I think there will be an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] providing for the payment of a fund to provide for the situation where there has been a partial performance of A. A. A. contracts by the farmer. There are some other items that I must skip over for want of time. There is the salary and expense of the Bituminous Coal Commission. That is the Guffey Act. I propose when we reach that item to move to strike it out, because I believe that bill, like the Potato Act, is unconstitutional, and we ought not to enforce a law which is manifestly unconstitutional.

With reference to the reciprocal tariffs, there is an appropriation of $30,350 for the purpose of enabling the Secretary of State, without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations, to operate that act and further reduce the duties on agricultural and other commodities in this country. I do not know what the object of the administration is, but certainly the result of these things is bad. The tariff on oats has been reduced from 16 cents to 8 cents per bushel. Today oats are 27 cents a bushel, while a year ago they were between 50 cents and 55 cents. Corn, which went up from somewhere around 40 cents and 50 cents a bushel to $1 a year ago because of the drought, is now around 83 cents a bushel. The tariff upon corn has been reduced from 25 cents to 10 cents. The tariff upon apples has been reduced from 25 cents to 15 cents. The tariff upon strawberries, blueberries, and hay has been reduced so that the market for most of the farmers in the northern section of the country is in danger of being wiped out by these Canadian importations.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. CULKIN. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means this morning referred to the present prices of dairy products. Is it not a fact that the effect of tariff reductions under these treaties will not come on for some 3 or 4 months yet? They have just gone into effect.

Mr. TABER. Already they are being felt, and the prices are lower than a year ago, but prices will be terribly depressed by the 1st of May.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. When this particular item in the bill is reached I propose to move to strike out the $30,350. The items to which I refer represent a very large portion of the controversial items in the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman state what is the attitude of New York business on the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreement?

Mr. TABER. I do not know what the attitude of New York City business is.

Mr. McCORMACK. I mean business in general.

Mr. TABER. The general business element is hit in this way: In my own home town we have a branch of the International Harvester Co. In Hamilton, Canada, there is a branch of that same organization. This reciprocal-trade agreement will permit the International Harvester Co. to employ Canadian labor at lower prices and operate their Canadian, Hamilton, Ontario, plant to the exclusion of the one in my home town. That is the way it hits ordinary business in the country part of New York State. As far as New York City goes, as far as the big importers go, I do not know, but this tariff deal with Canada has been made with the idea of practically putting the dairy farmer and the fruit farmer in northern New York and northern Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin on the rocks. On top of that, there are a great many other things in it which will hit the business people, all except the importer. Merchants and traders will be hit, because when the farmer has less income he will have less money to spend in trade. Therefore I do not see how any intelligent New York businessman could do otherwise than oppose this Canadian reciprocal-tariff agreement.

Mr. McCORMACK. I am interested in view of the fact that the editorial comment of New England newspapers, particularly the Republican press, is most decidedly favorable to the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreement. I am curious to have the gentleman's viewpoint.

Mr. TABER. I would say that probably those newspapers have not been well informed on what the thing would do.

Mr. McCORMACK. What, Republican newspapers?

Mr. TABER. I say that as to any newspapers which would make such a statement.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Might I make the further suggestion that the distinguished gentleman from New York scrutinize closely the answer to the first question that was asked him with reference to the effect of the devaluation of gold on the tariff.

Mr. TABER. It depends on what kind of dollars and cents you are talking about.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take much time of the Committee, but to answer, if I can, any questions about the bill and to make a few comments on the state of the Union, probably, in passing, insofar as they might reply to some other like remarks which have been made this morning.

First, I reiterate what my colleagues on the committee have said about the absence of our chairman. The illness of Mr. BUCHANAN today is very probably directly traceable to the long and arduous duties performed in the preparation of this bill and other measures coming before the Committee on Appropriations. He knew the bill as no other member of the committee knows it. It provides a lot of money for a lot of different activities, and every activity in its most minute detail had his careful and considered study, and I know that all of us are very happy that he is recuperating, and I ask the indulgence of the House in our feeble effort to take his place.

My very good friend from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY, seemingly felt an impulse to again voice his indignation over the sad plight of the country and to remind the country that he is still today of the opinion that the Democrats have ruined it, spoiling it, I think he said, with the spoils system.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think the Democrats could possibly have spoiled the country, because it was "might' nigh ruint" when we got it.

I say this with a smile to my Republican friends, because I do not get bitter in my partisanship; the only other thing that might have been done by our political adversaries before the Democrats came into power was to have lighted a match to the torch and started the fires burning upon the hilltops of this country. Twelve or fifteen million able-bodied unemployed citizens and 30,000,000 farmers of America would not have supinely, and without protest, submitted very much longer to the economic system fostered by the administration which had then utterly collapsed, and which had brought them into this poverty and destitution. As the President said upon that plaza, "The old order has failed, and a new order must save the country if it is to be saved." [Applause.]

Now, what is the use for Congressmen to come down here in the Well of this House and make political speeches? Our old grandmothers had a saying that sums up the situation: "The proof of the pudding is in the eating of it." Now, what is the use for you to stand here and tell me that President Roosevelt has ruined the country when I can point you to every responsible news sheet that you can find in the reading room today, which will tell you how much better off we are today than we were when the Democrats came into power? [Applause.]

Now, do not make any mistake about the fact that the American people are not going to know that. If some of the acts of this Congress have been declared unconstitutional, some of them which some of you gentlemen on the Republican side, in good conscience and good faith voted for also, it was but evidence of the fact that the legislative and executive branches of the Government were trying to administer the dose and apply the remedy that they thought the people of the country needed. About the Constitution: I believe, with Abraham Lincoln, that the people of this country are going to make the Government what they want it to be, and that as the years come and go they are going to fashion their Government to fit the people, and not try to fit the people to some static form of government. I am still a Jeffersonian Democrat in my belief that it would not be a bad idea sometime to consider the Constitution.

Some of you gentlemen are prone to twit us with quotations from Jefferson. Why do you not remind us of the philosophy of Jefferson who said that the Constitution ought to be revised every 30 years? Now, that would shock you, would it not? That would jar the preserves of some of my friends on the Republican side, if some Democrat would suggest a convention to revise the Constitution. Why do we have to hide behind a bush when we say today that the Constitution, in few fundamental respects, resembles the ancient document first handed to us? Some of our most precious heritages and liberties under that document, as we live under it today, were written there in the amendments placed to it and not by the forefathers.

Mr. WOODRUM. Ten of them in a row, as my friend from Illinois interpolates. So let us be about the business which sent us here and try to pass this legislation and adjourn Congress, and then go out on to the hustings in a good sportsmanlike way and try to convince the country, if we can, as to which party is entitled to leadership in the years to come.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] spoke to you about the Civil Service Commission and the merit system. He mentioned the fact that a great many people had been employed outside of the civil service. That is probably true. I believe, as I stated a few days ago, in the merit system, but I venture this suggestion, that if you go down into the several departments where they are performing work, and many of them are working day and night trying to carry out the duties that this Congress has laid at their door, you will find as much efficiency and as much patriotic loyalty in the people who are working there as you will find anywhere, irrespective of whether they have been certified by the Civil Service Commission or not. If the Civil Service Commission had undertaken to hold long, complex examinations, with their mental tests and their psychological tests and their thousand other kinds of tests, for all of these temporary employees that there are here in Washington, we would have been appropriating billions instead of a few hundred thousand dollars for the Civil Service Commission.

The gentleman from Missouri particularly mentioned The National Archives. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] mentioned the fact that when the original appropriation was up a year or two ago that provision was placed in the law. It may be, and it ought to be, I might say, that down in The National Archives you will find more Democrats than Republicans; but, if that is true, Mr. Chairman, it is no more true than the fact that over at the Congressional Library across the Plaza the Republicans are more largely represented. You have heard of the proverbial camel and the needle's eye. Try to find a Democrat in the Congressional Library or get one in there. Aside from that, those two kindred organizations have never been regarded as political spoils of either party; and I agree to that. A few years ago, when an effort was being made by one of our colleagues in this House, and on my side of the aisle, to pass a resolution putting the Congressional Library on political patronage, I, along with many other Members on my side of the aisle, opposed it and helped to defeat it, because it is a high-class organization of specially trained people, who should be selected for their fitness for the positions and not be made the football of either political party, no matter which is in power.

Now, gentlemen, as far as this bill is concerned, let me say a few words. I do not want to consume the time of the committee. Of course, as we know, this is the reincarnated spirit, we might say, of the bill H. R. 9215, which had such a spectacular and sad ending in the Senate of the United States.

A lot of things have happened to this legislation since then. It carried at that time a total of $103,272,705.94. It carries today $58,204,100.44, or a total gross reduction in the amount of the bill, taking out two new items which are in it now which were not in it then, of $47,708,375.50.

You will find in the report, if you are interested to look at it, on page 3, two very illuminating statements which thoroughly explain the make-up of the bill. You will find, of course, that by far the major item in this amount of $58,000,000 is the matter of $42,664,500 for the Social Security Act. You will find, then, one or two other major items running over a million dollars. The item for the Soil Conservation Service calls for $6,284,000. This item was $13,000,000 in the bill which failed of passage in the Senate, but by the use of allotments and some curtailment of the program this particular item has been reduced to $6,284,000.

You will find, then, for the enforcement of the Potato Act, which will shortly be laid in your lap for your careful and tender consideration and disposal, the sum of $1,250,000; for the interstate-commerce regulation of motor vehicles $1,035,000, which I may say is just about half what the Interstate Commerce Commission and our distinguished fellow colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] think will be sufficient or adequate to carry that law through, but the committee wanted them to start on a conservative basis, and we cut them down to this extent.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] will offer an amendment, so I am informed, appropriating $296,185,000, making it available to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the purpose of enabling them to make the payments to the farmers who had in good faith complied with the A. A. A. contracting program up to January 6, 1936, which was the effective date of the Supreme Court decision. There are a great many other items in the bill which I have not time to discuss. There has been a lot of debate on the bill, and I imagine there will be a lot more debate under the 5-minute rule.

A question was asked regarding the Social Security Act. May I say to my colleagues that the medical profession have a method of treatment that is oftentimes very effective, which they speak of as counter-irritation. If you have a pain in a certain part of your anatomy, by creating a pain on the outside through the application of an irritant, you can often divert the pain that is troubling you. A very eminent physician, one of my guests, is in the gallery today and is probably laughing at my feeble explanation of this method, but here is what I am thinking about: There is so much discussion now about plans for pensions for old age, and Congress is being importuned to provide them. In heaven's name, gentlemen, have we not done it? Can you not say to your costituents that we have passed an act which provides a pension, that it is on the statute books, that Congress is appropriating the money? Can you not wire back home tonight to some of your constituents, "I am happy to say to you that I voted today for $42,000,000 to help pay old-age pensions and relief of dependent children, and as soon as the machinery is put into operation the checks will go to you"?

That is a fact, that is real, that is not something to happen in the future held out to you as a bait. Of course, it is not $200 a month; it never will be $200 a month. Nobody who advocates such a thing believes it possible of accomplishment, but it is a plan economically sound that can be carried out, that can be justified, that can be paid for out of the revenues of the Treasury. The plan is before the Congress for such reasonable revision from time to time as they may wish to make.

So may I throw out this little bit of solace and consolation to those of my colleagues who are troubled about this particular matter of providing for the old folks at home: We have provided for them. One of the crowning acts, one that will go down in history as a great act of the great President who is now in the White House, is the Social Security Act, which provides a sane and economically sound method of approaching this sociological problem. [Applause.] So let us use the old medical idea of a little counter-irritation. The more they talk about $200 a month, let us speed up the machinery that will bring these little checks in to the people, that will afford the most of them an adequate and a reasonable pittance in their old age.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] is very important. I wondered if the gentleman would not take time to read it and to give us his views on it in advance of its being offered under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. WOODRUM. I want to be perfectly frank. I confess to my distinguished friend from Indiana that I have not seen the final draft of the amendment. The gentleman from Texas, an authority on the subject, as we all recognize, has given much thought and study to this problem, and when the time comes I am sure we shall be liberal enough to give him ample time to explain the amendment that the House may fully understand it.

I think it has been shown to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman from Indiana mean the one with reference to the A. A. A.?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman from Virginia will yield, I think I can tell him what it provides. The amendment provides for payment to those who have made A. A. A. contracts of the amount that the contract calls for where there has been performance on the part of the farmer.

Mr. PETTENGILL. May I ask: Does it apply to crops already in the ground or to crops hereafter to be put in the ground under contract?

Mr. TABER. Only where there has been performance on the part of the farmer.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman mean complete performance or partial performance?

Mr. TABER. It would have to be partial performance.

Mr. WOODRUM. Prior to January 6.

Mr. TABER. Prior to January 6, 1936. It does not relate to any new contract at all. I may say that the gentleman from Texas, at my suggestion, incorporated in the amendment language which I believe will make it absolutely certain that nothing is going to be paid to anyone who had not at least partially performed his contract prior to the 6th of January.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am thoroughly in accord with the moral obligation of the Government to the farmers under those contracts, provided it does not apply to future plantings.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I presume the gentleman from New York means that a farmer who is in the business of raising winter wheat, who has sold his wheat for 1936 and who has kept the amount of his acreage down to what the contract calls for, will be entitled to receive benefits under this appropriation?

Mr. TABER. There is no question whatever about that.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time and ask that the Clerk read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Public printing and binding: For the printing and distribution of the Federal Register and such documents as may be required to be printed and distributed by the Division of the Federal Register during the fiscal year 1936, in accordance with the provisions of Public Act No. 220, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved July 26, 1935, $100,000: Provided, That the provisions of section 2 of the Federal Register Act shall become effective 30 days after said appropriations become available, and the publication of the Federal Register shall begin within 2 business days thereafter.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to make an inquiry rather than indulge in a criticism in reference to an item we have just passed. This has to do with the House restaurant. May I inquire whether any effort has ever been made in connection with the House restaurant to lessen the noise of rattling dishes, floor noises, and so forth? It seems to me it is a question that has to do with the acoustic properties. It is perfectly terrible at noon to go down into that room with the idea of getting a meal there in view of the hubbub and noise which exists. You do not find that in any other restaurant, and I think the fault lies in the room itself.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman has raised a very interesting question that should undoubtedly be disposed of by the Congress. I shall be glad to join the gentleman in such resolution if the gentleman thinks it is constitutional. I am afraid, however, it might be one of those that might be attacked on the ground of constitutionality. If the Members make too much fuss when they eat their soup——

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not that kind of a noise. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I am afraid we might run into a constitutional question.

Mr. TREADWAY. It is not that kind of a noise. Undoubtedly the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] can give us some enlightenment, and I yield to him.

Mr. WARREN. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that Mr. Lynn, the Architect of the Capitol, has been making an investigation. This appropriation is to recondition the kitchens and does not provide anything for its maintenance.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman knows my anxiety about economies. I am wondering if a little larger sum should be added it would permit of taking care of this room where people eat as well as taking care of the room where the food is prepared for them? I am serious in this inquiry, and I think my colleagues will agree it is very objectionable to have to eat in such a noisy place.

Mr. WARREN. The trouble is there is not a proper space down there for conducting a restaurant. I do not know where we could get more room. We have studied that time after time. The restaurant is confined to cramped, small quarters, and the gentleman knows that they are rushed to death for about 2 hours every day. However, the Architect is looking into the whole question.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am very glad to have that report.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses: For three Board members, and for all other authorized and necessary expenditures of the National Labor Relations Board in performing the duties imposed by law or in pursuance of law, including rent and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, repairs and alterations, communications, contract stenographic reporting service, office supplies and equipment, law books, books of reference, newspapers, periodicals, and garage rentals, fiscal year 1936, $275,000: Provided, That the Board may procure supplies and services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5) when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $50.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 7, line 21, after the figures "1936", strike out "$275,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$375,000."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have been in communication with the National Labor Relations Board, and they seem well satisfied with their appropriation for the coming fiscal year; but they state that between now and July 1, with the number of cases they have coming into their regional offices, they will not be able to take care of them expeditiously unless they get more than the $275,000 allowed in this bill.

The average regional office contains three people—a director, an attorney, and a stenographer.

Take, for instance, Boston. The office at Boston takes care of all the New England States, and they have, I believe, four people instead of three, because they have an assistant there. They have to take care of all the cases which come before this regional board from New England with four people. In Atlanta, since last October, there have been a number of cases filed, and up to December last no action taken on such cases, because they have not had the help to consider the cases brought to them, including complaints brought in from labor organizations and from employees of different factories who have filed complaints with the regional board.

I do not think we are asking for much in requesting $100,000 to take care of this organization between now and July 1, when they will receive their regular appropriation for the coming fiscal year.

Labor is looking to this Board for relief. You have been reading in the papers about various injunctions. One injunction was granted out in Kansas City, and in the last 2 or 3 days we have had three injunctions against labor refused.

This is going to be a vital issue before the country. I think these offices should be well manned, and we should have more than three or four people in each one of these offices to take care of the cases filed with them. They have lawyers in these offices and some of them have cases involving reports of 1,000 pages, with practically no one to take care of them. Three people cannot take care of an office that has to provide for six different States. They must have help if we are going to make this law one that will function. I do not think any Member of the House wants a skeleton organization of three people to take care of any complaints you may have in your district or in your State. If you turn over to this Board a complaint from the employees of a factory, you expect to get results, and you do not want to have just three people handling the entire territory so that you will have to wait 3 or 4 months, in many instances, before you can get any relief whatever.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman believe that the amount he has asked for will be sufficient?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; they believe $100,000 will take care of them until July 1, but I believe it is absolutely necessary for the Board to have this money if it is to function properly. Of course, it can go along in a slipshod manner, but if you file a complaint you will have to wait for 3 or 4 months, and we do not want that kind of administration, because the workers will then say that the Government is simply gypping them; that the Government will give funds for all other departments but is not willing to give sufficient funds to take care of this law which we have passed.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CURLEY. Has the gentleman any idea of the number of complaints that have been filed with the National Labor Relations Board to date?

Mr. CONNERY. I know there have been a great many, but I do not know the exact figure.

Mr. CURLEY. As a matter of fact, there have been so many complaints filed that the personnel now allotted to the National Labor Relations Board is totally insufficient for it to function properly.

Mr. CONNERY. Absolutely. We have cases in Massachusetts before the Board in Boston and they cannot even look at them, let alone go out and have their attorneys appear in court and defend them against injunctions that are being brought by your John W. Davises and some more of your big corporation lawyers. If the Government is to defend these cases and make this law function properly, they have got to have money and they have got to have well-trained people in these offices who can prosecute and defend these cases for the Government.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, for the period ending the 28th of December 1935, there were 287 cases pending with which the Board was unable to cope due to insufficient help.

Mr. CONNERY. They cannot handle these cases because they have not the help, and I believe the Congress wants the Board to function as it wants other boards of the Government to function. The Board tells me they need $100,000. Of course, when they go before the Appropriations Committee they are tied, because the Budget gives them a certain amount and they are not supposed——

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. They are not supposed, in fact, they are not allowed, to go before the Appropriations Committee and say that this is not enough money for them. The Budget allows a certain figure and they are supposed to stand by that figure. However, they actually need this money in order for the Board to function properly, and I hope the House will pass the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, there is no disposition on the part of the Appropriations Committee or the Budget to do more with the Labor Relations Board than it tries to do with every other agency of the Government, especially a new agency, and that is to insist that it grow and develop and build up its organization slowly and conservatively.

My friend is in error when he says they cannot come before the Appropriations Committee without having their hands tied. They do come before the Appropriations Committee, and in this particular instance, this very matter was discussed.

Mr. CONNERY. I do not mean they cannot come before the Appropriations Committee, but they are gagged when they do appear before the committee.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; they are not gagged in any sense of the word. They are not supposed voluntarily to suggest that they have had a budget cut, but, as chairman of the committee—and I think every other subcommittee does the same thing—we ask them how much they requested of the Budget, and, invariably, we found during the consideration of this bill that the Budget has cut these bureaus from 25 to 60 and 70 percent, but did not cut the Labor Relations Board a nickel.

My friend also states that they are satisfied with the appropriation for 1937, which our committee has given them and which the House has passed. I call his attention to the fact that that appropriation gives them $60,000 a month. The appropriation which we give them in this bill for the remainder of this fiscal year amounts to a little over $60,000 a month. We deliberately gave them for the remainder of the fiscal year the pro-rata part of what they will have for the next fiscal year.

Now, give them $100,000 more for the period from now until July next, and what happened? They have $20,000 a month more between now and July 1 to build up personnel, and what happens to them on July 1? When their annual appropriation comes in they must, of necessity, reduce personnel.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. When they came for the appropriation for the coming fiscal year they did not know these hundreds of cases coming in. They are in now and they want this money to take care of them.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Board of Tax Appeals, the Securities and Exchange Commission, the Interstate Commerce Commission—everyone brings you a docket of thousands of cases—get down on their knees and beg for more money and personnel that they may bring their work up to date. We are doing with the National Labor Relations Board just what we are doing with others, giving them ample appropriations to begin functioning, and experience shows that their work will be provided for because Congress will be here and can appropriate for them.

The committee has no desire to hamper the work of the National Labor Relations Board, but we do want them to go conservatively and safely in order that we may all fulfill our obligations and hold down the department expenditures of the Government.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Gentlemen of the Committee, there is one phase about the situation with regard to the National Labor Relations Board which many of us seem to underestimate or entirely disregard.

That is, that throughout the country there is a concerted drive being made against the National Labor Relations Board and against the Wagner-Connery Act.

This drive is being conducted on all fronts. First, a committee of 86 lawyers, substituting themselves for the Supreme Court, declared the law to be unconstitutional. Then the Liberty League did the same. Only the other day the Associated Press through its counsel, John W. Davis, declared the law unconstitutional in a United States district court.

Thus you can readily see the great need that this Board has for appropriations, in order to adequately meet the onslaught of its powerful enemies I have just enumerated. Then, also, there are hundreds of cases piling up before it. If labor is to have the relief provided for in the Wagner-Connery Act, speedy disposition of these cases is of the essence.

This is a critical period for the Wagner-Connery law. Friends of labor—that is, real friends of labor—should not hesitate a moment in granting this additional $100,000 so that the National Labor Relations Board may effectively fight against these odds.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The 86 lawyers the gentleman refers to last summer were prejudiced and declared against the Wagner-Connery bill, and you cannot fight John W. Davis with the present personnel in the National Labor Relations Board unless you give the Board an opportunity to sit down and function. They say they absolutely need this money.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. That is a correct statement. As I say, the issue is simple. We either want the Wagner-Connery law to be enforced or we do not. We are either friends of this legislation or we are not. If we want even this small relief for labor carried out the only thing to do is to give the National Labor Relations Board the proper instruments with which to fight, sufficient appropriations to obtain adequate personnel so as to expedite the disposition of pending cases and to obtain necessary legal talent to defend the act from the onslaught of Bourbons. This legislation is being tested in practically every district court in the United States today where industry is doing business.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. I am in sympathy with the Labor Relations Board and its efforts, but I want to know whether the gentleman is making this request for this amendment because he has received communications from organizations of labor for this additional $100,000, whether they had a chance to appear before the committee and present their case, or whether the gentleman is asking this because he desires it or because it is needed and he has heard that it is needed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am asking for it for two reasons: First of all, the chairman of the Labor Committee communicated with the National Labor Relations Board and it made the request. Second, because of the accumulation of cases of which I know. Imagine! For the week ending the 28th of December 1935 there was an accumulation of 287 cases. That alone substantiates the need for sufficient appropriations for the National Labor Relations Board to carry on its work and its fight. Of course, the enemies of the Board—the enemies of the Wagner-Connery Act—will vote against necessary appropriations; but I appeal to every friend of the Wagner National Labor Relations Board and every friend of the Wagner-Connery law to stand by this amendment so as to give this Board a real opportunity to do its work and effectively fight the enemies of the Wagner-Connery Act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment. The Committee on Appropriations went into this matter very fully. They listened very patiently for a long time to the members of the Board. The situation is something like this: A number of cases are pending where the constitutionality and the construction of the act is under consideration, but every one of those cases is tried and argued by representatives of the Attorney General's office, and while there is some preliminary work to do in getting this stuff together and preparing it for the Attorney General's office, the trial work and the argument—the men who go up against the lawyers representing those who are trying to throw out of existence the National Labor Relations Board—is done by men who are representatives of the Attorney General's office and not of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Is it not a fact that the preparation of those cases before they get to the Attorney General's office must all be done by attorneys of the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. TABER. Yes; but that is not a matter which requires such highly skilled attorneys as those who go into court and go up against the big lawyers on the other side, and those men are provided for in the Attorney's General's office.

Mr. CONNERY. But in those preliminary hearings before the cases get to the Attorney General's office, in all of these hearings where the manufacturers and labor come in, the work must be done by their own lawyers.

Mr. TABER. In the preliminary hearings, yes; but the only case where they have to go up against important lawyers, high-priced lawyers on the other side, is in the courts where the Attorney General represents the Government. After very careful consideration of this item, the Budget presented an estimate of $275,000. The committee was unanimous in feeling that $275,000 was sufficient to permit this Board to properly function during the remainder of the fiscal year. It was on a basis fully as large as is provided for next year, and that went through on the independent offices appropriation bill without a struggle. It does not seem as if we ought unnecessarily to add to the burdens of the Government here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. This appropriation for the National Labor Relations Board is in an entirely different category from the appropriations for most any other department. There is more involved in this appropriation than there is in almost any other appropriation. There is a human element involved in this. There is the matter of human freedom, which ought to be considered above all else. As the committee hearings reveal, on December 28, 1935, there were 278 cases that were not closed. They were on hand, and Mr. Madden, of the Board, testified that up to that time they had finally disposed of only 159 cases. There are pending 278 cases, nearly twice as many as they have finally disposed of. There is more involved in this than just a few people. Involved in those 278 cases are thousands and thousands of workers. They filed their cases months ago. In some instances they have been waiting 2 and 3 and 4 months, practically since the National Labor Relations Board was established, to have their cases adjudicated. In the interim there has been a good deal of suffering, and there is a great deal of conjecture on the part of the workers as to whether this Labor Relations Board or the law creating it is merely a gesture by the majority party or whether we made a real attempt to set up machinery that would protect the workers in their right to organize. The question of freedom is connected with this appropriation.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman spoke of the question of suffering. In the Lion Shoe Co. in my city they have been on strike for the right to organize. They have received no wages. Their families have suffered. That applies in many other instances also.

Mr. WOOD. Yes. That is the case in many instances.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD. I yield.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is not correct when he says that the attorneys of the National Labor Board do not go into court. Under the Wagner-Connery Act the attorneys for the Board and not the attorneys attached to the Department of Justice must go into court and defend the act.

Mr. WOOD. The Labor Relations Board is asking for this $100,000. That is a very small amount of money when we consider the element that is connected with this appropriation. It is a matter of the freedom of the workers to organize. We attempted to do that in the enactment of the National Recovery Act. You all know what a tremendous battle ensued upon section 7a of that law. The law never was permitted to function property. Now, if we are going to give the workers that right, if we really intend to give them that freedom of action to organize and to bargain collectively, then we certainly do not want to hamper the administration of this law by cutting the appropriation so low that these 278 cases will have to continue on for months and months. I think we ought to expedite every case we can and let the worker know, so that he will have some notion as to whether he is going to be considered under the national labor relations law, and when.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOODRUM) there were—ayes 40, noes 51.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CONNERY and Mr. WOODRUM to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 51, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 7, line 21, after the figures "1936", strike out "$275,000" and insert "$325,000."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, having lost out on the amendment which I offered, for $100,000 increase, I am trying to get $50,000 now instead of $100,000. I think that should be a fair compromise with the Members of the Committee. Fifty thousand dollars will be some help to us in any event and help to take care of these cases which have accumulated before the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Only the other day they had before this Congress a bill to appropriate $125,000 to encourage foreign travel in the United States. It would be a strange thing if we could not raise this $50,000 to help make the Labor Board effective for the workers who are American.

Mr. CONNERY. My friend [Mr. O'MALLEY] is absolutely correct.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does not the gentleman think that the more expeditiously these cases are decided, whatever their merits may be, the better will be industrial relations?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I agree with the gentleman absolutely. The purpose of the Wagner-Connery bill was to bring about harmonious relations between employers and employees. The sooner these cases are settled and off the docket the better it will be.

I spoke about that shoe company in my own city. The workers have been on strike, fighting for their right to organize in their own union. They are out on the streets; they have been throwing stones at strikebreakers; they have the police up there outside of that plant right now. We could do away with such happenings quickly if we could settle these cases quickly. That is what I am after. We want them to have sufficient personnel to take care of these cases promptly.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. Is not this opposition largely a matter of attempting to cripple the Labor Relations Board?

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman mean as indicated by the votes in the House today?

Mr. FORD of California. No; I mean the general opposition.

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, yes. I would not say the vote in the committee indicates that, as it is only natural that the members should want to stand by the committee; but all these suits which are brought are simply to cripple that Board and wipe out of existence the Wagner-Connery bill, because it means a fair deal for labor in industrial relations.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, the law provides that the National Labor Relations Board must take these cases into court?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. Their own attorneys take the cases into court, and all the points involved are touchy points. I have found in my dealings with the Labor Relations Board that they are trying to be just and fair. They will not issue an order unless they are convinced that the case is a clear one for their jurisdiction. They are trying to function conscientiously and ably, and I do not think they should be hamstrung by lack of appropriations. I think we ought to give them at least this $50,000 to aid them in trying to clear up these cases.

Mr. CURLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. CURLEY. If we try to economize on this question now it will cost the country a great deal more later on, will it not?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. I will say to my friend from New York [Mr. CURLEY], the new member of our Labor Committee, that it will cost more than money, it will cause bloodshed, strife, and untold suffering to the workers of the country.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to make it 1 minute.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will accept the amendment. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 1 minute?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago we passed in this House, without one word of protest from all of these gentlemen who are appearing here today, a bill giving this agency $60,000 a month for the next fiscal year. No one has explained here today, nor can they explain why it would be desirable to give them more, proportionately, for the balance of this fiscal year than they are going to have the next fiscal year. All of this stuff about this being some effort to try to cramp the Relations Board or that it is a gesture against labor is "baloney", in the language of a certain statesman from New York. [Applause.] We are going to treat this Board like all other agencies; give them enough money to function, but make them hold down their personnel and conduct their business in an efficient, economical manner.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNERY) there were—ayes 37, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Printing and binding: For all printing and binding for the National Labor Relations Board, fiscal year 1936, $15,000.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, the amount, $15,000; and I use this word merely as a vehicle for my remarks.

I have just received a letter from former Congressman W. E. Evans, of California, pointing out that the widow of Mr. Charles F. Van De Water, who was elected to Congress but who was killed in an automobile accident a few days after his election, has been discriminated against because she has never received any of the compensation usually given to the widows of former Congressmen.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is not in order, that his statements do not relate to the paragraph he sought to amend.

Mr. FISH. I may point out to the gentleman from Alabama that this bill carries two or three items for similar purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But those items are not carried in the paragraph the gentleman sought to amend.

Mr. FISH. But they are in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's remarks must be directed to the amendment offered, under the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FISH. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall have no objection, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman secures permission to proceed out of order, if such a request is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that such a request would be in order.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Cannot the gentleman from New York ask unanimous consent to present the matter he desires?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has that right, but he has not exercised it.

Mr. FISH. I have not exercised it. I want to be heard by the Chair.

Mr. Chairman, it has been the general practice that the Member who moves to strike out the last word may speak upon any topic in the bill. The subject to which I address myself is in this bill, for provision is made on the second page for payment to the widows of three former Members of Congress. I think there should be general latitude in a ruling by the Chair on a proposition of this kind.

I have stricken out the amount, $15,000. I am asking for only $7,500. Certainly on this basis the Chair should grant me some latitude in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman is aware, of course, that certain practices are sometimes indulged in by general consent but if a point of order is made against them, the point of order must be sustained. Debate under the 5-minute rule must be confined to the paragraph under consideration. The paragraph here under consideration relates to the National Labor Relations Board. The gentleman's remarks do not, apparently, refer to this subject matter. The point of order is, therefore, sustained.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FORMATION OF THE CONSTITUTION

To carry out the provisions of the joint resolution entitled, "Joint resolution providing for the preparation and completion of plans for a comprehensive observance of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the formation of the Constitution of the United States", approved August 23, 1935, including payment of obligations heretofore incurred for salaries and expenses, fiscal year 1936, $10,000.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the Members of Congress in connection with this proposed celebration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the writing of the Constitution, that marvelous document written by the great Democrat, Thomas Jefferson, that I do not know anything we could better celebrate or more appropriately celebrate than the anniversary of the writing of the Constitution of the United States. I feel that the Members of Congress should study this document, that the Members should give consideration to every bill that comes before them to the end that we do not pass laws that are contrary to this Jeffersonian document. If in tomorrow's RECORD you will read the speech of a former colleague of ours, James Beck, of Pennsylvania, you will learn a great lesson.

If there is one thing that should be done today by all Americans from the highest official to the lowest citizen, that thing is first to study the Constitution. Then those who hold public office should respect it according to the oath and obligation they have taken.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, what did Jefferson have to do with the Constitution?

Mr. RICH. He was a man who obeyed the Constitution. He was different than the Democrats of the present day. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORD of California. In some respects he did more to disregard it than any other man in America.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendments will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses, Social Security Board: For all authorized and necessary administrative expenses of the Social Security Board in the District of Columbia and in the field, including field offices, in performing the duties imposed upon it in titles I, II, III, IV, VII, IX, and X of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935, including three Board members, an executive director at a salary of $9,500 a year, a director of the old-age benefits division at a salary of $9,000 a year, and other personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; travel expenses, including expenses of attendance at meetings which in the discretion of the Board are necessary for the efficient discharge of its responsibilities; supplies and equipment; services; newspapers, periodicals, and press clippings; law books and other books of reference; alterations and repairs; printing and binding; rentals in the District of Columbia or elsewhere; purchase and exchange, not to exceed $7,500, operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes in the field service, fiscal year 1936, $1,000,000, of which sum such amount as may be necessary shall be available for payment of salaries of the Board members from and including the respective dates upon which they officially assumed duty as such members, and for all other administrative expenses heretofore incurred during the fiscal year 1936 in the administration of all of such titles.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Am I right in presuming that an amendment incorporating the provisions of the McGroarty bill, otherwise known as the Townsend plan, would be held not germane at this point?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not prepared to rule upon the amendment until it is offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smoke regulation and control: For personal services, equipment, instruments, supplies, transportation, and other contingent expenses necessary for the enforcement of the act entitled "An act to prevent the fouling of the atmosphere in the District of Columbia by smoke and other foreign substances, and for other purposes", approved August 15, 1935, fiscal year 1936, $6,250.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONAGHAN: On page 13, line 11, after the figures, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"DEFINITIONS

"The term 'transaction' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include the sale, barter, and/or exchange of either or both real or personal property, including any right, interest, easement, or privilege of commercial value therein or related thereto, whether actually made at the time or only then agreed to be made and whether under executed or executory contract or otherwise; also including all charges for interest, rent commissions, fees, and any other pecuniary benefit of any kind directly or indirectly derived from or for any loan, deposit, rental, lease, pledge, or any other use or forbearance of money or property; and also including the rendering or performance of any service for monetary or other commercially valuable consideration, whether by a person or otherwise, including all personal service, also transportation by any means, and telephone, telegraph, radio, amusement, recreation, education, art, advertising, any public utility, any water rights, and/or any and all other service of any and every kind whatsoever, but excepting and excluding therefrom any single isolated transfer of property of fair value less than $100 which does not arise or occur in the usual course of an established commercial business and excluding any loan, deposit, withdrawal from deposit, hypothecation, or pledge of property or money.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment. As I understand, the amendment offered by the gentleman in substance is the Townsend pension plan. I do not know whether there is any significance to the fact the gentleman offers this amendment at the end of the smoke regulation and control section or not. It seems to me that is a very appropriate place to offer it. Of course, I do not mean any offense to the distinguished gentleman from Montana, but I do make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule.

It is quite evident that the amendment offered is new legislation, which is not in order in connection with an appropriation bill; therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Has the Clerk concluded the reading of the section dealing with the Social Security Board? I did not hear the last word in that section. I did not hear the Clerk conclude the reading of the entire section with reference to the Social Security Board. I wish to offer an amendment to the section.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Clerk has read that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read down to and including line 11 on page 13.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to the section dealing with the Social Security Board in order that I may offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be discourteous to the gentleman from Wisconsin, but I cannot consent to return to sections we have passed. If that is done in one instance, the gentleman knows very well that others will come in tomorrow with amendments to previous sections. I am therefore forced to object.

Mr. O'MALLEY. We have only gone one paragraph beyond that section.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have no objection to the gentleman making a statement in reference thereto, if he so desires.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I wish to offer an amendment on the salary provision for the director of old-age benefits in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sea-food inspectors: For personal services of sea-food inspectors designated to examine and inspect sea food and the production, packing, and labeling thereof upon the application of any packer of any sea food for shipment or sale within the jurisdiction of the Federal Food and Drugs Act, in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to amend section 10A of the Federal Food and Drugs Act of June 30, 1906, as amended", approved August 27, 1935 (49 Stat. 871), fiscal year 1936, $33,000, payable from receipts from fees under such act.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the item that has just been read, having to do with sea-food inspectors, provides for payment out of receipts from funds collected in the enforcement of that act. Since this has been incorporated in this bill, the Department of Agriculture and interested parties are of the opinion that perhaps this language would operate as a limitation on their right to administer the act and it is unnecessary to carry this item in the bill. I therefore ask unanimous consent that this section may be stricken from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SOIL CONSERVATION SERVICE

Salaries and expenses: For carrying into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of land resources against soil erosion, and for other purposes", approved April 27, 1935, including the hire, with or without personal services, of boats and work animals and animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles and equipment, and the construction of such buildings as in the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture are required to carry out the provisions of said act, fiscal year 1936, $6,284,000: Provided, That in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, any funds made available to the Soil Conservation Service from the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 may be expended for the employment of skilled and unskilled labor and foremen without regard to the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended: Provided, That no building shall be erected hereunder at a cost in excess of $2,500 except the following: 10 at not to exceed $8,000 each, 24 at not to exceed $5,000 each, 11 at not to exceed $3,750 each, and 1 at not to exceed $30,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WARREN: On page 16, after line 5, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For the purpose of collecting and disseminating useful information and data with respect to potato production and marketing within the United States to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture, the sum of $1,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936: Provided, That no part of such fund will be used for the enforcement of the Potato Act of 1935."

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order on the amendment just offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FULLER. The amendment just offered is not germane. The bill under consideration is an appropriation bill which appropriates money to carry out legislation that has already been enacted and which is now in force and effect. This is a distinct effort toward new legislation. It calls for an investigation, based upon no law that is now in existence and is not part and parcel of an appropriation bill. Therefore, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, in the first place I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment is offered under the heading "Department of Agriculture", beginning on page 14. Title 5, executive departments, Government offices and employees, chapter 9, sections 511 to 564, inclusive, establishes the Department of Agriculture. Section 512 establishes the executive department and Secretary. Section 514 defines the general duties of the Secretary of Agriculture, as follows:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall procure and preserve all information concerning agriculture which he can obtain by means of books and correspondence, and by practical and scientific experiments, accurate records of which experiments shall be kept in his office, by the collection of statistics, and by any other appropriate means within his power; he shall collect new and valuable seeds and plants; shall test, by cultivation, the value of such of them as may require such tests; shall propogate such as may be worthy of propagation and shall distribute them among agriculturists.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment offered by me is for an appropriation that is plainly and clearly authorized by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COOPER of Tennessee). The Chair is prepared to rule unless the gentleman from Virginia desires to be heard.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is to that part of the bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. This would necessarily relate to the organic law creating the Department of Agriculture. The Chair has examined, in the brief time permitted him, the law establishing the Department of Agriculture. The organic act creating the Department may be found in title V, section 511, United States Code, and contains this provision.

Establishing of departments. There shall be at the seat of Government a Department of Agriculture, the general design and duties of which shall be to acquire and to diffuse among the people of the United States useful information on subjects connected with agriculture, in the most general and comprehensive sense of that word—

And so forth.

It occurs to the Chair that the specific language contained in the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture would clearly authorize an appropriation for the purpose sought to be accomplished by the amendment here offered. The pending bill is an appropriation bill, and the part of the bill now under consideration relates to appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. The Chair therefore feels that the amendment is germane and that the appropriation is authorized by existing law. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM and Mr. FULLER rose.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a further point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment provides for an appropriation unauthorized by law, and I should like to be heard briefly on the point.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I made the point of order that it was not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be pleased to hear the gentleman, but that is the very point the Chair just passed on by reading the provision of the organic act creating the Department of Agriculture. The Chair held that the amendment is in order in view of that law.

Mr. TABER. I thought the point of order involved the question of germaneness.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair passed on both questions in ruling on the previous point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. O'MALLEY) there were—ayes 121, noes 14.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 10464, the Supplemental Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1936, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. HAINES (at the request of Mr. FADDIS), on account of important business.

Mr. RISK, for 7 days, on account of illness in family.

Mr. TERRY, for today, on account of business.

LOCAL LAW ENFORCEMENT IN RELATION TO NATIONAL CRIME

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech of J. Edgar Hoover. I received permission to do this yesterday, but it involved more than two pages of the RECORD. I have received a report from the Public Printer, and I therefore renew my request.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman let the House know what it is going to cost to publish it?

Mr. CONNERY. One hundred and two dollars.

Mr. RICH. Is it worth it?

Mr. CONNERY. I believe it is worth far more than that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of J. Edgar Hoover, Director, Federal Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, before the Sheriffs and Peace Officers Association of Oklahoma, at Tulsa, Okla., January 13, 1936.

It is especially pleasing to me to address you gentlemen, the sheriffs and peace officers of Oklahoma. I have long been eager for an opportunity to discuss with you upon a common basis the various problems which arise in the enforcement of law and apprehension and detection of criminals. While the crime problem is primarily local, yet it bears elements which make it a potential national menace. We must regard all crime, no matter how petty, as a thing of major importance; we must look upon any infraction of the law as a possible local firebrand which may have its reactions throughout the country. Crime no longer is a menace of purely municipal, county, or State limitations. Like the prairie fires which once swept this region, starting from a tiny blaze and raging with the first sweep of the wind into instruments of major disaster, crime of today may begin with a petty infraction and, within seemingly insignificant space of time, encompass every form of outlawry.

I have in mind a number of cases which, no doubt, are familiar to all of you. There is the instance of Wilbur Underhill, who began as a petty bootlegger, who went from this to thievery and burglary, and progressed onward along the path of crime to multiple murder, all within the space of a few years. I remember "Pretty Boy" Floyd, who also started as a petty larceny law evader and who ended that career after a reign of terror as one of the most feared desperadoes of America. The history of practically every criminal of major importance who has come to the attention of you gentlemen of law enforcement has a background of minor juvenile and even adult infractions. Therefore, each one of these men—and, I must add, some women—forms a living comparison to the simile which I drew of the prairie fire—a spark, a tiny blaze, and then wholesale destruction.

The part which the local officer plays in national enforcement is a tremendous one. It is his job to attempt to stamp out these sparks and, failing in that, to extinguish the blaze before it gets beyond control. That there are instances when these attempts fail does not, to my mind, mean that there has been inefficiency, that there has been a lack of interest or a fading of enthusiasm for the upholding of the law. It brings into the picture certain malignant elements which we all must recognize and which we all must band together in a concerted effort to eradicate. I refer particularly to the stultifying influence of politics.

Time after time, as all you gentlemen know, courageous officers have arrested young men and young women, charging them with some minor or major offense. A case has been carefully worked up, there is sufficient evidence for a conviction, and certainly sufficient reasons why this culprit should be made to realize that after all the law should be a majestic thing and that crime should not be countenanced in the community. However, almost immediately this honest officer finds himself embroiled in the efforts of numerous individuals whose main desire is not to see that justice is done, not to protect the community against infractions of the law, not to assist officers sworn to uphold their duty, but, through the efforts of some none-too-honorable attorneys, through the power of the vote, through the influence of local and State politicians, to nullify every effort which has been put forth by the law-enforcement officials. We find that this attempt to veto the law proceeds throughout all efforts which are made to adequately teach the lesson that crime should not pay. Its malignant influence creeps into the courts, it creeps through the bars of the penitentiaries, it makes its insidious way into the meetings of pardon and parole boards, and it practically places a medal of honor upon the man who can defeat the law and get away with it.

I believe that one of our greatest duties is to give the widest publicity to the efforts of politicians who seek to degrade law enforcement. I believe that there are enough honest citizens in our communities who, if they knew the truth about this tremendous pressure of gangrenous politics upon the most important phase of our lives—the protection and happiness of our homes—that a revolt would come about, giving the law-enforcement officer the freedom he needs in pursuit, detection, apprehension, and punishment, and the peace of mind which should be his, but which never can exist so long as he is harried by politicians who constantly threaten him should he have the temerity to arrest or attempt to prosecute a person under their protection. In such instances of local crime violations we have that spark and tiny flame about which I have spoken and which later leads to the sweeping destruction of the prairie fire.

I have mentioned local cases because they are excellent examples of what I desire to show. "Pretty Boy" Floyd, for instance, in the first analysis, was a local criminal; in the final analysis he was a potential menace to all of America, and thus the problems which I discuss with you are of vital interest to everyone throughout the United States, for what applies in Oklahoma applies equally from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf of Mexico to Canada. The problem everywhere is the same; small-town criminals of today become the dangerous public enemies of tomorrow. The scope, the magnitude of crime as it exists reaches staggering figures. Last year in the United States there was an estimated total of 1,445,581 serious crimes. May I repeat that? In 1 year alone almost one and a half million major crimes were committed against the citizens of this country. In other words, there was crime of desperate proportions—auto theft, burglary, aggravated assault, robbery, rape, manslaughter, and murder—committed against one of every 84 persons in this country, and few, indeed, were the criminals who did not begin in some petty way.

Returning to "Pretty Boy" Floyd, we find him at first confining his efforts to the small town in which he lived, then his activities spread to the county, then he sallied forth into various parts of the State. He moved into Missouri, into Kentucky. We find him going onward into Ohio, back down to Arkansas, further to New York State, ranging over thousands of miles, even as a predatory animal ranges over a game trail. All of us know only too well that there is a beaten track of criminality moving from the Gulf of Mexico to the Canadian border, with side shoots which often reach to the coast lines of the Atlantic and the Pacific. Crime, when it becomes a truly predatory affair, knows no boundaries. However, the harassed officer who must pursue that criminal finds himself blocked by statutes and laws at city, county, or State lines. Therefore, in the apprehension of these depredatory characters, it becomes necessary to overcome almost insurmountable obstacles. If the pursuit by an officer must stop at a county line, then indeed law is outwitted unless the officer of the next county takes up the chase, and the officers of other States assist, plus the action of such organizations as the Federal Bureau of Investigation, of which I am proud to be the head. The old adage of the chain being no stronger than its weakest link is here exemplified. Let cooperation falter and the chase indeed becomes a difficult one.

I am proud indeed to say that the cooperation of local, county, and State law-enforcement officials of Oklahoma with the representatives of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has been of the highest order. We in the Bureau feel our task often is much easier with gentlemen such as yourselves than it is in several large metropolitan areas where the heavy hand of politics is constantly at work, where petty jealousies are allowed to interfere with absolute efficiency, and where publicity-seeking officials sometimes find a greater reward in seeing their names in the paper than they do in knowing that an arch criminal has been brought to justice. We remember, with affection and deep regard, the magnificent record of Chief Olin Reed, of McAlester, Okla., who gave his life in the cause of cooperation.

There was no order or command which sent Olin Reed to assist the Federal officers who made the arrest of Frank Nash at Hot Springs, Ark. There was no greed for notoriety. There was no impelling urge of political expediency. Chief Reed knew Frank Nash by sight. He felt that he could render a service to the people of the United States by pointing out to the Federal officers this man whose field of crime, incidentally, had encompassed most of America. So, as a fellow officer, he went along and as a fellow officer he fell beside Federal agents and local police under the vicious assault of gangster-impelled machine-gun bullets at the Union Station Plaza in Kansas City, and as a fellow officer we revere him and respect his memory.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation believes that the secret of crime eradication lies in solidarity and the combined linking of all law-enforcement agencies. Much already has been done along this line, and with every forging of a new link in this chain of cooperation we find an added impetus in the war against the criminal.

Until several months ago the chasing down of a bank robber was wholly a local affair. This often meant that the task fell upon a community which could ill afford the tremendous expense necessary in these days to continue a pursuit which might last for years and extend through numerous States. Then Congress passed a law which allowed the Federal Bureau of Investigation to cooperate with local law-enforcement officials in the running down of predatory criminals who commit offenses against national and Federal Reserve System banks. In a comparatively short time the number of robberies has taken a drop of more than 50 percent. In other words, cohesion has been developed, a working arrangement by which both local and Federal enforcement agencies may pool their interests upon a common pursuit, and I am indeed proud of what has been accomplished.

In this connection may I direct your attention to the phenomenal growth of the Identification Division of the Bureau, which owes its existence to the wholehearted cooperation of such persons as yourselves? This Identification Division is not some mysterious affair which takes fingerprints out of thin air. They come from the crossroads of America, from the villages, from the towns, cities, and metropolitan centers, to be concentrated in Washington, and there to form a vast cross-index of over 5,500,000 evidences of law infraction, waiting always to bring to justice the man who tries to outwit the forces of law enforcement. This is a partnership, a contract by which a law-enforcement official agrees to furnish honestly and efficiently the fingerprints of persons who are arrested in his district. In return for this, payment is made by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the careful, honest, and efficient filing of these fingerprints and the watchfulness necessary to immediately identify similar fingerprints should they come in from any part of America. Thus the man who is a fugitive from Tulsa is identified in St. Paul. An escape from Leavenworth is found in New York, and so on, not only throughout America but throughout the world, for identifications have been made on arrested persons from as far away as Cairo, Egypt, and British South Africa.

Moreover, a new and stronger partner of law enforcement is growing up in Washington, the Crime Laboratory, where experts in chemistry, ballistics, and other forms of scientific detection and pursuit are at the service of localities. I hope the time will come when the services of the charlatans or so-called professional experts who appear as witnesses solely for the money involved may become a thing of the past. The Crime Laboratory of the Federal Bureau of Investigation has no opinions other than those which are the results of the application of cold, mathematical science. It reports innocence as well as guilt, and there is no power—monetary, political, or otherwise—which can cause it to deviate from that process.

Continuing its desire to place every possible aid in the hands of efficient law-enforcement officers there has been built up in our Bureau a single fingerprint file of the known public enemies of this country, thus making identification swiftly possible in the event of major crimes committed by persistent offenders.

I feel that justice should be rendered where justice is due, particularly in the field of law enforcement; and in speaking as modestly as possible of the work of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, I conceive it proper to say that the results of our work have in great measure been made possible by the splendidly enthusiastic and far-sighted interest, support, and encouragement of the Attorney General of the United States, the Honorable Homer S. Cummings, whose greetings I bring you today. At the inception of his incumbency as Attorney General he made it clear that the work of the Federal Bureau of Investigation must be carried on without regard to any outside, complicating interests, political or otherwise. His keen mind instinctively grasped the necessity for more comprehensive legislative measures, and he has labored ceaselessly, both in the legislative and administrative fields, for the success of the Bureau's crusade to combat criminals and suppress the major manifestations of crime, which constituted such a grave menace to the entire country when he first became Attorney General.

With cooperation between local officials and the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the crime situation, there enters the need of a third ingredient, the cooperation of the law-abiding citizen. All of us have seen cases fail, not because officers have been negligent in their duties, not because courts have not been courageous, but because the very person who should be the most eager volunteer in the war against crime has proved either cowardly or apathetic. I have in mind one case in which there were many witnesses to a murder. Try as he would, the county prosecutor in that case could not persuade a single one of those witnesses to go into court and testify against the slayer. It is a matter of record that crimes or threats of crime have been concealed by the victims who preferred to suffer in silence rather than solicit the aid of law-enforcement bodies. I submit that we who are entrusted with law enforcement cannot be mind readers. We must be informed of the crime, otherwise we cannot pursue the actual or potential criminal. In this regard, I wish to emphasize that when such information comes to the Federal Bureau of Investigation it is speedily and thoroughly investigated. Since kidnaping became a Federal offense 62 actual cases of kidnaping or threats to kidnap have come to the attention of this Bureau. Not one of these remains unsolved, and a case in particular, that of Charles F. Urschel, of Oklahoma City, gives me an opportunity to illustrate exactly what I mean by quick and proper notification plus thorough cooperation as a major factor in the solution of a crime.

Within a few minutes of the time that Mr. Urschel was seized at his home recourse had been taken to the emergency kidnaping number of National 7117 at Washington and the news of the crime flashed to the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Immediately special agents of the Bureau were rushed by airplane or speedy automobile from various parts of the country to concentrate their efforts, working in collaboration with local officers and starting from the place of the offense in Oklahoma City. I cannot praise too highly the aid which was given by local law-enforcement bodies. The trail, which began at Oklahoma City, moved into Texas, where invaluable aid was given by astute members of a Texas metropolitan police force. From Texas it spread to an expanse of the United States greater than that of continental Europe, and led to the wiping out not only of a kidnap gang but of all the roots of crime which had supported this band. Persons who had harbored the criminals were taken before the bar of justice. Others who had assisted them in hiding or passing the money were convicted. An attorney was brought to trail and sentenced for what the court and jury adjudged to be his part in the conspiracy. Through the closely knit efforts of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the police and other law-enforcement bodies in a number of States 20 persons were sentenced to prison, including 6 life sentences.

In this respect may I add that the conviction record of the Federal Bureau of Investigation remains at its high average. Only 6 persons out of 100 go free, once they enter a courtroom charged by the Federal Bureau of Investigation with a Federal offense. Ninety-four percent of them are convicted.

Speaking of convictions and penitentiaries, I hope that we never shall lose sight of the fact that a law-enforcement officer's greatest problem often arises at the very time when it should end, namely, when he sees a prisoner taken out of a courtroom for a term in prison. Unhappily for us, prisons all too often form a springboard toward major criminality, only a more or less pleasant meeting place where new crimes can be concocted for commission when, as and if a sentimental or otherwise expedient board or person with powers of clemency grants freedom for a new assault upon the peace and dignity of our citizens. This amounts to a national scandal. Escapes are often so easily arranged as to be almost humorous, did not the tragical element predominate. Prisons are being emptied by unreasonable exercise of the power to send warped and dangerous mentalities forth to freedom and to prey upon communities. Through this exercise of clemency the law-abiding person becomes all but powerless to escape the predatory actions of vicious human vultures, who are aided and abetted in their careers of destruction by persons swayed by political, sentimental, or monetary reasons.

I sincerely hope that we of law enforcement may remain diligently militant in our efforts to eradicate this most unsightly blot upon American civilization. It seems inconceivable that blood-crazed men should be allowed to receive knives, guns, ammunition, and even arsenals by which to murder their way to freedom from so-called escape-proof jails, and then carry on a new career of plunder and slaughter.

It seems beyond the range of human conception that boards of clemency should meet in secret session and undo, with the stroke of a pen, the work of fearless law-enforcement officers, the judgment of honest and efficient courts, the desires of the American populace itself, and throw open prison doors to hordes of sneering, desperate convicts whose sole purpose is again to flaunt the law. I do not speak of a few isolated cases, as the easy-freedom advocates would have us believe. I speak from the authenticity of a diligent search through the more than 5,500,000 fingerprints in the Identification Division, which show thousands upon thousands of cases in which hardened convicts and old offenders are repeatedly turned loose to pursue their criminal and degenerate desires. Should they again be apprehended, convicted, and sentenced, the angels of mercy who so love freedom for convicts and who so forget the innocent and suffering public will gently administer to their every desire and soon again throw the locks that will usher them forth to freedom.

I do not desire to be misunderstood upon this matter of parole. I certainly favor parole for the proper persons. However, I shall resist in every possible manner the continuation of parole for convicts who have shown no desire whatever to proceed upon a path that will lead them into the ranks of good citizens. Certainly, if he deserves it, a man should receive one parole. When he fails to make good on that parole, he should automatically cancel any right to further clemency, and it is the violation of this straight problem of common sense that arouses the indignation of every honest law-enforcement official in America.

May we work in close cooperation toward the common goal when there shall be a new day in our efforts toward the eradication of crime, when the task of enforcing laws shall be a career hedged about and protected by every possible bulwark that citizens can erect. May we look upon the day when it is no longer possible for a politician to whisper to a court or jury and bring about freedom for a guilty man. May we see the day when technicalities have been wiped out of criminal-court procedure, when witnesses may no longer feel the intimidation of gangsters or of gangster attorneys. I hope we may look forward to the day when the law-enforcement official is paid a salary commensurate with his efforts and at the fading of the trail may he be granted the honor, respect, and remuneration due him as a reward for long and valiant service in the interests of honesty and the peace and happiness and safety of America.

I thank you.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief table showing the present status of economic recovery.

Mr. CROWTHER. I object, Mr. Speaker.

FRANK HERBERT SIMONDS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have 5 legislative days within which to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks an appreciation of Mr. Frank Simonds, the great editor and historian, who died this afternoon after only a week's illness. He was born in Concord, Mass., in my district, and was one of the greatest authorities on the World War and on international affairs.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did I hear objection on the Republican side to my request?

The SPEAKER. Objection was made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Who made the objection on that side to the gentleman's request?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks I wish to record the achievements of a man whose passing has filled our hearts with sorrow, whose accomplishments in his chosen field were the most noteworthy of his time, and who, for all of that distinction, ever remained a modest, unassuming, reserved friend and man.

In the prime of his life, at the peak of accomplishment, one of America's most brilliant journalists passed away suddenly last Friday. His loss was the world's loss, for his studies and writings on world politics and foreign affairs were universally accepted as being fair and unbiased and the result of clear analytical reasoning. Americans and Europeans have said that no one knew the map of Europe so well as Frank Simonds.

Frank Herbert Simonds was born 58 years ago in the historical New England town of Concord, Mass. His family for generations had lived the quiet New England existence, taking part in the civic and social life of the community. His great-grandfather had served powder to the colonial troops at the Battle of Lexington, and his grandfather was a veteran of the Civil War.

From early boyhood Frank Simonds' chief interest and hobby was history. In this he was encouraged by his grandfather on his mother's side, who had come to America from Ireland shortly before the outbreak of the Civil War, enlisted on the Union side, and participated in many of its battles. He had come to love his adopted country and read avidly every book he could obtain which bore upon its history. This reading, this zest for war history, was in no small degree responsible for the clear, penetrating, analytical manner which in later years so strongly characterized his grandson's writings. He had inherited the traditions of the men who fought in the Revolution.

As a boy attending the Concord public schools, young Frank Simonds loved to draw maps, testing his knowledge of the boundaries of countries which, even in these early years, he foresaw would be changed by world events. Today several of his maps still hang upon the walls of that schoolhouse, his teachers proud of the painstaking devotion to accuracy and the great attention to detail he had displayed.

Upon his graduation from Concord High School he entered Harvard College. Briefly interrupting his studies there, he enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment in 1898 and was sent to Cuba and Puerto Rico. After this Spanish War experience he returned to Harvard, where he was graduated in 1900 with the degree of A. B. The following year he entered upon his journalistic career on the staff of the

New York Tribune. For 5 years he remained with that paper, covering assignments on National and State affairs which brought him to Washington and to Albany, the New York State capital.

He was the studious type of writer, poring for hours in research, burying himself in a book to the exclusion of all else—and generally it was one dealing with history, world geography, or military tactics. It was his hobby, his dominating obsession, to know the true facts and the characteristics of the country about which he was writing. This intense application, adopted so early in his career, was the primary cause of his acceptance in later years as the outstanding interpreter of the World War to American readers, because he knew every hill and valley and street name of the locality under discussion.

Leaving the Tribune in 1906, he transferred to the staff of the New York Post, where he remained a year. He then accepted a position on the New York Evening Sun as an editorial writer. In 1913 he was promoted to editor of the Sun, continuing in this capacity for 2 years.

Just prior to the outbreak of the World War in 1914 Mr. Simonds left America for an extended trip abroad, to study at first hand the political and military situations of the countries which were then on the brink of war. It was his good fortune, as well as the good fortune of his rapidly swelling list of readers, that he was in Greece when the murder of the Archduke Francis Ferdinand of Austria plunged the nations of Europe into a maelstrom of conflict. There it was that he wrote an editorial for the Sun which brought him national fame. Its predictions and analyses, based upon his historical knowledge, not only had the advantage of being first hand, but they had the added advantage of being impersonal and impartial. He gave a comprehensive analysis of the entire background of the crisis, its dangers to a political situation which needed but one match to touch off the explosion, and a prediction that an enormous disaster would result. The editorial created a sensation at that time.

As the great nations of Europe matched armies, Mr. Simonds remained there, sending home dispatches explanatory of the military movements. He had an uncanny way of knowing just what topographical problems the invaders would have to solve. His notes humanized and simplified the cold, meager official dispatches. His stories were watched for eagerly and read carefully. It was good reporting, only possible to one who had an innate interest in world affairs. His success in this writing removed him forever from routine duties. He had become a specialist in world politics and world events.

As a contributing editor of the Review of Reviews, Mr. Simonds' articles were eagerly read by officers of the Army and Navy, as well as by students and professors in universities. Apropos of the critics of these articles, the Review of Reviews said:

> When a man of German name writes to us that Simonds has been bribed by the British Ambassador into writing pro-ally articles there is almost sure to be in the same mail a letter from some Englishman or Canadian declaring that Simonds is undoubtedly in the pay of Bernstorff and the Teutons. But the faultfinders have been few and the admirers have been many.

With the close of the World War in 1918, Mr. Simonds ceased his newspaper work and devoted his time to syndicated articles, which he prepared for 50 of the country's leading newspapers. These were widely read, for they contained weekly appraisals of the international scene. As is natural to all analysts and predictors, he had severe critics who disagreed violently with him, but they had to admit that his premises were almost always correct. He was one of the first to express the belief that the war between France and Germany would eventually encompass the entire world.

Because of his accomplishments, honors of varied kinds were bestowed upon Mr. Simonds. France made him a chevalier of the Legion of Honor in 1919; Rumania, an officer in the Star of Rumania; Belgium, the Order of the Crown; and Poland, the Order of Polonia.

Despite the demands made upon his time by his prolific newspaper writing, Frank Simonds wrote a number of books dealing with the war and contemporary world affairs. He was accepted as an authority in this field; he was consulted by men high in the counsels of all nations. Among the books he wrote were: They Shall Not Pass—Verdun, 1916; The Great War, two volumes, 1914–15; History of the World War, five volumes, published between 1917 and 1926; The A B C of War Debts; How Europe Made Peace Without America, 1927; America Faces the Next War; and Great Powers in Politics.

Mr. Simonds lectured extensively. He was intensely interesting; his chuckling Yankee drawl emphasized a wit inherited from his Irish grandfather. He was a great lover of peace and quiet. Many of his happiest moments were occupied among his books at his summer home in New Hampshire, where he spent much of his time after the close of the war. His home life was an ideal one. Shortly after he started his career in New York he married Mary Florence Gledhill, who, with his son, James G. Simonds, and a daughter, Mrs. Lovell Thompson, survive him. Their home in Georgetown has been for years the mecca of statesmen and diplomats and writers of every nation, men who hung upon the words of Frank Simonds.

No man of our time saw more clearly the significance of international complications. He never hesitated to say what he thought, whether or not it was the popular thing to do so. His exploring mind bore into the depths of post-war diplomacy, analyzing the hidden dangers therein, and he spread the information broadcast, often to the embarrassment and chagrin of those who had hid behind a benign screen which was lifted by his exposures. America and Americans will miss him greatly. None of us will ever know how much he had done to better our position among the family of nations.

Newspapers all over the country are vieing with each other in sincere commendatory tributes which express very clearly the great loss American journalism has sustained. I select one from the Washington Post to quote, because it describes so beautifully, in a few words, Frank Simonds not only as a writer but as a friend:

> Frank H. Simonds had an eye for news still over the horizon and could interpret it out of a profound knowledge of the news of the past. In exposition of the political aspects involved, and in explanation of its strategy, his history of the World War is unique. All his work had the great merits of clarity and simplicity, yet was adorned with passages of moving splendor.
> Even those who disagreed with his deductions from the international scene universally acknowledged the skill with which he found and marshaled his premises, the diamond brilliance of his ordinary speech. He was a preeminent journalist, an excellent historian, a virtuoso of the lucid style that knows when to become fervid, an authority in the field of international politics, a master of the rare talent of conversation.
> But he was more. He was a great friend. Nothing that one may honorably do for another would Frank Simonds fail to do, and do gladly, for the many to whom he gave his affection. Throughout America and much of Europe there are many who owe intangible debts to him, debts of friendships, the beneficiaries of which have long known they could never adequately repay. Not only in his books but in the hearts of men "he, being dead, yet speaketh."

NEUTRALITY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including therein a letter which I have received on the neutrality question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Peter C. Borre, of Boston, Mass., relative to the pending neutrality legislation:

Hon. JOHN W. McCORMACK, JANUARY 22, 1936.
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN McCORMACK: I called at the office of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives today and was advised by the clerk of the committee that House Joint Resolution 422 (American neutrality policy bill) was now under consideration in executive session.

It is needless for me to stress the importance attaching to this intended piece of legislation. No one is more fully aware of your genuine sympathy with the American viewpoint from all its angles than am I. It is for this reason that I am taking the liberty of asking an unbiased approach and consideration of this impending legislation. It can positively be stated that I am actuated by no other duty than one of civic pride, not induced by membership in any organization or prompted by any outside force to take this step.

Had it not been that the pressure of my duties as New England counsel to this committee kept me in Boston, I should have appeared before the Foreign Affairs Committee at its public hearings. Failing in my desire to do this, may I importune you to consider a few outstanding facts?

At the outset, I have a feeling in common with all veterans of the World War, that war is first, last, and always a destructive agent and least desired by the common file; and as it concerns this country, we should stand clear of foreign embroglio. As an officer in the United States Army Air Corps Reserve, eligible for immediate call in the event of a declaration of war by this country, I feel secure in saying that, with many others, I am ready for service should the emergency arise.

Should, however, an emergency be permitted to develop through faulty application of principles in part induced by foreign countries seeking to enmesh us in their web of difficulty? Words upon words have already been uttered on this theme; suffice it to say that the hand of British diplomacy has been boldly apparent in soliciting subtle acquiescence on the part of the United States Government to British League policies. War is such a vital agent that Congress, I feel, should not delegate undefined powers to anyone, aye, even to the Chief Executive. This colossal weapon should repose in its major aspects entirely with the Congress, where a collective body may give it ample deliberation. It should not in any phase be entrusted in any general sense to personal or individual interpretation. Speaking specifically, the President should not be empowered to personally determine what commodities shall be embargoed.

Although this is a collateral item, it may serve to demonstrate the force of British action in this country quite emphatically:

Why should the United States take cognizance of the Italo-Ethiopian situation with any more alarm than it accorded the Chaco dispute in South America with its vast destruction of life and the present threat of its recurrence?

Beyond severe protests on the part of our Government to Japan, following the Mukden incident of September 1931 (which, by the way, due to English withdrawal of support, gave serious embarrassment to our State Department) was the Japanese Government limited in any way as to purchase in America of scrap iron and other war material on an unprecedented basis?

Did the solicitude of the League of Nations to curb aggression take into consideration the plea of the Chinese delegate? Was anything pronounced in the way of sanctions against Japan when this country boldly quit the League? Or was British reticence maintained either because nothing of British importance was in peril, or Great Britain dared not venture too far against so formidable a power as Japan?

The policy of the League of Nations regarding sanctions has been openly dominated by England and to observers who seek facts beyond veiled words the reason is apparent: She aims to stop Italy from acquiring domination over Abyssinia in order that the Empire gains of a not too distant part of the nineteenth century may be preserved intact for England. In this Britain seeks the assurance of the other powers and if needs be their military assistance.

It is quite obvious that this intended legislation has tremendous potentialities, especially wherein England seeks American concurrence with its policies. Need the fact be more effectively demonstrated than by mere reference to the action taken by the League of Nations just recently on the oil sanction. The handling of this activity, as well as the ill-fated Hoare-Laval peace move, was sufficient to cause the resignation of Foreign Secretary Sir Samuel Hoare, and just today the fall of the Laval cabinet. Nevertheless Mr. Eden, Hoare's successor, and definitely committed to a policy much more severe against Italy than that of his predecessor, has suddenly presented a mute appearance at Geneva. Can it be that by the merest coincidence that Mr. Eden smugly awaits the action of the American Congress that our State Department may then carry along with his already defined policies? Must we again tolerate the presumption on the part of England to dictate our foreign policy?

Rather than seeking the preservation of neutrality shall we be called upon to witness the paradox that legislation enacted ostensibly to maintain neutrality shall actually bring us within the shadow of the spring of 1917—a harbinger of American participation in another world catastrophe?

I feel with many others that the law recently enacted by Congress is sufficient to cover any general situation and should remain unchanged. Any action taken at the present time is purposely discriminatory and may visit embarrassment upon the Italian Government who, at present, is not officially at war with Abyssinia. If this savors of the ludicrous we have only to recall the crisis which occurred when England in 1861 through Premier Gladstone proclaimed neutrality in our Civil War, thereby causing caustic criticism in giving recognition to two sovereign belligerents. No step should be taken which invites a feeling of unfriendliness on the part of another power when America has nothing definite at stake.

I appreciate in advance the sincere consideration which these words shall receive from you; may I add my heartfelt thanks for your many labors of the past which seek the maintenance of high American ideals?

Respectfully yours,

PETER C. BORRE,
53 State Street, Boston, Mass.

POTATO ACT

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, in the bill now before the House of Representatives, H. R. 10464, making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, is contained an item of $1,250,000 for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the Potato Act of 1935.

This act provides in substance a tax of 45 cents a bushel on all potatoes produced after December 31, 1935, with certain provisions and limitations therein mentioned.

Michigan is the fourth State in the Union in the production of potatoes. Nearly all of the Michigan crop is sold and consumed within the State; therefore, very little enters into interstate commerce.

Under the Triple A decision recently handed down by the Supreme Court of the United States, holding the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional, it must be apparent to every Member of the House that the Potato Act of 1935 is also unconstitutional, as it involved exactly the same principle as the Agricultural Act, namely, the levying of processing taxes upon one class of people to be paid to another class.

The Potato Act is wholly unworkable and unsound in that it punishes the consumer as well as the producer who does not conform to its provisions. It would encourage the bootlegging of spuds and make criminals of honest, hard-working citizens of our country who till the soil for a livelihood, and likewise brand the innocent housewife a criminal for purchasing the product of the farmer in entire ignorance of the law.

I stand for a reasonable price, not only for potatoes but for all agricultural products of the farm, equal to the cost of its production, and a reasonable profit to sustain the farmer and his family under the American standard of living.

The farmers of my district and my State, I do not believe, are willing to surrender their rights and liberties under the Constitution of the United States for a temporary plan to regiment them under a dictatorial and bureaucratic form of government now centralized in Washington.

I am opposed to it and shall vote to strike that appropriation from the bill.

LAST 3 YEARS OF OLD DEAL COMPARED WITH FIRST 3 YEARS OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I am willing to withdraw my objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ELLENBOGEN] if I can be informed what his request is.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to inform the gentleman.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I asked unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a brief table showing the present index of industrial products and agricultural products.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the requests of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am enclosing figures and statistics showing economic conditions during the last 3 years under President Hoover as compared with the first 3 years under President Roosevelt. These figures, for the most part, are taken from the Philadelphia Record:

FRIDAY, JANUARY 24, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in Heaven, may our eyes ever be open to behold the goodness of the Lord; let us cherish that heavenly gift—the mercy of a thankful heart. We rejoice that by the delicate discipline of Thy redeeming love Thou dost wipe away the tears from the face turned toward Thee. O may the energy of love replace hate; let the inspiration of hope subdue fear and let the spirit of joy prevail over suffering. We pray that the altars of the land may turn to the poor, bereft of comfort. O great is their grief, their spirits faint, and their hearthstones bare. O let love linger here, aflame with the passion of service. "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me." In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 459) entitled "Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution entitled 'Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes' ", requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. BARKLEY, and Mr. NORBECK to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. BURKE a member of the committee of conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee", in the place of Mr. BAILEY.

PAY AND ALLOWANCE OF ARMY, NAVY, MARINE CORPS, ETC.—REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the bill (S. 3281) to amend an act of February 16, 1929, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to readjust the pay and allowances of the commissioned and enlisted personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service', approved June 10, 1922, as amended", and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has consented that this rereference should be made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COMMUNICATIONS ACT OF 1934

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, on August 23 of last year I introduced three bills proposing amendments to the Communications Act of 1934. At the same time I introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a "broadcasting research commission" to "make a careful and comprehensive investigation of radio broadcasting" in America. The purpose of the proposed investigation is to get information to be used as a basis for "recommendations to the Congress with respect to legislation and administrative changes designed to promote the maximum beneficial use of the facilities available for radio broadcasting in the interest of the people of the United States."

The three bills, H. R. 9229, H. R. 9230, and H. R. 9231, would deprive the Communications Commission of censorship powers and relieve radio stations from liability for remarks made in any broadcasts on public, social, political, or economic issues; would compel radio stations to set aside regular periods for uncensored discussion of social problems, with an equal opportunity for both sides of a controversial issue to expound their points of view; and would compel all radio stations to keep accurate records of rejected applications for time and the reasons therefor.

Now, four events lead me to extend these remarks on the subject of radio legislation:

First. The controversy between Mr. Fletcher, of the Republican National Committee, and national hook-ups would not have occurred if radio broadcasting stations were required to set aside regular and definite periods at desirable times of the day and evening for uncensored discussion on a nonprofit basis of public, social, political, and economic problems, and for education purposes. This in spite of Heywood Broun's contention that Liberty at the Crossroads is subversive propaganda seeking to undermine the American home.

Second. The denial of the application for a proposed labor station. KCLC in southern California would not be so discriminatory if H. R. 9230 were adopted.

On February 18, 1935, the Metro Broadcasting Co. applied for a station in East Los Angeles. Labor took over this application, and after the hearing on February 18, 1935, the examiner denied the application because labor did not have their own attorney to represent them. The matter was taken up with the Commission to prove labor's interest, and the Commissioners—Hon. Anning Prall, Hon. Judge Sykes, and Hon. Norman Case—remanded this application for further testimony to prove labor's interest.

On August 5 and 6 they were granted another hearing before P. W. Seward, examiner, who is against labor, and he would not allow labor to prove its interest in this application. Mr. Charlton Ogburn, attorney for the American Federation of Labor, appeared as attorney for this application and notified the Commissioners and the examiner that this application was for the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles. Mr. Ogburn asked the examiner if he could not amend the application to read "Central Labor Council of Los Angeles", affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, but the examiner, who is against labor, positively refused to allow this. At this hearing labor's representatives offered to deposit with the examiner a cashier's check for $10,000. Labor also delivered an assignment from A. Tornek to the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles. When the Metro Broadcasting Co. filed their application originally, A. Tornek and R. Lille were the applicants, and at the hearing on February 18, 1935, the examiner accepted an assignment from R. Lille to A. Tornek. Now all they are asking them to do is to accept an assignment from A. Tornek to the Central Labor Council, which the examiner refused to do. Labor also delivered contracts for the sale of time, which proved that the station would be on a sound financial basis; a lease for the property where the proposed transmitter is to be located; and a notice that the studios would be in the Central Labor Council of Los Angeles. What else could the examiner want to prove labor's interest in this application? To make a long story short, the examiner, who is against labor, recommended denial of this application.

Since this hearing the American Federation of Labor had a convention in Atlantic City, October 7 to 19, inclusive, and they passed a resolution endorsing the station 100 percent; and they instructed President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, to appoint a committee of three to call on the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission to support this station and to ask that a permit be granted labor.

Third. The able chairman of the House Labor Committee [Mr. CONNERY] on last Wednesday called attention to the fact that he had—> Received complaints from all over the United States with reference to radio, complaints from labor, from profit organizations, and from nonprofit organizations which have been denied radio broadcasting licenses and time on the radio.

These complaints would disappear with the enactment of H. R. 9229, H. R. 9230, and H. R. 9231.

Fourth. In his Jackson Day address the President had this to say:

> I make this specific recommendation, that each and every one of you who is interested in obtaining the facts and in spreading those facts abroad, each and every one of you interested in getting at the truth that lies somewhere behind the smoke screen of charges and countercharges of a national campaign constitute yourself a committee of one. To do this you need no parchment certificate; to do this you need no title. To do this you need only your own conviction, your own intelligence, and your own belief in the highest duty of the American citizen.
> To act as such a committee of one you will need only your own appointment, an appointment which carries with it some effort, some obligation on your part to carry out the task you have assigned yourself. You will have to run down statements made to you by others which you may believe to be false. You will need to analyze the motives of those who make assertions to you, to make an inventory in your own community, in order that you may check and recheck for yourself and thereby be in a position to answer those who have been misled or those who would mislead.

If "regular and definite periods at desirable times of the day and evening" were to be given over "on a nonprofit basis"; if the Communications Commission were deprived of its censorship powers; and if the radio stations were relieved from liability for remarks made in any broadcasts on public, social, political, or economic issues, Mr. Fletcher would not be discriminated against, labor would have an equal opportunity to be heard, as would all minority groups, and every person in the United States would have an opportunity to hear both sides of every question.

EXCISE TAXES ON IMPORTATION OF CRUDE PETROLEUM

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, under permission to revise and extend my remarks, I call attention to the introduction of H. R. 10483, a bill to provide revenue from excise taxes on importation of crude petroleum and its products. I think it is important, since the bill is in some features technical, to call attention to each section thereof in order that the whole matter may be closely understood.

The following is an analysis of each section of the proposed measure:

Section 1 amends section 630 of the revenue act which had been amended by the act of June 16, 1933, exempting from the various excise taxes specified materials and products used as supplies to vessels. Included among those exemptions was the phrase "fuel supplies." That this exemption covered fuel oil and other petroleum products was not realized by many at the time when it was proposed in a subcommittee of a Senate committee and presented as an amendment to a House resolution extending the gasoline sales tax for 1 year. This exemption of petroleum products used as fuel supplies for vessels cost the Federal Treasury in the year 1935 over $2,000,000. In 1934 this loss was $1,610,000 and in the last half of 1933 it was $660,000. It has taken one of the most important markets from the domestic industry and delivered it to a very small number of importing companies who have been able to gain control of this market through their ability to cut the price heavily if the domestic product attempted competition. The consumers of fuel oil have not profited by this tax-free importation. The only advantage has been reaped by the importers who have absorbed the difference between the low production cost in foreign countries and the higher production cost in the United States. Repeal of this exemption, for which no serious reason was even given to Congress at the time it was adopted, should not impose any burden upon consumers but should be to the profit of the Federal Treasury, the domestic industry, and American labor. The other exemptions granted in the act as it now stands are not affected by the present proposed amendment.

Paragraph (b) in section 1 of the bill I am proposing is the necessary correction of that section of the present bill dealing with credit and refunds to make it conform with the previously mentioned elimination of the exemption of petroleum products used as supplies for vessels.

Section 2 increases the present one-half cent tax on imported crude petroleum and on fuel oil and gas oil and certain other liquid derivatives of petroleum to 1 cent per gallon. This tax was originally proposed at 1 cent. It was cut to one-half cent partly because of the fear expressed by some that a 1-cent tax per gallon might act as an embargo. The great difference between the production costs of petroleum in this country and the much lower cost abroad makes it possible for importers to easily absorb this tax and still have a considerable advantage over the domestic product. An increase to 1 cent per gallon, making the tax 42 cents a barrel instead of 21 cents as at present, would reduce the profit made by those few companies which import petroleum and its products but should not affect the domestic market since that cost advantage has not been passed on to the general consumer. A study of the prices of petroleum products before and after this tax was laid shows that the average service-station prices in 50 representative cities, exclusive of tax, for the years named were given as follows by the Oil and Gas Journal: 1929, 17.91 cents; 1930, 16.33 cents; 1931, 13.09 cents; 1932, 13.30 cents; 1933, 12.76 cents; 1934, 13.60 cents. These excise taxes went into effect June 30, 1932.

This same section 2 also adds a new excise tax of $2 per ton on imported foreign asphalt, natural or otherwise. Foreign asphalt has been taking the most valuable portion of the construction contracts awarded under the large appropriations Congress has made to promote domestic industry and employment of American labor. Exemptions which have been granted by Federal agencies have made this possible by excepting asphalt from those provisions of the law which require only domestic materials or domestic products should be used. The low cost of foreign asphalt has made it possible for those using the imported products to consistently underbid the domestic industry on these large contracts. However, these lower bids have not expressed the difference in production costs but have been made sufficiently low to obtain the contract, netting large profits to the importer. This tax should produce considerable revenue for the Federal Treasury, although it is not high enough to constitute any embargo or any improper and unfair restriction on the importation of this product.

Paragraph (b) of section 2 strikes out of the revenue act as it stands at present the expiration date on all these excise taxes levied on imported petroleum and its products.

Section 3 imposes a definite limitation on the amount of foreign petroleum and its products which may be imported, fixing this at 4.5 percent of the national consumptive demand as determined by the Bureau of Mines. The domestic industry has long recognized the importance of having some definite limitation on the amount of these imports. The oil States of the Union, through their State agencies or through the Interstate Compact Commission, have been attempting to limit the production of petroleum to the amount required to meet the consumptive demand. Such a program would prevent waste of this valuable natural resource and would contribute an amount of stability to the petroleum industry, which it has never enjoyed. However, this effort cannot succeed if there is no way of determining what amount of foreign petroleum or its products will be imported and enter the domestic market. This bill attempts to fix this amount proportionately so as the domestic demand increases the amount of imports may increase, and as it decreases it may decrease. The amount set forth in this bill, 4.5 percent of the national consumptive demand, is practically the ratio accepted by the importers themselves, when they agreed with the Secretary of the Interior at the March 1933 Washington oil conference that such a limitation was necessary for the recovery of the domestic petroleum industry. From that day to the present time no objection has been offered by the importers to this ratio. In fact, they have repeatedly, through their own publications and in the press at large, accepted this limitation as proper and have declared their intent to keep within it.

However, those intentions have not been realized. It is manifestly difficult for a group of importers, unless they make definite agreements which might subject them to the penalties of the antitrust laws, to effectively limit their imports to any specific quantity. The only authority which can meet this situation is an act of Congress. The adoption of this legislation would bring security and order into an industry which has long been subject to the threat of impending large importations of foreign oil. It would also relieve the importers themselves of criticism, suspicion, and other annoyances which cannot fail to result so long as they are expected, without collusion or positive agreements, to make effective this varied limitation.

The bill does not delegate any authority of Congress over foreign commerce. It imposes a direct limitation. It definitely authorizes and directs the President to take certain steps which are necessary to make that limitation effective. It makes provision for maintaining normal importation ratios, but also provides in case any class of these imports falls below the customary ratio other classes of petroleum imports may take their place.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 10]

Andrew, Mass.	Dear	Hoeppel	Risk
Bell	Dempsey	Holmes	Sanders, La.
Brennan	Driver	Kee	Sandlin
Buchanan	Englebright	Lewis, Md.	Scrugham

Clark, Idaho	Greenway	Norton	Wolfenden
Clark, N. C.	Griswold	Oliver	Zioncheck
Corning	Haines	Patman
Crosser, Ohio	Hennings	Patton

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-nine Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES (H. DOC. NO. 398)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, H. R. bill 9870, entitled "An act to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes."

On May 22, 1935, in disapproving a bill to pay the bonus in full immediately instead of in 1945, I gave in person to a joint session of the Congress complete and explicit reasons for my action.

The bill I now return differs from last year's bill in only two important respects: First, it eliminates the issuance of unsecured paper currency to make the payments required and substitutes interest-bearing bonds, which, however, may be converted into cash for face value at any time; second, it adds $263,000,000 to the total payments by forgiving interest after October 1, 1931, on amounts borrowed.

In all other respects, the circumstances, arguments, and facts remain essentially the same as those fully covered and explained by me only 8 months ago.

I respectfully refer the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to every word of what I said then.

My convictions are as impelling today as they were then. Therefore I cannot change them.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 24, 1936.

The SPEAKER. The objections of the President will be spread at large upon the Journal, and the bill and message will be printed as a House document.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the consideration of the President's message be postponed until Monday next; and in that respect I desire to make a brief statement, which will not be made in any controversial spirit whatever. The situation is that the Senate of the United States is not in session and will not be until Monday next. Therefore, there cannot be any final and conclusive action on this proposition until that time. Also, we have been informed that there are a number of absentees from the House, who did not anticipate this measure would come up this week. It is a matter entirely for the decision of the House as to whether it wants to postpone the vote on this message or vote on it today.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the majority leader yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for a question.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask my good friend from Alabama if it would not be true that, if we should put this important vote off until Monday, members of a number of American Legion posts and of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War and of the Veterans of Foreign Wars would think it incumbent upon them to wire us, and in that way they would spend a lot of their money which they can ill afford to spend in sending telegrams, the sending of which would be entirely unnecessary? We could save them all that money by passing this bill at this time.

There are approximately 400 Members of the House here in attendance and ready to vote. We all know that we are going to pass this bill over the President's veto by a tremendous majority. Every Member of this House has had his stand on this measure duly registered by roll-call vote at the time we passed this bill in the House, and again the other day when the House adopted the Senate amendment. Hence no good would be accomplished by postponing this important vote until Monday, but we would cause many veterans all over the United States to be apprehensive and would cause many of them to spend their money unnecessarily sending telegrams. I am in favor of taking the vote at this time.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, some Members had hoped that advance notice of the coming of this veto message might be given to the Congress. As the distinguished majority leader has said, what we do today will not put us any further ahead than action on Monday. Some Members were just about to telephone the White House to find out when this matter was coming in, and Members have gone away with the idea that it would not come in today. In fairness to the few of our colleagues who are absent I hope this motion to postpone will be agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, let me make one further statement. As I stated in the beginning, this is a matter solely and entirely for the determination of the House. I stated the reasons that impelled me to make the motion. I think the Members of the House well understand the reasons that have been suggested for postponement. If those reasons do not appeal to the judgment of the House as sufficient—and they appeal to me as a fair basis for postponement under all the circumstances—the House can so express itself. It is a matter solely for the judgment of the Members of the House. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RANKIN. If we vote down this motion to postpone, then as I understand it the vote will come automatically on the veto message. Is that correct?

The SPEAKER. That would be the question before the House.

Mr. RANKIN. And a preferential motion will be in order for an immediate vote on the veto?

The SPEAKER. It will be the only motion before the House.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] on the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Alabama that further consideration of the veto message be postponed until Monday.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were ayes 131 and noes 189.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. RANKIN. On that, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Under the Constitution the vote is taken by yeas and nays. Those who favor the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding, will vote "aye" when their names are called; those who oppose will vote "no." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas, 326, nays 61, answered "present" 2, not voting 41, as follows:

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. THOMAS, is absent on account of illness. Were he present, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. GRISWOLD, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye" on the roll call. I have a general pair with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TREADWAY. I find he is not present. I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present." Were I permitted to vote, I would vote "aye." Were the gentleman from Massachusetts present, I understand he would vote "no."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. PATMAN, is unavoidably absent. He asked me to state that if present he would vote "aye."

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HAINES, is unavoidably absent. If he were present, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CLARK of North Carolina, is unavoidably absent. If present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. CITRON, is ill and unable to be present. Were he present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SCRUGHAM, is attending to an important matter before a department and did not know of this vote. If present, he would have voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MONAGHAN. To correct the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the correction.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday I presented the McGroarty bill, embodying the Townsend plan, as an amendment to the deficiency appropriation measure. I presented the bill in its entirety. For some reason unknown to the Clerk's office, only the part that carried the transactions tax was included. These mistakes have been constantly recurring on the part of the Clerk's office. I feel that it is incumbent that I serve notice upon the Clerk that if they continue I shall file proper proceedings against the Clerk's office. I cite in this connection the petition which was filed on the McGroarty bill at the Clerk's desk. I had sent a letter to the entire membership of this House at that time; notwithstanding that, the Clerk arbitrarily accepted the petition of another Member.

I cite you back to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1935, when Mr. HOEPPEL took the floor and made the following speech:

Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] today filed a petition, which is at the Clerk's desk. This petition seeks to bring to the floor for consideration and debate the McGroarty bill, commonly known as the Townsend old-age-pension bill.

In this connection I would request that those who are interested in this humane measure come to the desk and sign the petition, in order that early action may be had thereon.

I have in my hand a request from the City Council of the City of South Pasadena requesting the Congress of the United States to give fair and impartial consideration to the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan.

For the information of the Republican Members, I will say that South Pasadena is composed almost entirely of Republicans. For this reason I hope that the Republican membership will evidence the fullest measure of cooperation, and that, with the Democrats, we will obtain the required number of signatures to bring this question up for a decision as soon as possible.

I wish to compliment my colleague from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN], who has taken such an active part in the Congress in the interests of social security. It was Mr. MONAGHAN who headed the delegation which had a conference with the President recently on the subject of old-age pensions. Mr. MONAGHAN submitted the following letter to the various Members of Congress:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 2, 1935.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: Insistent is the clamor for an old-age pension; not a pauper's dole but a system that will be a proper step toward national recovery; a pension reasonably high enough to encourage aged men of all trades and occupations, even in the more remunerative walks of life, to leave their posts and thereby create opportunity for the employment of middle-aged and younger men.

As chairman of the Congressional Legislative Strategy Committee for the Promotion of Social Security I will place on the Clerk's desk in the House of Representatives, Monday noon, March 4, a petition for the discharge of the Ways and Means Committee from further consideration of the McGroarty bill (H. R. 3977), asking that it be considered on the floor of the House on either the second or fourth Monday of April.

As you, of course, know, the signing of this petition in nowise is a commitment to the Townsend old-age-pension plan, but merely an indication of desire for free and open debate on the measure and opportunity for proposing amendments.

Machines have robbed a large portion of the American public of a decent livelihood through pursuit of normal occupations, and a sound old-age-pension system, based upon the proper means of raising the money, would go far toward solving the problems of maldistribution. Therefore I urge you to sign this petition for the purpose of establishing a sound system of pensions that will permit the aged American citizen to raise his head high to heaven and proudly walk as a man amongst men.

Respectfully submitted.

JOSEPH P. MONAGHAN,
Chairman, Congressional Legislative Strategy Committee for the Promotion of Social Security.

On the following day, March 5, 1935, the following colloquy occurred between Mr. CARTER, of California, and Mr. KRAMER, of California:

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] made the statement yesterday that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] had placed on the Speaker's table a petition to relieve the Committee on Ways and Means from consideration of the McGroarty bill in reference to the Townsend old-age-pension plan.

I want to say to my colleague from California that either his eyesight is bad or else he has been misinformed. The petition was filed by the gentleman who is now addressing the House.

Mr. CARTER. Did not the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] announce, however, that he proposed to file that petition and sent the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER] and a number of other Members a letter to that effect?

Mr. KRAMER. I do not know what the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] announced, and I received no letter from him. I am just correcting the RECORD so far as the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL] is concerned.

Mr. CARTER. I understand from the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] that a letter was delivered to each and every Member of Congress, including the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER]. These letters were delivered through the post office in the usual course of mail delivery. While I do not want to accuse the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER] unjustly, it would seem to me that he must have had knowledge of the intentions of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN], not only by reason of the delivery of the letter but also from his contact with the Clerk of the House.

I have been informed by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] that the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER] contacted the Clerk of the House for the first time in reference to this matter on Monday, March 4, which was after the date of the delivery of the letter.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER] did not confer with the author of the bill. The author of the bill desired to have the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN] file the petition. Personally, I am not concerned about which gentleman should file the petition, but I did regret to see the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER]—aware, as he apparently was, of the intentions of the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN]—rush in and file the petition ahead of him. I do not believe that such tactics should be countenanced by the membership of the House of Representatives.

I think this kind of treatment should not be accorded a Member.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. No; I refuse to yield for the moment.

I therefore ask, Mr. Speaker, unanimous consent that this amendment be printed at this point in the RECORD so that the people of the country will not get the impression that I was proposing a sales tax to the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I must take issue with my good friend from Montana regarding his intimation that our Clerk is either careless or derelict in performing his arduous duties here. He is highly capable and efficient. Our two reading clerks, and our Clerk in charge of the House proceedings, and our able reporters of debate, are all high-class gentlemen, are unusually capable and efficient, and are most conscientious in the performance of their duties. Of course, once in a great while, amidst the confusion occasioned by the noise and hubbub we Members make ourselves in carrying on scores of different conversations on the floor, all that is said and done is not heard distinctly, and a mistake is occasionally made, and it is almost a miracle that more of them are not made. Our clerks all do remarkably well under the most trying circumstances.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Montana does not have to have unanimous consent. The gentleman can move to correct the RECORD in the manner indicated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman asked unanimous consent——

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the RECORD be so corrected.

Mr. BLANTON. And I obtained recognition on a reservation of objection to the unanimous-consent request in order to defend our clerks against the charge of carelessness and negligence.

The regular order was demanded.

Mr. BLANTON. Except in rare instances, our clerks are absolutely accurate in their reporting and are conscientious and efficient in all they do here.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the RECORD be so corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana moves that the RECORD be corrected as indicated.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Montana.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONAGHAN: On page 13, line 11, after the figures, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"DEFINITIONS

"SECTION 1. The term 'transaction' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include the sale, barter, and/or exchange of either or both real or personal property, including any right, interest, easement, or privilege of commercial value therein or related thereto, whether actually made at the time or only then agreed to be made and whether under executed or executory contract or otherwise; also including all charges for interest, rent, commissions, fees, and any other pecuniary benefit of any kind directly or indirectly derived from or for any loan, deposit, rental, lease, pledge, or any other use or forbearance of money or property; and also including the rendering or performance of any service for monetary or other commercially valuable consideration, whether by a person or otherwise, including all personal service, also transportation by any means, and telephone, telegraph, radio, amusement, recreation, education, art, advertising, any public utility, any water rights, and/or any and all other service of any and every kind whatsoever, but excepting and excluding therefrom any single isolated transfer of property of fair value less than $100 which does not arise or occur in the usual course of an established commercial business and excluding any loan, deposit, withdrawal from deposit, hypothecation, or pledge of property or money.

"A purchase obligation is not a loan under this act.

"Barter and/or exchange is defined as a plurality of transactions to the extent of the fair value of the property and/or service transferred or rendered other than money.

"The term 'income' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include the gross amount of any and all money or its equivalent received from or for any service performed or from or for any proceeds or profit from any transaction, inheritance, or gift whatsoever.

"The term 'net income' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as include all money and/or commercially valuable benefit or its equivalent actually received by the annuitant, after deducting only such charges and expenses as are directly incident to producing such net income.

"The term 'gainful pursuit' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include any occupation, profession, business, calling, or vocation, or any combination thereof, performed for monetary or other commercially valuable consideration, remuneration, or profit.

"The term 'annuity' and/or 'annuities' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include the various sums and/or amount of money distributed and paid pro rata and otherwise to the various persons who shall become and be the beneficiaries under this act.

"The term 'executory contract' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include any and all conditional sale agreements and contracts, and all other agreements and contracts the completion of which is or may be delayed to some time subsequent to the time of making thereof.

"The term 'gross dollar value' for the purposes of this act shall be defined so as to include the sum representing the total fair value of the entire property or service transferred or proposed to be transferred, without deducting any amount of encumbrance or offset of any kind.

"TAXES AND COLLECTION THEREOF

"SEC. 2. (a) There is hereby levied a tax of 2 percent upon the fair gross dollar value of each transaction done within the United States and Territories; also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax equal to one-tenth of the tax levied upon all incomes under the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1934 or any amendment thereto; also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax of 2 percent upon the fair dollar value of all transfers of property by devise, bequest, or other testamentary disposition or legal descent and distribution of property, as now or hereafter taxable under the provisions of the Revenue Act of 1934 or any amendment thereto; and also, in addition to all other taxes, a tax of 2 percent upon the fair gross dollar value of every gift in excess of the fair value of $500.

"(b) Except as hereinafter otherwise provided, all tax returns for the taxes imposed by this act shall be made by, and the tax shall be paid by, the grantor, vendor, lessor, and/or legal representative thereof, and by the legal entity by whom the service is furnished, for each and every transfer of property and/or rendition or performance of service, and for all transactions arising under executory contract the return shall be made and the tax shall be paid as of the date such executory contract is entered into, regardless of the time of the completion thereof: Provided, That in every case of compensation for personal service other than for professional service, the person or legal entity by whom such payment is made shall deduct the amount of the tax and withhold it out of such compensation and shall make the return and the payment of the tax for such cases in lieu of the return and payment by the person who performed the service.

"(c) All taxes imposed by this act shall be deemed levied and shall become payable upon all taxable transactions beginning and occurring on and after 30 days after this act takes effect.

"(d) Every return of taxes, together with the payment of the taxes, as required by this act, shall be made to the Collector of Internal Revenue of the United States, or to such other person as may be designated by rules and regulations issued under this act, for the district from which such return is made, as of the end of each calendar month during which such taxes become fixed and chargeable, and shall be delivered and paid to said Collector of Internal Revenue or other person not later than 10 days after the expiration of the calendar month for which such return is made.

"(e) The Secretary of the Treasury shall enforce the payment of the taxes required by this act to be paid, and shall promptly deposit in the United States Treasury all funds received by him through or from the collection of such taxes, all as required by rules and regulations to be issued and promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

"A SEPARATE FUND

"SEC. 3. There is hereby created in the Treasury Department of the United States a fund to be known and administered as the United States citizens' retirement annuity fund. All revenue derived from the taxes levied in and under this act shall be deposited by the Secretary of the Treasury in this United States citizens' retirement annuity fund, and shall be disbursed only for the payments of the sums expressly authorized by this act to be paid therefrom, and for no other purposes.

"ONLY UNITED STATES CITIZENS ARE ELIGIBLE

"SEC. 4. (a) Every citizen of the United States 60 years of age and over, or who shall attain the age of 60 years after the passage of this act, shall be entitled to receive upon filing application and qualifying as hereinafter provided an annuity payable monthly during the life of the annuitant, in a sum to be determined as hereinafter provided in this act.

"(b) The right of any person to receive an annuity under this act shall date from and begin on the date of proper filing of an application therefor, when and if such application is supported by proper and sufficient proofs in compliance with rules and regulations issued pursuant to the provisions of this act, but subject to the limitations upon time and manner of payment as hereinafter provided by this act.

"(c) The annuitant shall not engage in any gainful pursuit.

"(d) The annuitant shall covenant and agree to expend, and shall spend all of each month's annuity during the current calendar month in which it is received by the annuitant, or within 5 days thereafter, within the United States of America or its Territorial possessions, in and for the purchase of any services and/or commodities, and/or a home or an equity in or lease of a home, or for the payment of any indebtedness lawfully arising for any such purchase: Provided, however, That the annuitant shall not directly or indirectly expend a total of more than 10 percent of any such monthly annuity for gifts or contributions to any person or to any public or private institutions, associations, or organizations.

"(e) This annuity shall not be payable to any person who directly or indirectly receives from any source a net income of any kind or nature in excess of $2,400 per year.

"(f) Any person otherwise qualified to receive an annuity hereunder and who at any time receives any net income of any kind or nature not arising from personal services of such person and which in total amount is less than $2,400 per year, shall promptly make full and complete disclosure in writing under oath, as required by rules to be issued under this act, fully disclosing the amount and source of any and all such income, and thereupon the pro-rata monthly amount of any such annual income not arising under this act shall be prorated over the year and shall be deducted monthly from the monthly annuity payment to which such person under this act would otherwise be entitled, and the remainder shall be the annuity of such annuitant payable under this act: Provided, however, That all of the income of any such annuitant, whether arising under this act or otherwise, shall be expended as required for annuity paid under the provisions of this act.

"ADMINISTRATION PROVISIONS

"SEC. 5. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall create and maintain boards of review, within the several States, as he may deem necessary to carry out the provisions and purposes of this act, and he shall issue and promulgate and enforce proper and suitable rules and regulations governing the manner and place of registration by applicants for the annuities provided for under this act, and the method of identification of and registration by such annuitants, also to require and secure the proper spending of the annuity money by the annuitant as required by this act, and adequate and sufficient accounting thereof, and such other rules and regulations as he may deem necessary, all in accordance with the intent and purposes of this act; and he shall cause to be paid at regular monthly intervals, to each person who lawfully qualifies to receive annuities under this act, such amount as shall become due the respective annuitants lawfully qualifying under this act.

"(b) Proper and suitable boards shall be established by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, within each State as he shall deem necessary, such boards as have exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all issues arising under this act, subject to rules and regulations issued and promulgated under this act, concerning annuitants residing within the jurisdiction of the boards, respectively, but subject to the right of either party to have the decision of any such board reviewed by the State court having general jurisdiction over the area in which that board is situated.

"APPORTIONMENT AND DISTRIBUTION OF FUNDS

"SEC. 6. From and out of the proceeds of such taxes collected and accumulated under the provisions of this act, disposition and disbursements shall be made in the following manner and order, to wit:

"(a) All proper and necessary expense of administering this act shall first be paid or provided for, and upon a monthly basis whenever practicable.

"(b) A reserve fund shall at all times be maintained sufficient to protect and provide proper payment of any and all annuities the payment of which for any cause is deferred because of delay in approval of application for the annuity or otherwise.

"(c) All other money available in any month or period, from or out of said tax collections or any undistributed residue thereof, as hereinafter referred to, shall be distributed and paid monthly, pro rata, except as hereinafter provided, to all qualified annuitants who are of record on the last day of the calendar month period or longer first period as hereinafter specified, during which the tax collections and/or residue are accumulated for distribution, in such amount not exceeding $200 per month, as may properly be paid from the funds accumulated during that period, and in the following manner, to wit:

"(d) First. The total amount available for distribution shall be divided by the total number of the annuitants entitled to share therein, and except for cases where deduction is to be made as hereinafter referred to, the result shall be the pro rata annuity amount.

"Second. The proper deductions provided for by section 4, paragraph (f), of this act shall then be made from the pro rata amount so determined, as to all persons who have any income not arising under this act as annuity.

"Third. The amount so determined to be due each of the annuitants shall then be paid in manner and by method as follows, to wit:

"(e) The total amount of the deductions made as provided in section 4, paragraph (f), of this act shall constitute a residue which shall be carried over into the next following month and be merged into and become a part of the fund available for that month for distribution to qualified annuitants as provided for in this act.

"(f) All of the funds accumulated under this act during the period extending from the time this act goes into effect and to the end of the first full calendar month after this act takes effect and hereby designated as the 'first period', shall be promptly paid for and as of the 1st day of the fifth full calendar month after this act takes effect, to such annuitants as are of record on the last day of such 'first period' and as hereinbefore provided for in section 6, paragraph (c), of this act.

"(g) All of the funds accumulated under this act during the second full calendar month after this act takes effect, hereby designated the 'second period', shall be promptly paid for and as of the 1st day of the sixth full calendar month after this act takes effect, to such annuitants as are of record on the last day of such 'second period' and as hereinbefore provided for in section 6, paragraph (c), of this act.

"(h) Subsequent monthly payments to the annuitants shall be made by this same method, monthly, as follows:

"Accumulation of third period to be paid on 1st day of seventh month.

"Accumulation of the fourth period to be paid on 1st day of eighth month.

"Accumulation of the fifth period to be paid on the 1st day of the ninth month, etc.

"And continuing so long as any funds are available therefor under this act, to the annuitants identified monthly in accordance with section 6, paragraph (c), of this act.

"RULES AND REGULATIONS

"SEC. 7. All administrative details not specifically otherwise provided for in this act shall be governed by rules and regulations issued and promulgated by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

"APPROPRIATION FROM THE FUND

"SEC. 8. The Secretary of the Treasury, upon demand by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, is hereby authorized and directed to pay from money or moneys available in said United States citizens' retirement annuity fund the money necessary to cover the monthly annuities as designated by said Administrator to be paid to qualified annuitants, and for other purposes, in a total amount as elsewhere provided in this act, but in any event not to exceed at any time the amount on deposit in said fund; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sum or sums as may be necessary to establish and maintain this act, subject to reimbursement out of funds collected hereunder, pursuant to the provisions of this act.

"PENSIONS NOT SUBJECT TO GARNISHMENT, ETC.

"SEC. 9. Any annuity granted under this act, and the money proceeds thereof due or in the hands of the annuitant, shall be wholly exempt from attachment, garnishment, execution, levy, and/or any other judicial process.

"DISQUALIFICATIONS

"SEC. 10. No annuity shall be paid under this act to any person who is not at the time of payment domiciled within the United States or its territorial possessions.

"SUSPENSION AND FORFEITURE

"SEC. 11. The right of any person to receive an annuity under this act may be suspended and/or forfeited for any of the following causes:

"(a) For engaging in any gainful pursuit.

"(b) For violation of any of the provisions of this act.

"(c) For unreasonable and unnecessary maintenance of any able-bodied person in idleness and/or for unreasonable and unnecessary employment of a person or persons or the payment to any person of any salary or wages or any other form of compensation in disproportion to the service rendered.

"(d) For willful failure or refusal to obey any rule or regulation issued under this act.

"(e) For willful refusal by any annuitant to pay any just obligation.

"DELAY IN PAYMENT—REMEDY

"SEC. 12. If in any case the payment of an annuity to any person is delayed to an extent which causes an accumulation of 2 months or more of annuities, then, and in that event, the expenditures by the annuitant for the amount of any such accumulation shall be made upon the basis of 2 months for every month of such accumulation.

"CERTAIN OFFENSES A FELONY—PENALTY

"SEC. 13. It shall be a felony, and punishable as such, for any applicant for an annuity, or for any annuitant, or any person required by this act to make any return for the payment of any tax, to make any false statement, or to knowingly withhold any facts material to the proper administration of this act, with intent to defraud the United States, under a penalty of a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 1 year, or both.

"CONSTRUCTION OF THIS ACT

"SEC. 14. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby."

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I just want to say that we desire to resume consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill as soon as the gentleman from Massachusetts concludes his remarks, and I shall be forced to object to any further requests.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I have risen in order not to let go unchallenged in the RECORD the statements made about the Clerk's office.

The present Clerk of the House and the previous Clerks of the House have acted with extreme fairness to all Members. I think the gentleman, upon examining his remarks, will realize that he probably expressed himself in a manner which does not reflect his true state of mind.

The present Clerk of the House of Representatives, a former Member of the House, is outstanding for his fairness in the discharge of his office. He commands the respect of all because of the fine quality of fairness that he possesses. I cannot speak too highly of him. I think the gentleman who has just made such strong remarks will realize that probably he expressed himself in a manner which does not reflect his true state of mind.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Briefly, for an apology or a correction of his statement. If not, I do not intend to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I may say in explanation to the gentleman that the action of which I spoke this morning has occurred several times.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have not seen such occurrences, and I will not permit such statements going into the RECORD without challenging them. [Applause.]

As a part of my remarks I include herein a letter received from Hon. South Trimble, Clerk of the House of Representatives:

Hon. JOHN J. McCORMACK,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. McCORMACK: Inasmuch as you were good enough to challenge several statements made on the floor of the House today criticizing the service of the Clerk's office, I herewith submit to you the facts relative thereto.

As you undoubtedly know, the matter of reporting the debates and handling matters inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is not a part of the duties of the Clerk of the House. This function is handled by the official reporters of debates; therefore the failure to print any part of a Member's remarks or extension of remarks is chargeable to that office or to the Government Printing Office, which prints the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Reference was also made to an application made to discharge a committee from the consideration of the McGroarty bill, and in explanation I will say that Mr. KRAMER came to my office quite a number of days before a motion to discharge the committee from consideration of the McGroarty bill could be filed, under the rule of the House, and asked for such a motion. He was informed that the necessary 30 days had not expired for the filing of such a motion, and that such a motion could not be filed with the Clerk until the necessary days had lapsed. He admonished me not to inform anyone that he intended filing such a motion. About a week later Mr. MONAGHAN made application for a similar motion and was informed that the necessary 30 days had not yet expired, and that such a motion could not be filed until the necessary 30 days had lapsed. He then made a similar admonishment to that of Mr. KRAMER.

This put me in a very embarrassing position, as you might see. I therefore resolved to keep the admonishments of these two gentlemen confidential and to furnish a motion on this bill to the first Member of the House who should make application to the Clerk after the necessary 30 days had expired. This appeared to be a proper solution to this problem. Mr. KRAMER, of California, was the first Member of the House to come to me after the necessary legislative days had expired under the rule, and I, therefore, received his motion to discharge the committee from consideration of the McGroarty bill. When Mr. MONAGHAN arrived in my office an hour or so later and made a similar application for a motion he was informed that Mr. KRAMER had already submitted a motion to discharge the committee on that bill, and that under the rules of the House two such motions could not be filed with the Clerk. He was then given a detailed explanation of all the facts relative thereto as I have set them forth above. He appeared to accept the facts at that time. I still believe that my action at that time was the only solution to that problem, and I hope that the House itself may feel the same way.

Mr. MONAGHAN has referred to three additional errors on the part of this office, but fails to give specific information concerning them. I feel sure that, if given any details, I will be able to give as reasonable and logical an explanation of them as for the two mentioned specifically.

The Clerk's office has always honestly endeavored to perform its multifarious duties without fear or favor and will continue to do so.

Yours sincerely,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we have voted to pay the adjusted-compensation certificates by exchanging one bond for another. We have authorized payment, but we have not appropriated the money. Therefore I am introducing today a bill, H. R. 10594, calling for payment of these bonds by the issuance of new money. [Applause.]

WE HAVE IDLE GOLD

We have nearly $11,000,000,000 of monetary gold that belongs to the people of the United States. Our Government has outstanding $6,000,000,000 of currency. That means that we have almost $2 in gold for every dollar of currency. In other words, we have $5,000,000,000 of idle gold that belongs to the Government. It is not worth any more to the people than so many brickbats. We dig it up in Colorado, and I understand we are going to bury it in Kentucky.

BONDS MAKE MORE TAXES

If these bonds are paid in non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, it will save the Government of the United States over a billion dollars in interest; because, unless we provide a method such as this for financing these baby bonds when they are presented for payment, it will be necessary for the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow this money by issuing more interest-bearing bonds.

I am opposed to the issuing of any further interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds.

At the close of the Civil War bonds were issued to pay the veterans of that war. That was 65 years ago. Those bonds are still not paid, and our Government is still paying interest on them.

I have information from the Treasury Department that there are $44,000,000,000 worth of interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds in the United States. That means that $44,000,000,000 of wealth in this country is not taxed either as to income or principal. But the interest on that $44,000,000,000 marches steadily on through good years and bad.

We have been told from this floor in very clever arguments that we cannot tax these bonds because they bear such low rates of interest that if we tax them we must offer them at just that much more interest, but what about the taxes on a farm? The farm can actually lose money and still the farmer must pay taxes or lose the farm. He is not exempted from taxation because his farm yields him only 3 percent. In fact, he can lose a year's labor and lose his seed, and yet we tax him on his farm. Therefore I see no good reason why the man who puts his money in bonds instead of a farm should be exempt from taxation, as well as receive interest which also is exempt from taxation.

Bonds are what the name signifies. Bonds mean profits for the bondholders and bondage for the people. Bonds mean shekels for the bondbrokers and shackles for the taxpayers.

SOUND MONEY

There are those who would create fear in the minds of the people as to the soundness of our money. They are the ones who profit by Government bonds. They are the ones who have invented such terms as "tinkering with the currency", "fiat money", and "printing-press money." They have also hollered "inflation."

Can it be said that we have a debased currency when we have almost two gold dollars back of every greenback? Can anyone say "inflation" when the dollar today is worth $1.25? No; these terms have been invented to prevent the issuance of new money and insure the continuation of the bond racket.

As to the printing presses, they are going to be started anyway. They will either print bills or bonds. Unless this Congress demands the printing of money, then these printing presses will print bonds, interest-bearing bonds, tax-exempt bonds. What is the difference so far as inflation is concerned? It is just as possible to have bond inflation and credit inflation as it is currency inflation, and much more dangerous, because when you are printing currency, you know exactly how many dollars you are turning out; but when you are authorizing the issuance of bonds, you are creating a backlog of credit against which the bankers of this country can lend and thereby bring about the greatest inflation we have ever known. Therefore it is much safer to pay these obligations in non-interest-bearing Treasury notes than it is to pay them in bonds.

CONSTITUTIONAL DUTY

The Supreme Court has said that Congress under the Constitution cannot help the farmers by control of production, but here is a constitutional method of helping the farmers by paying these obligations in new money.

The issuance of this money will increase the purchasing power of every bushel of wheat; it will increase the debt-paying power of every bale of cotton.

The money masters have hollered for the Constitution. All right, let us give them the Constitution. By it Congress is not granted a mere permissive right to control the value of money, but the language in the Constitution is mandatory. It says:

Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof.

The Wall Streeters have cried for the Constitution; now let us give it to them. [Applause.]

DEDICATION OF THE NEW YORK POST OFFICE ANNEX

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech of the Postmaster General of the United States on the occasion of the dedication of the New York City post office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know whether Postmaster General Farley is going to continue in a dual capacity—that is, as an office-holder in the Democratic administration and as Postmaster General?

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Postmaster General James A. Farley at the dedication of the New York City Post Office Annex at 12 noon, December 5, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the dedication today of this splendid annex to the New York City post office marks another forward step in the development of the mail facilities in our great metropolis, which is the largest and most important postal center in the world.

Federal buildings to house 16 postal stations in New York City and 4 in Brooklyn are now under construction or will be placed under construction soon. These 20 postal stations, together with the post-office annex, make up a Federal building program which is designed to provide modern structures with ample space for present and future needs at points where it has been determined that postal accommodations of a permanent nature are required.

These buildings will make possible a more efficient mail service, as well as improved working conditions for postal employees.

The postal service in New York began in little coffee houses, to which ship captains personally delivered the first letters from the old countries. In those early days New York was known as New Amsterdam.

In 1672 Governor Lovelace endeavored, but without success, to establish a monthly post-route service between New York and Boston. It was 10 years before this route was in successful operation.

The growing importance of New York was recognized by the British Government when the act of 1710 established the general post office for the British Empire and also designated Edinburgh, Scotland; Dublin, Ireland; and New York City as chief letter offices.

Thirty years later, in 1740, a post road was blazed from New York to Philadelphia and the first regular mail service was started between these cities. Postmaster Bailey, who took office in 1804, moved the post office from 62 Broadway to 29 William Street because the patrons complained that the Broadway office was too far uptown. The postmaster and one clerk carried on the entire business in a room 12 by 15 feet, and the postmaster and his family lived in the remaining portion of the house.

One hundred and forty-four mail boxes were installed and a shed was erected over a sidewalk so that patrons might be protected while waiting for their mail as the delivery windows opened directly on the street.

Our Republic—A History of the American People has the following reference to the early postal system of the United States:

"In 1775 a general postal system was established, with Ben Franklin at its head, and by 1783 a letter could be sent from Maine to Georgia. Philadelphia and New York received mail 5 days a week, but most towns were lucky to get one mail a week. Letters to out-of-the-way places were longer in reaching destination than is now required to reach a point on the opposite side of the globe. In the transmission of mails there was no provision for secrecy or security. Letters were opened and read by the carriers in the most shameful manner. So far was this practice indulged in that Madison and other leading men found it necessary to conduct a part of their correspondence in cipher. Post riders on their long and tedious journeys could generally find time enough to read all the missives entrusted to their care, for it was seldom that the entire mass of letters exceeded the capacity of a single pair of saddle-bags. On an average, a man did not mail more than one letter in a year."

It was from such humble beginnings that our present great United States Postal System has grown, and the growth of the Postal Service in New York City forms one of the most interesting and important chapters in the history of the Service.

Postal receipts in New York City now approximate $62,000,000 annually, which is about one-tenth of the entire postal revenues of the United States. So that you may better understand the magnitude of the mail business originating in New York, I cite a few statistics:

Each year there are mailed approximately 1,000,000,000 pieces of first-class matter, 600,000,000 circulars, and 50,000,000 parcel-post packages. That only includes our outgoing mail. Hundreds of millions of pieces of mail are also received at the New York City post office each year. Approximately 16,000 regular employees are engaged in the handling of this mail, and in addition there are thousands of substitute and temporary employees.

In this city the post office has a motor-vehicle service fleet comprising 515 trucks and 628 chauffeurs, and many other employees.

Our pneumatic-tube service of 26½ miles, connecting our most important stations, carries mail underground in canisters, each holding approximately 500 letters.

Seventeen years ago the first air-mail service in the United States was established between this city and Washington. Now 27 air-mail planes leave here daily and a like number arrive from all points of the country. There are also approximately 677 mail trains arriving and departing from this city daily, which carry the mails to all parts of this country.

Approximately 85 percent of all the international mails flow through New York, and an average of 180 mail steamships sail from here each month, while a corresponding number arrive each month.

One hundred and sixty-five thousand New Yorkers have more than $63,000,000 on deposit in our Postal Savings bank. Through the splendid cooperation of our New York postal organization, $9,171,700 in United States savings bonds have been sold to 13,552 investors in this city.

Selection of the site for this annex was announced by the Treasury Department on October 1, 1929, and the property was acquired under authority of the act of Congress passed on March 4, 1929. The site cost $2,500,000. On August 2, 1933, the Public Works Administration allotted $4,828,000 for this project, which amount was later increased $315,000, making a total limit of cost of $5,143,000.

The Treasury Department announced the selection of the architectural firm of McKim, Mead & White, of New York, to prepare the plans for this building, and the construction contract was awarded by the Treasury Department on February 26, 1934, to James Stewart & Co., of New York, in the amount of $4,287,700.

The building is a four-story and basement structure of classical style architecture; the exterior of light gray granite. The building covers a ground area of approximately 154,670 square feet, with volume of 13,763,000 cubic feet. The workroom contains 144,409 square feet plus 99,020 square feet for the financial section, as well as ample space and facilities for other postal activities located at this point.

Since 1790 New York City has had 24 postmasters. This list begins with Sebastian Bauman and ends with Albert Goldman, the present capable postmaster, whose wide business experience is enabling him to give this city a most excellent and satisfactory service.

Such buildings as this facilitate the work of handling the mail, but, after all, it is the men and women employees who make the Postal Service efficient. The thousands of loyal officials and employees in New York are keenly alive to the public interest and realize that the welfare and progress of the people in this community are largely dependent upon the manner in which they perform their duties.

New York City is the greatest and most important financial and commercial center in the country, and it is the most important seaport. Its prosperity is dependent upon the business of the country as a whole. Because of this, New York must have the most modern and efficient facilities for the transaction of its business. One of its greatest business facilities, if not the greatest, is the Postal Service.

The Post Office Department has diligently sought to provide the best possible service for New York, and it has sought to provide such service for the entire United States. This new annex and the score of other new postal stations now being constructed or soon to be constructed in Greater New York attest the accuracy of this statement.

During the past 2½ years we have greatly improved the postal service throughout the country. We have largely reorganized the Railway Mail Service, eliminating excess railway mail-car space. We have reconstructed the domestic air-mail system. We have revised the foreign air-mail system, adding the trans-Pacific service to this system. We have greatly improved the Rural Free Delivery Service and brought about a very substantial saving in its operation. We are now engaged in effecting economies and improvements in our Ocean Mail Service. On October 1, 1935, we put into effect a 40-hour working week for postal employees, and today the morale of our employees is better than it has ever been.

On June 19, 1934, Congress authorized the expenditure of $65,000,000 for public buildings at places to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General. Three hundred and sixty-one projects were selected for consideration under this authorization. Twenty-four of these projects have been completed and 236 have been placed under contract and are now in the course of construction. In 31 cases bids have been opened or have been invited.

Plans are now being prepared for the remaining projects under the $65,000,000 program, which comprise less than 20 percent of the total, and it is believed that it will be possible to ask for construction bids on these few remaining projects in the very near future.

Included in this program is the new post-office building in the Bronx, which is now in course of construction, and which is scheduled for completion by October 24, 1936.

On August 12, 1935, Congress appropriated an additional $60,000,000 for Federal buildings and the program under this appropriation provides for 357 projects. For 287 of these buildings sites had to be acquired. It is hoped to have a very large percentage of these buildings under construction during this winter. The Treasury and Post Office Departments are putting forth every effort to this end.

Postal receipts are regarded as one of the most reliable barometers of business conditions, and they have been steadily increasing for more than a year. The percentage of increase at the 12 largest post offices in the country for the week ending November 29, 1935, as compared with the same week last year, was 6.57 percent. Postal receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, were approximately $44,000,000 more than for the preceding fiscal year, and I have every reason to believe that as large, if not a larger, increase will be shown during the present fiscal year.

While postal receipts provide reliable evidence of the very substantial and continuing improvement in business conditions throughout the country, they are by no means the only evidence of such improvement. In fact, every index points in the same direction. Bank deposits and bank clearings continue to show increases; prices of farm products continue at a profitable level; railroad traffic, both freight and passenger, is steadily increasing; factories throughout the country are increasing production and adding to the number of their employees; there is renewed activity in the mining industries; steel production and building operations have greatly improved; wholesale and retail sales are constantly growing in volume. In fact, in every way and on every hand, there is a marked improvement in business conditions.

I am inclined to agree with a prominent western businessman with whom I talked a few days ago. He said that "in reality the country is out of the depression and that we are now suffering from the scars of the depression, but that even the scars will all be healed within the next year."

It must be clear to every unbiased person that the Roosevelt administration has not only saved this country from an utter collapse but that it has brought the country well along the road to recovery and prosperity.

I know that the memory of man is reputed to be very short, but I am quite sure that it is not so short that the people of the United States have forgotten the distressing and hopeless conditions which they faced 2½ years ago when President Roosevelt was inaugurated, and I am equally sure that our people realize and appreciate the vastly improved conditions which exist today.

We have passed through the valley and we are now in the highlands. A new day has dawned and we are well into a new era which will not only bring back prosperity but will give our people a greater degree of economic security and social justice than they have heretofore enjoyed.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATION BILL—1936

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10464) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10464, the supplemental appropriation bill of 1936, with Mr. COOPER of Tennessee in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to announce that when the Committee rose last evening the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] had offered an amendment, to which a point of order was raised and overruled. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is now entitled to recognition in support of his amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WARREN: On page 16, after line 5, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"For the purpose of collecting and disseminating useful information and data with respect to potato production and marketing within the United States to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture, the sum of $1,000,000 for the fiscal year 1936: Provided, That no part of such fund will be used for the enforcement of the Potato Act of 1935."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment is agreed to, and it has the support and approval of those in charge of the bill, the next paragraph in the bill will be entirely stricken out. I have heretofore frankly admitted that in light of the Supreme Court decision the Potato Act of 1935 would have no further standing in court. This amendment has nothing to do with that act in any way, shape, or form, and so expressly provides; therefore, any discussion outside of the amendment is not relevant, and I take it that the committee is only interested in the matter at issue.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman kindly tell the Committee just what it is proposed to do with the funds and what set-up is to be arranged?

Mr. WARREN. I am coming to that.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered in good faith. Of course, we all say that about all of our actions here, but I assure you that if I were not convinced of its necessity I would not be here urging its adoption today.

The amendment is frank and devoid of indirection and subterfuge. If, after you hear the argument, you are not convinced of the necessity of it, then I ask no one in the House to cast a vote in its behalf.

The Department of Agriculture has secured in the past few years full and complete information and history in regard to all of the major crops. This information is necessary and valuable for any future farm program that Congress may agree upon. It is generally understood that we will have a program which will include all crops. The only major crop for which the Department does not have the necessary information is potatoes. They tell me it is highly essential that information be secured for potatoes, and unless they have such data as is desired it will place any potato program a year behind other crops.

Now, it may be argued, and it was argued yesterday, that this information is already available, possibly, through the Bureau of the Census. This is entirely incorrect. The agricultural census merely asks the farmer how many acres did he plant and how many bushels did he raise in the year of 1934. This means nothing; is far from sufficient; and the next information gathered along that line would be about 5 years from now. This also contained no data as to sales, no data as to marketing or interstate movement, and the Department has again, today, advised me that this is necessary if potatoes are to be aided in any future program.

This amendment provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall secure this information and here is the information that they tell me they need:

Past acreage production shipments and sales of potatoes for a series of years, 1929 through 1935, United States totals present census figures and estimates incomplete and inaccurate insofar as taken. The same is true of State totals. County figures are not available except for acreage and production of census years and sales for the census year of 1929. These figures, by counties, are too incomplete and inaccurate to be used as a basis for preparing data for dissemination to farmers. Individual census schedules are confidential and not available.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, may I have 3 more minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 additional minutes. A number of us would like to ask some questions.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to proceed for 5 more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. WARREN (reading):

Even if these figures—

And I am quoting from a memorandum sent to me by the Department—were available, they would not give an accurate or adequate basis for determining past acreage, production, shipments, and sales of potatoes. Sales and shipments were not included in the 1934 census. Individual operators and farmers data are not available and therefore preparation of intelligible information to disseminate to farmers is impossible.

Now, it has also been argued that the Division of Crop and Livestock Estimates also has been gathering information about potatoes.

Did you know that this division, which only has an annual appropriation of approximately $600,000, attempts to make reports on 31 regular crops, 61 fruit and truck crops, and 13 different livestock products, and there is only one man in this entire Division who is in charge of the 61 fruit and truck crops, and it is an estimate where they send out a questionnaire to one or two people about possible acreage or average production in particular sections?

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think quite a number of gentlemen in the House would like to go along with the gentleman from North Carolina, because they like him, and because they have great confidence in his judgment, but on the basis of the facts as we understand them now, we simply cannot do this, and I wish to ask if the gentleman will kindly answer some questions, which are asked in entirely good faith purely for information, in regard to this matter?

Mr. WARREN. I shall try to answer them.

Mr. LUDLOW. The Potato Section of the Department of Agriculture, to which the gentleman refers, represented by Mr. Hutson and some other gentlemen, came before the Budget and before the Appropriations Subcommittee and presented the reqirements of their service, did they not?

Mr. WARREN. That was for the enforcement of the Potato Act.

Mr. LUDLOW. I have read those hearings from beginning to end, and not once did anybody, in presenting the needs and requirements of this Bureau, ever ask for this appropriation of $1,000,000, or any other sum, for potato statistics. Why did they not ask for it?

Mr. WARREN. That is very easy, indeed, to answer. The Department came before the committee, and, of course, no one asked them anything about it. The Department came there in view of a Budget estimate that had been sent up by the President of $4,250,000 for the enforcement of the Potato Act, and that was the only thing that they were concerned with, because they thought at that time they would be called upon to enforce the act.

Mr. LUDLOW. If this enormous sum of $1,000,000 for potato statistics is so vital, why did not some of these men, when they appeared before the committee to present their needs, say something about it? I do not understand yet why they did not at least say something about it. They were not a bit backward about asking the enormous sum of $4,250,000 to enforce the Potato Act, but they said nothing about needing additional statistics to assist in enforcement.

Mr. WARREN. Because, I will say to the gentleman, that had the act been enforced and had the appropriation been passed as provided in this bill, they would have secured these statistics under that item.

Mr. LUDLOW. I would also like the gentleman to answer the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], as well as my own, with respect to how this money is to be spent, how much personnel is going to be required, and for what exact purpose it is to be spent. When departments come before us asking for appropriations they submit somewhat of a break-down. What is the break-down on this proposition?

Mr. WARREN. I have tried to inform the gentleman of the purpose for which this is to be spent. I have no idea what the personnel would be, but I may say to the gentleman that the potato section, as set up under Mr. Hutson, and all the work that has been done under it down to date, there were merely a handful of people employed in the section, and they were taken practically as a whole, with one or two exceptions, from people already engaged in work within the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed for 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. I should like to ask the gentleman one more question. Is any of this money to be used to prepare advisory allotments?

Mr. WARREN. I understand that not one penny of it is to be used in reference to any allotment or any feature of the potato bill.

Mr. LUDLOW. I am not asking about legal allotments, but advisory allotments.

Mr. WARREN. Not that I know of.

Mr. LUDLOW. My friend is very gracious in replying to questions, and I have but one more inquiry: Has the gentleman talked with Mr. Austin, of the Census Bureau, as to the potato statistics now available in his Bureau?

Mr. WARREN. No; I have not. I have talked with the Department of Agriculture, and they tell me that the statistics on hand are not sufficient. Potatoes are generally the fifth crop in value in this country, and if it is to receive any consideration whatever, these statistics are necessary and vital.

Mr. LUDLOW. Let me say that Mr. Austin says that he believes the statistics already on hand are ample and that the appropriation of $1,000,000 to collect additional potato statistics is not at all necessary.

Mr. WARREN. I have just stated what the Department of Agriculture told me as to the advisability and necessity of this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, our good friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] is one of the most generally and universally beloved colleagues in this House. He is a splendid gentleman and a most valuable legislator. I am his friend. Ordinarily I would vote for any proposition that he made upon this floor without looking into it carefully, because I have that much confidence in him. He has been instrumental in saving millions of dollars for this Government.

But this proposition he is proposing, to turn over $1,000,000 in cash to Secretary Henry Wallace, to be spent by him as he sees fit, "in collecting and disseminating information about potato production and marketing", is one concerning which I believe that I am better posted and have more definite information than has been furnished my good friend from North Carolina.

If you will get the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Wednesday, January 25, 1933, just a few days before President Roosevelt had been inaugurated, you will see that I showed that since 1910 the Department of Agriculture prior to 1933 had spent $250,000 developing the Katahdin potato.

In order to get definite information on just what the Department had been doing with the hundreds of thousands of dollars we had been appropriating for it annually "to collect and disseminate useful information", I had to corkscrew it out of Dr. William A. Taylor, Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry, by asking him specific questions and making him give me specific answers.

THE $250,000 GOVERNMENT KATAHDIN POTATO

I elicited from Dr. Taylor that on November 16, 1928, Dr. E. C. Auchter was appointed head of the division of horticultural crops in the Bureau of Plant Industry under Dr. William A. Taylor as chief thereof, who in turn was under the Secretary of Agriculture, at a salary to Dr. Auchter of $5,600, and at that time—January 1933—his salary had been raised to $6,400 per annum; and in addition he was receiving what Dr. Taylor denominated as "a stipend" of $750 per annum from the Maryland University for delivering lectures there.

GOVERNMENT PAID $100 PER ACRE RENTAL

In answer to my specific question, I had Dr. Taylor admit that, dated April 1, 1929, on behalf of the Government, Dr. Auchter had rented 9 acres of land from the University of Maryland—which, by the way, was paying him a stipend of $750 per annum for delivering lectures—at an annual rental of $900, or $100 per acre rental per year.

In other words, as soon as Dr. Auchter got employed by the Government at $6,400 a year, although still holding his position with the Maryland University, his Government Bureau leased 9 acres of land from the Maryland University and pays the university $900 a year rental for the 9 acres; and that is done notwithstanding that we have got the Arlington experimental farm of 350 acres owned by the United States over here that ought to be adequate for the Agricultural Department experimental work. And the Government has other experimental farms. And I maintain that it was ridiculous for the Agricultural Department to pay a rental of $100 per acre per annum for this land, when it was at the same time also paying a rental of $10.21 per acre per annum for 325 acres of land also over in Maryland for alleged experimental purposes.

I maintain that it is most ridiculous for this Government to pay a rental of $100 per acre per annum for land over here in Maryland, when the Government owns and has turned over to the Department of Agriculture 350 acres for its experimental farm over here close to Arlington, Va.

I then asked him the following question:

You have probably seen the statement of Prof. L. C. Fitch, of Iowa, in Market Growers Journal of November 15, 1932, that the United States Department of Agriculture spent $250,000 in developing the new Katahdin potato. Please advise me whether this is true, and in such connection advise me the amount of money the Department of Agriculture has spent in developing the Katahdin potato.

And from Dr. Taylor's reply I quote:

We have seen the statement of Prof. L. C. Fitch, of Iowa, in the Market Growers Journal of November 15, to which you refer.

A little more than $250,000 has been expended since 1910 in potato breeding and selection work.

Then I asked the following question:

You are probably aware of the statement that the Department has been breeding potatoes since 1910 and has put out only one variety to this date. Please advise if this is true.

And from Dr. Taylor's reply I quote:

It is true that at the present time only one of a considerable number of promising potato seedlings has been named and commercially distributed.

And that is the Katahdin. He says:

Another variety will be named shortly and given an extensive field test in 1933.

Now, let us see just what this famous Government-created $250,000 Katahdin potato has accomplished for the farmers and consumers of the United States. I then asked this Bureau this question:

You have probably seen the statement made by Prof. A. G. Tolaas, in the American Potato Journal of October 1932, that the average yield of your new Katahdin potato on eight farms in Minnesota was 240 bushels per acre, while the old well-known variety of Irish Cobbler potato yielded 269 bushels per acre on the same farms. Please advise me your reaction on this statement.

From Dr. Taylor's reply I quote:

We have seen the statement of Prof. A. G. Tolaas in the American Potato Journal of October 1932, stating that the average yield of the Katahdin potato on eight farms in Minnesota was less than the yield of the Irish Cobbler variety.

Then he tries to explain, from which I quote:

In Mr. Tolaas' report to this Department, giving the results of this season's study, he states:

"There has been a great deal of interest in this variety, and I believe that it does have a commercial possibility in this region."

Regarding one of our other seedlings, he states:

"From what I have seen of this seedling it probably would be even more suitable to our conditions than is the Katahdin."

Then I asked of this Bureau the following question:

You have probably seen the statement of Dr. John Bushnell in the proceedings of the seventeenth annual meeting of the Ohio Vegetable Growers' Association, 1932, that in three trials in Ohio the new Katahdin potato yielded 232 bushels per acre, while the old well-known Russet Rural variety yielded 266 bushels per acre. Please give me your reaction on this statement.

From Dr. Taylor's reply, I quote:

We have seen the statement of Dr. John Bushnell given in the proceedings of the seventeenth annual meeting of the Ohio Vegetable Growers' Association, and we have personal reports from Dr. Bushnell. His report on the Katahdin this year, as well as last year, indicates that it is not especially suitable under his conditions.

Thus you see that Dr. Taylor did not deny the criticism made by Dr. John Bushnell, of Ohio, that after the Agricultural Department had spent $250,000 of the people's tax money between 1910 and 1933 developing its specially named Katahdin potato, the old well-known Russet Rural variety in Ohio had produced 54 bushels of potatoes more per acre than the Department's Government-endowed $250,000 Katahdin.

Then I asked the Bureau this question:

Please advise me whether or not the Katahdin potato is a late potato and not good in sections where early varieties are used, and also whether or not it has a bitter taste when cooked.

And from Dr. Taylor's reply I quote:

Katahdin is a late variety and will not compete with Irish Cobbler, if they are dug when the Cobbler is mature and the Katahdin is still immature. A few Katahdins were reported strong by one or two of the judges.

Then I asked the Bureau for the following information:

Please advise me the date when F. J. Stevenson, of Minnesota, was employed by your Department to assist in breeding potatoes. (a) What is his salary at the present time? (b) Is it not a fact that he has been paid by the Agricultural Department $1,000 more than he received at the time he was employed? (c) Also please advise me whether or not it is a fact that said F. J. Stevenson never did any potato work until he was appointed to breed potatoes for the United States?

And, from Dr. Taylor's reply, I quote:

Dr. F. J. Stevenson, of the University of Minnesota, was selected from the civil-service list and employed by this Bureau to assist in breeding potatoes on July 15, 1930. Dr. Stevenson's present salary is normally $4,200 per annum, with the legislative furlough. He had been receiving a salary of $3,300.

You will note that he was receiving only $3,300 per annum at the time he was employed by the Department of Agriculture at $4,200, although he had never specialized in potato breeding, for Dr. Taylor then admitted:

Dr. Stevenson had not specialized on potato breeding prior to his work in this Bureau.

The time has come for this Department of Agriculture to stop wasting money in the name of the farmers. The farmers cannot stop it. But we Members of Congress can stop it, and the only way to stop it is by our votes. We must vote against these wasteful items.

Secretary Henry Wallace has a whole army of Government employees scattered over my district, and he has an army of them scattered over Texas and in every State of this Union.

To show you just how arrogant and autocratic they have become, under his Republican guidance, I want to quote from one down in Callahan County, Tex.:

[From the Cross Plains (Tex.) Review of Nov. 15, 1935]

ITEMS OF INTEREST FROM COUNTY AGENT'S OFFICE

By Ross B. Jenkins

TALK TO YOUR COUNTY AGENT ABOUT ADJUSTMENT

From time to time some producers think they have an adjustment that could be made and address their grievances to Representative THOMAS L. BLANTON or to the Secretary of Agriculture, Henry A. Wallace, and a few times to President Roosevelt. Of course, every citizen has the right to address any of the above mentioned or any Senator, as far as that is concerned, but it is all a waste of time as for getting the adjustment made.

All that time can be saved and much better and detailed information can be gained by going to the county agent and talking over the complaint direct.

No person is going to get any more certificates than are authorized by the county committee and sanctioned by the county agent. No person will get more hogs or a greater peanut acreage without it meets the approval of the respective county allotment committee which authorizes it to the county agent.

No man has yet received one pound of cotton exemptions or any other consideration by trying to take their case over the heads of the county committee. It's simply not done that way.

You will note that this county agent, who draws a salary of $200 per month from this Government in addition to what Callahan County pays him, tells the Democratic farmers of a whole county that they are wasting time to take any matter up with any Congressman or Senator (spelled with a small letter), because he is the chief high-muck-a-muck, holding his position under a Republican Secretary of Agriculture.

When farmers of Callahan County were complaining to me in 1934 that they were not getting from this Henry Wallace agent what was coming to them, and the complaints were so numerous as to warrant me to investigate it, I called on this agent to furnish me a list of all the farmers he had contracts with, their post-office addresses, and some other data, and he positively refused to do so, intimating that it was none of my business, and I was forced to take the matter up with Washington before I forced him to comply.

SHIFTS HIS COUNTY AGENTS ABOUT

Secretary Wallace first sent his agent, C. Metz Heald, to my home county of Taylor, where he stayed until about January 1935. Then he was sent to Eastland as the county agent of Eastland County. The following will show you just how many A. A. A. employees Secretary Wallace had in the office there at Eastland:

[From the Cisco (Tex.) Daily Press, Jan. 9, 1936]

COUNTY AGENT IS DIRECTED TO STOP WORK

As completely as a jammed projection machine arrests a motion picture into a "still", the ruling of the United States Supreme Court Tuesday halted all manifestations of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. The effect of the ruling was immediate to every individual affected by the A. A. A.

County Agent C. Metz Heald, at Eastland, received a telegram Tuesday morning stopping action on all programs under the A. A. A. and ordering him to take charge of all programs under the A. A. A. and ordering him to take charge of all forms, records, and property of the A. A. A.

FIVE PROGRAMS HALTED

All five programs under the A. A. A. in Eastland County were brought to abrupt halt. Four A. A. A. paid employees in Mr. Heald's office were released. They are W. W. Kelly, in charge of the corn-hog program; J. B. Hart, in charge of contract division for all programs; Miss Connie Groves, in charge of the subsidiary division; and Miss Genevieve Lyons, general stenographer.

The five programs affected here are the cotton-control program, corn-hog, peanut, potato, and wheat-control programs.

TELEGRAM

The telegram received by Mr. Heald read:

C. M. HEALD,

County Agent, Eastland County:

Following telegram signed by C. W. Warburton and Chester Davis: [Quote] Decision Supreme Court holds control program unconstitutional [Stop] Action these programs suspended pending further notice [Stop] Notify members State committees and boards, State field men, county control associations, and committees to discontinue work and incur no expense pending further information [Stop] Notify county agents as Federal employees to take charge all production-control association forms, records, and property [Unquote] You are to carry out these instructions to the letter [Stop] Be governed only by instructions from official sources [Stop] We will endeavor to keep you advised.

H. H. WILLIAMSON.

Mr. Williamson is director of extension work in Texas.

I found out that they had been sending these long-haired potato scientists down to old Mexico, digging around in the mountains hunting for original potato sprouts. They had sent them all through South America. The people paid their bills. My God, when is this waste of public money in the name of the American farmer going to end? [Applause.]

I want to say this to my friend from North Carolina that, of course, we are going to throw out the succeeding proposition seeking to waste $1,250,000 on an unconstitutional law, and there will be no trouble about that. We are going to save that $1,250,000. [Applause.]

This amendment seeks to put $1,000,000 into the hands of Secretary Wallace, without a safeguard on it, and let him control the spending. Not even General McCarl can pass on how he spends it. I am not willing to put this $1,000,000 into the hands of Secretary Wallace.

I say this, that Secretary Wallace has done more in my State to hurt the Democratic administration than every other officeholder in the United States, and he will do more to hurt us when election time comes. I once had a flock of sheep, and I learned something about sheep. There is a black sheep in every flock, and Secretary Wallace happens to be the black sheep in the Democratic flock. He has filled my district and all of the other districts in the State of Texas with an army of arrogant, inefficient officeholders. In every county he has a county agent drawing $200 a month from this Government, and he has an assistant drawing $150 a month from this Government, and other clerks. Not once has he conferred with a Democratic Congressman about their appointment.

Mr. BIERMANN. But Secretary Wallace has not asked for this million dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. But he wants it, and this amendment is going to put it in his hands. So we must kill this amendment.

Mr. BIERMANN. He never asked for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why give this $1,000,000 to him if he did not ask for it? I say to my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] that he has saved more money from being spent wastefully probably than any other man in the House. He is the efficient chairman of our Committee on Accounts. He works hard and zealously to save the people's money; and how on earth they could have prevailed on him to offer this amendment to waste a million dollars and put it in the hands of one man to spend I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert these excerpts.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that in order to conduct the debate for and against the amendment, some gentleman supporting the amendment should be recognized next. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] seek recognition for that purpose?

Mr. BLAND. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for 5 minutes.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, we are talking of Irish potatoes, not Katahdan potatoes. I have never heard anything about Katahdan potatoes and I know nothing about the $200,000 which it is claimed has been spent in developing them. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] takes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] to task for proposing this amendment. If he should go into the territory represented by the gentleman from North Carolina and the territory represented by me, by the Members from Maryland, by the Members from Maine, and by Members from many other potato sections, he would see such a deplorable condition that he would change his position and would undoubtedly support the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina. While other commodities have been protected under the agricultural administration, the burden on the potato has become heavier and heavier. We are asking now for some relief.

We are not asking for the enforcement of the Potato Act of 1935, which in the light of recent decisions will be held unconstitutional in all probability. The Potato Act, however, was based on the cotton legislation, the tobacco legislation, and other legislation of that kind. The potato is just as much entitled to protection as any other agricultural product now receiving protection at the hands of the Government. We are asking that this money shall be appropriated for the purpose of collecting and disseminating information for the purposes which the gentleman from North Carolina so ably presented to the House. The gentleman from Texas says that you are asked to put it into Secretary Wallace's hands and states that he is afraid of Secretary Wallace. In the name of heaven, gentlemen, who should be afraid of Secretary Wallace but the potato growers themselves, who have tried to have enforced legislation for the benefit of potatoes? If we are willing to trust Secretary Wallace in this, surely the gentleman from Texas should be willing to trust him with the administration of this fund. This legislation may mean escape from bankruptcy and would certainly provide some measure of relief. These people are unable to pay their debts. They have mortgages on their homes, their taxes are unpaid, and they are coming to you in desperation, asking that something may be done which may lighten some of the burdens that they must now bear. I ask you to support the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM to the amendment offered by Mr. WARREN: Page 1, line 5, strike out "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$500,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire if this is in accordance with the agreement. The gentleman did not intimate that he was going to offer another amendment and then take up the time so that those who wanted to debate this matter would not have an opportunity to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman submits that as a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will state that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto has been limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, let us get the record straight on just where we stand on potatoes. It is admitted that all funds for the enforcement of the Potato Act are out; that no effort will be made to put funds into the bill for the enforcement of the Potato Act, although the Budget sent to us an estimate of $4,250,000 for that purpose. It came up, however, before the decision of the Supreme Court in the A. A. A. case. I think it might be fairly assumed that if that decision had come down before the Budget estimate there might have been some difference in the estimate sent to the committee.

Let me say it is well within the authority of the legislation which we passed, that money should be appropriated for a preliminary investigation and the gathering of useful information with reference to this large crop. Of course, I only speak for myself. The Committee on Appropriations has not acted on the matter, and I do not undertake to speak for all the Members of the Appropriation Committee. Each Member can speak for himself. But I have said to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] and my colleague from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], who are so much interested in this, that, in my judgment, there is abundant reason why the Department of Agriculture should have adequate and proper information about this great industry, so that in any contemplated farm program that may be projected, they may be able to take care of this great portion of the farm population.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LUDLOW. If they think they should have it, why have they not asked for it until this eleventh hour?

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, they have asked for it. They did not come before the committee, but the Department says it needs this information. It seems to me that $500,000 is a happy way out of this thing. We have cut the Budget from $4,250,000 down to $500,000. I have no interest in it, but I hope the committee will adopt the amendment and let the people who are interested in potatoes have a sum to gather their information, and in the farm program they will be prepared to present their case.

Mr. FULLER, Mr. TABER, and Mr. TARVER rose.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], a member of the committee.

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] rising in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] or the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. FULLER. Yes; both the original amendment and the last amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. In view of the fact that the Chairman announced a moment ago that he intended to divide the time equally and in turn between those in favor of the Warren amendment and those opposed to it, does the Chair not take the position that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] was actually in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]?

The CHAIRMAN. Since the statement made by the Chair a moment ago, an amendment has been offered which, of course, altered the situation to that extent. The gentleman from Virginia was recognized in support of his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TARVER. I was on my feet asking recognition at the time the Chair recognized the gentleman from Arkansas. I am a member of the committee and I desire to be heard on the same side of the question on which the gentleman from Arkansas proposes to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is eminently correct. The Chair will state, with due apology, that he sought to recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], a member of the committee, and, as the gentleman knows, the ranking minority member. The gentleman indicated he would yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TARVER. I do not understand that the gentleman from New York has the right to designate who should take the floor. I insist that I am entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to recognition, and the Chair will endeavor to recognize him as soon as possible.

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FULLER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. To submit a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. FULLER. No; not in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will come out of the gentleman's time if he yields.

Mr. FULLER. I do not yield, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, this is nothing but a subterfuge to try to take care of the most unpopular measure that was passed by this Congress at the last session. Through the personal influence of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], whom we all love, that bill was passed. The newspapers of the United States have justly held us up to ridicule and contempt for having passed the potato bill under the A. A. A. regulations. Even the Secretary of Agriculture in a newspaper article says it is practically impossible of administration. It is only an example of what we have done for our good friend from North Carolina. Not very long ago we went entirely outside the realms of agriculture and allowed him to put peanuts under the regulation of the A. A. A., and they are there now. Then, when we oppose a thing like this, which is holding us up to ridicule and contempt, he thinks he ought to get by with it. As a matter of fact, my good friends who are in sympathy with this measure come to me, put their arm around my shoulder, thinking I will go down the line all the time, and say: "Do not fight that, that just means jobs for these Government fellows who are going to be let out under the A. A. A." It is to allow a lot of them to hold jobs looking after potatoes and potato bugs. Let the "bug-ologists" perform this task. One million dollars to look after potato bugs, how their eyes grow, and how to keep them open! What is the purpose for this $1,000,000? How are you going to expend it? What are you going to do with it, and what information do you want? People have been engaging in this business for years and years. They know more about the marketing and growing of potatoes than anybody you could get from a little college and who is unexperienced in the business. It is just a subterfuge to try to get away from this other provision that follows later in the bill. The potato industry held us out to the world in contempt. It is an infinitesimal part of agriculture.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. FULLER. Just for a question.

Mr. SHORT. If we make an appropriation for this particular crop, will we not be asked to make appropriations for every other crop?

Mr. FULLER. Yes.

The people of my district ship more canned tomatoes, more peaches, and more apples in one year than all the potatoes shipped out of North Carolina and Virginia put together, and nobody seeks to regulate us or give us any benefit under this law. It is just an excuse to try to give some semblance of authority, to try to keep this potato law before the American public and make the American public like it, and make the people who live in the cities pay at least twice as much as they should for potatoes.

The idea of such regulations as requiring the tagging of all potato production over 5 bushels! It was enough to make the American press and the American people ridicule Members of Congress. The measure was passed without serious consideration, and now is the time to correct the error. In my opinion any man who votes for this appropriation has little regard for agriculture as a whole, has little regard for the money of the people of the country. Such a course brings into disfavor the great agricultural-adjustment program. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] acknowledges he does not speak for the committee, and has no authority to so speak for the committee, but is seeking to aid his buddy from North Carolina, Mr. WARREN, and asking for half. What is $500,000 to them? You could take that much money and make many a soul in this country happy. We have got to draw the line sometime on useless, worthless, frivolous expenditures which are sought simply for the purpose of keeping men in jobs. [Applause.]

Mr. TARVER, Mr. BARDEN, and Mr. MAY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia, a member of the committee, for 5 minutes.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, as a member of your subcommittee on agricultural appropriations, I hope to be able to submit to you some statements that should, in my judgment, receive your consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the question of the regularity of the procedure here. The subcommittee on agricultural appropriations for some time has been, and at the present time is, holding sessions morning and afternoon on items of this identical character relating to other activities of the Department of Agriculture. Witnesses from the Department of Agriculture appear before our committee and testify concerning the uses to which they propose to put the appropriations which they ask, the number of employees which will be necessary in expending the appropriations, and every detail of their plans with regard to the expenditure of the appropriation if it should be granted.

That is the proper course to be pursued in appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States for the use of any department. You might as well do away with your subcommittees and your Appropriations Committee if you permit the inclusion of large amounts on the floor without any hearings having been had before a subcommittee; without even a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture or any official of the Department of Agriculture showing the appropriation to be necessary of the tremendous sum asked either in the original amendment or in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. LUDLOW. Has the gentleman's subcommittee at any time or in any way, shape, or form ever had this matter before it?

Mr. TARVER. We have not been requested to take any action in regard to this subject matter at all. I may say here that while this item is offered as an amendment to a deficiency bill it is clearly not a matter of deficiency, except upon the idea that it involves an appropriation for the present fiscal year, because no appropriation for this particular purpose has been made heretofore. It is clearly a matter which comes within the jurisdiction of your subcommittee on agricultural appropriations. I do not know what funds may be necessary for this purpose. You do not know. No official of the Department has testified before my subcommittee or any other subcommittee with regard to the matter. Let me assure the Members who are interested in the making of this appropriation that if those who are sponsoring it will have officials of the Department of Agriculture appear before us in our hearings which are now going on, and will submit evidence showing a necessity for this appropriation or any part of it, the subcommittee will give them sympathetic consideration. The matter would then only be delayed for the brief period of time which will elapse before our bill is completed and submitted to the House. That is not likely to be a greater period of time than 2 or 3 weeks.

Why not permit this matter to be investigated and have some evidence submitted to the House or one of its committees showing the necessity for this appropriation before we undertake to write it into an appropriation bill?

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TARVER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. If the proposed appropriation is clearly for statistical purposes, what value is the farmer going to get by being told how many potatoes he raised last year?

Mr. TARVER. That is a matter which should be developed by evidence before a proper committee of the House. We have had no evidence submitted with reference to it, not even a letter from an official of the Department of Agriculture. I do not agree with my colleague from Texas that the Secretary of Agriculture should be blamed for this matter. The Secretary of Agriculture, however subject to condemnation or criticism his conduct may be regarded by some Members of the House, has had nothing to do with this. He is not asking the Congress to pass it, and if we agree to the amendment we agree to it at the request of our distinguished colleague the gentleman from North Carolina, loved, as has been said, by all Members of the House, and upon his request alone rather than upon the submission of proper evidence justifying the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BARDEN] both seek recognition in support of the amendment. If agreeable to both gentlemen, the Chair will recognize them for 3 minutes. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] for 3 minutes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia, I presume, does not want to give the members of the committee the impression that this matter was not threshed out before the subcommittee on deficiency of the Appropriations Committee. It is true that there is some difference in the wording as between the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina and the provision that is already in the appropriation bill; but the general subject matter was given consideration. I am informed that the matter was presented to that subcommittee requesting that money be made available to make the same type of an investigation to which the gentleman from North Carolina is now referring.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield to the gentleman from New York, briefly.

Mr. TABER. Nothing of that kind was presented, and I attended every hearing.

Mr. BOILEAU. I know that the bill now provides for $1,250,000. This deficiency bill was reported out since the Supreme Court knocked out the A. A. A., and I presume every member of the Deficiency Committee knew that the Potato Control Act was as unconstitutional as the A. A. A. When they reported this bill out they must have assumed that the Secretary of Agriculture would use the money primarily in the way provided for in the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The gentleman from Texas, for whom I have a high regard, referred to the amount of money that was spent in making some inquiry in trying to develop a new potato known as the Katahdan potato. That is a collateral issue. What difference does it make how much money has been wasted in the past, provided it can be demonstrated that this money is needed in the future? I submit that all Members of the House who voted against the Potato Act in 1935 and who come from districts which produce potatoes should give this amendment their support. There is absolutely no connection between this bill and the Potato Act, which the Supreme Court declared was unconstitutional.

This bill simply tries to put the potato farmer in the same position that the wheat farmer, the cotton farmer, the tobacco farmer, and all the rest of them are in now, because, under the old A. A. A., the Department of Agriculture has spent millions upon millions of dollars to collect data with reference to wheat, with reference to tobacco, with reference to cotton, and all the other commodities. We propose now to appropriate just a little bit of money so that when the permanent program goes into effect they will have some information upon which to base a program for potatoes as well as for the other farm products.

Mr. BARDEN and Mr. TABER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. As indicated, the Chair feels the gentleman from North Carolina is entitled to recognition for 3 minutes.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Chairman, I come from a district which adjoins the district of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. I know something of the potato situation in that section and I know something of the needs of the potato farmers, and here we have garnered facts concerning every other major crop and left potatoes out.

In order to pass wise legislation we must have facts. There have been a considerable number of assaults made on the potato bill of last year; probably some may think they are justified in making them. I do not, but if so, we can charge a part of that to the very fact we did not have the information we are now calling for, and the next time we begin to legislate we will find that we will need this information.

Now, as to the gentleman from Texas, I do not take him very seriously about this situation, and I think he split the switch when he began to talk about the development of some unheard-of potato, and when it comes to the gentleman from Arkansas, who referred to this matter as a subterfuge, and branded it as such, I say to him in all frankness, my good friend [Mr. WARREN] does not indulge in subterfuge. [Applause.]

This piece of legislation is needed, this appropriation is needed, and it has been cut to $500,000 in order that we might carry through the investigation and ascertain the facts that are needed.

So far as going before the Agricultural Committee is concerned, these facts have been discussed before the Agricultural Committee many times——

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARDEN. Yes.

Mr. TARVER. If the gentleman means my committee, he is totally in error, because they have never been discussed at all there by anybody.

Mr. BARDEN. May I say to the gentleman that it might not have been labeled just as this amendment is, but I say we certainly had enough hearings about the potato situation to convey sufficient information to the Agricultural Committee that this is needed.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman confuses the agricultural subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations with the Committee on Agriculture, which is the legislative committee.

Mr. TABER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Permit the Chair to invite attention to the fact that the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Oklahoma are seeking recognition in opposition to the amendment. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was before the committee it appeared that only $27,000 had been spent on this proposition to date, and that came by an allotment out of the $100,000,000 original A. A. A. appropriation. They are down to the point where potatoes are coming into the market from Florida, and they wanted this money not for study but for allotment purposes and for collection of taxes.

There was no intimation whatever they needed money for any such purpose as that set forth in the amendments under consideration. There is no intimation anywhere of any intelligent way in which this money might be spent.

Let me say that there is available in 1936 for experimental and research purposes $6,728,000 for the Department of Agriculture; for 1937 appropriation there is $7,778,000.

Now, it is utterly and absolutely ridiculous for us to appropriate either $500,000 or $1,000,000 for this purpose, because it is not needed.

These people were all ready to make allotments; they have made a study with the money they had. It is absolutely ridiculous for us to appropriate $1,000,000 or $500,000 to make a study on these matters which have already been made. [Applause.]

I hope the House will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, and also the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. About 30 minutes ago it was said that this study to gather statistical data and information to be furnished the farmers on how to raise potatoes was worth a million dollars, and 15 minutes ago it was only half as important and was reduced to $500,000 by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. TABER. Yes; and I hope it will go all the way down.

Mr. DONDERO. Last year Maine, the first State in the Nation in the production of potatoes, raised so many potatoes that the price went down to 2 cents a bushel, and they dumped 5,000,000 bushels in a lake. How can this House justify the expenditure of a million dollars, or even $500,000, for the purpose proposed in the face of such facts?

Mr. TABER. I do not know about that; but the Census Bureau in the 1930 and the 1935 censuses has statistics of all the potatoes that each farmer raised. There is no legitimate need for taking this money out of the Treasury for any such purpose as this. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, both of the pending amendments ought to be voted down. To appropriate such a large sum of $1,000,000 as called for in the amendment offered by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] without any hearings or consideration of a committee is to my mind unthinkable. To cut the amount half in two, as proposed by my good friend the able gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] is hardly less objectionable. It simply looks like an effort on the part of these two House leaders, whom we all respect, to come into the back door and get an unreasonable amount of money for potato investigation, but which matter has not even been presented to the proper committee.

We have just heard the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER], of the agricultural subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, state that no such request has been even presented to his committee, but if such a request should come that it would be given sympathetic consideration. Certainly that committee should be given that much courtesy.

Now, considerable discussion has been made this afternoon about the much-discussed and much-abused potato bill passed during the last session at the urgent request of the potato growers of the Nation.

Certainly it is not my purpose to defend the ill-fated potato-control bill that all agree is outlawed by the Supreme Court in its A. A. A. decision. But many of us who represent districts where very little, if any, Irish potatoes are grown for the market voted for the potato-control bill reluctantly, in the hopes that it would aid potato growers. Just to keep the record straight, be it remembered that potatoes were selling as low as 10 cents per bushel on the market when the bill was passed. And within 24 hours after the passage of the Potato Control Act the price advanced considerably.

Members of this House from Colorado, Iowa, Maine, and other potato-growing States had loyally supported legislation to help the cotton growers of the South, so I have no apology for lending my support to aid the distressed potato growers.

But that is water over the dam. I am willing now to further lend my assistance to my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] in any reasonable manner, but I again insist that he should make the proper showing in a regular way before the proper committee of this House. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WARREN) there were—ayes 31, noes 116.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS

Potato Act of 1935: For carrying into effect the provisions of the Potato Act of 1935, approved August 24, 1935, there is hereby appropriated and made available to the Secretary of Agriculture the proceeds derived from the taxes imposed by such act to remain available until June 30, 1936; together with an additional amount of $1,250,000, fiscal year 1936.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: Beginning on line 6, page 16, strike out the paragraph ending in line 12.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, in view of the sentiment of the House just expressed when the last vote was taken, I do not think that any debate is necessary on this amendment.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. ELLENBOGEN: Page 16, line 6, strike out all of lines 6 to 12, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "No appropriation heretofore made or contained in this bill shall be used for the enforcement of the provisions of the Potato Act of 1935, approved August 24, 1935."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill and is not germane to the amendment to which it is offered. It undertakes to put a limitation on money heretofore appropriated and not covered in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman briefly on the point of order.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, at this time the Department of Agriculture is using the appropriation for the purpose of enforcing the Potato Act.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the gentleman must confine his remarks to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair requested the gentleman to speak to the point of order.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. The appropriation contained on page 16 of the deficiency appropriation bill is for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of the Potato Act. Therefore, any amendment that seeks to limit or prevent the Department from enforcing that act is a proper amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the opinion of the Chair, goes further than indicated by the gentleman's statement in support of his amendment. The amendment, in the opinion of the Chair, very clearly embraces legislation which is not in order on an appropriation bill. The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia. At the time of the passage of the Potato Control Act of 1935 the House had no opportunity to discuss it except for 1 hour. It was attached in the Senate as a rider to the amendments made last year to the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It then came over here from the Senate with no opportunity for proper discussion. One hour's discussion is not sufficient for this House to act intelligently on a bill of that import and magnitude. On the Senate side the record shows that it was not submitted to any committee; that it never had the benefit of study by any Senate committee, and that there was no report from any such a committee. There was very limited debate in the Senate itself. It is true there was some consideration of it in the Agricultural Committee on the House side; and it was voted out of the House committee by a very close vote. I think that the vote was 11 to 12, but 12 were in favor of the bill, so the potato bill was reported to the House. But that particular bill never came before this House and was never considered by this House, because the Senate rider superseded it.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman prepared the minority committee report on the House bill, which was filed, and the gentleman also made a speech on the floor of this House at that time, which thoroughly convinced many of us just what the bill was. I think the gentleman is entitled to credit for the fight that he made and for what he did and said. The fight against the potato bill, led by the gentleman from Iowa, brought the whole thing to the attention of the country, and by reason of general indignation we are today wiping out the whole thing.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I thank the gentleman for his kind remarks. I was about to say that in the minority report, which I had the duty and also the pleasure of preparing, we point out the very thing that gentlemen now on this floor admit to be true, namely, that that act was unconstitutional. Now I am glad to have the brave and candid admissions of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] frankly stating that the act was unconstitutional. It follows that after all the views of the minority of the committee were correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Was the gentleman equally wise about the constitutionality about the remainder of the A. A. A. when that was here, or did the gentleman vote for that?

Mr. GILCHRIST. There were a great many portions of the A. A. A. Act that are not affected in any way by the decision of the Supreme Court. I have stated many times in discussing the Potato Act that compliance with it was not voluntary. No man had a chance to avoid it. Compliance with a great many of the other provisions of the A. A. A. is a voluntary matter with the farmer. He can go into it or stay out of it, as he chooses. That is what I pointed out last year. I then said that there was a great difference in principle between an act which forced a man to yield to it and one which did not force such yielding; between an act which coerces and compels and regiments and one which extends to the American farmer the right to elect for himself and to choose just what course he will pursue.

Mr. BREWSTER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the gentleman recognize that the Supreme Court was unable to draw his distinction as to voluntary and compulsory?

Mr. GILCHRIST. The Supreme Court has never passed upon that distinction. The Supreme Court held that the processing tax of the A. A. A. as related to cotton was not constitutional. It may never notice such a distinction.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. In view of the fact that we raise more potatoes now than we can use, does not the gentleman think that the information that might be gathered under this section should be "how farmers should not raise potatoes"?

Mr. GILCHRIST. The House has already rejected the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN], which provided for an appropriation to pay for gathering potato statistics, and I need not answer the gentleman's question or express any opinion regarding it, but will leave the suggestion implied in his question to the consideration of the House. But since the House voted down the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina there has come into my hands a telegram from Mr. C. L. Fitch, the able and tireless secretary of the Iowa State Vegetable Growers' Association, reading as follows:

Grower representatives at Washington of potato interests wire me to wire you what money needed to get additional potato statistics for future adjustment program. In my judgment, 2 days' time of two good Washington men and travel money to bring 20 dealers and growers to central point would be all necessary. Check on present statistics potato production here is important, because everywhere but number large-scale producers hardly justifies State-wide detailed research.

I am willing to have the Agricultural Administration gather useful data concerning potatoes, but certainly no great additional sum is needed for that purpose if we regard the opinion of my good friend, the efficient secretary of the Iowa association. And I wish to say, finally, that I am ready at all times to support the interests of all farmers, wherever they may be and whatever they may produce. I do not believe that one group of farmers should chisel upon or against another group of farmers. I still believe, as I did a year ago, that potato growers who insist on raising surpluses and in glutting local markets may be taken care of under the marketing agreements and orders provided in the Triple A. I believe in helping the potato farmer, the cotton farmer, the tobacco farmer, as well as the corn farmer, the hog farmer, and the dairy farmer. We should do this in a way, however, that does not take away the rights of any farmer nor array the one against the other. The Triple A has been of service, and we should give credit to it for many good and wholesome things.

The potato farmer as well as all farmers must be given a just portion of that prosperity that is due to all agriculturists. Let him be a free man and not a regimented and controlled man, and give him a full measure of prosperity. But the excesses of the Potato Act of 1935, which were denounced at the time by many of us, have led it to an early death. Requiescat in pace!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] has expired.

All time has expired on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Payments to cotton ginners: The appropriations for carrying into effect the act entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved April 21, 1934 (48 Stat., pp. 598–607), as amended, are hereby made available to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of section 40 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved August 24, 1935.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 16, after line 24, insert as a new paragraph the following:

"Payments for agricultural adjustment: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out all the purposes of and to meet all obligations and commitments—including salaries and administrative expenses—heretofore or hereafter incurred under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, or regulations heretofore issued thereunder, except refunds pursuant to section 21 (d) of that act, an additional amount of $296,185,000, together with a sum equal in amount to the unexpended balances of the funds heretofore established by the President under authority of section 15 (f) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, and directed by the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, to be spent for the benefit of agriculture in Puerto Rico and Hawaii; said sums to remain available until expended. The expenditures authorized under this appropriation shall include, but shall not be limited to, rental and benefit payments, expenditures for rent and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, stenographic-reporting services, supplies and equipment, past purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, directories, periodicals, newspapers, traveling expenses, printing and binding in addition to allotments under existing law, and such other expenses as may be necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of this appropriation. No part of the sums appropriated herein shall be used for rental or benefit payments in connection with adjustment contracts entered into on or after January 6, 1936, provided that such funds shall be available for rental and benefit payments in an amount that the Secretary determines to be fair and equitable to farmers who have applied for contracts, and who prior to January 6, 1936, have in good faith made adjustments in acreage and otherwise complied with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in connection with a crop program, regardless of whether contracts have been signed, and as to those contracts entered into prior to January 6, 1936, no part of the sums appropriated herein shall be used for rental or benefit payments in connection with adjustment contracts unless there has been partial performance by the farmer. Funds herein made available for administrative expenses shall be available for allotment to the bureaus and offices of the Department of Agriculture and for transfer to such other agencies of the Federal or State Governments as the Secretary of Agriculture may request to cooperate with or assist in the administration of the work under this appropriation or of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, including necessary investigative work.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this amendment undertakes simply to provide funds for carrying out the moral obligation incurred by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration prior to January 6, 1936. It seems to me that the chairman of the subcommittee should agree to the terms. I do not think anyone can question the fact that the Congress should provide for making these payments.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the committee has had no meeting on this amendment, but so far as I know the amendment is satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. TABER. I may say, if the gentleman will yield, that I have been over this matter very carefully with the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and with the ranking minority member of that committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE], and that it is satisfactory with certain changes which have been agreed to and which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has now presented for the consideration of the House. I believe the House should adopt the amendment.

Frankly, I want to say that, regardless of my position on whether or not the Government should have entered into these contracts in the beginning, I do not believe the Government or any part of it can fail to meet the obligations of its contracts.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I will state that I had the matter up also with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and it is thoroughly agreeable to him. In fact, he made the suggestion that the amendment should be offered and the money made available immediately. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] introduced a similar bill, and assisted in working out this amendment. I have not found anyone who does not feel that these obligations should be met.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The gentleman might also state that the Committee on Agriculture has reported a resolution to this effect. The question has been given consideration by the committee.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. What is the amount involved in these contracts?

Mr. JONES. Two hundred and ninety-six million one hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the amount now asked for include obligations on uncompleted contracts?

Mr. JONES. Only where there has been compliance. Some additional provision will need to be made on floor stocks on which a tax has been paid and on shipments to foreign countries and to charitable institutions in the country; but the amount needed for this purpose is not yet definitely determined and that can be taken care of separately. This clears up obligations to producers incurred prior to January 6.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman means floor stocks in the hands of retail grocery men and wholesale distributors?

Mr. JONES. On that part on which the law provided for a refund. I may state to the gentleman that they should be refunded and I am in favor of doing so.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. TABER. I want to make clear my understanding of this amendment, that it goes so far only as to meet the obligations of the contracts that had been entered into prior to the 6th day of January 1936, where there has been a partial performance on the part of the farmer, and in addition those others where there has been a partial performance and applications have been filed by the farmer, but the Secretary, because of technicalities and delays in the Department, had not reached the point of actually entering into the contracts.

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. TABER. And it is limited entirely to these features?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is correct in that statement; and in those cases the applications contain practically all the terms of the contract anyway.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, in support of my contention I submit the following excerpt from a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the United States v. Realty Co. (163 U. S. 444):

> In regard to the question whether the facts existing in any given case bring it within the description of that class of claims which Congress can and ought to recognize as founded upon equitable and moral considerations and grounded upon principles of right and justice, we think that generally such question must in its nature be one for Congress to decide for itself. Its decision recognizing such a claim and appropriating money for its payment can rarely, if ever, be the subject of review by the judicial branch of the Government. Upon the general principle, therefore, that the Government of the United States through Congress has the right to pay debts of the United States, and that the claims in these cases are of a nature which that body might rightfully decide to constitute a debt payable by the United States upon considerations of justice and honor, we think the act of Congress making appropriations for the payment of such claims was valid without reference to the question of the validity or invalidity of the original act providing for the payment of bounties to manufacturers of sugar as contained in the Tariff Act of 1890. The judgments in these cases are right, irrespective of how that question might be decided, or of any conclusion that might be reached upon other questions suggested at the bar.
> The judgments are, therefore, affirmed.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. I have not had a chance to read the amendment. As I understand, it does not propose to anticipate any A. A. A. legislation and to make appropriations for it, as the newspapers have suggested?

Mr. JONES. That is correct. There is nothing whatever looking to any future legislation in this particular amendment.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Does the gentleman understand that farmers entering into contracts who have sowed winter wheat will come under this amendment? I should like to know also whether the spring wheat farmers who have entered into contracts, plowed their land but not sowed their wheat, will come under the amendment?

Mr. JONES. There are some contract payments on the 1935 crop that I understand have not been paid, but spring crops would not be included.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Yes; there are some of those.

Mr. JONES. This does not undertake to cover crops where there has been no partial compliance. It is hoped we will be able to work out new plans for the Congress to pass on that will take care of different crops in the future; but we did not want to undertake to cover anything here except something that had been done prior to the decision of the Supreme Court. This simply enables the Government to take care of its moral obligations.

I submit herewith a statement of the Department giving a break-down by commodities of items included in the appropriation.

Classified list of elements entering into estimate submitted by Agricultural Adjustment Administration

Commitments on contracts entered into between Secretary of Agriculture and producers of the following commodities:
Cotton	$15,177,000
Wheat	59,160,000
Corn-hogs	98,264,000
Tobacco	7,195,000
Sugar	35,143,000
Peanuts	832,000
Rice	169,000
Total		$215,940,000
Purchase and disposition of agricultural commodities in conjunction with adjustment programs:
Hogs	$154,000
Wheat	319,000
Sugar	114,000
Peanuts	723,000
Total		1,310,000
Administrative expenses:
Cotton	$6,000,000
Cotton ginning payments	3,000,000
Corn-hog	3,000,000
Wheat	1,500,000
Tobacco	1,200,000
Sugar	1,050,000
Peanuts	125,000
Rice	60,000
General	3,000,000
		236,185,000
Estimated commitments and administrative expenses in connection with rental and benefit payments to farmers who have applied for contracts and who, prior to Jan. 6, 1936, have in good faith made adjustments in acreage and otherwise complied with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in connection with a crop program regardless of whether contracts have been signed		60,000,000
Grand total		296,185,000

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, I am entirely in accord with the general proposition that the United States Government owes a moral obligation to the farmers who have in good faith relied upon what they thought was a legal contract entered into with the Government. When a carefully considered bill to authorize settlement with the A. A. A. contract signers is presented, I intend to support an equitable and just settlement.

The thing I am now protesting against is that we are spending $300,000,000 on an amendment offered under the 5-minute rule which has never been in print, which none of us have ever seen or had an opportunity to study or reflect upon, and which the committee that reported this deficiency appropriation bill has never considered. There is no immediate emergency to justify slap-dash action. I am tired of voting out hundreds of millions of dollars without careful consideration, and I serve notice that from now on I am going to stop, look, and listen. The people expect it; the farmers themselves expect it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true that the Committee on Agriculture has had this matter under consideration and consented to report a resolution for this very amount and for the very purpose?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I have not seen that, and may I ask the gentleman how many Members of the House have seen it? There are 400 Members of the House who are not on the Agricultural Committee, and I doubt if one of the 400 has ever seen what we are now asked to vote on on 5 minutes' notice.

Mr. JONES. The Committee on Agriculture, consisting of 25 Members and 3 Delegates, considered this matter several days ago and filed a report. It is now on the House Calendar, and has been for 4 or 5 days, I may say to the gentleman from Indiana.

Not only has the Committee on Agriculture taken favorable action but we have consulted the ranking members of the Appropriations Committee and also other Members, and I have found no one who does not agree that this obligation should be taken care of immediately.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I may say to the gentleman from Texas that if this was brought in as an independent measure and sufficient time given to consider it, rather than as an amendment under the 5-minute rule, my position would be entirely different, but I do object to voting the expenditure of $300,000,000 on a matter on which the House has not been informed and not even considered by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. This matter has not been considered by the Subcommittee on Appropriations as was deemed so important awhile ago?

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is my understanding. The committee that has reported the bill now under consideration today has not even considered this item of $300,000,000.

Mr. JONES. The matter has been submitted to the Budget Director and given very thorough consideration.

Mr. PETTENGILL. May I ask the gentleman from Texas what is the extreme emergency for passing this today?

Mr. JONES. These obligations have been incurred, and some of them are past due. In some instances checks have been made out. The farmers have complied with all of the obligations so far as their part of the contract is concerned, and it seems to me it is unthinkable that the Government of the United States should ask them to do something and comply with certain conditions, and then be put in the attitude of even questioning whether or not those obligations should be met.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am not questioning the moral obligation, but I want to know what the resolution covers. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. What is partial performance under a contract within the gentleman's understanding of that term? Would it apply, as the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER] asked a moment ago, with reference to crops placed in the ground after this date under a contract entered into prior to January 1936?

Mr. JONES. I understand there are practically few, if any, of that type of contract. The contracts that would be approved, and practically the only ones involving partial compliance, are those involving the winter-wheat growers, who had a 2- or 3-year contract signed up and who sowed their wheat last October or November, possibly some of it in December. They have complied with all the requirements for this year, their contracts covering more than 1 year. That partial performance would be adjusted on an equitable basis, as set out in the amendment. I may say to the gentleman it is hoped that we may have a new program to take care of future transactions insofar as we can, but that matter cannot be covered in this kind of an appropriation bill, which we tried to make of such a nature that there would be no question about its justice.

Mr. DOCKWEILER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I want to consume this minute to state to the members of the Committee that as a member of the Appropriations Committee I heard nothing about this item, and there has been no consideration given by my committee of this $300,000,000 appropriation. I am not saying now that I am either for or against the proposition, but I do say that my constituency in Los Angeles, Calif., do not want me to vote for the appropriation of $300,000,000 without better and more real consideration than has been given to this matter. I am opposed to it on that ground. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, there was no disposition to try to avoid going before the Appropriations Committee in the proper way. These are obligations which everyone recognizes, and we have studiously avoided including anything else. These obligations have already been incurred and the money is needed by the farmers who have in good faith complied with the terms of what they thought was a binding contractual obligation. The matter may be easily settled by the terms of the contract. If we undertook to go into an investigation of each one of these contracts before paying them, they would not get their money before next July.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER. Have we not been giving this matter consideration ever since the Supreme Court decision?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CARPENTER. What further consideration do we have to give to the matter?

Mr. WOODRUM. And does not the gentleman understand that the estimate came to the committee since the bill was reported and if it is not put in here it will go to the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and will be put on the bill there and come back to the House? So there has been no effort to avoid due and orderly consideration; and inasmuch as our minority members are satisfied with it, certainly the rest of our colleagues should be.

Mr. JONES. I may say that one of the chief reasons I wanted the House to consider this proposition, as the chairman of the subcommittee has just said, was that the Budget estimate came up after the bill was reported. I hope the gentleman will not oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

The 1935 cotton price adjustment payment plan: So much as may be necessary of the amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, by section 32 of the act approved August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 774), is hereby made available, to remain available until expended, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make the payments provided for in the 1935 cotton price adjustment payment plan (set forth in the printed forms issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, designated forms nos. C. A. P. 1 to 5 and forms supplementary thereto) to the persons and in the amounts and in the manner prescribed in said plan, except that the provisions of said plan which condition the making of payments upon the producer undertaking to cooperate in the 1936 cotton-adjustment program formulated under the Agricultural Adjustment Act shall be of no force and effect, and to pay the necessary administrative expenses incurred and to be incurred in connection with the making and auditing of the payments hereby authorized by the Department of Agriculture, the Treasury Department, and the General Accounting Office, in Washington and elsewhere, in accordance with said plan: Provided, That for the purpose of receiving applications for and making the payments hereby authorized and in order to expedite the making of such payments said forms shall be employed without alteration, but shall be read and construed as if there were deleted therefrom all references to any undertaking to comply with the 1936 cotton-adjustment program formulated under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended: Provided further, That payments payable hereunder to cotton producers who in 1935 operated on a farm which was not in 1935 covered by a 1934 and 1935 cotton acreage reduction contract or which in 1935 was covered by such a contract which was not complied with in 1935 shall be made as soon as may be without delaying payments to producers who in 1935 operated on a farm covered by such a contract which was complied with in 1935.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOODRUM: On page 17, line 20, after the word "Office", strike out the word "in" and insert the following: "including the employment of persons and means in the city of."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I may say, in explanation of the amendment, that I have not had a chance to show it to my colleagues on the committee, but this is simply a clarifying amendment enabling them to employ personnel in the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES: On page 17, line 22, strike out all of lines 22 and 23 and all of lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 18 down to and including the word "all" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Applications for and the payment thereon are hereby authorized, and such forms may be employed without alteration and payments made without regard to any."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, this is largely a clarifying amendment, but it does take out some language that is thought not to be in the most desirable form. I worked this out in connection with the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. It does not change the meaning particularly, except that it avoids the necessity of deleting something from a contract.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made in a colloquy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] with reference to the preceding paragraph by inserting a paragraph of an opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of United States against Realty Co. in One Hundred and Sixty-third United States Reports.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this paragraph beginning at the top of page 17 provides that so much as may be necessary of the amount appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, by section 32 of the act approved August 24, 1935, which is the act amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act, is hereby made available for purposes as outlined in the paragraph.

I would state to the membership of the House who are not familiar with section 32 that this is the section that provides that 30 percent of all the money realized from all import duties shall be available to the Secretary of Agriculture to aid agriculture in accordance with the provisions of that particular section. I understand there is about $90,000,000 available for this purpose. Is that right?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct—$92,000,000, to be exact.

Mr. BOILEAU. And about what part of the $92,000,000 that is available for all types of agriculture do you expect will be paid under this paragraph for cotton?

Mr. WOODRUM. About $50,000,000 is what the testimony showed it is expected will be used for cotton. This has been reduced to $45,000,000, I am advised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. BOILEAU. Is that with respect to all programs that may be attempted with respect to cotton or under this particular paragraph?

Mr. WOODRUM. Under this particular paragraph, as I understand it.

Mr. BOILEAU. And is there anything in this paragraph or in any other legislation that will prevent the Department of Agriculture or the Secretary of Agriculture from using any of the remaining $47,000,000 for cotton?

Mr. WOODRUM. The legislation, as the gentleman will recall, put it all at the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to what he will use it for, and there is no change in that respect.

Mr. BOILEAU. Do I understand that this particular paragraph allocates definitely so much of that particular fund as the Secretary may see fit to use for cotton?

Mr. WOODRUM. The allocation was made in the law we passed, and this paragraph does not change it in that respect.

Mr. BOILEAU. What is the necessity, then, for this language?

Mr. WOODRUM. The necessity for this language is the Supreme Court decision, which provided they could not make contracts based on an agreement to reduce acreage or curtail crops in the future.

Mr. BOILEAU. Is the purpose for which this money will be used under this authorization different from that provided in the original section 32?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not at all, except for the fact that in the payments on the contracts made in the 1935 crop, some of them were conditioned on the fact the farmers would agree to enter into a reduction program in 1936, and to that extent they ran into the Supreme Court decision. Many of those contracts have been signed and are in the office of the Secretary of Agriculture, and rather than go back and make new contracts and go over the facts again we give them this saving language.

Mr. BOILEAU. How long ago did the Secretary make the allocation of $45,000,000 for cotton?

Mr. WOODRUM. Last summer or fall.

Mr. BOILEAU. Then there will be $47,000,000 available for other crops?

Mr. JONES. Only $15,000,000 of the appropriation just made goes to cotton—$15,000,000 out of the $296,000,000.

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Administrative expenses, exportation and domestic consumption of agricultural commodities: Not to exceed $300,000 of the appropriation made for the fiscal year 1936 in section 32 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved August 24, 1935, is hereby made available for administrative expenses other than administrative expenses in connection with the 1935 cotton price adjustment payment plan.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 16, line 21, after the word "expenses", insert the following: a comma and "including the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere."

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Chairman, the word "expenses" occurs twice in that line. After which word is the amendment to be inserted?

Mr. WOODRUM. After the word "expenses" where it first occurs.

The amendment was agreed to.

POTATO STAMPS

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I rise, not to go further in the discussion of potatoes, the eyes of which are weeping from the action of this Chamber, but to assist in what I am sure will be recognized on both sides of the House as a very laudable purpose.

I am going to cooperate with the gentlemen of the majority in seeking to pay the expenses of the Government, perhaps ultimately retiring the national debt, without resorting to inflation. [Laughter.]

I hold in my hand one of the potato stamps issued by the United States Treasury under the authority of the late lamented Potato Act, which are at present on sale. I call attention of those interested in stamp collecting—and I understand there is a most distinguished philatelist at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue—to the fact that under the admissions of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] and the opinion of the Supreme Court, these stamps may very soon disappear from circulation. I was obliged to wire to Jacksonville, Fla., to the collector of internal revenue in order to secure these stamps.

They are most beautiful specimens of the engraver's art with a most attractive young lady, whose eyes would do justice to even the finest product of our potato fields, gracing the face of the stamp above the word "potatoes." They are issued in denominations of three-fourths cent, 1½ cents, 2¼ cents, 3 cents, 3¾ cents, 7½ cents, 11¼ cents, 18¾ cents, 37½ cents, 75 cents, 93¾ cents, $1.12½, and $1.50.

There are at the present time a very limited number of these stamps in circulation in the entire country.

I am quite sure the stamp collectors of the country will desire to have in their archives these mementos of an experiment noble in purpose to solve one of the agricultural problems of the United States.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the remarks I made this afternoon.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL BITUMINOUS COAL COMMISSION

Salaries and expenses, National Bituminous Coal Commission: For all necessary expenditures of the National Bituminous Coal Commission in performing the duties imposed upon said Commission by the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, including personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, traveling expenses, contract stenographic reporting services, stationery and office supplies and equipment, printing and binding, and not to exceed $2,500 for newspapers, reference books, and periodicals, fiscal year 1936, $400,000: Provided, That this appropriation shall be available for obligations incurred on and after September 21, 1935, including reimbursement to other appropriations of the Department of the Interior for obligations incurred on account of said Commission.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: Page 21, line 21, down to line 11, page 22, strike out all of the paragraph.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is a motion to strike from the bill the entire appropriation for the National Bituminous Coal Commission, the Commission set up under the Guffey Act. Frankly I believe that under the decision of the Supreme Court it is generally recognized that this act is unconstitutional. I do not believe we should appropriate for the operations of that Commission. My case is just as plain as that. I think it is putting Congress in a very serious position to appropriate this money when I believe 9 out of every 10 of the Members of the House believe the act itself under which this Commission is operating is unconstitutional. I have, therefore, offered this amendment to strike out the whole thing. This amendment, if adopted, I shall follow up with an amendment to strike out the following paragraph. I do not think I need say anything more.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto shall close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] for 3 minutes, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON] for 3 minutes, and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] for 4 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, to those of us who represent coal-mining districts to strike out this paragraph of the bill would render irreparable damage. The Coal Commission has been working since September 21. These men have been serving without salary. Over 4,000 have voluntarily signed under the Guffey Coal Act, and those 4,000 represent 80 percent of the commercial bituminous-coal tonnage of the country. By commercial bituminous coal I mean not captive mines that mine coal only to be used in their own establishments, but 80 percent of the coal production that is being sold to the American people is now represented by the Bituminous Coal Commission. For Congress to anticipate what the Supreme Court is going to do about a law which we passed in the last session, it seems to me, is presumptuous. We passed the law. The case is before the Supreme Court, and certainly we should appropriate for our own agencies which we set up, at least until the Supreme Court has rendered its decision. This act by the 1934 tonnage of coal will produce for the Federal Government in excess of $10,000,000. It is costing $400,000 to operate it, as is asked for in this appropriation. We passed the act and we should appropriate the necessary money to see that it functions as we passed it.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise to supplement what the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has said with respect to the inadvisability of providing for an appropriation for an act which is palpably unconstitutional. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON] has just stated that we should not anticipate what the Supreme Court will do.

I am in full agreement with him when there can be the slightest doubt of the outcome, but that is not the case here. When the Guffey bill was under consideration last year I predicted from the floor that it would be held unconstitutional. At that time, of course, we did not have the decision of the Supreme Court of January 6 in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. How anyone reading that decision, whether he reads the majority opinion or the minority opinion, can have any doubt that this act, at least as far as the drawback portion of the tax is concerned, will be held unconstitutional is beyond my conception.

The Guffey bill provides for a 5-percent tax on the sale of coal, but allows a drawback of 90 percent of this tax to producers who accept the Bituminous Coal Code provided for by the act. This code, among other things, contains provisions for the fixing of minimum and maximum prices, and of maximum hours of work, roughly similar to codes under the N. R. A.

The Supreme Court in the Schechter-N. R. A. case held that such a code could not be imposed on business, not in interstate commerce, by the directly coercive weapons of fine and imprisonment, and the Supreme Court on a number of occasions has held that the mining of coal is purely an intrastate business (Heisler v. Thomas Colliery Co., 260 U. S. 245 (1922); Oliver Iron Co. v. Lord, 262 U. S. 172 (1923)).

The only way in which the principle behind the Guffey bill differs from that behind the N. R. A. is that in the former there is no apparent compulsion on the coal producer who fails to accept the code. He is assessed a large tax and is then refused the drawback to which his competitor who accepts code is entitled. In other words, instead of the coercion of fine and prison sentence which the N. R. A. provided, there is in the Guffey bill the coercion of a confiscatory tax. The producer's act in accepting a code is apparently voluntary, but as a matter of economic necessity it is really coercion.

Lawyers with some knowledge of constitutional law have thought that the child labor tax case settled some time ago the unconstitutionality of such a law, and evidently the President had some such view when he asked last summer that the Guffey bill be passed "irrespective of any doubt as to its constitutionality no matter how reasonable."

It would seem that the recent Agricultural Adjustment Act decision set this question at rest once and for all, for not only did the opinion itself advert to the question but the dissenting opinion agreed on this point.

Mr. Justice Roberts said:

> In the Child Labor Tax case (259 U. S. 20), and in Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S. 44), this Court had before it statutes which purported to be taxing measures. But their purpose was found to be to regulate the conduct of manufacturing and trading, not in interstate commerce but in the States—matters not within any power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution—and the levy of the tax a means to force compliance. The Court held this was not a constitutional use but an unconstitutional abuse of the power to tax.

Even Mr. Justice Stone, in the minority decision, concedes that if the A. A. A. tax had been used as coercion to bring about a result which otherwise could not be legally brought about by Congress it would be unconstitutional, pointing out, however, that in the A. A. A. case there was not the use of the tax as a direct method of coercion. He said it was simply the use of the spending power to bring about a result through voluntary cooperation. That is where Mr. Justice Roberts and Mr. Justice Stone differ in their opinions. Let me point out what the latter said in the minority opinion:

> The tax is unlike the benefits which were held invalid in the Child Labor Tax case, * * * because they were themselves instruments of regulation by virtue of their coercive effect on matters left to the control of the States.

Here is a tax which is an instrument of regulation by virtue of the coercive effect of the tax itself, accomplishing a regulation of something which the Congress might otherwise regulate.

We have just stricken out the appropriation for the Potato Control Act because we know that act is unconstitutional. Let us be consistent and do the same for the Guffey bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, this is a new departure in legislative procedure when the House of Representatives undertakes to anticipate the action of the Supreme Court and thereby withhold appropriations from institutions.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Is that not just exactly what the gentleman from Virginia did a half an hour ago?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; not at all. The situation in regard to the potato-control bill was quite different. The Budget, in sending it up, recognized that there were inherent difficulties in it and sent no estimate for 1937. Our committee, in reporting it, came to that conclusion and reported merely an amount to run for a couple of months. But the Bituminous Coal Commission is in an entirely different situation. There may be respectable legal opinion that this act will ultimately be held unconstitutional, but certainly the House of Representatives, sitting as the Committee of the Whole, is not going to undertake to arrogate to itself the authority to anticipate a ruling of the Supreme Court, and disband and dismantle this Commission that has been set up under specific authority and warrant of Congress.

Of course, I appreciate the fact that this motion to strike out an appropriation, while probably it is made in good faith, is more or less routine, and that no really serious intention exists that Congress would take any such action as that.

There are other gentlemen here interested in it. If the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER] desire, I will yield a minute to them.

I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. This is a new method of repealing an act of Congress heretofore regularly enacted. Gentlemen refer to the Guffey-Snyder coal bill as being unconstitutional. It is so easy to say a measure is unconstitutional. Gentlemen refer to the recent Supreme Court decision invalidating the A. A. A. as authority for their conclusions that the bill under discussion is unconstitutional. The Bituminous Coal Conservation Act may be stricken down by the Court, but no one can say what the conclusions of the Supreme Court will be until they pass on it regularly. Certainly the Hoosac case is not authority, in my opinion, that the Guffey coal bill is unconstitutional.

Sometime during the last session, as I recall it, prior to the consideration of the Guffey coal bill, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] challenged the constitutionality of this bill and inquired if any Member would dare to say that it was constitutional. At that time I informed him of my opinion relative to its constitutionality and today I call his attention to the fact that the district court here in Washington, in the trial upon its merits, upheld the constitutionality of the act insofar as the price-fixing phase of it was concerned, however, agreeing with the gentleman from Ohio as to the invalidity of that part which dealt with the control of wages, hours, and so forth. A very distinguished Kentucky lawyer in the person of Hon. Elwood Hamilton, now gracing a Federal bench in the western district of Kentucky, upheld the validity of the act in a very illuminating and sweeping decision. There are a number of the courts that have enjoined the collection of the tax, but so far as I recall it, the district court case, brought by Mr. Carter, and the Kentucky case are the only two that have been prepared and decided upon their merits.

The basis of support in the A. A. A. was the taxing power and the welfare clause. The Court there held that the taxing power could not be used for the purpose of regulating that which was beyond constitutional power, but their holding of that, it seems to me, inevitably leads to the conclusion that the taxing power, said by the gentleman from Ohio in the Guffey Act to be coercive, may well be exercised if that which is to be regulated is within constitutional power. The things sought to be regulated are entirely different. That which is sought to be regulated under the Guffey Act are transactions directly affecting interstate commerce and defined as such by the Congress. In other words, the things sought to be regulated are within the power of the commerce clause of the Constitution as we see it.

The Hoosac case had no support of the commerce clause. I quote from the decision of Mr. Justice Roberts:

> The third clause endows the Congress with power "to regulate commerce * * * among the several States." Despite a reference in its first section to a burden upon, and an obstruction of the normal currents of commerce, the act under review does not purport to regulate transactions in interstate or foreign commerce. Its stated purpose is the control of agricultural production, a purely local activity, in an effort to raise the prices paid the farmer. Indeed, the Government does not attempt to uphold the validity of the act on the basis of the commerce clause, which, for the purpose of the present case, may be put aside as irrelevant.

The Hoosac case was closely akin, in principle, to the case of Hill v. Wallace where the taxing power was sought to be exercised to control intrastate transactions. Chief Justice Taft struck down the statute and in so doing mentioned the fact that the words "interstate commerce" were not found from the beginning of the statute to the end and that such power was not relied upon. Thereafter Congress enacted the law with the commerce clause as its foundation to regulate practices which directly burdened interstate commerce. The same Chief Justice Taft upheld the validity as being within the constitutional powers of Congress.

In view of the situation, we respectfully submit that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], distinguished as he may be, should not be permitted to do by indirection that which he was unable to do in the direct attack on the measure when it was up for consideration. I trust that his motion to strike this appropriation will fail.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this coal bill was written after the Supreme Court's decision on the N. R. A. The bill was analyzed before it was introduced by legal minds equal to any in our country. The bill was written so as to dovetail into the decision handed down on the Schechter case. In other words, if the Supreme Court uses the same premises as its basis of reasoning as it did in the Schechter case they will pronounce the Guffey-Snyder Coal Act constitutional. We must assume that since the Supreme Court is made up of the same nine men that they will be logical and use the same logical basis in arriving at their conclusion.

In the supplemental appropriation bill of 1936, now under consideration, we have the item of $440,000 to carry out the provisions of the Guffey-Snyder Bituminous Coal Act. It will be observed that the National Bituminous Coal Commission started its function on the 28th day of September 1935. Due to the fact that the filibuster in the Senate in the closing days of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress held up a number of appropriations, this being one of them, a deficiency of $440,000 appropriation is necessary at this time in order to have the act in operation as per the requirements of the act until July 1, 1936.

Mr. Chairman, under the laws governing our land and governing Congress, any bill signed by the President, is a law, until the Supreme Court of the United States rules otherwise. Therefore, this Bituminous Coal Act that started to function September 28, 1935, is functioning under the law, and we are duty bound to provide means and methods, so as to have it function as nearly 100 percent as possible. That is the intent, the purpose, and spirit of all laws. This $440,000 is necessary to provide the equipment, personnel, and the set-up, to run this Commission to July 1, 1936.

Mr. Chairman, there are many who thought that this bill was not constitutional last August 19 when it passed the House of Representatives who now think that it is constitutional. The decision handed down by the Supreme Court since that time would indicate, upon close interpretation, that the Guffey-Snyder Coal Act is constitutional.

It seems singular that some of our Republican friends here in the House and some Liberty Leaguers throughout the Nation are using up so much of their energy howling about this Democratic Congress putting on the statute books acts of Congress that are unconstitutional. Why, bless your soul, all you have to do is to turn to the record and you will find that of the 65 or 66 acts of Congress that have been declared unconstitutional the Republican Party was in power when about two-thirds of them were put on the statute books. People living in glass houses should not throw stones.

The Commission has set up a most economical and efficient structure. To put the whole program into effect, it was thought necessary to have a personnel of 312 people, but, in order to economize, the contemplated personnel is not to be more than 225. To operate efficiently and effectively with such a small personnel, it is necessary that there be no branch offices, but the entire administrative force and personnel to be housed here in Washington. In order to start on September 28, it was necessary to borrow money and to borrow personnel from other bureaus and agencies. This $440,000 is merely to pay back the amount borrowed and continue to operate until July 1, 1936.

The one outstanding reason why this measure appeals to at least 90 percent of the people is because of the fact that there is so much harmony and cooperation between the operators and the miners in this procedure. I made it 90 percent, because as late as January 22, 1936, we were informed by the Commission that 81½ percent of the tonnage-output operators had signed up and were going along with the provisions of the act and were happy to do so. Of course labor is 100 percent for the measure.

The last three sessions of Congress passed many pieces of humane and constructive legislation, but it is generally conceded that the most outstanding piece of humane legislation as well as stabilizing legislation passed during the last 3 years was the Guffey-Snyder Bituminous Coal Stabilization Act. The businessmen, the bankers, and the farmers are for this act when they once analyze it and realize the benefits. They realize that if this act is in operation they will know approximately how many tons of coal will be mined in their district next year. They will know how much the pay rolls of the mines will be, approximately, for the next year. They will know, approximately, how much they will have to pay for the tonnage they require for their respective business for the next year. They know that over a space of years it will cost less for the purchase of a ton of coal under this procedure than under the old cutthroat procedure. Therefore, I think I am safe in saying that it is the hope of businessmen as well as labor that this act remains in operation.

I am not saying that it is perfect. It will need adjustments; but we must not go back to the cutthroat methods we had in the bituminous-coal industry. Nobody wants to go back to those methods. This is the best medium we have available for operating the bituminous-coal industry. Therefore, gentlemen, I am sure you agree with me that it is our duty to give this Commission the sum asked for so that they can function properly.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has expired.

All time has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 29, noes 70.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BACON: Page 22, line 11, after the word "Commission", insert "Provided, That if the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935 is declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, no money herein provided shall thereafter be spent, and all money herein appropriated and unexpended shall be immediately covered back into the Treasury."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. This seems to me to be legislation undertaking to effect a limitation. If, of course, the Supreme Court declares the act unconstitutional, expenditures under it will cease and no money may thereafter be expended under the act.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this is an amendment that comes within the Holman rule, that it is a limitation saving money for the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WOODRUM. But it is made contingent on something that may or may not happen.

Mr. BACON. Yes; it is made contingent on something happening.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, is the gentleman suggesting that the Congress should hint the unconstitutionality of a law before it is passed on by the Supreme Court?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the Holman rule does not necessarily apply. The Chair is of the opinion, however, that the amendment is a limitation. The purport of the amendment taken as a whole impresses the Chair as being a limitation.

Mr. WOODRUM. May I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment means hereafter, any time in the future, any appropriation that hereafter may be made, and that it is not confined to the appropriation in this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; that is the very point on which the Chair's decision turns. The Chair interprets the words used in the amendment to mean that it refers to the appropriation provided in this bill. It would, therefore, be a limitation on the appropriation here provided. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in good faith. When the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional there were attempts—and successful attempts—made to use the money appropriated for the N. R. A. for other purposes.

None of this money should be spent if this act is declared unconstitutional, and in view of past performances I think the House of Representatives, which should control appropriations, should be watchful for raids on the Treasury. They have the right to apply this limitation so that money that ought not to be spent shall not be spent. This amendment may save money and prevent money from being illegally used.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman care to yield?

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. I have introduced this amendment in good faith to prevent what has happened in the past shall not happen in the future.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that debate had already closed, but inasmuch as the gentleman from New York was inadvertently recognized, the gentleman from Virginia will be recognized in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that so far as the purpose the gentleman had in mind is concerned I am in sympathy with it. I would call to his attention, however, the fact that quite a different situation exists with reference to the money appropriated in this bill and the money with which the N. R. A. was operated. The N. R. A. was operating under direct relief funds or grants from the emergency funds which might be used or diverted. The money provided in this bill is appropriated by Congress for a specific purpose, and if the Court should hold unconstitutional the act for the administration of which this appropriation is made, I am sure the Comptroller General of the United States would never permit any expenditure of this fund to be made after that decision of the Court for any other purpose. I have no objection to the amendment being adopted, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KELLER) there were—ayes 61, noes 11.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries, Department of State: For an additional amount for salaries, Department of State, including the same objects specified under this head in the Department of State Appropriation Act, 1936, $39,330, of which amount not to exceed $30,350 may be expended by the Secretary of State without regard to civil-service laws and regulations or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TABER: Page 30, line 8, after the figures "1936" and the comma, strike out "$39,330" and insert in lieu thereof "$8,980", and strike out all after the changed figures in that paragraph.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment to strike from the bill all appropriations for the operation of the reciprocal tariff act. These funds are asked for the purpose of employing additional help in the Department of State for the operations of that division. Under the tariff act we have had a reciprocal tariff agreement with Cuba, a reciprocal tariff agreement with Canada, with the Netherlands, with Belgium, and with Sweden, all of which have opened wide the gates to let in agricultural products at a lower rate of duty, to the great damage of the American farmer.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I want the RECORD to show that I support the gentleman's amendment, being opposed to this reciprocal tariff policy.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will take the responsibility that is theirs and vote this out in order that this operation which is doing so much damage to American agriculture and American business may be stopped.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have 5 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes. We have debated this question time and time again.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be discourteous to my good friends on the other side, but they know that not once but three or four times we have debated this matter, and my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] spoke 10 or 15 minutes yesterday on this very matter. I do not know but what the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] had some time also.

Mr. REED of New York. I did have some time yesterday.

Mr. WOODRUM. We have debated this matter time and time again. It is the same old question, whether in this appropriation bill we want to withhold appropriations for reciprocal agreements, which act was overwhelmingly passed by both branches of Congress, and which the gentlemen know will remain on the statute books until we take substantive action to wipe it off the books.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. I do not wish to inflict myself on the House in this connection.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am trying to protect the Members of the House, too.

Mr. CULKIN. If I could have 5 minutes I am sure I could contribute something for the information of the gentleman himself.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am sure the gentleman could contribute an intellectual discussion on the whole tariff question that we talk so much about, but it is not in issue here. This appropriation involves a few clerks in the State Department that the State Department have to have in connection with these trade-agreement compacts.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield in order that I may say a few words?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, everybody knows that I am vitally interested in the dairy business. It is one of the largest industries in my district.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include certain quotations and official figures.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, there appeared in the Canadian Forum under date of September 1932 an article in which the writer points to the effect of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act upon the Canadian dairy farmers. While the Democratic Members assert that the Smoot-Hawley tariff was of no benefit to the American dairymen, the Canadian authorities present an entirely different picture. I quote from the Canadian publication:

This act (Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act) practically wiped out Canadian export of feeder cattle and of milk and cream to the United States. The farmers of the prairies found the cattle a welcome source of cash income in times of poor wheat crops, and the dairy farmers of eastern Quebec and of New Brunswick had built up a profitable business selling to the metropolitan centers along the eastern seaboard of the United States. Furthermore, they had gone to great pains to change their herds of cattle to conform to sanitary requirements of the consuming markets.

Now, with reference to New Zealand as a potentional danger to the dairy interests of the United States under the recent trade agreement with Canada, I refer to the action taken by the Dominion Government when New Zealand saw fit to ship dairy products into Canada under a special dispensation primarily intended for Australia under a trade agreement. I quote from the Canadian Year Book, 1930–31:

New Zealand had taken full advantage of the opportunity to export butter to Canada, and this trade had reached such proportions as to alarm the dairy industry. In May 1930 the Dominion Government gave notice to New Zealand that on October 12 the Australian treaty rates would be withdrawn on New Zealand products, the intention being that in the interval a new arrangement would be concluded.

Let us examine this matter a little further. I find that the tariff research committee, Madison, Wis., has published information, and I quote from this document:

New Zealand: Until the summer of 1930 New Zealand and Australia had preferential trade agreements with Canada which enabled them to ship butter into Canada with a duty of only 1 cent per pound. In 1929 New Zealand shipped 34,000,000 pounds of butter to Canada. Considerable quantities of her butter were diverted to Canada during the period 1926–30. However, on October 12, 1930, the Canadian tariff on New Zealand butter was raised to 4 cents a pound and later increased to 8 cents. These duties virtually checked New Zealand butter shipments to Canada and increased the relative importance of the United States as a market.

This same report then continues and shows specifically why New Zealand shipments of butter to the United States injures our dairy farmers. I quote:

Imports from Denmark are spread throughout the year, while those from New Zealand are concentrated in the 4 winter months from December to March. It is during these 4 months that imports have their greatest effect on prices, because demand is very sensitive under the high prices characteristic of the winter season. Imports from New Zealand, therefore, because of their large total volume and concentration in a limited period, constitute the chief foreign competitive element in the United States industry.

You Democrats who state that the tariff, the Smoot-Hawley Act, was of no benefit to the dairy farmers recall that this act went into effect June 17, 1930. What was the effect on importations of butter into our market? Our imports of butter in 1932 were the lowest since 1918. Not only this, exports of butter exceeded imports by one-half million pounds in 1932. If you are not satisfied with the effect of tariff legislation, especially in behalf of the dairymen in the United States, and if you still believe it is not helpful to them, please observe the effect of the Canadian tariff upon the Canadian butter market. Let me quote:

The Canadian balance of trade in butter shifted from a net importation of 34,300,000 pounds during the first 8 months of 1930 to a net export balance of 3,400,000 pounds during the same period of 1931.

This shift in Canada from an import basis to an export basis occurred within 1 year from the time the Dominion Government took steps to protect its market from invasion by foreign dairy products. With all these facts available, yet, under the most-favored-nation clause, this administration, under a trade agreement with Canada, proposes to open our market, not only to Canadian dairy products but to the dairy products of New Zealand and other countries.

I have introduced a bill to take from the President the power to enter into trade agreements. I hope that it will have the support of those who believe that the American market, the best cash market in the world, rightfully belongs to the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prohibition of export of arms and war munitions: For the expenses of administering Public Resolution No. 67, approved August 31, 1935, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, stenographic reporting, translating, and other services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent in the District of Columbia or elsewhere; traveling expenses; purchase of necessary books, documents, and periodicals; stationery; communication service; printing and binding; equipment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, fiscal year, $25,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, as far as I know there are no other items in the bill that are controversial. I therefore ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer on page 34.

Mr. WOODRUM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I shall ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill after page 34, the point at which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] desires to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third World Power Conference: For the expenses of organizing and holding the Third World Power Conference in the United States in 1936 or 1937, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, communication services, stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); travel expenses, local transportation, hire of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, printing and binding, entertainment, official cards, purchase of newspapers and periodicals, necessary books and documents, stationery, membership badges, and such other expenses as may be actually and necessarily incurred by the Government of the United States by reason of observance of appropriate courtesies in connection therewith, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments have been made for any purposes herein specified, fiscal year 1936, to remain available until June 30, 1937, $75,000.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RANKIN: On page 34, after line 2, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Commission to study the subject of Hernando de Soto's expedition: For the expenses of a commission, consisting of not fewer than five or more than seven members, to make a thorough study of the subject of Hernando de Soto's expedition and report back to the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress with recommendations for a suitable and appropriate celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the landing of de Soto in Tampa Bay, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, without reference to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended; stenographic reporting, translating, and other services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); rent, traveling expenses, purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers and periodicals, stationery, official cards, printing and binding, and such other expenses as may be authorized by the President, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which expenditures may be made for any of the purposes herein specified, $5,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remaining portion of the bill be considered as read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10464) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TABER offers the following motion to recommit:

"That the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 21, line 21, strike out all the paragraph down to and including line 11, on page 22."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

SOCIAL SECURITY—THE FRAZIER-LUNDEEN BILL, S. 3475 AND H. R. 9680

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address which I delivered over NBC on January 18, 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 18, 1936, I had the honor to speak at the Cosmos Club, Washington, D. C., under the auspices of the People's Lobby, Benjamin C. Marsh, executive secretary, 113 First Street NE., Washington, D. C. The People's Lobby is doing splendid work along the lines of progressive legislation, and Mr. Marsh is an able director.

The broadcast was given through the courtesy of the National Broadcasting Co. On that occasion social security, unemployment, old age, health, accident, and maternity—the entire field of social insurance—was the subject of discussion.

The tide of resentment among the voters of America is rising against the administration Social Security Act. It is an empty gesture, and hangs up a zero on the wall in that department of social security which now is the most important of all—unemployment insurance. And in other respects it leaves much to be desired. I would like to see the entire act repealed, and S. 3475, introduced by Senator LYNN J. FRAZIER, senior Senator from the State of North Dakota, and H. R. 9680, introduced by ERNEST LUNDEEN, Representative from the Third District, Minnesota, enacted into law.

We ask all people interested in the subject of genuine, adequate social security to communicate with the Interprofessional Association, Miss Mary Van Kleeck, chairman, 130 East Twenty-second Street, room 600, New York City, for copies of the bill and methods and means of promoting its success.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Chairman, fellow citizens, 8 months ago I spoke to you in this same room at a noon meeting sponsored by the People's Lobby. I said to you at that time that the American people expect adequate, genuine social security, including unemployment, accident, maternity, and health insurance, and old-age pensions. I said to you 8 months ago:

"In the near future the American people will learn that under the administration social-security bill, fifteen million now unemployed will receive nothing, and those who are now employed must wait for years before they are eligible to pitiably and utterly inadequate sums for unemployment insurance in the future."

And I said when the American people analyze the provisions of the administration measure they will demand a new or revised social-insurance bill.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, knew what he was talking about when he said last year that the administration Social Security Act would be "pitiably and utterly inadequate."

So far the press reports only 9 States and the District of Columbia have passed unemployment insurance laws and only 18 States have old-age-pension laws that meet the Federal requirements.

No wonder Abraham Epstein, executive secretary of the American Association for Social Security, calls the administration bill "the social insecurity act."

We do have real social-security legislation before Congress—the Frazier-Lundeen social-security bill, introduced on Monday, January 6 of this year by LYNN J. FRAZIER, of North Dakota, in the Senate and by ERNEST LUNDEEN in the House. This bill provides genuine, adequate social security along the same lines provided in the Lundeen bill of last session—this bill was favorably reported by the House Committee on Labor. The new Frazier-Lundeen bill is worked out in greater detail and many points are clarified, but the fundamental principles are the same. We insist on the basic principles of genuine social security. We would set up a Nation-wide Federal system. Unemployment is a national problem.

The Frazier-Lundeen bill goes into effect immediately, and provides for all workers, including all wage earners, all salaried workers, farmers, professionals, and the self-employed.

It guarantees an income equal to average earnings, but in no case less than $10 a week, plus $3 for each dependent. It maintains the American standard of living.

It provides a democratic system of administration by representatives of workers' organizations, under a system of civil service free from political control.

Finally, the Frazier-Lundeen bill lays down the policy that additional funds needed for social security shall be raised by taxation on high incomes and corporate surpluses. No tribute is levied on the worker or upon the employer whose income is not in the upper brackets.

I wish to give full credit to the Interprofessional Association—Mary Van Kleeck, chairman—an organization with 21 chapters throughout the United States, in the matter of drafting the bill and submitting the same to Congress. Professional people are awakening to the necessity of their joint action with other workers and farmers.

Now you may say: "Where will you get the money? How much will it cost?

The Frazier-Lundeen bill authorizes an appropriation of $5,000,000,000 for social security. A United Press dispatch of January 6 says that so far, the depression has cost us seventeen and one-third billion dollars. That is the figure in the President's budget presented to Congress 2 weeks ago. Seventeen and a third billion dollars for agricultural aid, relief, public works, home loans, and miscellaneous aid. Where do we get the money for that?

We canceled $12,087,667,000 of war debts back in 1926. Where did we get the money for that?

We appropriated more than a billion dollars last year for war and war preparations. Where did we get the money for that?

Many of our people have been under the impression that we must have more gold to give social security to our people. We have about 40 percent of the world's gold now; and yet, according to Lloyd George, there is more poverty and misery in one American city than in all the British Isles combined.

If it is gold we need, we have the gold, and we have heavy reserves lying idle in banks. We have reserves piled so high in banks that the Federal Reserve Board officials met in Washington a few weeks ago to decide what to do about it, and apparently decided to do nothing.

We have gold. We have bank reserves. And we have more—of greater value than all of these—the labor power of 50,000,000 working people. The wealth of America is not in dollars alone. We have tremendous developed and potential resources beyond the comprehension of the mind of man. Even if the profits from some of these great resources are being squeezed out by financial dictators at the expense of the people, we have these sources of wealth, and they belong to the people. They can be taxed. The people can take them over, if necessary, in a peaceful and lawful manner, under the Constitution of the United States.

Oh, yes; we have the sources of wealth. But today the control of these great natural resources is not in the hands of the people. That is why the people do not receive full benefit from them. Two hundred giant corporations control half the corporate wealth of the country, and, at the present rate of concentration, by 1950, 80 percent of the corporate wealth of the country will be controlled by 200 giant corporations.

Each year we read of the huge salaries and dividends drawn by bankers and captains of industry. Recently the top salaries for 1935 have been published.

In 1929 Eugene Grace, of Bethlehem Steel Corporation, received $1,635,000 in salary and bonus. In 1935 the chairman of Bethlehem Steel's board received $250,000 in salary alone. Coca-Cola's president received $100,350. Woolworth Co.'s president drew three hundred thirty-seven and a half thousand. The country's largest publisher, William Randolph Hearst, drew $500,000—and so on down a long list of executive salaries—and that is not mentioning the House of Morgan and other money lords of the American financial aristocracy. In addition to salaries there are dividends received by the same people. Dividends alone gave $1,700,000 to Samuel H. Kress, of Kress' chain stores, in 1934, and five and a half million dollars to John D. Rockefeller, Jr., from oil interests. These statistics are compiled by Labor Research Association of New York City. We can tax these salaries and these dividends. We can apply the British rates above $5,000.

As long as these great American natural resources continue to fill the greedy coffers of the super-rich, their corporations continue to function, corporate surpluses are piled high for the rainy day. But let business become slack and profits be reduced, and a great cry goes up from corporations that they cannot afford to do business and employ labor. That is why the American people do not derive full benefit from our enormous natural resources: Because they have no control over their operation or the distribution of the wealth they produce. We, the people, have lost the ownership of the country in which we live. Farmers and workers together will find a way to regain the ownership they have lost.

Labor cannot depend upon State governments or private industry to provide social security. When depression and panic strikes, labor pays. From 1929 to 1933 labor lost over $60,000,000,000 in wages. No one thought of asking if labor could afford it.

What of the corporate surplus that captains of industry set aside for a rainy day? Labor was not allowed to use that surplus. In 1928 the corporate surplus amounted to $47,000,000,000, and even in 1932 it was over 36 billions. This was the amount accumulated by corporations from funds which had not been distributed. Certainly, this surplus was not produced by capital alone. It was produced by labor. It was made possible by the cooperation of capital and labor, and it should be available for labor's insurance against unemployment. Abraham Lincoln said that labor has a prior right to the fruits of toil, that capital could not exist if labor had not first existed, that labor deserves much the higher consideration. So labor has a prior claim to corporate surplus.

But this fact is not recognized by industrial leaders. Capital has been permitted to draw on the surplus, while labor becomes the army of the unemployed.

In contrast with labor's loss interest payments have decreased very little during the depression. There is no comparison with wages. Wages dropped 60 percent from 1929 to 1932. Interest payments dropped less than 4 percent. In many industries more interest than ever was paid during the depression. In the electric-light, power, and gas industries interest payments in 1932 were 24 percent higher than they were in 1929.

Now wages are supposed to be rising, but higher prices offset the increase in wages. Last year the American Federation of Labor reported that food prices rose 25 percent in the last 2 years while wages rose only 8 percent. Purchasing power of the working people cannot be increased that way. Standards of living cannot be maintained. Workers still cannot buy back the products they produce, and unemployment still hangs over us like a great cloud of the oncoming storm. The latest report of the American Federation of Labor shows that there are 11,650,000 American workers without jobs.

The dangers to American democracy lie not so much in armies across the sea nor in the agitation of radicals at home. The dangers to American democracy come from our lack of social security.

A financial oligarchy has entrenched itself in America. Chain stores and chain banks are destroying the independent merchant. Industry and finance have passed far beyond the control of any State.

They adopt antisocial attitudes toward the common people. They form "economy leagues" and "liberty leagues" to fight against the common people's rights. They carry on a loud-mouthed, swaggering campaign. They send the American people off on a wild-goose chase against a few thousand hungry "reds", while they continue their plunder.

The American people must have security. They demand security in return for their patriotism, their loyalty. The strength of democratic government is no greater than the love of its people.

A day may come in the not distant future when the patience of our long-suffering people is exhausted.

The storm may yet break upon our heads. We stand now upon the brink of an abyss.

If you ask me, "How much will it cost to give security to our people?", I say to you, "How much will it cost not to give them security?" We must calm this wail of anguish that cries out from the soul of America. We must dry this ocean of tears. I say to the Money Trust of America, you must pay and save yourselves, by the way, lest you be overwhelmed by the wrath and the fury of the coming storm. Some day the money powers of this country will pay, and pay double, and then we will all know that they can pay. It can be done in a peaceful and lawful manner. It must be done, regardless of cost, to save the life of America.

A PATENT ON PROGRESS?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short editorial from the Ann Arbor (Mich.) Daily News.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an editorial from the Ann Arbor Daily News, of Ann Arbor, Mich. This is one of the leading daily newspapers in the Middle West and the editorial is well worth reading. The editorial is as follows:

A PATENT ON PROGRESS?

President Roosevelt, overlooking no opportunity to defend the New Deal, and especially those parts that have run afoul of the Supreme Court, used quotations from T. R. to bolster his case as he dedicated a memorial to his famous predecessor and cousin.

This is one of the quotations:

"A great democracy must be progressive or it will soon cease to be a great democracy."

The President uttered many words of tribute for the Chief Executive who was so much admired in his time and whose memory is revered by Americans.

"With clearness of vision, of energy, of unfaltering facts, he labored through his entire strenuous career to transform politics from a corrupt traffic to a public service," said President Franklin D. Roosevelt, discussing the policies and ideals of President Theodore Roosevelt. "With a very passion for justice and equality before the law, he sought with voice and pen, with every resource at his command, to obtain for men everywhere their constitutional guarantee of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

So it seems, from the address at the dedication, that Theodore Roosevelt always stood for progress and devoted much time and energy to the furtherance of the cause of a square deal for all Americans. All this was generally understood, however. Theodore Roosevelt was one of the greatest of Presidents, and therefore he was progressive.

But it does not follow that Theodore Roosevelt would have endorsed some of the principles of government which Franklin D. Roosevelt has sponsored and which have been ruled as invalid by the Supreme Court. It is doubtful if he would have lent an ear to any proposal for regimentation of industry, business, and the private lives of individuals.

The present administration seems to feel that whatever it attempts must be progressive, and that any interference with an experiment it undertakes must, therefore, be opposed to progress. There is a strong suggestion in the President's addresses and in phrases uttered by other administration mouthpieces that the Democrats stand for progress and that it must naturally follow that the Republicans are opposed to it.

The attitude of the present administration appears to be that the Roosevelt regime has a copyright on progress, that its formulas are the only ones that can bring about improvements in the Nation.

Theodore Roosevelt, a Republican, was a progressive. Any Republican that may be nominated for the Presidency this year must also be progressive. Any candidate that stands on a platform guaranteeing a static condition in government or the relations of men to each other is not likely to get far.

Conditions, socially or otherwise, in America are not perfect today. There are many faults calling loudly for correction. This does not signify that a radical must be entrusted with the reins of government any more than it signifies that an ultraconservative should be given control. Neither fascism nor socialism is wanted.

But progress there must be; a "square deal" is essential to national advancement because it is necessary to human happiness.

However, the New Deal is not necessarily a square deal, and it is not patently progressive in all its phases. Something new is desirable, but nothing can be considered desirable merely for the reason that it is new.

If the President stands on the premise that to be progressive the people must accept the N. I. R. A., the A. A. A., and other policies that have been ruled un-American, he can quote any number of great Americans as endorsing his policies. But his premise is wrong. There are several different ways to bring about advancement, and it should be brought about by methods that fit into the American scheme of things, rather than by those that may be adapted from fascism, nazi-ism, or communism.

The great national question of the day is not whether progress is wanted. The question is how to have it. The New Deal and the "square deal" may not be cousins.

THE INDEPENDENT BANKERS OF MINNESOTA

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address delivered by myself at the Independent Bankers Association of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by me before the Independent Bankers Association of the State of Minnesota at the Lowry Hotel, St. Paul, Minn., Saturday evening, September 28, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to be here on this occasion, as I am deeply conscious of contribution to freedom and good government which this organization has made. Single-handed and alone, you have stood as the only opposition to the organized chain-banking interests of the country in their high-powered and unlawful efforts to secure an absolute monopoly on the banking business of the Northwest. Without your voices and energies raised against the complete overthrow of independence in banking this territory today would have been financially under the complete control of a handful of men representing the international bankers of America. Our business, our money, our hopes, our ambitions, our happiness, and all opportunity for free expression of individual effort would have been blasted by a sinister organization which had for its purpose the complete enslavement of the millions in the great Northwest. I salute you as comrades of the plain people in their struggle for existence.

In due time and when the history of this period shall have been written into the history of the Nation your organization and your members will hold a high place in the esteem of a grateful generation.

That we are permitting money to be issued and circulated unconstitutionally cannot be seriously doubted. The Constitution of the United States provides that to Congress alone shall be given the power to issue money and regulate the value thereof. This provision of the Constitution has never been repealed and stands as the fundamental part of the Constitution. Ever since the National Bank Act of 1863 was passed, and more particularly since the passage of the Federal Reserve Act in 1913, the power to issue money and regulate the value thereof has been handed over to private banking interests, and to thus hand over the control of the Nation's money and credit was and still is unconstitutional. This question has never been squarely raised before the Supreme Court of the United States, but has been acquiesced in by mere custom.

The evil effects of this unconstitutional control can be clearly seen when we see the following effects of this control, stated substantially as follows:

Bonds of the Government are issued in place of money; these bonds are sold to the banks and draw interest at an average of 3 percent and are tax free. Having thus secured the Government's obligations, the private banking interests, through the Federal Reserve Board, deposit the same identical bonds with the Government as security, and the Government hands over printed but unsigned currency of the United States for the full amount of the security offered. For this money the Federal Reserve Board does not pay any interest whatever.

Second. Under the banking laws adopted by Congress the money thus obtained or actually issued by the banks can be loaned out in amounts of 10 times the actual cash. The credit thus extended draws interest to the same degree as actual money. Through this operation the private interests of the country have created a public and private debt in the United States of $275,000,000,000, or approximately three times the present value of all property in the United States, public and private. The interest on this huge debt saps the annual resources of agriculture and labor, and still all the interest cannot be paid. The buying power of the people is destroyed by the forced payment of interest on imaginary money, the real money of which belonged to the Government all the while this process was in operation.

Third. We witness loss of homes and property and the people mired down in a sea of debt. Relief and more debts take the place of sound business activity. Unemployment follows as the result of the failure of business to find purchasers. The purchasing power of the people has been destroyed by the payment of interest. Thirty cents of every dollar's purchase goes to interest.

Fourth. To bring back normal conditions and prevent starvation of the people the Government again issues bonds, and sales are again made to the private banking interests, and as the process keeps on the whole business life of the Nation becomes more stagnant and suffering of the millions increases.

The remedy is easy: Congress can do it if it will. The power to issue money can be taken away from the private banking interests and exercised by the Government. Money can then be issued directly by the Government; bond issues can be stopped and the great interest burden stopped on bonds, and in addition the loaning of hot air can be controlled and the billions of dollars of interest on this hot air can be eliminated. The fifteen billion, or a major part of it, now going down the rat hole of interest on debts, public and private, can be turned into the business channel in the form of purchasing power in the hands of the people. There is nothing difficult or complicated about this remedy. In fact, the remedy is to declare now that the Constitution means what it says and that Congress has reassumed a power which it has always had, but which Congress cannot surrender by an act of Congress.

Surely it cannot be denied that this statement of the situation is fair; the reasoning is logical and cannot be successfully questioned. Why, then, don't we begin to do that which we always had a right to do and should have done? We falter because it will bring to an end the reign of special privilege. That special privilege can and does control congressional elections. Congressmen thus elected remain true to the interests that elected them. If the people will elect a Congress whose membership is not afraid of special privilege, the job will be done. This momentous question can be settled in the first congressional election which comes up. The people can win if they themselves will shun the alluring emoluments of special privilege, and go to the polls with a determination to save the greatest Government on earth from complete bankruptcy. Neither party is solely responsible; both major parties are sustained by contributions from special privilege, and when in office respond identically to their master's voice.

This unbridled control of the money and credit of the Government by private interests makes every citizen, including the operators of this unjust system, a financial slave. For centuries now we look with horror upon the land feudal system of continental Europe, but, as devastating as that system was, it at least fed the victims. We drove out the last vestige of feudalism here when we established this country, and it was because of the fear of it that our Declaration of Independence and the preamble of the Constitution were written. Having destroyed one system, we opened the way for a worse one. We are at this very hour confronted with the most dangerous feudal system ever recorded in the history of mankind—a financial feudalism. This system has deprived more than half of our population of their wealth, of the opportunity to work, of the necessities of life, and made them, in this emergency, abject slaves kneeling daily before the gates of public and private charity for that pittance which alone sustains life.

Every conceivable remedy can be applied; we can go in debt $40,000,000,000 more, and with it create artificial and useless jobs; we can build W. P. A. golf courses across the continent north and south, east and west; we can cut every weed and bush along the roadsides of every highway in America; we can build towers rivaling the Washington Monument for the purpose of caring for wild ducks; we can pour billions more into the cash tills of railroads, insurance companies, and banks; we can pass refinance bills until the crack of doom, and still our plight will continue until not a home in all the land is secure from financial ruin, unless we will eliminate prejudice, until we shall forget personal gain and all that it means in ease and enjoyment, and stand up like patriots of old and eradicate this common enemy of all—the financial feudal system of America. All other issues are but anthills to this mountain of destruction.

We need no further evidence of the debauchery of the private control of the Nation's money and credit. We are now at a point in our Nation's history where we must act. For generations we have escaped this gigantic task because of the endless dominions of the great unsettled West. We have pushed on to that West, we have conquered it, and have been in return exploited by this same feudal system. We are now at the end of the trail, and for the very first time in American history we have turned to face our tormentors. We have the best form of government on earth. It was instituted for justice, peace, and happiness, but through the power of this feudal system we have permitted it to control our Government instead of demanding that it shall be controlled by the people for whom it was instituted.

Shall we stand here idly and witness the destruction of this great Government? Shall we permit its enemies from within to accomplish that which its enemies from without do not dare attempt? The time has come, my friends, when every citizen in the land must forget himself, his ease and enjoyment, and be willing to make sacrifices now beyond comprehension to rid this land of its enemies of destruction, and there are none so dangerous to our liberties and to our lives as this monster known as financial feudalism. The question is, Shall we live on as a nation composed of free men or will we be content with restricted freedom during our lifetime and leave our children to become the financial vassals?

Not only have great private interests obtained a monopoly on the use of Government money and Government credit, but by reason of this control the great banking oligarchy has not spared independent banking but has used every conceivable power so abundantly created by the control of money to blot out and destroy all independence in banking; nor have its efforts stopped there. They have gone into every business field. They have used their power to furnish credit to legitimate business only on condition that profits to them shall be made a first consideration. Service to the community has been entirely overlooked. The welfare of the country and the people in it have been entirely and intentionally overlooked. They have demanded and obtained interests in and, in many cases, control over all legitimate and sometimes illegitimate business that has been compelled by reason of controlled money and credits to come to them for loans. They have filled boards of directors of business and affiliates, and have cobwebbed the whole business structure of the country with their interlocked directorates. Their purpose has been to lay the drain pipes of profits to every business to suck from it its independence, its ability to serve the public, and its property. Having obtained unlimited financial power, it has sought through that agency to control every activity of a free people and make them finally financial slaves.

Not satisfied with this, they have been bold enough to connive with weak Government officials and dazzle them with their power until they have intrigued their way into every Government financial institution designed to relieve the people. They are today in supreme command of the Government cash, the Government credit, the Government financial institutions. They are bigger than party—their comradeship in this oligarchy of finance is strong enough to keep their representatives in high Government positions, regardless of what political party may be in control. They have become, as they believe, masters of the people. They are destroying the Government, yet call the loudest for Government protection when their interests are in jeopardy. They desire Government for their own protection when their interests are in jeopardy. They desire Government for their own protection, but would deny that same protection to the people who suffer under their untrenched reign. Profits are their only ideas of patriotism. They would stand idly by and see this Government crumble and decay if only they may preserve their own financial empire.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the president of the National Academy of Sciences, transmitting, pursuant to law, the report of that academy for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1935, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on the Library.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress that it is the sense of the members of the Minnesota Legislature that the Government of the United States should perform its solemn promise and duty and place American agriculture on the basis of equality with other industries by providing an adequate system of credit, and that legislation to that end should be adopted at the earliest possible date, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. SHIPSTEAD on the 23d instant, p. 893, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, favoring the adoption of a constitutional amendment, so as to provide relief to farmers under the invalidated A. A. A. program, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See concurrent resolution printed in full when presented today by Mr. LOGAN.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter from the Discussion Group of New York City, N. Y., enclosing copy of a letter addressed by that group to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] commending him and the work accomplished by the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, and also favoring an additional appropriation for the expenses of the special committee, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

He also laid before the Senate the petition of O. G. Bargeron, of Brigham City, Utah, praying for the adoption of the so-called Townsend old-age-pension plan, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted at a meeting in Faneuil Hall, Boston, Mass., of lodges of the Massachusetts Grand Lodge of the Order of the Sons of Italy in America, favoring adherence to the practice and policy of American neutrality heretofore followed and now in effect, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by meetings of veterans and friends of veterans at Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the enactment of legislation providing for the immediate cash payment of adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by Malone Grange No. 959, of Malone, N. Y., favoring the imposition of a 10-cent tax on oleomargarine for the protection of the milk and butter industry, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAPPER presented a resolution adopted by members of Company G, Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, at their annual reunion at Coffeyville, Kans., favoring the enactment of the so-called Spanish War travel pay bill for the benefit of volunteer soldiers who remained in the Philippines after the signing of the treaty of peace with Spain, which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition numerously signed by sundry citizens of Phillipsburg, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the advertising of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LOGAN presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Concurrent resolution of the Senate of Kentucky and House of Representatives of the General Assembly of Kentucky requesting the United States Senate and the Congress of the United States to immediately enact legislation to provide for a constitutional amendment to take the place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act

Whereas the farmers of the State of Kentucky have been greatly benefited by the relief accorded them under the Agricultural Adjustment Act; and

Whereas the price of their products has been increased materially by the provisions of said act; and

Whereas said products before said act was passed were being produced at a loss to the farmers and that the benefits of said act have so increased the price of said products that the farmers of the State have been able to pay their debts and educate their children and save their homes; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has held said act unconstitutional, and the effect of said ruling will deprive the farmers of the State of the benefits of said act and will cause the prices of the products of the farmers to fall materially; and

Whereas the farmers of the State are not now adequately protected and our people are greatly distressed on account of the loss of the benefits of the A. A. A.: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the Commonwealth of Kentucky (and the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress and the Senate of the United States immediately enact legislation to provide for a constitutional amendment to take the place of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and to provide if it be possible the same relief that the farmers enjoyed under said A. A. A.; be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the senate be directed to send copies of this resolution to the Clerks of the House and the Senate of the Congress of the United States and to each Member of Congress from Kentucky.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—PETITION

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a petition addressed to me from a very large body of citizens of the State of Washington, asking Congress to make provision for the employment of this great body of citizens, who have not been on relief but have not had work for many years. I ask that the names be omitted from the RECORD, because it would necessitate too much printing.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the names, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States of America:

We, the undersigned, respectfully petition your honorable body and represent—

That there are at present in this country millions of unemployed who are desirous of securing employment and in need of work, but are not eligible to secure employment on the W. P. A. and other governmental agencies for the reason that they are not on relief rolls, either by reason of pride, or reliance upon their relatives or friends, or through the expenditures of savings in the past years which have dwindled to nothing, or through great sacrifice of property heretofore acquired.

This body of citizens, numbering 3 to 1 of those now employed on Government relief rolls, should be recognized and funds provided for their employment. These citizens are the backbone of the country and have in the past, and will in the future if employed, contribute largely toward the revenue which is necessary to carry on the Government. A failure to make suitable provision for this large number of citizens will necessitate their being placed on relief rolls.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. JOHNSON, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9871) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for the participation of the United States in the California-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Diego, Calif., in 1935 and 1936; authorizing an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes", approved March 7, 1935, to provide for participation in the California-Pacific International Exposition to be held at San Diego, Calif., in 1936, to authorize an appropriation therefor, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1474) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally, without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

S. 3686. A bill to amend that provision of the act approved March 3, 1879 (20 Stat. L. 412), relating to issue of arms and ammunition for the protection of public money and property (Rept. No. 1475);

S. 3687. A bill to validate payments and to relieve the accounts of disbursing officers of the Army on account of payments made to Reserve officers on active duty for rental allowances (Rept. No. 1476);

S. 3688. A bill to validate payments and to relieve disbursing officers' accounts of payments made to Reserve officers promoted while on active duty (Rept. No. 1477);

S. 3737. A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire by donation land at or near Newburgh, in Orange County, N. Y., for aviation field, military, or other public purposes (Rept. No. 1478); and

H. R. 3421. A bill to authorize credit in disbursing officers' accounts covering shipment of privately owned automobiles from October 12, 1927, to October 10, 1929 (Rept. No. 1479).

PRINTING REPORT OF DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution (S. Res. 220), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Thirty-eighth Annual Report of the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution for the year ended April 1, 1935, be printed as a Senate document.

EXPENSES OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATION OF THE MUNITIONS INDUSTRY

Mr. NYE, from the Special Committee on Investigation of the Munitions Industry, reported a resolution (S. Res. 221), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Vice President, under authority of Senate Resolution 206, agreed to April 12, 1934, to investigate the munitions industry, hereby is authorized to expend from the contingent fund of the Senate $7,369 in addition to the amount heretofore authorized to be expended for the purposes set forth in said resolution: Provided, That the committee is requested to make its final report to the Senate, with recommendations for legislation at this session of Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on January 23, 1936, that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1626. An act for the refunding of certain countervailing customs duties collected upon logs imported from British Columbia;

S. 2421. An act to amend the act entitled "An act forbidding the transportation of any person in interstate or foreign commerce, kidnaped, or otherwise unlawfully detained, and making such act a felony", as amended;

S. 2887. An act authorizing the Perry County Bridge Commission, of Perry County, Ind., to construct, maintain, and operate a toll bridge across the Ohio River at or near Cannelton, Ind.;

S. 3120. An act to authorize and direct the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain moneys to "Funds of Federal prisoners";

S. 3131. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge and causeway across the water between the mainland, at or near Cedar Point, and Dauphin Island, Ala.;

S. 3245. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at Astoria, Clatsop County, Oreg.; and

S. 3425. An act authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Government of Norway in settlement of all claims for reimbursement on account of losses sustained by the owner and crew of the Norwegian steamer Tampen.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3817) to amend section 36 of the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. BAILEY:

A bill (S. 3818) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to consider, ascertain, adjust, and determine certain claims for damages resulting from the operation of vessels of the Coast Guard and Public Health Service (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 3831) for the relief of J. H. Knott; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

A bill (S. 3832) to provide for Senate ratification of foreign trade agreements; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask permission, on behalf of my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] and myself, to introduce a joint resolution which provides for the participation of the United States in the world's fair which is to be held in the city of New York in 1939. I ask to have the joint resolution referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be received and referred as requested by the Senator from New York.

By Mr. COPELAND (for himself and Mr. WAGNER):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 203) providing for the participation of the United States in the world's fair to be held by New York World's Fair, 1939, Inc., in the city of New York during the year 1939, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 10464) making appropriations to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, and for prior fiscal years, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PUBLIC GRAZING LANDS—AMENDMENT

Mr. ASHURST and Mr. HAYDEN, jointly, submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them to the bill (H. R. 10094) to amend section 1 of the act entitled "An act to stop injury to the public grazing lands by preventing overgrazing and soil deterioration; to provide for their orderly use, improvement, and development; to stabilize the livestock industry dependent upon the public range; and for other purposes", approved June 28, 1934 (48 Stat. 1269), which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. KEYES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place, under the heading "Veterans' Administration", to insert the following new paragraph:

"For allotment and transfer to the Navy Department, for disbursement by it under the various headings of its applicable appropriations, for 40 beds at the United States Naval Hospital at Portsmouth, N. H., for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, including minor repairs and improvements of existing facilities under their jurisdiction necessary to such care and treatment, $60,000."

AMENDMENT TO SUPPLEMENTAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. KEYES submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10464, the supplemental deficiency appropriation bill, 1936, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place to insert the following:

"VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

"For allotment and transfer to the Navy Department, for disbursement by it under the various headings of its applicable appropriations, for 40 beds at the United States Naval Hospital at Portsmouth, N. H., for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, including minor repairs and improvements of existing facilities under their jurisdiction necessary to such care and treatment, $30,000."

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES—VETO

Mr. HARRISON. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the veto message of the President of the United States with reference to the so-called bonus bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I return herewith, without my approval, bill H. R. 9870, entitled "An act to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes."

On May 22, 1935, in disapproving a bill to pay the bonus in full immediately instead of in 1945, I gave in person to a joint session of the Congress complete and explicit reasons for my action.

The bill I now return differs from last year's bill in only two important respects: First, it eliminates the issuance of unsecured paper currency to make the payments required and substitutes interest-bearing bonds, which, however, may be converted into cash for face value at any time; second, it adds $263,000,000 to the total payments by forgiving interest after October 1, 1931, on amounts borrowed.

In all other respects the circumstances, arguments, and facts remain essentially the same as those fully covered and explained by me only 8 months ago.

I respectfully refer the Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives to every word of what I said then.

My convictions are as impelling today as they were then. Therefore I cannot change them.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 24, 1936.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives with reference to the veto message, which will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
January 24, 1936.

The House of Representatives having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 9870) entitled "An act to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes", returned by the President of the United States, with his objections, to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, it was

Resolved, That the said bill pass, two-thirds of the House of Representatives agreeing to pass the same.

Mr. KING. I move that the veto message just read by the clerk be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING].

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, you have just heard read the message of the President dated the 24th instant, in which he returns without his approval H. R. 9870, known as the soldiers' "bonus" measure.

It is possible there may be some individuals who entertain the view that the veto message should have been longer and should have critically examined and condemned the provisions of the bill referred to. However, the President, in the message before us, specifically directs the attention of the Members of the Senate and the House to his veto message of May 22, 1935, in which he disapproved of the bonus bill which the House and the Senate passed.

In the message just read the President declared that he gave explicit reasons for his veto of that bill, and states that—

> With the exception of two provisions, the circumstances, arguments, and facts remain essentially the same as those fully covered and explained by me only 8 months ago.

He states that his convictions are as compelling today as they were then. In other words, the veto message of May 22, 1935, represents the views of the President with respect to the measure now before us, and the reasons therein set forth are the basis for his disapproval of the message now before us.

Mr. President, I request that the clerk read the message of May 22, 1935, because it is possible that some Senators have forgotten the invincible reasons then assigned by the President for his disapproval of the bonus bill.

No one has attempted to answer the facts and reasons assigned by the President for his disapproval of the measure referred to. His arguments are unanswerable; the message was one of the most powerful ever delivered by any President. It has often been stated by opponents of the President, as well as by his supporters, that his so-called economy message to the Congress and the veto message of May 22, 1935, not only were convincing but were enthusiastically approved by millions of the American people.

I can scarcely believe that Senators who voted to sustain the action of the President in disapproving the bonus bill in May 1935 can give their support to the bill now before us, and which has been returned disapproved by the President. If the President was right in vetoing the former bonus bill, he is right in vetoing the pending measure. Senators who have urged that we "follow the President" have an opportunity now to demonstrate the sincerity of their appeals.

Since the veto message of May last conditions have arisen which strengthen and fortify the position then taken by the President and which supply additional reasons for the disapproval of the pending bill. It is certain that the expenditures of the Government for the next fiscal year will be larger than anticipated and will exceed the Budget estimates. The deficit for the next fiscal year will be of greater magnitude than was thought possible, and will require additional revenues which must be met by increased taxation, or stupendous bond issues which will retard recovery and disturb the economic and financial conditions of the country. To add more than $2,500,000,000 to the public debt, as contemplated by the bill before us, will prove disturbing to our industrial and financial situation if it does not seriously impair the credit of the Government.

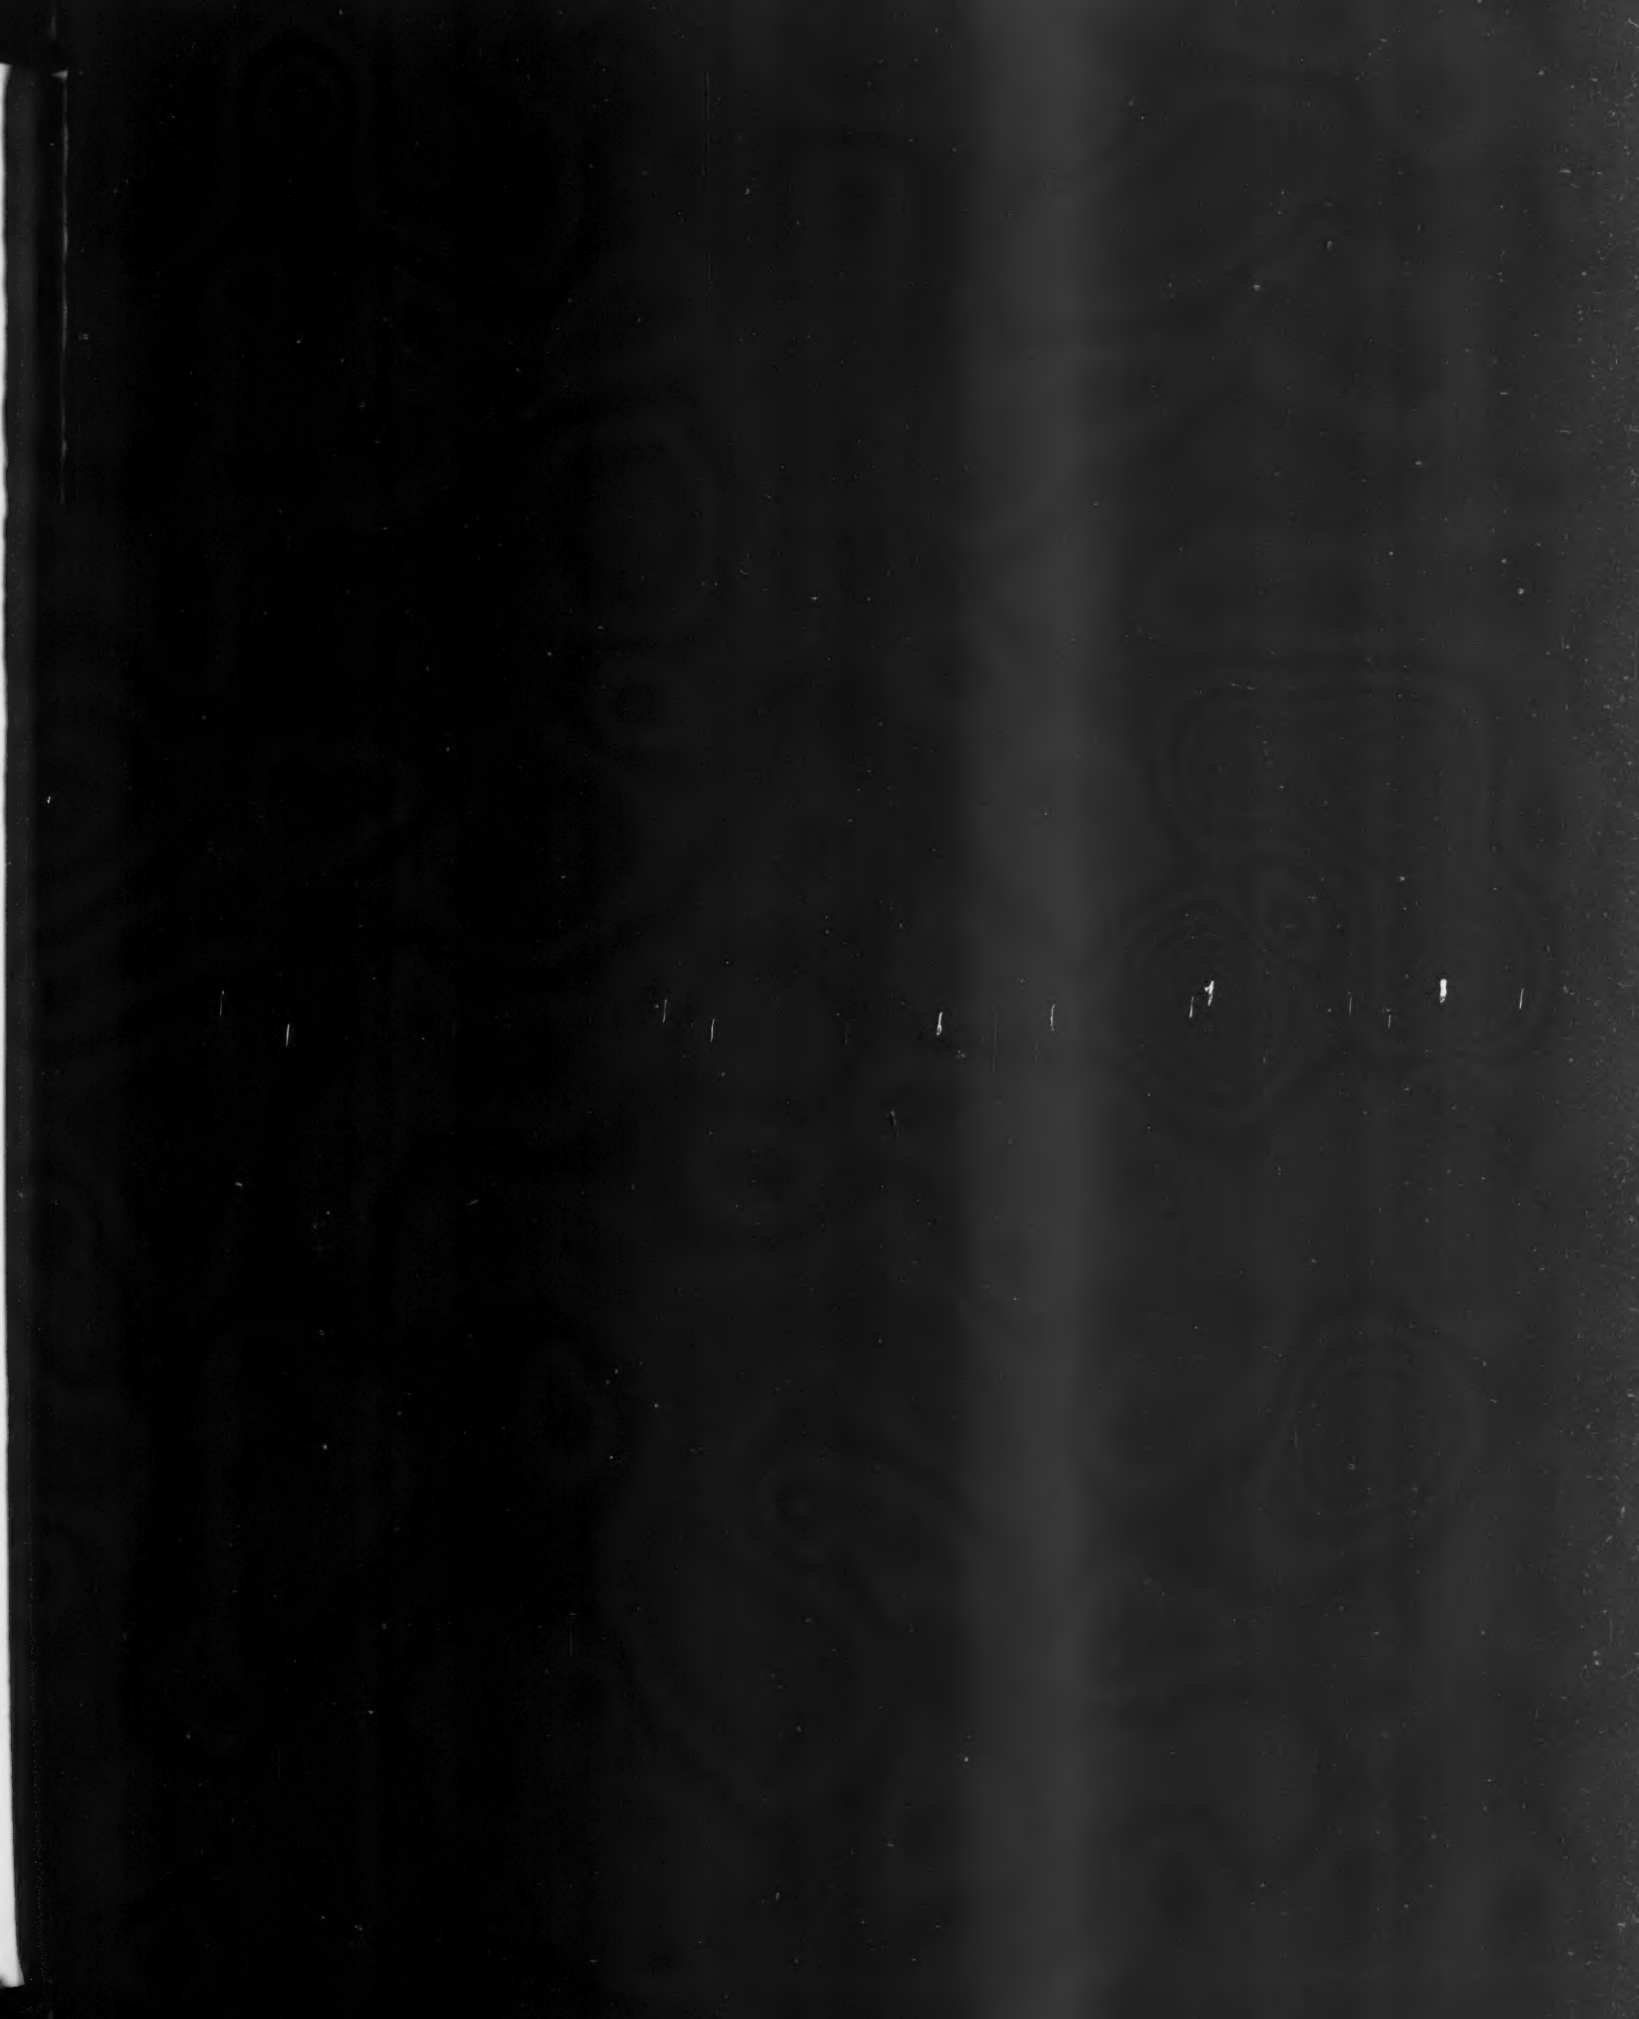
I request that the veto message of May 22 be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Speaker, Members of the House of Representatives, 2 days ago a number of gentlemen from the House of Representatives called upon me and with complete propriety presented their reasons for asking me to approve the House of Representatives' bill providing for the immediate payment of adjusted-service certificates. In the same spirit of courtesy I am returning this bill today to the House of Representatives. As I told the gentlemen who waited upon me, I have never doubted the good faith lying behind the reasons which have caused them and the majority of the Congress to advocate this bill. In the same spirit I come before you dispassionately and in good faith to give you, as simply as I can, the reasons which compel me to give it my disapproval.

And I am glad that the Senate by coming here in joint session gives me opportunity to give my reasons in person to the other House of the Congress.



As to the right and the propriety of the President in addressing the Congress in person, I am very certain that I have never in the past disagreed, and will never in the future disagree, with the Senate or the House of Representatives as to the constitutionality of the procedure. With your permission, I should like to continue from time to time to act as my own messenger.

Eighteen years ago the United States engaged in the World War. A nation of 120,000,000 people was united in the purpose of victory. The millions engaged in agriculture toiled to provide the raw materials and foodstuffs for our armies and for the nations with whom we were associated. Many other millions employed in industry labored to create the materials for the active conduct of the war on land and sea.

Out of this vast army, consisting of the whole working population of the Nation, four and three-quarter million men volunteered or were drafted into the armed forces of the United States. One-half of them remained within our American continental limits. The other half served overseas; and of these, 1,400,000 saw service in actual combat.

The people and the Government of the United States have shown a proper and generous regard for the sacrifices and patriotism of all of the four and three-quarter million men who were in uniform no matter where they served.

At the outbreak of the war, the President and the Congress sought and established an entirely new policy, however, in order to guide the granting of financial aid to soldiers and sailors. Remembering the unfortunate results that came from the lack of a veterans' policy after the Civil War, they determined that a prudent and sound principle of insurance should supplant the uncertainties and unfairness of direct bounties. At the same time, their policy encompassed the most complete care for those who had suffered disabilities in service. With respect to the grants made within the lines of this general policy, the President and the Congress have fully recognized that those who served in uniform deserved certain benefits to which other citizens of the Republic were not entitled, and in which they could not participate.

In line with these sound and fair principles, many benefits have been provided for veterans.

During the war itself provision was made for Government allowances for the families and other dependents of enlisted men in service. Disability and death compensation was provided for casualties in line of duty.

The original provisions for these benefits have been subsequently changed and liberalized many times by the Congress. Later generous presumptions for veterans who became ill after the termination of the war were written into the statute to help veterans in their claims for disability. As a result of this liberal legislation for disability and for death compensation, 1,140,000 men and women have been benefited.

During the war the Government started a system of voluntary insurance at peacetime rates for men and women in the service.

Generous provision has been made for hospitalization, vocational training, and rehabilitation of veterans. You are familiar with this excellent care given to the sick and disabled.

In addition to these direct benefits, Congress has given recognition to the interest and welfare of veterans in employment matters, through veteran preference in the United States civil service, in the selection of employees under the Public Works Administration through the establishment of a veterans' employment unit in the Department of Labor, and through provisions favoring veterans in the selection of those employed in the Civilian Conservation Corps. Many States have likewise given special bonuses in cash and veterans' preferences in State and local public employment.

Furthermore unemployed veterans as a group have benefited more largely than any other group from the expenditure of the great public-works appropriation of $3,300,000,000 made by the Congress in 1933, and under which we are still operating. In like manner the new $4,000,000,000 Work Relief Act seeks to give employment to practically every veteran who is receiving relief.

We may measure the benefits extended from the fact that there has been expended up to the end of the last fiscal year more than $7,800,000,000 for these items in behalf of the veterans of the World War, not including sums spent for home or work relief. With our current annual expenditures of some $450,000,000 and the liquidation of outstanding obligations under term insurance and the payment of the service certificates, it seems safe to predict that by the year 1945 we will have expended $13,500,000,000. This is a sum equal to more than three-fourths of the entire cost of our participation in the World War, and 10 years from now most of the veterans of that war will be barely past the half-century mark.

Payments have been and are being made only to veterans of the World War and their dependents, and not to civilian workers who helped to win that war.

In the light of our established principles and policies let us consider the case of adjusted compensation. Soon after the close of the war a claim was made by several veterans' organizations that they should be paid some adjusted compensation for their time in uniform. After a complete and fair presentation of the whole subject, followed by full debate in the Congress of the United States, a settlement was reached in 1924.

This settlement provided for adjustment in compensation during service by an additional allowance per day for actual service rendered. Because cash payment was not to be made immediately, this basic allowance was increased by 25 percent and to this was added compound interest for 20 years, the whole to be paid in 1945. The result of this computation was that an amount two and one-half times the original grant would be paid at maturity.

Taking the average case as an example, the Government acknowledged a claim of $400 to be due. This $400, under the provisions of the settlement, with the addition of the 25 percent for deferred payment and the compound interest from that time until 1945, would amount to the sum of $1,000 in 1945. The veteran was thereupon given a certificate containing an agreement by the Government to pay him this $1,000 in 1945 or to pay it to his family if he died at any time before 1945. In effect, it was a paid-up endowment policy in the average case for $1,000 payable in 1945, or sooner in the event of death. Under the provisions of this settlement, the total obligation of $1,400,000,000 in 1924 produced a maturity or face value of $3,500,000,000 in 1945.

Since 1924 the only major change in the original settlement was the act of 1931 under which veterans were authorized to borrow up to 50 percent of the face value of their certificates as of 1945. Three million veterans have already borrowed under this provision an amount which, with interest charges, totals $1,700,000,000.

The bill before me provides for the immediate payment of the 1945 value of the certificates. It means paying $1,600,000,000 more than the present value of the certificates. It requires an expenditure of more than $2,200,000,000 in cash for this purpose. It directs payment to the veterans of a much larger sum than was contemplated in the 1924 settlement. It is nothing less than a complete abandonment of that settlement. It is a new straight gratuity or bounty to the amount of $1,600,000,000. It destroys the insurance protection for the dependents of the veterans provided in the original plan. For the remaining period of 10 years they will have lost this insurance.

This proposal, I submit, violates the entire principle of veterans' benefits so carefully formulated at the time of the war and also the entire principle of the adjusted-certificate settlement of 1924.

What are the reasons presented in this bill for this fundamental change in policy? They are set forth with care in a number of "whereas" clauses at the beginning of the bill.

The first of these states as reasons for the cash payment of these certificates at this time: That it will increase the purchasing power of millions of the consuming public; that it will provide relief for many who are in need because of economic conditions; and that it will lighten the relief burden of cities, counties, and States. The second states that payment will not create any additional debt. The third states that payment now will be an effective method of spending money to hasten recovery.

These are the enacted reasons for the passage of this bill. Let me briefly analyze them.

First, the spending of this sum, it cannot be denied, would result in some expansion of retail trade. But it must be noted that retail trade has already expanded to a condition that compares favorably with conditions before the depression. However, to resort to the kind of financial practice provided in this bill would not improve the conditions necessary to expand those industries in which we have the greatest unemployment. The Treasury notes issued under the terms of this bill we know from past experience would return quickly to the banks. We know, too, that the banks have at this moment more than ample credit with which to expand the activities of business and industry generally. The ultimate effect of this bill will not in the long run justify the expectations that have been raised by those who argue for it.

The next reason in the first "whereas" clause is that present payment will provide relief for many who are in need because of economic conditions. The Congress has just passed an act to provide work relief for such citizens. Some veterans are on the relief rolls, though relatively not nearly as many as is the case with nonveterans. Assume, however, that such a veteran served in the United States or overseas during the war; that he came through in fine physical shape, as most of them did; that he received an honorable discharge; that he is today 38 years old and in full possession of his faculties and health; that like several million other Americans he is receiving from his Government relief and assistance in one of many forms—I hold that that able-bodied citizen, because he wore a uniform and for no other reason, should be accorded no treatment different from that accorded to other citizens who did not wear a uniform during the World War.

The third reason given in the first "whereas" clause is that payment today would lighten the relief burden of municipalities. Why, I ask, should the Congress lift that burden in respect only to those who wore the uniform? Is it not better to treat every able-bodied American alike and to carry out the great relief program adopted by this Congress in a spirit of equality to all? This applies to every other unit of government throughout the Nation.

The second "whereas" clause, which states that the payment of certificates will not create an additional debt, raises a fundamental question of sound finance. To meet a claim of one group by this deceptively easy method of payment will raise similar demands for the payment of claims of other groups. It is easy to see the ultimate result of meeting recurring demands by the issuance of Treasury notes. It invites an ultimate reckoning in uncontrollable prices and in the destruction of the value of savings, that will strike most cruelly those like the veterans who seem to be temporarily benefited. The first person injured by sky-rocketing prices is the man on a fixed income. Every disabled veteran on pension or allowance is on fixed income. This bill favors the able-bodied veteran at the expense of the disabled veteran.

Wealth is not created, nor is it more equitably distributed by this method. A government, like an individual, must ultimately meet legitimate obligations out of the production of wealth by the labor of human beings applied to the resources of nature. Every country that has attempted the form of meeting its obligations which is here provided has suffered disastrous consequences.

In the majority of cases printing-press money has not been retired through taxation. Because of increased costs, caused by inflated prices, new issue has followed new issue, ending in the ultimate wiping out of the currency of the afflicted country. In a few cases, like our own in the period of the Civil War, the printing of Treasury notes to cover an emergency has fortunately not resulted in actual disaster and collapse but has nevertheless caused this Nation untold troubles, economic and political, for a whole generation.

The statement in this same second "whereas" clause that payment will discharge and retire an acknowledged contract obligation of the Government is, I regret to say, not in accordance with the fact. It wholly omits and disregards the fact that this contract obligation is due in 1945 and not today.

If I, as an individual, owe you, an individual Member of the Congress, $1,000 payable in 1945, it is not a correct statement for you to tell me that I owe you $1,000 today. As a matter of practical fact, if I put $750 into a Government savings bond today and make that bond out in your name you will get $1,000 on the due date, 10 years from now. My debt to you today, therefore, cannot under the remotest possibility be considered more than $750.

The final "whereas" clause, stating that spending the money is the most effective means of hastening recovery is so ill considered that little comment is necessary. Every authorization of expenditure by the Seventy-third Congress in its session of 1933 and 1934, and every appropriation by the Seventy-fourth Congress to date, for recovery purposes, has been predicated not on the mere spending of money to hasten recovery, but on the sounder principle of preventing the loss of homes and farms, of saving industry from bankruptcy, of safeguarding bank deposits, and most important of all—of giving relief and jobs through public work to individuals and families faced with starvation. These greater and broader concerns of the American people have a prior claim for our consideration at this time. They have the right-of-way.

There is before this Congress legislation providing old-age benefits and a greater measure of security for all workers against the hazards of unemployment. We are also meeting the pressing necessities of those who are now unemployed and in need of immediate relief. In all of this every veteran shares.

To argue for this bill as a relief measure is to indulge in the fallacy that the welfare of the country can be generally served by extending relief on some basis other than actual deserving need.

The core of the question is that a man who is sick or under some other special disability because he was a soldier should certainly be assisted as such. But if a man is suffering from economic need because of the depression, even though he is a veteran, he must be placed on a par with all of the other victims of the depression. The veteran who is disabled owes his condition to the war. The healthy veteran who is unemployed owes his troubles to the depression. Each presents a separate and different problem. Any attempt to mingle the two problems is to confuse our efforts.

Even the veteran who is on relief will benefit only temporarily by this measure, because the payment of this sum to him will remove him from the group entitled to relief if the ordinary rules of relief agencies are followed. For him this measure would give, but it would also take away. In the end he would be the loser.

The veteran who suffers from this depression can best be aided by the rehabilitation of the country as a whole. His country with honor and gratitude returned him at the end of the war to the citizenry from which he came. He became once more a member of the great civilian population. His interests became identified with its fortunes and also with its misfortunes.

Some years ago it was well said by the distinguished senior Senator from Idaho that "The soldier of this country cannot be aided except as the country itself is rehabilitated. The soldier cannot come back except as the people as a whole come back. The soldier cannot prosper unless the people prosper. He has now gone back and intermingled and become a part of the citizenship of the country; he is wrapped up in its welfare or in its adversity. The handing out to him of a few dollars will not benefit him under such circumstances, whereas it will greatly injure the prospects of the country and the restoration of normal conditions."

It is generally conceded that the settlement by adjusted-compensation certificates made in 1924 was fair and it was accepted as fair by the overwhelming majority of World War veterans themselves.

I have much sympathy for the argument that some who remained at home in civilian employ enjoyed special privilege and unwarranted remuneration. That is true—bitterly true—but a recurrence of that type of war profiteering can and must be prevented in any future war.

I invite the Congress and the veterans with the great masses of the American population to join with me in progressive efforts to root a recurrence of such injustice out of American life. But we should not destroy privilege and create new privilege at the same time. Two wrongs do not make a right.

The Herculean task of the United States Government today is to take care that its citizens have the necessities of life. We are seeking honestly and honorably to do this, irrespective of class or group. Rightly, we give preferential treatment to those men who were wounded, disabled, or who became ill as a result of war service. Rightly, we give care to those who subsequently have become ill. The others—and they represent the great majority—are today in the prime of life, are today in full bodily vigor. They are American citizens who should be accorded equal privileges and equal rights to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—no less and no more.

It is important to make one more point. In accordance with the mandate of the Congress, our Budget has been set. The public has accepted it. On that basis this Congress has made and is making its appropriations. That Budget asked for appropriations in excess of receipts to the extent of $4,000,000,000. The whole of that deficit was to be applied for work relief for the unemployed. That was a single-minded, definite purpose. Every unemployed veteran on the relief rolls was included in that proposed deficit—he will be taken care of out of it.

I cannot in honesty assert to you that to increase that deficit this year by $2,200,000,000 will in itself bankrupt the United States. Today the credit of the United States is safe. But it cannot ultimately be safe if we engage in a policy of yielding to each and all of the groups that are able to enforce upon the Congress claims for special consideration. To do so is to abandon the principle of government by and for the American people and to put in its place government by and for political coercion by minorities. We can afford all that we need; but we cannot afford all that we want.

I do not need to be a prophet to assert that if these certificates, due in 1945, are paid in full today, every candidate for election to the Senate or to the House of Representatives will in the near future be called upon in the name of patriotism to support general pension legislation for all veterans, regardless of need or age.

Finally, I invite your attention to the fact that solely from the point of view of the good credit of the United States, the complete failure of the Congress to provide additional taxes for an additional expenditure of this magnitude would in itself and by itself alone warrant disapproval of this measure.

I well know the disappointment that the performance of my duty in this matter will occasion to many thousands of my fellow citizens. I well realize that some who favor this bill are moved by a true desire to benefit the veterans of the World War and to contribute to the welfare of the Nation. These citizens will, however, realize that I bear an obligation as President and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, which extends to all groups, to all citizens, to the present and to the future. I cannot be true to the office I hold if I do not weigh the claims of all in the scales of equity. I cannot swerve from this moral obligation.

I am thinking of those who served their country in the Army and in the Navy during the period which convulsed the entire civilized world. I saw their service at first-hand at home and overseas. I am thinking of those millions of men and women who increased crops, who made munitions, who ran our railroads, and who worked in the mines, who loaded our ships during the war period.

I am thinking of those who died in the cause of America here and abroad, in uniform and out; I am thinking of the widows and orphans of all of them; I am thinking of 5,000,000 of Americans who, with their families, are today in dire need, supported in whole or in part by Federal, State, and local governments who have decreed that they shall not starve. I am thinking not only of the past, not only of today, but of the years to come. In this future of ours it is of first importance that we yield not to the sympathy which we would extend to a single group or class by special legislation for that group or class, but that we should extend assistance to all groups and all classes who in an emergency need the helping hand of their Government.

I believe the welfare of the Nation, as well as the future welfare of the veterans, wholly justifies my disapproval of this measure.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I return, without my approval, House of Representatives bill no. 3896, providing for the immediate payment to veterans of the 1945 face value of their adjusted-service certificates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to invite the Senate to a thought, that it is apparent from the declaration of the President in the message just read and also from the views often expressed by the President that he has given very serious and deep consideration to the whole matter.

Sirs, at the outset the President declares before us his friendship for the soldier, and states his desire for beneficial service in his behalf. Above all, he makes a complete declaration of no interest otherwise than the preservation, as he sees it, of the credit of the Treasury and the welfare of the country. His sympathy for the soldier, and his thought of respect to the Congress and the committees—of one of which I was a member—that presented the measures and the reasons to him, and his position clearly indicates the very high and noble purpose the President had in returning the measure with his veto.

I commend to my honorable colleagues that which we all will approve and greatly endorse. It is that whatever has been the course of the President in this serious subject has been the result of the conception of a duty necessary to be discharged, sanctified by a sacred conscience.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I have finished.

Mr. KING. I desire to ask the Senator a question, if I may.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Utah desires to interrogate me. I have concluded, but I yield for that purpose.

Mr. KING. I merely wish to ask the Senator whether his very eloquent apostrophe to the President does not compel him to vote to support the attitude of the President in this matter?

Mr. LEWIS. No; it compels me to do exactly as the President did—to follow the sense of duty, sustained by conscience.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very interesting editorial, written by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], appearing in the Progressive of January 25, 1936, on the subject of the payment of the soldiers' adjusted compensation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Progressive of Jan. 25, 1936]

THE BONUS IS DESERVED!

(An editorial by Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.)

The day the United States entered the World War it undertook a serious obligation to the soldiers who were called into the service. The Government required nearly 4,000,000 boys to give up their places at home and help fight the war, and they were assured that their service would not be forgotten.

The sacrifice those American soldiers were asked to make cannot be estimated. Many of them left their families never to return. Others came back maimed and incapacitated for a useful life.

They not only made a physical sacrifice; they made an economic one as well. While profiteers were coining fortunes at home with the help of wartime prices, while the jobs these soldiers left behind were paying others the full measure of wartime wages, and while business and agriculture were both sharing in the prosperity of the war, they were serving their country for $30 a month.

The last war is now almost 20 years behind us, and many people are prone to overlook the circumstances on which the Government's obligations to the veterans are based. It has always been my contention that once the Government resorted to the plenary power of drafting men for service in a foreign war, it became responsible not only for the physical consequences to the men inducted into service but also for their economic handicap upon their return to civil life. This policy was recognized in the promises made to the veterans that "nothing would be too good for them when they came back."

The American people were morally obligated to share the burden of the war among them as equally as possible, and the Government was likewise obligated to do everything in its power to discharge this responsibility. But within 3 days after the first American draft contingent departed for France the United States Senate in the professed interest of the Federal Budget killed a proposal to increase the pay of soldiers at the front to $3 a day. Yet the same Senate consistently refused to act in the interests of the Budget when it came to the question of taxing war profits and putting the war on a pay-as-you-go basis.

The bonus is a belated attempt to compensate the veteran for the economic discrimination he suffered during the period of his war service. Unfortunately, the damage he sustained is probably now far beyond any practical hope of full compensation. The settlement outlined in the Adjusted Compensation Act of 1924 is no measure of it; it is only a recognition of the obligation and an attempt to meet it in part.

Since the question was first raised after the war the bonus has always been opposed by those who condemned it as a threat to the National Budget and the credit of the Government. However, throughout the administrations of Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover the Government was consistently committed to a policy of tax reduction for the benefit of the wealthy. Under the leadership of Secretary Mellon the taxes on great wealth and huge fortunes were consistently reduced. The same man who, as Secretary of the Treasury, so violently opposed every move toward the payment of the soldiers' bonus on the ground that it would unbalance the Budget was thus pushing forward a policy of tax reduction which would have virtually the same effect, but the beneficiaries of the two policies were not the same. The veteran was sacrificed in favor of wealth.

The Government should have accorded its soldiers fair economic treatment during the war, but failing in that it should have paid the bonus after the armistice and promptly compensated them for the injury they suffered. The obligation was due immediately after the service was rendered. The Government belatedly recognized the obligation in 1924, but insisted that the payment should be postponed until 1945. Many veterans were justified in calling this a tombstone bonus.

It is too late to hedge on the costs of the last war. They should have been considered before we entered it, for once a war is fought it must be paid for. Bonuses and pensions are a part of the cost of war. The time to decide whether those costs are to be paid or not is before we go to war, not afterward.

A few years ago 72 percent of our regular national expenditures went for the payment for past wars and the preparation for future wars. Those who are opposed to the payment of the bonus can make better use of their energy by supporting a reduction of costly armaments, the adoption of a strict neutrality statute, and legislation to take the profit out of war instead of advocating the repudiation of our existing obligations at the expense of the World War veteran who has already done his part.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am somewhat embarrassed to find that, so far as I can discover, there is to be nothing said on the other side of the Chamber in an effort to support the President's veto of the adjusted-compensation bill. One of my colleagues suggested a few moments ago that any effort to sustain the President's veto was a good deal like the chap who wanted to whip the corpse. Whether that be true or not, it seems to me that something ought to be said on one side of this Chamber or the other in support of the President of the United States when he sends a veto message to the Congress upon an important subject.

A few days ago, when this matter was before the Senate, the chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] expressed the hope that the President would approve the bill, but also suggested that he was satisfied that whether the President approved it or not, it would become the law of the land. With his long experience in the Senate, with his quite accurate knowledge of what those on the other side are thinking and doing, I assume that his prediction is about to be fulfilled.

I may say that I was disappointed in the President's message in two particulars; first, that it was not as vigorous as I had hoped it would be. It has been described by some persons as of the milk-toast variety.

I was also disappointed in noting that he made the mistake of saying that the bill now before us differed from the one enacted in May of last year, in that it adds $263,000,000 to the bonus payment by forgiving interest after October 1, 1931, on amounts borrowed. I think the President is mistaken with respect to that, although the chances are it would not have affected his judgment with respect to the veto.

I desire to call attention to section 509, paragraph (c) of the Adjusted Compensation Act of 1935, as follows:

(c) If at the time of application to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment under this section the principal and interest on or in respect of any loan upon the certificate have not been paid in full by the veterans (whether or not the loan has matured), then, on request of the veteran, the Administrator shall (1) pay or otherwise discharge such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest (accrued or to accrue) as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this section, and (2) deduct from the amount of the face value of the certificate the amount of such principal and so much of such interest, if any, as accrued prior to October 1, 1931.

Mr. President, I only read that into the RECORD for the purpose of keeping the RECORD as nearly straight as possible.

In the veto message of May 22, 1935, the Senate was invited to join the House and for the first time, so far as I know, hear the President deliver a veto message to a joint session of the Congress. It was a dramatic thing to do, and the President appeared there with all the fire of a real general satisfied that he was correct, and satisfied that he was sure to win. Today there is no such dramatic situation, unless writing the veto message with his own hand may be said to be dramatic. But, in my judgment, there is one thing the President ought to have commented upon. Senators will recall what has just been read to them—the veto message of May last—as to what the President said about not being able to say that with the bonus added at that time, in May 1935, it would put the country in the position where it could not meet its obligations. However, it seems to me that he might have added to this veto message a very significant fact, namely, that between that time and June 30, 1937, according to the Treasury Department, the debt of the country, including the payment of this bonus, will be increased by something like $7,000,000,000.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who now occupies the chair, spoke following me the other day when the bonus bill was before the Senate, and undertook to minimize the dangers which would come to the country if the bill were passed. The distinguished Senator is a member of the Finance Committee. He was present when Mr. Morgenthau, the Secretary of the Treasury, was before the committee. I propose to show that the Senator from Kentucky made a very serious mistake, however, in his statement to the Senate as to the condition of the Treasury—a serious mistake, it seems to me, because it involves literally billions of dollars. The Senate will recall that the Senator from Kentucky went on to show that the refunding of $5,800,000,000 was not important at all, because the Secretary of the Treasury could do the same as a distinguished Governor did in his State at one time, namely, give a new note for an old note, a practice which the distinguished Governor had been following all his life in his personal affairs. So the Senator from Kentucky gets rid of the difficulty of refunding that $5,800,000,000 with that interesting story.

Then he goes on to show that the next item—the billion-dollar item—was the item that was placed there for the purpose of returning to the processors the amount of tax which they paid under an act which had subsequently been declared unconstitutional. The Senator was in error with respect to that. That billion dollars is for no such purpose. I shall read in a moment or two what the Secretary of the Treasury said, because before we vote upon this bill I desire the Senate and the country to know the exact facts with respect to the condition of the finances of the country as shown by the Secretary of the Treasury himself. However, before going into that let me call the Senate's attention to some other statements made by the Senator from Kentucky.

In the first place, he calls attention to the fact that the Government debt during the Hoover administration was increased from $16,000,000,000 to about $21,000,000,000. Then he goes on to use this language:

In other words, in the 4 years of the administration of Mr. Hoover our public debt increased from about $16,000,000,000 to about $21,000,000,000, whereas it has increased since the 4th of March 1933 from about $21,000,000,000 to about $28,000,000,000.

Then he goes on to show that it has been estimated that by the end of June of next year the public debt would be $31,000,000,000. Then he deducts from that the recoverable assets of $4,300,000,000, and thereby undertakes to show that the much-talked-of increased debt during the Roosevelt administration was not, after all, very different from that of the Hoover administration.

But he does not give to the Hoover administration the credit—it is not very important so far as this discussion is concerned—he does not give to Mr. Hoover's administration the credit for $2,283,000,000 of that $4,300,000,000. So that if he had been accurate with it all, and assuming that we ought to deduct the $4,300,000,000, he should in all fairness have deducted the $2,283,000,000 from the $5,000,000,000 deficit during the Hoover administration. But, like him, I do not propose for the moment to discuss the merits of those administrations with respect to the matter of the public debt. However, he gives the figures of the public debt at the present time as being $28,000,000,000. The actual public debt on December 31, 1935, was $30,557,324,062, according to the Treasury's own statement. So with respect to that he was at least two and one-half billion dollars off in his figures.

I may now refer to the testimony given by the Secretary of the Treasury to show that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky was not justified in minimizing the condition of the Treasury. This testimony does not appear in the hearings in logical order, so in places it is duplicated; but this, to my mind, is an important matter, and I hope the Senate will be patient with me until I can get it in the RECORD. Senator COUZENS inquired:

Included in that, of course, is not any additional expense of the Government?—

Referring to the $5,800,000,000—

Secretary MORGENTHAU. No, sir. I was going to come to that. For the rest of this fiscal year we estimate, after the decision of the Supreme Court on the A. A. A., that we will have to raise in new funds about $1,000,000,000 between now and the 1st of July * * * A billion dollars in cash between now and the 1st of July. That is taking into account the loss of revenue through the decision of the Supreme Court on the A. A. A. and not allowing for any legislation to refund the Treasury in view of the Supreme Court decision. We do not know what Congress will do in that connection.

It seems to me it is there made perfectly clear that the billion dollars referred to by the Senator from Kentucky is not the estimated billion dollars that has been illegally collected from the processors. Further along in this testimony that fact is emphasized—

The CHAIRMAN. Is that assuming that the money that has been paid already on the processing tax can be recovered by them?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. No; but it does take into account the loss of impounded money.

Senator CLARK. It provides for paying off the contractual obligations of the Government and for disposing of the impounded money?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. No, sir; it does not take into account the money which is due the farmers for having carried out the 1935 contracts.

Later in this testimony that is estimated to be $236,000,000. So we have a billion, and then we have two hundred and thirty-six million more.

Secretary MORGENTHAU—

Talking about the impounded money—

I am trying to state it as I see it on this morning, with the Court's decision behind us, and not taking into account new legislation which is being discussed by the Congress and the administration.

So, taking everything into account, we figure we have to raise another billion dollars between now and the 1st of July.

Now, starting in with July 1, 1936, as the President's Budget stood the morning he sent it to you, we would have had to raise $500,000,000 new money for the year beginning July 1, 1936.

So we have $1,000,000,000; we have two hundred and thirty-six million which it is estimated will be returned to the farmers, and we have five hundred million more to take care of the President's Budget for the next fiscal year.

The President stated in the Budget message that he would send up the figures for the relief in a couple of months, and he indicated that the amount would not exceed $2,136,000,000. If you wish to use round figures as to what Congress may vote, let us use $2,000,000,000 for relief, plus the $500,000,000 deficit. That is two and one-half billion dollars that we might have to raise in the fiscal year beginning with July 1, 1936.

Now, on top of that there is the figure for the veterans, in between your $1,700,000,000 and the $2,200,000,000, and the average of which is about the figure of $2,000,000,000. So there is five hundred million in the President's Budget; let us use the figure $2,000,000,000 for relief, and let us use $2,000,000,000 for the soldiers' bonus, so you get another four and one-half billion dollars that we might have to raise during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1937.

That four and a half billion dollars plus the one billion that he needs for this fiscal year make five and a half billion, and adding to that the $5,800,000,000 for the next 7 months makes a total of $11,300,000,000, without saying anything about the $236,000,000 that must be returned to the farmers.

Mr. President, I am trying not to burden the RECORD with some of the duplications in this matter. So I will ask the Senate to bear with me a moment until I can find the quotations from this testimony which I wish to call to the attention of the Senate.

Bearing in mind the condition in which the Secretary of the Treasury finds himself, let me quote this statement:

Now, when we talked about a decreased deficit, that is what a bond buyer looks for. He wants to know what is the state of his own Government's finances. He will say, "Are they going to go constantly into debt or are they coming out of this depression with decreasing deficits? * * *"

The thing I am trying to say is this: Since Monday a week ago I do not think anybody in the United States can say what the picture is going to be. So many things have happened that affect the Treasury that I certainly am not smart enough, and I haven't met anybody that is smart enough, who can say what is the future of the Government bond market.

Now, this whole question of Government credit is such a delicate thing. One day there is confidence and the people who buy bonds are with you, and then overnight something happens and they won't buy.

Again—

Senator BAILEY. Now, Mr. Morgenthau, let me ask you, if in the next 90 days the Treasury undertakes to sell bonds, or if in the next 17 months the Treasury undertakes to raise $11,000,000,000 by way of selling bonds or short-term notes, and you should fail to sell them, and a demand is being made, what would be the effect on the economic structure of the Government?

Secretary MORGENTHAU. The minute I cannot raise the money required to finance the Government, that minute you will have complete chaos.

Further along Senator BARKLEY asked:

That puts no immediate string on the Treasury, unless they ask for cash—

Talking about the bonus.

Secretary MORGENTHAU. What I was trying to do was to answer Senator BAILEY'S question as to what effect this proposed legislation will have on the bond market. Now, you have got to put yourself in the place of a man who wants to buy United States Government securities, and the thing that is going through his mind is, "What is the worst he may expect."

Mr. President, I am quite certain that the Secretary of the Treasury is correct when he estimates that we shall require for the remainder of the present fiscal year a billion dollars of new money; that we shall require for the next fiscal year when the bonus bill becomes operative four and a half billion dollars, making a total of five and a half billion dollars to be added to the debt which on December 31 last was more than thirty and a half billion dollars, making a total debt, if you please, of $36,000,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator taking into account in the total just given what obviously we will have to appropriate under contemplated legislation, including several hundred million dollars, perhaps $500,000,000, for agriculture, and then, in addition to that, as I think the Senator from North Dakota will bear me out, an appropriation for naval and military purposes larger than that which was contemplated by the President in the Budget message which he transmitted to the Congress? I think the amount that Congress will have to appropriate in order to meet the demands of Congress if not of the executive departments before adjournment will be greatly in excess of the sum indicated by the able Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no doubt the Senator is correct, but what I was endeavoring to do, and all I was endeavoring to do, was to point out what the Secretary of the Treasury himself said he could see as the needs of the Treasury without any additional legislation, which was a point he emphasized on more than one occasion.

Mr. President, we have heard read this morning the message of the President of May 22, 1935, which he emphasized in the veto message we now have before us is still his opinion. I desire to read an extract from the former message because I want to emphasize it:

I cannot in honesty assert to you that to increase that deficit this year by $2,200,000,000 will in itself bankrupt the United States. Today the credit of the United States is safe. But it cannot ultimately be safe if we engage in a policy of yielding to each and all of the groups that are able to enforce upon the Congress claims for special consideration. To do so is to abandon the principle of government by and for the American people and to put in its place government by and for political coercion by minorities. We can afford all that we need; but we cannot afford all that we want.

I do not need to be a prophet to assert that if these certificates, due in 1945, are paid in full today every candidate for election to the Senate or to the House of Representatives will in the near future be called upon in the name of patriotism to support general pension legislation for all veterans, regardless of need or age.

Finally, I invite your attention to the fact that solely from the point of view of the good credit of the United States the complete failure of the Congress to provide additional taxes for an additional expenditure of this magnitude would in itself and by itself alone warrant disapproval of this measure.

Mr. President, with respect to minorities controlling the Congress and running the Government, we have heard that cry throughout the country for many years and for many generations. Everyone appreciates that there is much in what the President said with respect to it. Everyone at the same time appreciates that it is only the strong Executive who can stop that sort of thing; and when the Executive does undertake to stop it, it seems to me his message and his determination ought to meet with some reasonable response from the Congress itself.

I think the President could have added to this message. I repeat what I said before, that he could have written a stronger message and made a stronger appeal to Congress if he had called our attention to the fact that between the last message and this he and his Secretary of the Treasury can see $7,000,000,000 more of debt being piled upon the citizens of this country.

O Mr. President, I do not know where the limit is. It may be that there is no such danger as I anticipate; it may be that there is no such danger as the Secretary of the Treasury intimates and as the President of the United States intimates; but, as the distinguished Senator from North Carolina said to the Secretary of the Treasury, if you keep on going to the well at sometime it must be true that you will come away without anything in the bucket except that which you take there.

O, Mr. President, the fact that minorities are calling upon the Congress, the fact that we are being asked today and tomorrow and every other day that we are here to do something special for some particular group is the one thing that endangers our democracy itself. And, Mr. President, while we may feel compelled to yield to many of them, in this particular instance, when we are faced with this terrible deficit and this terrible debt, with the assurance that the relief of this country is going to need more than $2,000,000,000 of Federal funds to keep people from being cold and hungry, notwithstanding that, without knowing definitely whether the bond market may break or not, here we are, 9½ years before the debt is due, paying the debt and at an additional cost to the country of something like a billion and a quarter or a billion and a half dollars.

Mr. President, I am rather pleased in one respect. It is true I have not agreed with many things the present administration has done; and because I did not agree I have been called all kinds of names and have been accused of being controlled by all kinds of interests. But today I am delighted to know that I stand here approving, for once, the one time that I know he is right, the President of the United States, with whom I do not agree on many matters. It seems to me, as I think about that and as I think about the position the President is in today, that he would be in tears when he finds 85 percent of the large majority on the other side of the Chamber voting against him. Oh, I am so sorry for him today. [Laughter.]

What is it that has brought about this new alinement? What is it that enables me to say the President is right for once, and the President to say, "HASTING'S is right for once"? I do not quite know what it is. What is it that has put him on the same side with the United States Chamber of Commerce? What is it that has put the National Economic League on the same side—at any rate, has gotten them together on the bonus bill? What is it that has brought about this alliance between the President of the United States and the Liberty League?

Oh, that is the thing which is interesting; that is the thing I should like to find out. I wonder if it may be said that industrial autocrats have control of the country once more, as has recently been stated? I wonder if it be true the industrial autocrats have grabbed this administration and control it as they controlled the three last Republican administrations, according to the President himself? O Mr. President, do you suppose it could be true that the vested interests have control in Washington again? Do you suppose it could be true that entrenched greed of the industrialists had anything to do with the writing of this veto message? Oh, no, Mr. President. Oh, no; it is not true. You know it is not true, and I, too, know it is not true; but I deny it for the Democrats, rather than to embarrass them by leaving them to deny it.

But may I inquire just now what you think the attitude on the other side of the Chamber would be today, feeling as you do with respect to approving the bonus bill and overriding the President's veto? Think what you would do if this had been a Republican President who had returned the measure to the Senate of the United States. Oh, you would cry out again, "Industrial autocrats are back at their old tricks; entrenched greed is in control once more." You would blame it on Mellon or Mills if they were in office. I can see the distinguished junior Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] rising in his place and calling attention to the fact that the Liberty League was in control of "crooks and rascals", with all those "bloodsuckers"! Senators will remember his speech. I have not any doubt that if the situation were reversed he would rise in the Senate and blame the Liberty League with being responsible for what has happened here, with being responsible for trying to prevent the soldiers from getting what they claim is due them. O Mr. President, it makes a lot of difference sometimes who is in the White House. However, I am shocked that it does not make enough difference to enable me to convince anyone that I am right and that he is wrong.

Mr. President, when this bill was here previously I called attention to the fact that it seemed to me the chairman of the Finance Committee ought to be somewhat embarrassed, because I had the privilege of sitting here and not being compelled to say anything when the veto message was before the Senate in May 1935. Who led that fight? The distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. I did not have to do anything except to vote to sustain the President. I asked the distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] the other day whether he was embarrassed, and he said he was not. I am not surprised at that, but I did suppose there would be some out of the 85-percent majority on the other side of the Chamber who would feel somewhat embarrassed because they are turning down their great leader. Oh, I beg of you not to desert him now! [Laughter.] You have told us that he is the Moses who was leading us out of the wilderness. You have assured us that all we had to do was to wait and wait, and finally we would see the things accomplished which were hoped for by the great mass of the citizens of America.

O Mr. President, I beg the distinguished leader on the other side of the Chamber, I beg the distinguished Chairman of the Finance Committee, I beg the distinguished President pro tempore of the Senate, I beg the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] who has recently taken on the important duty of increasing instead of losing the majority on that side of the Chamber—I beg of all of you just now on this historic occasion not to desert your leader. Give him your support and show him you have always been with him. You know you have voted for things you did not like, all of you, and merely because he has asked you to do it. Now when he asks you to do something that you know is right and that he knows is right, I beg of you to make it easy for yourselves and go along with him. Help him to reduce the expenses of the Government by 25 percent, which he promised in his campaign. Help him to balance the Budget. Help him to eliminate some of the governmental bureaus instead of increasing the number. Do all of that, I beg of you, for this is the last day, this is the last occasion on which this particular bonus measure will be before the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a quotation from former Senator Oscar W. Underwood's Drifting Sands of Party Politics.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be inserted in the RECORD, as follows:

QUOTATION FROM OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD'S DRIFTING SANDS OF PARTY POLITICS

Where our danger lies is not from a majority of the mass of all the people, whether they live in the North or the South, the East or the West, but it comes from majorities reflected in legislative bodies induced by the fear or influence of the organized blocs, classes, and clans who have taken upon themselves the purpose to govern our country in order that they may achieve political power, business or class advancement, and ethical progress. * * *

No system could be more productive of bad government for the individual citizen, than for organized class to direct the destiny of our country. What can be done to overthrow the rule of class and return to the simple government of the people, that persisted in the main from the days of the Revolution to the dawning of the twentieth century? * * *

The men and women of America who desire the preservation of their individual rights under the Constitution of their country and are opposed to the establishment of a system of paternalism in the United States must above all else and at all times stand steadfast to the first principles of government, and see to it that their representatives in Congress do not sacrifice principle under any circumstances, no matter how alluring that bait may be.

We should divorce the Federal Government from any intimate association in the domestic affairs of the people; confine its active function to the national endeavor contemplated in the beginning; as far as possible abolish the numerous boards, commissions, and bureaus that are now exercising powers of government. We should confine the power to exercise legislative discretion to the Congress of the United States and maintain the power to execute the laws in the hands of the President, where power and responsibility may be united in one person; allow only the courts of the land to pass judgment that affects the rights and liberties of the citizen. In other words, we should abolish the discretions that are now vested in a bureaucratic government and restore in its entire integrity the government of law we inherited from our fathers.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in connection with the debate on the President's veto, I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Boston Post.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Boston Post of Jan. 25, 1936]

THE BONUS VETO

President Roosevelt's reiteration of his former bonus veto assumes that the same conditions exist as in May 1934 when he intimated that the credit of the country was endangered by the appropriation for the bonus.

Since then, however, money has been spent with a lavish hand and much of it for the benefit of certain classes of the population. Hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended or will be expended on a multitude of very dubious and costly experiments.

Therefore, when the veterans argued that a part of this huge expenditure might well have been used to pay the bonus, many persons who had opposed the bonus payment on the ground that the country could not stand the strain changed their views. Added to this was the claim made by Secretary Morgenthau of a $2,000,000,000 Treasury gain from the dollar devaluation and a profit of more than $500,000,000 from silver purchases.

At all events, the President's short message gives the impression that no fresh argument against the bonus was necessary on his part. Doubtless the Senate will speedily overrule the veto as did the House yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Byrnes	George	Lonergan
Ashurst	Capper	Gerry	McAdoo
Austin	Caraway	Gibson	McCarran
Bachman	Carey	Glass	McGill

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is, Shall the bill pass, the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. McNARY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, which resulted—yeas 76, nays 19, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, the Chair should like to be permitted to make an observation before announcing the result of the vote. There are at present 95 Members of the Senate. This is the first time since the present occupant of the chair has been Presiding Officer of the Senate that all Senators have been in their seats and have voted when the roll was called. The Chair congratulates the Members of the Senate on their good health.

On this question the yeas are 76, the nays are 19. More than two-thirds of the Senators have voted in the affirmative, the bill is passed. [Applause in the galleries.]

UNITED STATES VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3328) to provide an official seal for the United States Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes, which was on page 1, line 13, to strike out "evidenced" and insert "evidence."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I will state in a word the situation of this matter.

The bill passed by the Senate provided for a seal to be used by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs. The word "evidenced" was used when it should have been "evidence." I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

The motion was agreed to.

ACQUISITION OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, a group of Senators and Representatives headed by the Vice President and Speaker of the House recently made a trip to the Philippine Islands as guests of the Philippine government to attend the inauguration of Hon. Manuel L. Quezon as first President of the new Philippine Commonwealth. This visit served to renew interest in our possessions in the Pacific and afforded an opportunity for Members of the Congress to study conditions in the Orient at first hand.

Considerable discussion has been indulged in during the past 35 years concerning the original intention of the high officials of our country with respect to the Philippines.

In order to keep the record clearly in mind I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a copy of a telegram sent to Mr. Day, chairman of the peace commissioners representing the United States at Paris at the time of treaty negotiations with Spain, under date of October 26, 1898, and signed by the then Secretary of State, John Hay; also copy of a portion of a telegram from the Secretary of State to Mr. Day under date of October 28, 1898.

Also I ask to have printed a copy of a letter written by Admiral George Dewey under date of October 3, 1898, to Commander A. D. Brown, then president of Norwich University.

All of these throw some light as to what was in the mind of the President and in the mind of the American naval commander in dealing directly with the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont?

There being no objection, the letter and telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OCTOBER 26, 1898.

MR. DAY: The information which has come to the President since your departure convinces him that the acceptance of the cession of Luzon alone, leaving the rest of the islands subject to Spanish rule, or to be the subject of future contention, cannot be justified on political, commercial, or humanitarian grounds.

The cession must be of the whole archipelago or none. The latter is wholly inadmissible, and the former must, therefore, be required. The President reaches this conclusion after the most thorough consideration of the whole subject, and is deeply sensible of the grave responsibilities it will impose, believing that this course will entail less trouble than any other, and besides will best subserve the interests of the people involved, for whose welfare we cannot escape responsibility.

HAY.

[Telegram]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, October 28, 1898.

MR. DAY: While the Philippines can be justly claimed by conquest, which position must not be yielded, yet their disposition, control, and government the President prefers should be the subject of negotiation, as provided in the protocol. It is imperative upon us that as victors we should be governed only by motives which will exalt our Nation. Territorial expansion should be our least concern; that we shall not shirk the moral obligations of our victory is of the greatest. It is undisputed that Spain's authority is permanently destroyed in every part of the Philippines. To leave any part in her feeble control now would increase our difficulties and be opposed to the interest of humanity. The sentiment in the United States is almost universal that the people of the Philippines, whatever else is done, must be liberated from Spanish domination. In this sentiment the President fully concurs. Nor can we permit Spain to transfer any of the islands to another power. Nor can we invite another power or powers to join the United States in sovereignty over them. We must either hold them or turn them back to Spain.

Consequently, grave as are the responsibilities and unforeseen as are the difficulties which are before us, the President can see but one plain path of duty—the acceptance of the archipelago. Greater difficulties and more serious complications, administrative and international, would follow any other course. * * *

HAY.

UNITED STATES NAVAL FORCE ON ASIATIC STATION, FLAGSHIP "OLYMPIA",
Cavite, P. I., October 3, 1898.

Commander A. D. BROWN,
United States Navy.

MY DEAR BROWN: I wish to thank you most sincerely for your kind letter of August 2 received by the last steamer.

All the nice things you and other friends are saying about me has quite turned my head and I am now the vainest man in the Philippines, and that is saying a good deal.

The insurgents are now quiet, waiting, I suppose, to see what will be done by the commission in Paris. Indeed, we are all looking Parisward. I trust the entire archipelago will be retained by the United States. Any other arrangements will lead to no end of trouble.

I enclose an official letter to you in connection with asking State aid for the university.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE DEWEY.

POLITICAL CONDITIONS IN CALIFORNIA—ADDRESS BY SENATOR M'ADOO

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I present to the Senate and make request that there be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address delivered on January 25, 1936, by the junior Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] over the radio to the constituency of California touching matters of government of serious import.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen and fellow Democrats, this zero weather in Washington makes me doubly sorry that I cannot attend your barbecue today and enjoy the sunshine of your comradeship in our beautiful California. I felicitate you on this auspicious gathering. It evidences the enthusiasm and determination of a regenerated democracy.

I must advert to the recent significant developments in the Democratic situation in California, because they raise issues which must be met squarely and without hesitation.

A special meeting of the Democratic State Central Committee was called on short notice by its "Epic" chairman, Mr. Olson, to meet in Los Angeles January 17 for the purpose of selecting a delegation to the national convention in Philadelphia and for the adoption of resolutions concerning national policies. This unexpected move aroused Democrats throughout the State. There was no occasion for the meeting, because the State committee has no power to nominate a delegate ticket under our primary law; and the interjection of controversial platform issues into our Presidential primary would arouse needless antagonisms over questions which can be settled alone by the national convention. When the State committee met, the Olson plan was overwhelmingly repudiated. A resolution, drawn upon my suggestion, endorsing Franklin D. Roosevelt for renomination and requesting him to select a list of delegates to be entered in the May primary with his endorsement, was adopted.

This action of the committee is binding upon the State chairman any every member of the committee. It thereupon became Mr. Olson's duty to present to the President that resolution, and that one only, as the official expression of the State committee of the Democratic Party.

The next day following the action of the State committee a convention of the so-called Epic League was held in Los Angeles. State Chairman Olson was a member of and a party to the action of that convention. Its deliberations were concluded with the adoption of a resolution to name a list of 100 or more "Epics" pledged to the "production for use" program. Delegate Olson was requested, or directed, to submit this list of "Epics" to President Roosevelt with the request that he choose from it the 44 delegates from California. The resolution then proceeds: "Resolved, that President Franklin Delano Roosevelt be given until February 10, 1936, to accept a working majority of the candidates as determined by caucus in this convention, and that if this shall not be done by the President in the specified time * * *, a convention of all 'Epic' forces will be called for the purpose of selecting an independent 'Epic' delegation pledged to the support of other candidates as President and Vice President."

This is the first time in the history of America that any group of individuals has delivered an ultimatum in such offensive terms to any President of the United States. This ultimatum is not only ill-advised, but it is a direct challenge to every effort which leading Democrats have been making to effect, if possible, a basis of cooperation between all elements in the party. It is an affront to the President to demand that he perform the will of the "Epics" in California without regard to the real Democrats, who constitute the vast majority of the party; it is an insult to attempt to read all Democrats out of the Democratic Party.

You will observe that the action of the Democratic State Central Committee is diametrically opposed to the action of the "Epic" convention. How can Mr. Olson perform his duties as chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee and at the same time execute the will of the "Epics" as expressed in their recent convention? Did Mr. Olson visit the President as chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee, advocating the plan which that committee has adopted, or did he go as Delegate Olson of the "Epic" convention and press upon the President acceptance of the ultimatum of the "Epics"?

I wish now and here to say that Mr. Olson cannot act in this dual capacity with the consent of the vast majority of the Democrats of California. He must either be a Democrat or an "Epic." I do not believe in hyphenated parties or hyphenated citizenship. We are either Democrats, owing allegiance to our party as such, or we are "Epics", owing allegiance only to the "Epic" organization. We cannot be "Epic"-Democrats and "Epics" at the same time. The demand that "Epic" delegates be chosen by the President presents an issue which cannot be avoided. We may as well fight it out in the May primary, so that by November 1936 we shall have a united and cohesive Democratic Party, acting for the good of all the people instead of for any particular group or class, and capable of delivering the electoral vote of California to the nominees of the Democratic national convention in 1936.

Chairman Farley, at the meeting of the Democratic National Committee in Washington on Jackson Day, warned Democrats throughout the Nation that the political battle of 1936 would be one of the most bitterly contested in the history of America. I have no doubt that his statement is correct. The Democratic Party can win on true Democratic principles. It cannot win by shifting to any socialistic, communistic, or other doctrines which are alien to the basic principles for which Washington stood, for which Jefferson stood, for which Jackson stood, for which Lincoln stood, and for which Woodrow Wilson stood.

I notice that the claim is continually asserted by certain "Epic" leaders that they are themselves and that they also represent the liberal forces in California. They denounce all regular Democrats as reactionaries. This is, of course, a wild claim, looking at it either way. All my life I have been considered a liberal. I have fought with the liberal elements of the Democratic Party against reactionaries of every kind and character. I was such a liberal that I voted for Sinclair for Governor of California, and I think it takes a liberal, or more, to do that. I have no sympathy with the effort of the so-called "Epic" leaders to proscribe those members of the Democratic Party who have borne the brunt of battle for Democratic principles these many years and who won the great Democratic victory in California in 1932, 2 years before the "Epics" were born. At that very time—1932—Mr. Sinclair was the Socialist candidate for Governor and was using every effort to defeat Roosevelt and to destroy the Democratic Party.

I urge upon Democrats everywhere and of every shade of opinion to pull together for the principles of true democracy. Let us repudiate those warring chieftains who are dominated by selfish ambitions and who would rule or ruin the party.

I have great respect for the rank and file of those who have identified themselves with the "Epic" movement. They are honest and earnest citizens like the rest of us. I appeal to them and to all Democrats to forget factional differences and to join in a united effort in support of the administration and of the nominees of the Philadelphia convention.

Let us now consider some of the great achievements of the administration during the past 3 years.

First of all, I would put the law under which all deposits of $5,000 or less in national banks or member banks of the Federal Reserve System are insured so that depositors within that limit need not fear for the safety of their money. The savings of the people cannot be stolen from them by mismanaged banks or by the criminal operations of officers or directors of the banks. Thus by one piece of constructive legislation we have made secure the very foundations of our financial structure.

This law was not passed without the bitter opposition of every powerful interest in the United States, but public opinion—which represents the will of the people—was irresistible. That is the virtue of our form of government. The ultimate appeal is to the people. They make their decisions not through arsenals and violence but through the power of the ballot.

After making secure the depositors in banks the next step was to make farms safe from mortgage foreclosures. We strengthened the Farm Credit Administration and gave it power to make loans on farms with long maturities and at low rates of interest. This has resulted in saving thousands of farmers from the loss of their farms and has made it easier for them to pay the interest on their mortgages.

Another step was to save city and suburban homes from foreclosures, so the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was created. The homes of thousands of people have been preserved to them through the operation of this law. Like the farmers, city and suburban home owners have been refinanced at low rates of interest and on long time.

It was necessary to do more than save these homes. They needed to be modernized so that the owners and their families might live with a larger measure of comfort, convenience, and sanitation. Hence, the Federal Housing Administration was formed. Through its operations millions of dollars have been loaned for the installation of plumbing, refrigeration, and other modern appliances. The home owner and his family have been made more secure in the possession of their home and are now permitted to enjoy the blessings of modern facilities.

The Civilian Conservation Corps has taken more than a half million American youngsters out of the streets of our great cities, has enabled them to lead wholesome lives in the open air, and has trained them in useful occupations.

Great Government projects have been stimulated by Federal aid. In California, for instance, we have the All-American Canal now well under way. Its completion will give the farmers of the Imperial Valley independence of a foreign-controlled water supply and make them safe for all time against an insufficient irrigation system. The Government has supplied loans to the Metropolitan Water District, by means of which a 300-mile aqueduct, tunneling great mountains and stretching its useful length over valleys and deserts, will bring from the Colorado River an unlimited supply of water for the necessities of the Southland. The bureau of power and light of the city of Los Angeles was provided with a loan on reasonable terms to build a great high-tension line from the Boulder Dam to the city of Los Angeles. Thereby it has secured an ample supply of cheaply generated power for the millions of people south of the Tehachapi and for other millions yet to come. We have largely extended the seawall at San Pedro and will continue the work until it is finished. This will give us one of the finest protected harbors on the Pacific coast and will assure the adequacy and preeminence of this great port not only for mercantile vessels but for our great and growing Navy.

Work on the Central Valley irrigation project has been begun through money advanced under this liberal administration, thus making permanent the welfare of the inhabitants of the San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys. Grants have been made for flood control in various localities throughout the State. Aid has been given to the construction of our magnificent highway system, but, more than all, the unemployed have been protected against want, and the general economic structure has been strengthened to such an extent that private industry will in the near future be able to absorb the redundant supply of labor.

Congress has appropriated six and one-half million dollars for our Federal building in Los Angeles. Work on this splendid structure will soon begin.

These are some of the many progressive and liberal things which have characterized Democratic control of the Government. But our opponents will ask the American people this year to turn this administration out and to put a new and untried administration in. Upon what rational ground can they ask the people to do this? Would they stop the march of progress, now so well under way, and revert to the calamitous period over which the last Republican President presided? What do our opponents have to offer? What improvement can they suggest that they would make either in the legislation already enacted or in the policies to be pursued? There is no ground upon which they can make a successful appeal to the people. Stripped of all pretense, all oratory, and all frenzied utterances, what they say simply comes to this: "The Democrats have the offices and we want them." If this is their appeal, I predict that it will be rejected by an overwhelming vote of the American people.

What we are really trying to do in Washington is to reorganize, not destroy, our economic and social order by an intelligent understanding of human needs, human suffering, and human craving for a safe refuge from the affliction of disabled bodies and hungry souls.

We have marched far in the direction of this inspiring goal, which, after all, must be the aim of every humane government; but these great things do not "spring full-fledged from the brow of Jove." They come from the patient progress marked by toil, suffering, and sacrifice until the wonderful hinterland of happiness has been won. We must, therefore, in spite of temporary reverses in the courts or on the hustings, march proudly forward under the banner of democracy and progress. We invite all men and all women of liberal views to join us in a noble effort to complete the work so auspiciously begun by giving an additional 4 years within which to do it. I am confident that the future of America depends not upon a resurgence of reaction but upon an unswerving adherence to the policies of progress and the supremacy and exaltation of the Democratic ideal.

LEGISLATION IN AID OF DEBTORS—ARTICLE BY JUDGE GALSTON

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article written by a very distinguished Federal judge, Clarence G. Galston, concerning legislation in aid of the debtor.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOME REFLECTIONS OF FEDERAL JUDGE CLARENCE G. GALSTON CONCERNING LEGISLATION IN AID OF THE DEBTOR

This paper is not intended as a technical article for lawyers but rather presents a consideration of the subject matter in its social aspects. Who is there that is not directly or indirectly affected by the social problems of the day? All important Federal legislation enacted and proposed during the last few years seeks to remedy the economic maladjustments which have threatened and still do threaten the social conditions of the Nation. Apart from the constitutional clouds enveloping them, statutes adopted during this period demonstrate to a marked degree how far we have advanced as a socially minded people. Certainly 25 years ago the function of government as then conceived by the lawmakers countenanced no such regulation of private undertaking or business as results from the National Recovery Act; no such effort to regulate agriculture as is embraced in the various statutes to aid the farmer; no such support of labor as is the aim of the national labor bill; no remote notion of insurance, such as is embraced in the proposed Social Security Act; no such relief measures as the public-works statute provides.

Such legislation, particularly the invalidated agricultural composition statute, challenges the attention of students of economics, as, indeed, do most of the laws which have been enacted during the last 2 years, and among the issues involved is the question whether relief to one economic group can be effected without visiting substantial distress on other groups.

An investor is not by any proper definition of the term necessarily one who is in the creditor class. Included in the investor group are those whose sole means of support may be a very limited fixed income. Those who hold obligations of farmers, of railroads, of owners of hotels and apartment houses, may themselves show a distressed balance sheet. Terms are relative. A creditor may be a very poor person indeed, and the invasion by operation of law of his contractual rights may cause burdens no less oppressive to him than those of the debtor, whom the law seeks to aid.

Effort to bring succor to any one depressed economic group requires the most rigid scrutiny. Lines of demarcation are shadowy indeed. It is doubtful whether there can be any general classification of citizens into debtors and creditors. Many belong in both groups. As between the so-called debtor and the so-called creditor there is no median line except as the terms express a relationship between two parties to a contract. If A is a debtor and B is a creditor of A, legislation that seeks to relieve A at the expense of B may so disaffect B as to impair his power to meet his obligations to C, D, E, and F. Each in turn becomes involved in the process and involves countless other persons.

Lawmakers who are faced with class problems have no simple task. Unfortunately it is just such class problems as are fundamental in our affairs today.

Political or social problems of this kind lead to an observation on the inexactitude of political science as contrasted with the natural sciences. Man-made law is likely to be imperfect. It would be marvelously strange were it otherwise. Those who make the law, those who administer it, those who interpret it, those who seek to conform to it, those who violate it, are all human beings. Each has his prepossession, his bias, or prejudice, inherited or acquired, or both. It may be conscious bias or below the seat of consciousness. Each has his self-interest, conscious or otherwise. In the social sciences we find both the observer and the observed variable quantities. The constants are few. Consequently the gathering of social data and the interpretation thereof result in the widest differences of opinion. Could any more conclusive illustration be found than that afforded by the report of the National Crime Commission appointed by President Hoover? Here was a trained group of high-minded, intelligent, and truth-seeking people. It would seem that only euphemistically can the social sciences be so termed.

How is predictability possible among 125,000,000 people distributed over so vast an area as the United States, of diverse sectional, economic, social, educational, political, and religious interests? Nevertheless, in every city, town, or hamlet one can find cure-alls for the social ills—each one, of course, sounding more in disguised hope than in valid thought. Within limited communities such as existed in our early settlements where the church exercised a rigid control and the examples set by the elders were followed by the flock, predictability was possible. But in a complex civilization, highly organized, not only not homogeneous as was theirs but heterogeneous to the *n*th degree, variability, not fixation of standards predominates. Since the regeneration of mankind is not yet in sight, laws made by human minds to regulate the destinies of human beings cannot reasonably be expected to attain scientific perfection.

However earnest, well-meaning, and competent a legislative body may be, however resolute the effort to ascertain the facts before the enactment of the law, a consistently scientific technique cannot be developed to discover truth with any such assurance as the laboratory worker pursues in physical science. The philosopher in the natural sciences has to deal with physical elements and forces that are themselves free from bias, prejudice, motive, or any of those emotional states which distinguish human beings from the objects of the physical world. The chemist knows how the gases and metals will behave; and if his knowledge of them is not perfect, it is because of no fault of theirs. All oxygen is the same. There are no inherited traits and nothing by way of environment which distinguishes one atom of oxygen from another. The scientist deals with uniformity. Such is not the happy position of the social experimenter. Like the scientist, he starts with an hypothesis, but, unlike him, his hypothesis is tainted with an inherent bias. The sum total of his prior experience, his environment, and his inheritance indubitably affect his interpretation of human beings and their relationships to one another. Out of this may come at best only approximation to sound laws.

Of the sections of the laws for the relief of the debtor to which I shall presently refer, those, save that relating to agricultural compositions, resulted from studies of bankruptcy conditions, abuses, and defects under existing law made by many agencies. This procedure was proper in principle. Investigation committees consisting of a number of industrial and credit associations assisted the Solicitor General. If the enactments which followed fail in the objectives predicated on the findings of the investigators, it cannot be charged to lack of earnestness in the survey, but rather to the usual and infinite variety of difficulties encountered in obtaining perfect laws. A comprehensive bankruptcy act based on the present-day needs and designed to correct the abuses of creditor control of bankrupt estates remains still only a hope. Some of such abuses and inadequacies are revealed in the report of William J. Donovan, submitted in March 1930, to Judge Thomas D. Thacher on the administration of bankrupt estates. The theory of unlimited creditor control is the subject of caustic criticism in that document. Foremost among the recommendations made is the creation of the office of a permanent Federal bankruptcy commissioner with control over trustees of bankrupt estates. Thus the administrative functions would be centralized in the commissioner as in England they are centralized in the board of trade under the Inspector General in Bankruptcy. This would free the courts from administration burdens and leave them to perform judicial functions only.

The bankruptcy amendments enacted by the Congress in the sessions of 1933 and 1934 have provoked a more than usual amount of discussion. This results, I think, from a persistent thought that theretofore bankruptcy laws had been designed mainly to aid creditors, whereas in this legislation the objective is relief for the debtor.

Tracing as we do our fundamental law to England, we find that prior to the American Revolution, statutes in respect to bankrupts in England beginning with the first English bankruptcy act in 1542, and subsequent acts for 150 years, were concerned only with the criminal aspects of the bankrupt's activities and set up no adequate system for the administration of bankrupt estates. Pursuant to the terms of the first English bankruptcy act, the offender was commanded to return to the realm, and on his failure so to do all his goods, chattels and lands of every kind were ordered seized and distributed among his creditors. Not content with such provisions, Parliament, in 1623 decreed that pillory and the loss of an ear should be imposed upon a debtor who failed to show that his bankruptcy was owing solely to his misfortune. Voluntary petitions by the bankrupt were unknown to the law.

Surprisingly some marked advance is recorded as early as the Statutes of Anne of 1705 and 1711. These statutes permitted a bankrupt a discharge, but no general bankruptcy system had been developed in England when the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

By virtue of the fourth clause of section 8 of article 1, power was vested in Congress "to establish * * * uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States." Though this clause has been the source of legislation of extreme importance, curiously enough there is no record, or at least none that I have been able to find, of a discussion thereof during the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention; and only the briefest reference is found in the Federalist papers. In paper XLI there is this comment:

"The power of establishing uniform laws of bankruptcy is so intimately connected with the regulation of commerce, and will prevent so many frauds where the parties or their property may lie, or be removed into different States, that the expediency of it seems not likely to be drawn into question."

The first of our bankruptcy statutes was that of 1800. This was a law primarily directed against debtors and followed the teachings of the English bankruptcy acts. It was confined to traders, and provided only for involuntary, not voluntary bankruptcy. The act was short lived and was repealed in 1803. Not until 1841 did Congress again assert its prerogative as to this subject. During the intervening years the States dealt with insolvent debtors. The Federal act of 1841 also was short lived, but is interesting because there was some provision for a system for administering insolvent estates, and for the discharge of the debts of the bankrupt.

Again there was a long lapse of time before the Congress passed a bankruptcy act. That was the law of 1867. Under this act the bankrupt for the first time was privileged to effect a composition. The primary object of the act though was to secure a just distribution of the bankrupt's property among his creditors, and a release of the bankrupt from his obligation to his creditors was but a secondary consideration.

Then followed the present Bankruptcy Act of 1898, which was framed to correct many of the faults and limitations of the earlier statutes.

We come then to the amendments of 1933 and 1934, known as chapter 8 of the National Bankruptcy Act, and entitled, in terms to arouse our interest, "Provisions for the relief of debtors."

This chapter has to do with individual debtors, with agricultural compositions, with reorganizations of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, and, lastly, with corporate reorganization.

However multifarious the purpose behind this legislation may have been, it is notable for its frank concession that creditors should be concerned with the well-being of their debtors.

The chapter for the relief of the individual debtor became a law on March 3, 1933. Its novel features deserve attention. Any person, excepting a corporation, is permitted to file a petition stating that he is insolvent or unable to meet his debts as they mature and that he desires to effect a composition or an extension of time to pay his debts. The provision for extension is important, particularly so since the terms in respect to extensions may apply to all classes of creditors, secured as well as unsecured. The court will confirm the debtor's proposal for a composition or extension after it has been accepted by a majority in number of all creditors whose claims, if unsecured, have been allowed, or, if secured, are proposed to be effected by the extension, which number must represent a majority in amount of such claims, and if satisfied that it includes an equitable and feasible method of liquidation for secured creditors whose claims are affected and of financial rehabilitation for the debtor and that it is for the best interest of all creditors.

Observe the use of the term "debtor" instead of the term "bankrupt." The term "bankrupt" is discarded and the substituted phrase, "unable to meet his debts as they mature", employed. The object of the phrase was to avoid whatever stigma attached to the use of the term "bankrupt." At once the phraseology was seized upon as a ground for attacking the constitutionality of the act. It was said that while the Congress has power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, it has no power to pass laws for the aid of debtors who are unable to meet their debts as they mature, and hence that the act did not fall within the purview of the constitutional clause. In one of the earliest cases to reach the courts involving this question the court said:

"It is not necessary for us to say that mere unwillingness, or mere failure to pay his debts has ever been sufficient under our laws to entitle a debtor to the benefit of a bankruptcy act, but we do say that except under the act of 1867, inability to pay has always been recognized as a proper cause for adjudication, whether that inability were caused by a lack of assets or a lack of liquidity of assets (In re Landquist, 70 Fed. (2d) 929, at p. 931).

Thus the common-sense inference must be drawn that it is of no moment whether one who is unable to pay his debts as they mature be classified as a bankrupt or an insolvent, so long as the enactment in respect to persons so situated is uniform throughout the United States.

The subject was discussed also in Continental Illinois Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railway Co. (opinion delivered Apr. 1, 1935; not yet officially recorded), recently decided by the Supreme Court, and the same conclusion reached.

The provision for agricultural compositions, unlike the section of the act heretofore discussed, was a radical amendment of the bankruptcy statute. It was the subject of divergent views by various lower courts, but recently has been declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court. The ground for the conclusion is readily understood. However broad the bankruptcy clause of the Constitution is, it is not unlimited in scope. The constitutional power is subject to the amendments to the Constitution. Congressional authority to enact bankruptcy laws is thus tempered by the due-process clause. The act in question was in part retroactive in terms and purported to deprive the mortgagee of rights in specific property since as to mortgage debts it applied only to those existing prior to the enactment of the act. Mr. Justice Brandeis wrote:

"The bankruptcy power, like the other great substantive powers of Congress, is subject to the fifth amendment. Under the bankruptcy power Congress may discharge the debtor's personal obligation, because, unlike the States, it is not prohibited from impairing the obligation of contracts. Compare Mitchell v. Clark (110 U. S. 633, 643). But the effect of the act here complained of is not the discharge of Radford's personal obligation. It is the taking of substantive rights in specific property acquired by the bank prior to the act."

The opinion contains also this observation, which clearly shows that the Court passed only on the specific question involved in the case:

"But we have no occasion to decide in this case whether the bankruptcy clause confers upon Congress generally the power to abridge the mortgagee's rights in specific property. Paragraph 7 declares that 'the provisions of this act shall apply only to debts existing at the time this act becomes effective.' The power over property pledged as security after the date of the act may be greater than over property pledged before; and this act deals only with preexisting mortgages."

Nevertheless, the opinion concludes with this stirring admonition, after holding the act void:

"For the fifth amendment commands that, however great the Nation's need, private property shall not be thus taken even for a wholly public use without just compensation. If the public interest requires, and permits, the taking of property of individual mortgagees in order to relieve the necessities of individual mortgagors, resort must be had to proceedings by eminent domain; so that through taxation the burden of the relief afforded in the public interest may be borne by the public."

Perhaps of the recent-debtor-creditor legislation the most interesting as well as the most effectual is that which has come to be designated as 77B. That is the act which provides for corporate reorganization. Under preexisting law such reorganizations were effected through equity receiverships. That machinery was not wholly satisfactory. To avoid certain of its more pronounced defects, such as forced judicial sales of mortgaged properties, burdensome and expensive ancillary administration, bringing secured creditors within the fold were some of its main objects. The powers vested in the court are both considerable and extensive. It makes possible conservation of assets for junior creditors and shareholders and sets up new remedial practice. In the financial and industrial centers of the country the act has been generously, perhaps too generously, resorted to. One immediate effect has been to reduce the number of petitions in bankruptcy, for all corporations, small as well as the larger and more important organizations, have sought relief under its terms. This had led to much abuse, for debtors are prone to avail themselves of all maneuvers to stave off the fatal day of payment or bankruptcy. If the business is hopelessly insolvent, if there is no grounded expectation that creditors will fall in line, if there is no prospect for new funds, if conditions in the industry, immediate and prospective, menace further operations of an impoverished plant, the debtor should not delude itself, for in such circumstances not reorganization but liquidation is clearly indicated.

But in a proper case it is a very meritorious enactment, and when I say proper case I mean one in which the petition for relief is filed in good faith and with a reasonable expectation that a plan of reorganization can be offered which will prove satisfactory to two-thirds of each class of creditors involved.

There has been no adjudication by the Supreme Court as yet of its constitutionality, but what that Court is likely to say when that question is presented has perhaps been foreshadowed in a case recently decided by the Supreme Court (Continental Illinois National Bank & Trust Co. v. Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Railroad Co., decided Apr. 1, 1935), involving section 77 of the Bankruptcy Act, a statute for reorganization of railroad corporations, and which contains many similar provisions. In that case the factual question presented was whether a secured creditor, during the pendency of the reorganization proceedings under section 77, could be enjoined from the sale of collateral belonging to the railroad company and held by the creditor as security for a note issue. Starting from the major premise that the Federal Constitution vests Congress with the power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States, the Court propounded to itself the question, "Does section 77 constitute a law on the subject of bankruptcies?" The opinion sets forth an historical consideration of cases bearing on this subject. It is recited that within the meaning of the constitutional provision bankruptcy and insolvency are convertible terms, and have been so recognized. The act under consideration, like that relating to the individual debtor, did not use the term "bankruptcy", but instead provided that "any railroad corporation engaged in interstate commerce may file a petition stating that the railroad corporation is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature, and that it desires to effect a plan of reorganization." The Court found that since the Bankruptcy Act defines an "insolvent" as one whose assets, at a fair valuation, are not sufficient to pay his debts, it may be construed to include a debtor who, although unable to pay promptly, may be able to pay if time to do so be sufficiently extended. Thus by liberal construction it was held that section 77 is in effect an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act, and therefore within the power to Congress to enact.

So it is a fair assumption, based on the reasoning employed in the Rock Island case, that 77B also will be held to be an amendment of the Bankruptcy Act.

At first reading one perhaps is startled by the remedial possibilities of the act, but when the alternative which a creditor faces means ownership of the debtor's property and all its attendant problems and responsibilities, he may well believe it advantageous to avoid a forced judicial sale. After all, a plan of reorganization is nothing more than a composition. Even for a secured creditor to scale down his indebtedness may, in all the circumstances of a case, be a most wise decision. Resentment frequently is stirred when people seem to be getting something for nothing, as when a debtor is permitted to get a receipt in full for paying but a small percentage of his indebtedness; but it does not follow that the debtor is the only party benefited. The indirect benefits may well be worth the apparent sacrifice which the creditor makes. He foregoes a present satisfaction for future direct and indirect benefits. Creditors in business must have customers and to the extent that customers can be rehabilitated there is corresponding benefit to the creditor. In a practical way, too, creditors can aid themselves by participating in the management of the reorganized company. Most, or at least many business failures, like other failures in life, are the result of unwisdom, inexperience, incompetence, lack of management. Creditor representation in the reorganization may prove of substantial importance in overcoming such defects.

One of the weaknesses of 77B is the immense volume of administrative detail which it casts upon judges. Every important policy in the management of a corporation which is brought under its provisions may be and frequently is submitted to the judge for his determination. This is so whether the debtor remains in possession or whether a trustee is in control. The act is but a year old and nevertheless the business cares cast upon the judge who fathers the proceeding are vastly burdensome. New petitions multiply far beyond the number of pending petitions disposed of. Reorganizations take time. Most Federal judges, at least in the southern and eastern districts of New York, begin and end their day with administrative problems arising out of 77B proceedings. Such duties are not judicial in nature. The main function of a court should be to decide controversies and not to operate a business.

Nevertheless, judges are confronted daily with such purely business questions, as what the terms of a lease shall be, the salaries to be paid officers, whether and when and in what quantities commodities to be used in manufacture should be purchased, whether money may be borrowed and machinery bought, whether seasonable commodities held by a secured creditor as collateral should be sold and if so, under what condition. Equally numerous, and indeed greater in variety, are the business enterprises that come to the Federal courts on the wings of 77B. Thus we have a swing from dairies to breweries, coal yards, lumber, cement, wines and liquors, hotels and apartment houses, shoes, furniture, even kiddie shops have sought relief in our court. An administrative medium, even at the risk of setting up another bureau of control, would seem to be indicated as a wise expedient, providing always there be reserved the right of judicial review.

Another judicial function to be exercised is the consideration of the fairness of the plan proposed. This in part calls also for the exercise of a business judgment, even though the court will not desire to work out a plan itself nor hazard its own business judgment to supplant that of those who supply the capital for the new enterprise. However, since creditors of all classes and indeed all interested parties are given a free opportunity to be heard, the court is thus ordinarily provided with sufficient data with which to determine the question of fairness of the plan. Each case will present its own problem. The language of the act is clear. It forbids confirmation of a plan unless the court is satisfied that it is "fair and equitable and does not discriminate unfairly in favor of any class of creditors or stockholders."

As I indicated at the outset, this is not intended as a technical paper for lawyers, and in consequence no attempt was made to present a detailed analysis of the foregoing sections of the chapter in aid of debtors. An appraisal at the moment seems to be premature, though it may be said that the main objective of the legislation in many cases is being attained. There remains, however, the broader question suggested in the 1934 majority report of the committee on bankruptcy of the American Bar Association as to whether, in view of the ratio of debts to wealth in this country, in the effort to establish a national recovery, the relief afforded does more than ease restricted credits and distressed property and bring some readjustment, but without effecting with dispatch a debt reduction of significant proportions.

CAN WE PAY AS WE GO?—ADDRESS BY GOVERNOR LA FOLLETTE

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on January 9, 1936, Wisconsin's Progressive Governor, Philip F. La Follette, discussed at the Town Hall in New York City, in the light of experiences in the State of Wisconsin, the important question of government fiscal policy which is being more and more currently debated, Can We Pay as We Go? I ask unanimous consent to have this address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, the State of Wisconsin has followed the pay-as-you-go policy for more than 80 years. It has met its responsibilities as generously as any. It has a public-school system from kindergarten through university; a public-health service second to none: a model system of highways. It pioneered in legislation protecting men and women from the hazards in industry and abolishing child labor. It originated and leads America in vocational education, which is an important factor in the outstanding technical skill of our workers. It led in agricultural research, education, and in establishing high standards of quality and purity, which are factors in Wisconsin's leading position as a dairy State. It pioneered with workmen's compensation, and was the first State to enact and put into operation unemployment insurance. It was the first State government to provide financial aid to help carry the burden of relief, and is among the first to secure approval of its plan for old-age pensions.

I cite these facts, not to prove Wisconsin the best State, but to show that a State that follows the pay-as-you-go policy can at the same time provide generously for the needs of its people. The State of Wisconsin has paid its bills out of each year's income. The State government operates on a cash basis. We have paid our bills and do not owe anyone a dollar of indebtedness.

Progressive Wisconsin is not a new convert to the idea of balancing the budget and paying as we go. We know out of long experience that it is a sound financial policy. But more, we know that it promotes honesty and efficiency, eliminates waste, and compels governments to face facts. Where the taxpayer gets his bill annually for the expenditures of his government he is deeply interested in that government. When it spends a dollar he knows it is his dollar, and he does not want it wasted. He is alert, and insists not only that there shall be no graft, but he insists that there shall be efficiency. He wants his money's worth.

The most effective cure for political pap in all its forms is a pay-as-you-go policy. It is no accident that a State like Wisconsin has perhaps the most efficient public service in America. Aside from thirty-odd administrative officers every employee of the State and its institutions is under civil service. But it does not stop with the State government. When citizens demand good government they demand it up and down. That is why municipal government has been out of partisan politics in Wisconsin for years. That is why our judicial system gives us an administration of justice that makes life and person safer there than in any other place in the United States. These things have come to pass, not because our politicians do not like political patronage. But political pap and good government do not go together. Our voters demand efficient government; and the voters, in this, as in most things, get what they demand.

But America as a whole has not followed this policy. Those governments that have not followed it cannot expect to attain it overnight. They must be prepared to pay the price. That price is willingness to levy and collect the taxes each year to pay that year's bills. Those governments that have piled up debts "cannot have their cake and eat it, too." For years States like Wisconsin have been ridiculed and assailed because we did raise the taxes to pay our bills. We were charged with being radical, unfriendly to business, and driving industry out of the State. It is only natural that we are pleased today when a great leader of American industry says this about Wisconsin:

"Because of its honest government, wise use of taxing powers, and natural advantages, Wisconsin is one of the most attractive States in the Nation for manufacturers. Wisconsin has paid its way as it has gone, and there has been no scandal, graft, or corruption. * * * If Wisconsin continues to use its tax power wisely, it will find itself advantageously situated in comparison with other States."

We who pay as we go face facts. We cannot evade thinking by borrowing. When our State raises a dollar to meet the problems of the depression we have to dig down and bring up a dollar in cash. We cannot issue bonds, or give our note to a banker. We cannot postpone or evade thinking about the problems of unemployment by mortgaging the future to buy groceries and fuel for unemployed.

In order to pay cash, there must be enough income to meet the bills. The Government's income comes from taxpayers. As the depression has eaten into the income of our taxpayers, so it has immediately reduced the revenues of the Government. States like Wisconsin are constantly aware that the only way to improve the State's income is first to improve the income of taxpayers. We cannot deceive ourselves by borrowing. We know today that we have just about reached the bottom of the tax barrel. We cannot go on in the future, as we have in the past, taking more and more out of our citizens' flattened pocketbooks to maintain millions of other human beings and billions of dollars worth of resources in idleness. We cannot borrow, so we are compelled to face the difficult and complex problem of unemployment. If we are to have balanced Government budgets, our people must first have the income to balance their own budgets.

All the wealth we have ever had or ever will have comes from the labor of man applied to our natural resources. We cannot create wealth by printing presses or waving a wand. Wealth comes from work, and poverty from idleness.

Since 1929 America has tolerated enforced idleness for millions of men and women and billions of dollars worth of material resources. This unemployment of human and material resources has cost us over one hundred and fifty billion dollars in lost income. But on top of that, we have had to pay doles out of our decreased income to support this unemployment. We are a rich country, but we are not rich enough to carry the cost of unemployment, either in terms of dollars or in terms of human character. Another way must be found.

The only way out—short of bankruptcy—is putting our resources to work creating greater wealth. How can it be done? The conservative claims these resources will go back to work when governments balance their budgets. "Restore confidence and capital will flow back into productive enterprise and put us all at work."

There is lack of confidence abroad in America. But its source is not loss of the gold standard, nor unbalanced budgets. The real cause is the undermining of confidence of millions of Americans in their own ability to earn their own living. Ten million unemployed—40,000,000 men, women, and children—who for over 6 years have lived in the richest land on earth, only to be told "we will feed you, but we have no work for you to do." That is the cancer that eats at the confidence of the American people. Give back to our people, and particularly to our younger men and women, faith in themselves, in their usefulness to our country, and faith in their own ability to find a place in our life, and you thereby restore their confidence in themselves and in the future of the Nation they inhabit.

We must turn our backs on trying to get rich by having less. We need more, instead of less. The Brookings report demonstrates that we had no overproduction even in 1929. To have supplied the American people with a modest standard of living in that year, we would have had to increase by three times the production of consumable goods. Today the backlog of unsupplied wants is enormous. Supplying the minimum needs, let alone increasing our standard of living, would today swamp every resource we have.

Our great economic objective should be to increase the total production of wealth in America. There is no sound reason why our national income should not be one hundred billions a year in 1937—that means doubling our income of today. But it can come only by all of us going back to work. Not raking leaves or digging ditches, but productive work which when completed leaves something needed and useful. There is more than $100,000,000,000 of that kind of work waiting here in America—a job for every able-bodied person that needs one for years to come.

But equally, if not more important, we must turn our backs on the whole idea of something for nothing. We must return again to the wise and sound policy that America owes no able-bodied person a living, but that we do owe every able-bodied person a real chance to earn his own living. We must provide generously for old-age pensions, and a far broader and more adequately supported system of education for our youth. But for all the rest of us, it must be back to work. Not a penny of public money to support able-bodied persons in idleness, but millions to provide them with useful work. Thus, and thus alone, can we balance our budgets.

How will such a plan be paid for? A year ago I made a business proposition to the taxpayers of Wisconsin. That offer still stands. We are ready to launch a program. First, that will provide every able-bodied person with a chance to earn his own living from useful work at decent wages; second, that will finance the share to be paid by local units of government out of their current income without incurring a dollar of debt; third, that will completely wipe out the whole system of relief; fourth, that will provide an adequate and generous system of old-age pensions; fifth, that will not increase the taxation of our present incomes by a single dollar; sixth, the only tax of which will be based on increased income. If we make the taxpayers more money, they will pay a small slice of the extra money into the common pot to pay for it. It is a pay-as-you-go program—one that will pay for itself from the wealth and business it creates.

Thus you will see that I am convinced that this policy applies to extraordinary, as well as to ordinary expenditures of governments, though naturally the period for balancing an extraordinary expenditure must be longer than for ordinary. To make this policy effective it must be imbedded in the Constitution itself.

The deep underlying principle which supports "pay as you go" is moral responsibility, not responsibility for just dollars and cents but responsibility for the material and spiritual consequences of public policies. A deep sense of moral responsibility makes men formulate policies they believe in sufficiently not only to win with but to go down to defeat for. "Gold is tried in the fire, and acceptable men in the furnace of adversity." It is such men who can say in the face of adversity: "Neither the clamor of the mob nor the voice of power will ever turn me by the breadth of a hair from the course I mark out for myself, guided by such knowledge as I can obtain and controlled and directed by a solemn conviction of right and duty."

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY ICKES ON PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered last night by Hon. Harold I. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior and Administrator of Public Works, before the Town Hall meeting at the Shoreham Hotel in this city on Why I Favor a Program of Public Works.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY I FAVOR A PROGRAM OF PUBLIC WORKS

During the years that America was skimming the cream from off its rich natural resources it acquired a happy-go-lucky attitude toward life that has become traditional. We were taught to believe that the morrow would always take care of itself. We should trust entirely in the Lord, or what passed for the Lord in our materialistic minds. If one accumulated a greater share of wealth than a sound social system should permit anyone to have and to hold, what mattered it? It was notorious that in America it was only three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves and the poorest man under the flag might aspire in his turn to own a private yacht and send the women of his family abroad to buy a face lift of culture and a permanent wave of music and the arts. The rich man was to be looked up to and emulated; the poor man had only himself to blame.

When hard times befell we were not greatly concerned, because there were new lands just beyond to be had for the taking; fresh forests waiting for the woodsman's ax, undiscovered mines to be searched for and developed. But then came the day when it was forced upon the consciousness of even the most unregarding that our physical frontier had vanished into the western horizon; the shock of the discovery that our resources, rich and varied though they were, were not inexhaustible. Nor was this the whole of the depressing prospect. Our inventive genius outran even our incredible industrial expansion. The result was bitter competition for jobs of which there were fewer than composed the army of eager claimants for those jobs. With no new lands to turn over to the fast-growing farm population, to say nothing of the technological unemployed, where was work to be found for the hands, increasing in number every year, that eagerly reached out for work?

One of the gravest and most pressing problems that we face today is that of the standing army of our unemployed. No longer may we trust to luck unless we choose recklessly to laugh in the very face of inevitable disaster. We must find some means of supplying employment for those who are able and willing to work and thus sustain our population on a basis that approximates our supposed American standard of living. We must take an inventory of our national assets and on the foundation of that inventory plan for the future development of our America so as to make the best possible use of all our resources for the greatest good of the people.

I make this suggestion with not a little misgiving, because it has not been the American way. He who ventures to suggest the advisability of planning for the future is taking his very life into his hands. It simply is not done in the best American circles. We must reverse our forefathers and they never planned. When they had devastated one forest, they merely moved on to another. When they had exhausted the fertility of a farm in one section, there was always another farm a little farther on to be had for the taking. As I say, they never planned; they merely exploited. Ergo, we should not plan. Moreover, certain foreign countries have taken to planning and that makes it un-American for us to do likewise. It may be objected also that planning involves the use of our mental processes, and that implies a "brain trust." We have been properly ridiculed for drafting the brains of specialists to help us solve our social and economic problems. That is, too, un-American. Brains should be used not to help Government but to get what they can out of Government!

However, there are certain stark facts that confront us which, whether we relish it or not, are forcing a realistic tempering of the traditional American optimism that every citizen who is willing to work can find employment at a satisfactory job that will yield him and his family a comfortable living, which implies also a standard American education for his children, some modest luxuries, and a reasonable degree of leisure.

With the depletion of our natural resources there has gone hand in hand a sharp curtailment of opportunities for employment on the farms, in the mines, and in the factories. Year after year, due to improved processes, more produce and goods are being turned out with less human labor. The result is what has come to be known as technological unemployment. It has been estimated that in 1929, which was supposed to be the peak year of American prosperity for all time, there were in this country between two and two and a half million men ready and willing to work who could find no work to do. There seems to be no limit to the output of American inventors and technicians. And it is reasonable to suppose that, as time goes on, there will be more and more men unable to find employment for technological reasons.

What do we propose to do for these men? Without even making a strugggle in their behalf, shall we endure the building up in this country of a permanent class to which we shall grudgingly dole out a bare living? Or shall we seriously address ourselves to the problem of creating worthwhile employment for all the men and women of America who want to sustain themselves by their own efforts in the honorable and traditional American manner?

It may not be the only way out, but to my mind, one of the soundest and most statesmanlike undertakings in which we could engage would be a system of useful public works, which, while taking up the slack in employment, at the same time would add to our national assets. Obviously, such a program should not be undertaken unless it could be kept free of politics. The nature, the size, the extent, and the location of the projects should be determined by the best brains the country contains solely on the basis of the facts, unaffected by prejudice, or uninfluenced by those who possess power.

There should be no logrolling in making up the list of projects, no trading for parochial benefits after the manner in which our tariff laws have been written. That ancient and dishonorable institution, the American pork barrel, should be rolled down the precipice of public disapproval to burst its staves beyond repair on the hard rocks of a scientific and objective determination of what undertakings should have priority for the greatest good of the country as a whole. Projects should be built by the Federal Government, either on its own account or on some fair basis of cooperation with States or local communities or other beneficiaries, but wherever Federal money is given or loaned there should be strict Federal supervision to the end that a dollar in value shall be forthcoming for every dollar spent. All projects, insofar as possible, should be self-liquidating.

Personally I favor a program of public works in a time of unemployment, because, both socially and economically, it is much to be preferred to the dole. I hope that never again will America have to resort to direct relief in order to supply its unemployed employables with food and shelter and clothing. The dole is destructive of morale. Insidiously, it weakens the moral fiber, tending to develop a class whose sense of pride and personal integrity is permanently undermined. Not only is direct relief objectionable as a social measure, it is economically unsound. It does not pay for itself, to say nothing of earning a return upon the sums laid out. It merely keeps men and women and children from starving or freezing to death, because we are too humane, for the time being at least, to permit that.

When America decided on direct relief she had no other choice. We knew that we were in a desperate situation economically; that undetermined millions of people were unemployed; that banks were crashing to the right of us and to the left of us, carrying down with them the savings of many a depositor who, given those savings, could have gone along for at least another lap on his own economic power, but we merely sat and talked about our wonderful American initiative and resourcefulness, hoping—oh, so desperately hoping—that the last factory would not close nor the final bank fail before a new administration had come into power which we might hold responsible, in some degree at least, for the catastrophe that had overwhelmed us.

When that new administration did come into power, to its credit be it said that it lost no time in going to the rescue of communities that had exhausted their resources in taking care of their unemployed. We have done our best to see to it that no one went hungry in the United States. The cries of anguish that have gone up in the land have not so much been outbursts caused by the pangs of hunger, as they have been symptoms of economic sciatica which has affected the pocket nerves of the wealthier classes called upon to share their excess riches with those who in more fortunate times had by their labor and services contributed to the accumulation of those riches.

It has always seemed to me that one of the greatest failures in statesmanship in American history was that of not having ready a comprehensive and well-matured plan of useful public works and a determination to put that plan into effect as soon as we could hear the thunder of the depression upon the rocks. Senators WAGNER, LA FOLLETTE, and COSTIGAN, among others, had, I believe, been urging upon the floor of the Senate the formulation and adoption of such a program before and just after the full force of the economic hurricane struck us in the fall of 1929, but the administration in power, through ineptness or failure to grasp the real situation, proved to be unequal to the occasion.

There are sincere people who object that public works cannot stem the tide of such a depression as swept over the country in 1929. They say that England tried the plan and failed, and that we have attempted it only to discover its inadequacy. I express no opinion as to what may or may not have happened in Great Britain, because I have no first-hand knowledge of the facts, but so far as the United States are concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that the public-works theory has not failed here. It has never really been tried. We have dabbled with public works; we have done some wishful thinking about public works, but the principle has never been given a trial on a scale commensurate with our needs and adequate to the situation. Notwithstanding, I believe that our program, tentative though it has been, has more than justified itself.

In June of 1933 the National Industrial Recovery Act appropriated $3,300,000,000 for public works. From the Emergency Appropriation Act of 1934, $396,500,000 more were made available. In the spring of 1935 Congress drew on the Treasury for a further sum of $4,800,000,000, of which $445,047,762 went for public works. In addition to these congressional appropriations we have a revolving fund into which has gone money received from the sale through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of bonds taken by the Public Works Administration in making loans for local projects. Already we have sold about $302,638,000 worth of such bonds. This money has been available for additional loans on other local projects to create more employment.

I might interject here that we have made a profit for the Government of more than $4,750,000 on the bonds that have been sold thus far. I might say also that the investment bankers who purchased these securities through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and paid this $4,750,000 profit to the Government could have bought them at the original price paid by us if they had had a little more of that confidence in the future of America which they insist is so essential to recovery.

It would appear from the foregoing figures that P. W. A. has appropriated and allotted for investment during the past 2½ years a total sum of $4,444,000,000 in round numbers. But this is not quite the true story. While Congress appropriated or made available sums totaling this amount the customary and usual appropriations for permanent improvements for the various departments of the Government were withheld, with the result that it was necessary to give them large allocations out of P. W. A. funds. Then, too, we were called upon to provide for the administrative expenses of many of the emergency agencies that were set up to fight the depression.

The fine C. C. C. program of the President originally was largely financed out of P. W. A. funds, and in the fall of 1933 he drew on us for $400,000,000 for the Civil Works Administration. At the outset $238,000,000 were transferred to the Navy for the shipbuilding program on which it is engaged in order to bring our fleet up to treaty parity. All told, approximately $1,183,000,000 went to C. W. A., C. C. C., T. V. A., the Farm Credit Administration, and other recovery agencies, reducing the total sum available to P. W. A. from $4,444,000,000 to about $3,261,000,000.

Nor is this all. Subsequently it became necessary to impound out of our unappropriated and unobligated balances another $310,000,000 in order to finance the Federal Emergency Relief Administration pending the passage of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. This left us a balance of approximately $2,951,000,000. Through the sale of borrowers' securities and the release of a small portion of impounded funds the net result is a final sum of about $3,000,000,000 for 2½ years, or an average of $1,200,000,000 a year, for the real public-works program.

Of course, a billion dollars a year looks like a good deal of money, but when it is considered in connection with what was customarily spent on the average for new construction in the United States during the years just prior to the depression, it is truly insignificant.

The total volume of construction work in normal times in the United States is not definitely known, but various experts have estimated that in the peak years of the 1920's from eleven to fifteen billions of dollars was the annual outlay. Let us be conservative and call it twelve billions. These twelve billions during the depression fell off to a sum of from three and a half to four billion dollars annually, which means a shrinkage in outlay for construction work of, let us say, $8,000,000,000 a year. Contrast this $8,000,000,000 with the average of $1,200,000,000 spent annually under the public-works program. Or, to tell the story in gross sums, we have $30,000,000,000 spent in 2½ years prior to the depression as against about twelve billions for a like period during the depression.

Am I not right, on the basis of these figures, in suggesting that the public-works theory has never really been tried, and therefore cannot have failed in the United States? Yet some people have expected this sum to pulse through the arteries of trade in the same volume and with the same reinvigorating effect as the eleven to fifteen billions of dollars whose place it has been trying so bravely to fill. It was like sending out a tugboat to capture the Atlantic fleet. Instead of siphoning enough money into the channels of trade through the construction of substantial public works to do a recovery job we have been using an eye dropper. And the resulting drop in the eye to the undiscriminating has seemed to be as big as a house.

I anticipate that through the minds of some of you there may be running the thought that conveniently I am ignoring the large sum of money allocated for the work-relief program under the act of 1935. I have not overlooked this important factor. I will even admit that some of this money has gone for public works, but, generally speaking, only a small part of it has been spent for public works of the type that I have in mind. About $928,000,000 of the $4,800,000,000 appropriated in 1935 were allocated for direct relief, while more than $1,000,000,000 of this sum have been, or are being, spent on projects which are fully justified although they may not come within the classification of public works under discussion. The allocation of every cent of this money was proper and in the public interest. It represents a necessary and justified investment in character and morale.

As I have already said, if the Nation should determine upon a policy of public works in times of unemployment, it should plan ahead. Careful advance planning and the maintenance of a skeleton organization that can be expanded to meet any need will mean that if, unhappily, we are called upon to endure another depression, the idling engine can be thrown into high gear instantly. Delays that were unavoidable because of lack of preparedness when the present program was undertaken in 1933 need not impede the speedy undertaking and carrying out of public-works programs in the future. We must not repeat the experience of 1933, when, without a single plan, mature or immature, and without an organization, the national administration was suddenly called upon to undertake a program of public works practically overnight.

Considering the difficulties that confronted us, we are entitled to feel proud of the record that we have made. So far, disbursements under the first program total approximately $1,900,000,000, and it is estimated that some 3,400,000 man-years of direct and indirect employment have been created. It is to be remembered that these figures do not include the money spent and the vast amount of work created under the programs of C. C. C., C. W. A., and T. V. A.

Practically all of the 15,000 Federal projects included in the first public-works program have been completed. Large projects such as the Columbia River Basin development, Casper-Alcova, and Fort Peck Dam remain on the dwindling list of uncompleted undertakings. Considerably more than half of the 4,000 non-Federal projects undertaken under this same program have been completed and are in use. The $200,000,000 worth of railroad rehabilitation and equipment construction is 95 percent finished.

The remaining projects under the first program are being pushed to completion rapidly as our new program, including 4,166 non-Federal projects and 37 additional slum-clearance and low-rent housing projects, is getting quickly under way. With respect to 4,149 of the new non-Federal projects and the 37 housing undertakings, construction contracts had been let on January 16 last, or they were being advertised for bids. These call for an expenditure of approximately $849,000,000.

Although our current program is somewhat smaller than the first, it will, nevertheless, result in over three-quarters of a billion dollars worth of construction.

I am confident that any fair-minded and impartial critic, after studying the record, would say that the public-works job of this administration has not only been well and honestly done but that, considering all the circumstances, it has been expeditiously carried out.

I say this, conscious though I am of certain hypercritical editorial writers, many of whom have never built a chicken coop, who have pounded out on their typewriters sage and informed opinions of the shortcomings of the Public Works Administration. I reflect also that politicians out of office and eager to get back in have joined in a loud chorus of "red tape" without going to the trouble to discover how little they knew about what was going on. Then there have been the critical chiselers, the grafters, and the corner-cutters who resented the loss of opportunities for illicit profits that are implicit in "haste makes waste" operations.

I conceived it to be one of my principal duties as Public Works Administrator to perform the tasks assigned to me in such a manner as to convince the people of the country that Government is able to build a great series of public works covering practically every county in the United States, not only in a workmanlike manner but substantially free from scandal. The result has been that communities that had come to regard corruption and graft and chiseling as inseparable from public construction have learned that such work can be as honestly and economically done by the public as by any prudent businessman. If we are to adopt the principle of public works during depression periods as a fixed policy of government, it was well worth proving, as we have done, that the taxpayers' money that goes into public works can be economically and honestly spent.

One of the most significant outgrowths of our present public-works program has been the institution by the President of what in effect is a national planning board. The name of this valuable instrumentality is the National Resources Committee. The heart and nerve center of that committee is an advisory board, of which that able, devoted, and distinguished citizen of Washington, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, is chairman. Another member is Dr. Charles E. Merriam, of the University of Chicago, and until he resigned recently, Dr. Wesley C. Mitchell, of Columbia University. Two new members are Messrs. Beardsley Ruml and Henry S. Dennison. Mr. Charles W. Eliot, 2d, has served as executive officer of this board.

I know of no agency of Government that has done more effective and outstanding work than this advisory board—and all without any blaring of trumpets. Under its leadership, there have been set up in every State except two, as well as in Alaska, planning committees that are working in close cooperation with the national committee. The result is that if and when there shall be occasion in the future for undertaking a public-works program, at least a comprehensive and carefully considered general national plan will be ready. I go so far as to express the hope that henceforth no public work will be undertaken anywhere by the Federal Government until it has been approved by this national planning body, not only as to necessity and social importance, but as to priority. The days of the discredited pork barrel in the United States ought to be at an end forever.

According to the economists, the reason for, or the immediate result of, an economic depression is the stagnation of money in the circulatory system of commerce. Money is to trade and industry what blood is to the human body. An economic embolism means an immobile patient under the care of doctors and nurses. In order to cure the patient it is necessary to absorb the embolism and restore that normal and healthy circulation, without which business will continue to lie flat on its back.

Although recognizing this principle in the abstract, some timid statesmen and economists nevertheless insist that the Nation must not help to restore circulation, at least to the point of transfusing health-giving currency and credit from its own sounder body. Their reasoning seems to run along this line: Business must be stimulated; only the circulation of money can stimulate business; banks and private individuals possessing funds refuse to make use of them; the Government alone has both the money and the will to stimulate business; therefore the Government must not spend any money for this purpose, but, on the contrary, must keep at all times strictly within its budget.

One of the outstanding defenders of this illogical theory has been Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, former Director of the Budget, for whom I have a very genuine respect and personal regard. In his official capacity he did all he could to oppose the public-works program; and about a year ago, in a speech before the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, he said: "The huge obligations entered into on account of public works, even if no further appropriations for public works are made, will continue for many years to constitute tremendous drains on the Federal Treasury."

Imagine a board of directors of a great corporation declaiming against the expenditure of money for the building of a badly needed fabrication plant because the obligation, if entered into, "would constitute a tremendous drain upon the resources of its treasury." This is not merely laissez faire; it is economic sclerosis. Needed or useful capital expenditures constitute assets and not liabilities. And at what better time can capital be invested in permanent improvements than in a period of depression, when it is comparatively cheap to build and when the employment of men will contribute to economic recovery?

If an investment in a permanent improvement constitutes an economic burden, then no addition to plant equipment in private ownership would ever be justified. As a matter of fact, the pursuit of this doctrine to its logical conclusion would inhibit not only additions to the plant but the initial building of the plant itself. It would mean that a man should not deposit money in a bank because the banker might lend it to an industrialist to increase the operating capacity of his factory. The only sound course to pursue would be to tie it up in the traditional sock and hide it under the mattress.

Many billions of dollars could properly be spent in the United States on permanent improvements that would add to our assets. Such spending would not only help us over depression periods, it would do much for the health, well-being, and prosperity of the people. I am unable to believe that providing an adequate water supply for a municipality or putting in a sewerage system is a wasteful outlay of money. Money spent in such fashion as to make our people healthier and happier human beings is not only a good social investment, it is sound from a strictly financial point of view. I can think of no better outlay, for instance, than money invested in education and health. In our first program, more than 24 percent of the 4,000 non-Federal projects were educational buildings, while in our present program the percentage is in excess of 50. Had it not been for public works, school construction in this country, already far below normal requirements, would indeed be in a sorry state today. Sound and well-trained minds in sound bodies would add more to the actual prosperity of this country, measured purely in money values, than anything else I can think of at the moment.

If we admit the theory that during a time of depression it is necessary to keep money pulsing in order to bring about a return of prosperity; and if the situation is such that, as has been the case during the last few years, only public monies, whether National, State, or local, are available to supply the circulation without which health cannot be restored to our economic system, then I submit that there is no choice except for the people en masse to do what individuals cannot or will not do. They must invest in the future of America. If America has the economic resiliency that we believe it to have, there is little risk in such adventuring, provided that we are reasonably prudent.

And if public moneys are to be put into circulation, always, of course, within the bounds of reason, I am convinced that the soundest, safest, and most beneficial manner in which this can be done is through a Nation-wide building program. There are several arguments that can be made for public work which, as it seems to me, are conclusive for this type of project, on the assumption that the Nation should undertake at all to join issue with a depression by directly stimulating employment.

In the first place, well-planned and built and worth-while public works constitute valuable assets. Directly or indirectly, they will yield a return to the community. In a very real sense, they will be self-liquidating. Even in those cases where they do not make an equivalent return in actual dollars and cents, such projects as waterworks, sewerage systems, schoolhouses, hospitals, and others that could be enumerated, do pay out handsomely, even if indirectly, through the beneficial services that they render.

Another advantage of the types of public works that are under discussion is the widespread stimulation to employment that they give. The value to the Nation of a project cannot be measured alone in terms of the actual employment at the site. The most ephemeral type of project may, while it is in progress, employ at the site a large number of men as compared with, let us say, a bridge or a schoolhouse. However, the aggregate of those employed, directly and indirectly, in building a bridge or a schoolhouse may be as large as, or larger than, the number put to work on a temporary project. It is the indirect employment which is one of the chief values of and justifications for substantial public works, as compared with unsubstantial construction. And the product is a permanent addition to the real wealth of the Nation.

Take the Pennsylvania Railroad project, for instance. Here was a straight loan to the Pennsylvania Railroad of approximately $70,000,000 at 4 percent (be it noted in passing that the major portion of the securities taken by the Government for this loan was subsequently sold by us at a profit of more than $2,000,000). This project consisted of finishing the electrification of the line from New York to Washington and of certain other portions of the road, of building new electric locomotives and freight cars, of changing old locomotives from passenger to freight, and of relining the old Union Tunnel in Baltimore. The project was completed in about 22 months. The direct employment numbered 15,000 men. The indirect employment probably ran to at least 30,000 men. The total employment, both direct and indirect, was scattered among 15 States.

Steel had to be fabricated, stone had to be quarried, concrete had to be manufactured, cars had to be built, trees had to be made into lumber, copper had to be melted into transmission lines, electric locomotives had to be built, and all of these materials and the final products into which they were transformed had to be transported from points of origin to final destinations.

A similar story could be told of every project of a substantial character that is built. The benefits percolate into many communities in widely separated States. We think of the great Boulder Dam as local to Nevada, yet many millions of the money that have gone into the construction of that record-breaking project have been expended in States lying east of the Mississippi River.

Another fortunate result flowing from a public-works program is the stimulation that it affords to the producers' goods industries. If, as economists seem to agree, the measure of the success in overcoming a depression is the measure of the quantity of producers' goods that are manufactured, then it stands to reason that whatever has the effect of stimulating the heavy-goods industries will, more quickly than anything else, bring us out of a depression. It is a well-known fact that the greatest stimulation that can be afforded to the heavy-goods industries results from the construction of projects calling for materials for the production of which those industries must be drawn upon or for machinery and tools required to produce those materials.

A public-works program has all of the attributes required to stimulate business and industry and thus make a frontal attack upon a depression. It also has social qualities of a high order. It puts money into circulation; it creates permanent and valuable assets in return for the money expended; it has a tonic effect upon the production of producers' goods; it gives men employment at worth-while jobs; it increases Federal revenues. In addition to providing work directly at the site, it calls back to factory and quarry and railroad still other men to produce and transport the materials that are used at the site. Its benefits are widely diffused. I submit that there is nothing else that can be undertaken by the Government that is so well calculated to put an end to a depression as is a carefully planned and executed program of public works. But enough money must be spent to give a real stimulation.

There is hardly any limit to the amount of money that can legitimately and wisely be spent on public works in this country over a series of years. I will not pause to dwell on the need in every part of the land for schools, for sewerage systems, for new or improved waterworks, for power plants, or for public construction of other sorts. But if I may, I will refer briefly to certain types of monumental public works that can be done on a national scale.

Three magnificent superhighways could be built from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast unmarred by billboards, hotdog stands, or indiscriminately located service stations. These longitudinal highways could be bisected by three or four similar ones running from Canada to the Mexican border, or to the Gulf coast. The westernmost of these North-South highways, with the consent of and in cooperation with our neighbor, Canada, could extend into Alaska. And, strange at it may seem, the best opinion is that this road would be open to travel for the greater part of the year. Similarly, one or two of these highways, if Mexico and our other neighbors farther south were willing, could stretch across Mexico and the countries of Central America down to the Canal Zone.

And why not consider lighting our highways? This would permit safe hauling of heavy freight at night and provide less dangerous traffic conditions in the winter months when the days are short.

I have long desired to see the elimination of every grade crossing in the United States, excepting only those on insignificant spur and branch lines that are scarcely ever used. Here indeed is an enterprise to engage the interest of the richest nation in the world. In these days of heavy motor traffic on many thousands of miles of improved roads radiating into every nook and corner of the United States, the question of grade crossings is one of grave public concern; all the more so since our railroads, in order to meet the competition of airplanes and motor trucks and busses, are putting on lighter and faster trains.

It stands to reason that, as motor vehicular traffic increases and additional light and fast trains are put into service by the railroads, our grade crossings will become sources of even greater danger than they are at present. Our casualty list grows longer every year until it has become a matter of major importance. Nor should grade-crossing elimination be restricted to junctures between highways and railroads. In many parts of the United States where vehicular traffic is unusually heavy there should be grade separation at highway crossings. Not only would there be a precious saving in human life flowing from a separation of grade crossings, there would be a notable resulting economy in dollars and cents, to say nothing of the saving in time.

There are other great projects to be undertaken. The United States, in cooperation with local authorities, could enter upon a program for the correction of stream, lake, and coastal waters pollution. What a wonderful thing it would be if once again our streams were so pure that fish could live in all of them, that our children could swim without danger of contracting loathsome diseases, and that a dependable supply of uncontaminated water for domestic uses would be available. We could renew our forests more rapidly than we have done so far. Hundreds of millions of dollars are required for erosion correction and control. What remains of the public range requires careful attention if we are to maintain flocks and herds to supply our needs. (Of course, if our natural resources had been wisely and prudently used, it would not be necessary for us now and in the future to tax ourselves until it hurts in order to repair the ravages that are the direct result of uncontrolled and ruthless exploitation by selfish and greedy men). Large sums of money could profitably be spent on flood control and on river and harbor improvement. Not the pork-barrel type of project but improvements that are needed and which will yield returns to the country in the future, both social and economic.

In the arid West there are still waters running to waste that can be impounded and used for the irrigation of immensely rich soil that is capable of furnishing homesteads for hundreds of thousands of happy and prosperous American families. That it will be necessary, in support of a sound national economy, sooner or later, to irrigate every acre of land in the United States which, if put under water, will yield profitable crops to the farmers, is not to be doubted. The fact that it is expedient now to restrict farm production is, in my judgment, only a temporary measure forced upon us as the result of past economic imprudences. If we are going to raise our standard of living—and that is something that we must and will do if we are to realize the ideal of America—we will need more food and not less food; more clothing and not less clothing; more shelter and not less shelter. This will mean that the land will be called upon to produce whatever it is able to produce to advantage, and this in its turn will mean more irrigation projects, especially in the great West.

When we consider irrigation we naturally think also of hydroelectric power. Great national projects for the production and distribution of power are something to which the Government can turn its hand in the future for the benefit of the people. Other Boulder Dams remain to be built. The many-sided Tennessee Valley experiment can be reproduced in varying degrees and on different scales in widely separated parts of the country.

Transcending in importance even great transcontinental highways or reclamation projects, or in fact any of the types of public works already referred to, would be a program of low-cost housing undertaken in all parts of the country. I can think of nothing in the way of building that would be so fully worthwhile or which would have such a quick regenerating effect upon stagnating business. I have been, and continue to be, more interested in low-cost housing than in any other phase of public works. It might be said that the nature and the extent of the housing that America provides for those in the lowest-income groups is the real measure of our civilization. We talk about building power projects here and there as yardsticks with which to measure the reasonableness of the charges of private plants. In a true sense, the insanitary, disease-breeding, vice-ridden, and fetid slum areas that can be found in every part of the United States is a measuring rod, and a shocking one at that, of man's inhumanity to man in a supposedly civilized and humanitarian country. For my part I would not take it amiss, if, during the next depression, every cent of the large public-works funds that we ought to appropriate should go into decent houses for those in the lowest-income groups. I am confident that such an investment would prove, from every point of view, to be the soundest that as a people we have ever made.

In fact, as I have indicated, there is practically no limit to the worth-while physical improvements that can be made in this country. But I want to repeat that any program of public works should be carefully planned in advance. It should be free from politics. It should be grounded firmly upon the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number of the people. I hope that we will never go through another depression, especially such a one as that from which, as I trust, we are now emerging. But there have been depressions, many of them, in the past, and there may be others in the future, to bring us to our knees for our economic sins.

My own belief is that if we return to the old happy-go-lucky system of laissez faire we may expect other depressions that will be our just due. But we may at least hope that there is wise enough statesmanship and sufficient general intelligence in this country to profit by the experience of the recent past so that we will be prepared to meet them wisely and with courage. And in my opinion, we will not meet them wisely unless we have fully prepared our blueprints for a comprehensive and far-flung program of useful public works. Nor will we meet them with courage unless we are prepared to spend sums of money adequate to the need. We may not always be able to prevent fires, but at least we can keep them from spreading if we have trained and experienced firemen, up-to-date equipment, and a ready and sufficient supply of water.

ELECTRIC RATES IN WEST VIRGINIA

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I present certain data relative to electric rates in West Virginia, which I ask may be published in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed, as follows:

ELECTRIC RATES IN WEST VIRGINIA

WEST VIRGINIA

Estimated annual revenue, $19,733,946. Estimated annual saving under T. V. A. rates, $6,955,093. Estimated annual saving under Tacoma rates, $8,272,874. Estimated annual saving under Ontario rates, $8,805,681.

BARBOUR COUNTY

BERKELEY COUNTY

BOONE COUNTY

BRAXTON COUNTY

BROOKE COUNTY

CABELL COUNTY

CALHOUN COUNTY

CLAY COUNTY

DODDRIDGE COUNTY

FAYETTE COUNTY

GILMER COUNTY

GRANT COUNTY

GREENBRIER COUNTY

HAMPSHIRE COUNTY

HANCOCK COUNTY

HARDY COUNTY

HARRISON COUNTY

JACKSON COUNTY

JEFFERSON COUNTY

KANAWHA COUNTY

LEWIS COUNTY

LINCOLN COUNTY

Estimated annual revenue, $217,073. Estimated annual saving under T. V. A. rates, $76,517. Estimated annual savings under Tacoma rates, $91,002. Estimated annual saving under Ontario rates, $96,862.

LOGAN COUNTY

M'DOWELL COUNTY

MARION COUNTY

MARSHALL COUNTY

MASON COUNTY

SOIL EROSION AND ITS CONTROL IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address entitled "Soil Erosion and Its Control in the United States", delivered by Dr. Walter C. Lowdermilk, associate chief of the Soil Conservation Service, at the Third International Congress of Soil Science in London, England, on August 7, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Soil wastage from accelerated erosion has been heralded in a dramatic way by unprecedented dust storms in the United States during the spring months of the past 2 years. Gigantic clouds of dust have been blown aloft out of the Great Plains region, blotting out the sun at midday, and, as an ominous yellow pall, have swept eastward over a front of hundreds of miles up to 10,000 feet in height. For the first time in history dust clouds blown out of the farm fields of western Kansas, Texas, Colorado, Oklahoma, and Nebraska have repeatedly cast a yellow gloom over cities of the Atlantic seacoast. The dust cloud of May 11, 1934, was observed 300 miles offshore in the Atlantic. Choking dust storms arising from wind erosion of unprotected soils of the Great Plains paralyzed traffic, interrupted train service, made life intolerable, even to taking toll of human lives caused by "dust pneumonia." Newspapers carried startling accounts of the necessity of burning street lights during the day, of the blocking of roads with drifted soil, and of blowing soil out of fields down to plow depth. These repeated dust storms on such a gigantic and fearsome scale have been effective as never before in calling the attention of the American people to the problems of soil wastage in erosion by wind and by water.

The wastage of the basic and indispensable resource of the country—the soil—has become one of the most important problems confronting the Nation. Within a short period of 300 years the agricultural and plains grazing lands have been transformed from their pristine fertility to a state of progressive and menacing depletion as a result of accelerated and unrestrained soil erosion. The economic and social aspects of this tragic transformation have been tremendous. The acceleration of erosion in the East and in the South, in the North and in the West, has exacted an enormous cost to the Nation, as measured by soil depreciation and reduced crop yields alone; and has carried with it consequences of first importance to the permanence of investments in billions of dollars in river navigation, water power, municipal water-supply reservoirs, irrigation, agriculture, and grazing. Accelerated erosion has combined with and speeded up runoff of surface water from bared and cultivated slopes to accentuate flood peaks and to augment the cutting and transporting power of stream flow. Equally significant has been the transformation of fertile soils by the sorting action of flood flows into sterile overwash sands on alluvial bottom lands and into troublesome sediments in stream channels and reservoirs.

It is my purpose in this paper to examine in a broad way the problem of soil erosion or man-induced erosion and its control in the United States. The subject falls naturally into three parts: first, a review of the condition of the Americas when the English colonists cleared their first corn fields; second, the present condition of the land after three centuries of agricultural exploitation; and, third, measures that are being taken to meet the menace and challenge of soil erosion to the people of the United States.

I

By one of the most remarkable facts of history the North American Continent, as well as South America, was isolated from the Old World during the long and tedious rise of its civilizations and was preserved in pristine beauty and fecundity, in waiting for the establishment of new nations and a new civilization.

The structure of the North American Continent was vast, extending 3,000 miles from east to west, and from the frozen wastes of the Arctic to the luxurious forests of the Tropics. More than a third of the land comprised the great central valley of the Mississippi River, which Adams calls the most spacious habitation for human life to be found in the world. Of the area confined within the limits of the United States embracing nearly 2,000,000,000 acres, nearly one-half, or 830,000,000 acres were covered with primeval forests of great density. A squirrel might have leaped from bough to bough for a distance of a thousand miles and have seen scarcely a flicker of sunshine on the ground, so contiguous were the tree crowns and dense the foliage. The giant Sequoia trees of the Pacific coast, some with 4,000 annual rings, are the oldest living things in the world. Great mountain ranges flanked the valleys and rose in lofty peaks to the zone of perennial snows.

Nearly a third of the land area was occupied by broad expanses of grasslands, across which roamed great herds of buffalo and antelope and furnished the red men with happy hunting grounds prior to the white man's arrival. Absolute desert spread over only 2.5 percent of the area. The remainder of the land 405,000,000 acres, was occupied by open woodland, mountain waste, and water surface. Buried deep under the soils were fabulous riches of coal and iron, silver and gold, copper and oil. And a half-billion acres of virgin soils plenteous in the accumulated fertility of centuries were awaiting the plow. The few small clearings and irrigated patches cultivated to the hitherto-unknown crops of maize, tobacco, and sweetpotatoes were little indication of the potentialities of the land in huge crop production.

To the English colonists three centuries ago this was the land of promise; its resources exceeded the fondest dreams of an immigrant people. Except in an insignificant way the aborigines of North America had done little to cultivate the soil or to change the primeval character of vast expanses of the land surface and its vegetation. The coverage of vegetation and the soils protected by it were natural responses to long processes of interdependent soil and plant development under favorable climates. The streams, abundant in fish, bore oceanward the residue of precipitation waters that flowed gently from drainages of unbroken stands of vegetation. Such streams ran clear except in floods, when channel and bank erosion furnished the major burden of silt. Channel cutting and bank erosion generated soil creep down vegetated slopes and, supplemented by solution, served to sculpture and wear down the land with the leisure of geologic processes.

Where, however, comparatively rapid differential land uplift had occurred or within climatic zones too rigorous or too arid to support a complete coverage of vegetation, storm waters swept from unprotected surfaces substantial quantities of erosional debris into drainage streams. Processes of erosion proceeded in these instances at more rapid rates than elsewhere throughout the land. Streams such as the Missouri and the Colorado ran muddy throughout most of the year. The vast extent of soils suited to agriculture, however, had with few exceptions been built up under unbroken mantles of forest, woodland, or grass vegetation.

In the broad expanses of the country, from semitropical to boreal climates, from humid to arid zones, there spread before the eager colonists and settlers an infinite variety of rich promises and rewards for their efforts. By far the larger area was completely covered with vegetation ranging from grasses to dense forests. Such coverage had in the long period of interdependence of soil formation and plant succession protected the land surface from rain wash and favored the absorption of rain and melting snow by deep soils honeycombed and made porous by the burrowing of subterranean animals and insects and by plant roots. Little or no surface washing of soils occurred, and the slow process of soil formation had developed a wide variety of profiles of different ages.

Certainly under such conditions the processes of erosion, which the writer has termed "geologic norms of erosion" (1934), had not proceeded at rates in excess of those of soil formation. Beneath the protecting coverage of vegetation lay the nourishing soils, of varying depths, which were the products of intricate processes of soil formation during thousands of years. This fact is of fundamental importance in considering problems of soil conservation in long-time planning of land use. Erosion had not exceeded soil formation under these natural and little-disturbed conditions: The soil was maintained despite the geologic process of erosion.

II

Into this pristine continent entered the colonists and settlers with a burst of energy that began a transformation of the earth's surface at a rate never before equaled, and with it the creation of a civilization of fabulous wealth. There were reservoirs of population in Europe which supplied in a comparatively short time millions of vigorous and daring people to clear away the forests and to cultivate the soil at an astonishing rate in their westward march of agricultural occupation. It was no steady infiltration into undeveloped regions but a rapid advance over a wide front by farmers and stockmen with their plows and herds. Frontiers were pushed farther and farther westward at a pace that eliminated planning or thought of the effect of this occupation upon the sustained utility of the abundant resources that everywhere swept away to the horizon. The American people were engrossed in subduing the "wilderness", in felling the forest, in slaughtering the buffalo, in breaking the sod of the prairies and, in turn, the short-grass plains of the West. In his eagerness the settler became wasteful, thoughtless, and lost sight of his stewardship of the newly occupied continent.

Confronted by apparently limitless resources there developed in the minds of the colonists and succeeding generations an attitude to develop and exploit the land as rapidly as possible with little regard for the consequences. This became the typical American attitude, heedless and unplanned land exploitation, without regard for continued or sustained use. If land "wore out", there was new land to clear in the West. The impelling motive in exploitation of resources, moreover, was complex and contained to a major degree the lure of large gains at low costs and with comparatively little effort. This early belief in the limitless expanse and resources of the new-found continent has persisted too long and played a villainous role in the wasteful practices of land use which now have become a recognized menace to continued national welfare.

The agricultural occupation of the land is completed. When President Franklin D. Roosevelt, by Executive order of November 26, 1934, withdrew the remaining public domain from homestead entry he brought to a close an era in American history, an era of land settlement and exploitation. All the good lands of the Nation are occupied. The frontier of new lands was pushed westward, ever westward, until it dissolved in the waters of the Pacific. And a new frontier now appears in the conservation of lands under cultivation.

Withal, it is only necessary here to call attention in this era of land exploitation to the significant changes in rate of erosional processes occasioned by the clearing of vegetation, the breaking of the soil with plows, and the heavy consumption of the forage herbage by rapidly multiplying herds. Soils, which had been thoroughly protected through thousands of years of time by unbroken mantles of vegetation and had for this reason been weathered to fine textures, high organic contents, and good fertility, were suddenly exposed to the dash of customary torrential rains and to the blasts of winds over extensive areas. There began under these conditions a rate of erosion which was accelerated far above the rates that hitherto obtained. The significant fact of this period is that the rate of soil removed by rain wash and wind blasts greatly exceeded, and still does exceed, the rate of soil formation over vast areas—a sure process of soil destruction. Topsoils have been literally washed away, leaving raw, comparatively unproductive, unabsorptive, and intractible subsoil exposed at the surface, such as is conspicuous throughout the major agricultural soil provinces of the Nation, as the Piedmont Plateau, the areas of glacial and loessial soils, much of the Atlantic and Gulf Coastal Plains province, the Great Plains region, and the greater part of the crop and grazing areas of the West. Moreover, concentration of run-off has cut enormous gullies through topsoils (A horizons) into underlying materials (B and C horizons). These gullies are cutting headward and laterally into valuable farms, pasture, range, and forest lands, disgorging erosional debris upon alluvial bottom lands and into drainage channels. So enormous has been the work of accelerated water erosion as to reduce and destroy the productivity of millions of acres of farm and grazing lands of densely populated agricultural regions of the United States within the past century.

The first inventory on a national scale of the condition of the land as to erosion was made as a reconnaissance erosion survey by the Soil Conservation Service in 1934, under the immediate direction of Glenn L. Fuller, in charge of erosion surveys. The erosion map prepared from the reconnaissance shows the condition and extent of soil erosion, or accelerated erosion, besides the dominant soil types, the character of topography as expressed in degree of slope and present land use. Three general types of erosion were recognized, namely, (1) sheet erosion, including rill erosion; (2) gully erosion; and (3) wind erosion. No one type of erosion occurs alone; it was necessary to show conditions of the land as combinations of these major types of erosion. Gully erosion is easily noted; sheet erosion is less conspicuous but more wide-spread. The degree of sheet erosion is determined by the amount of truncation of the original soil profile. It was thus necessary to reconstruct the original soil profile from relict areas or from former soil surveys to determine the amount of loss of topsoils or a horizon of the profile.

For purposes of mapping conditions of the land as to erosion were classified into nine categories represented by numerical symbols. They are:

Condition of land as to erosion

Erosion symbol:

1. Little or no soil erosion; less than 25 percent of the topsoil lost.
2. Moderate sheet erosion, representing loss of 25 to 75 percent of topsoil.
3. Severe sheet erosion, representing loss of more than 75 percent of the topsoil.
4. Moderate wind erosion, representing small amounts of topsoil removed, accompanied by local accumulations, such as hummocks.
5. Severe wind erosion, where major amounts of surface soil are removed, usually associated with sandy hummocks.
6. Extreme wind erosion, representing losses of soil and drifting too severe for cultivation.
7. Land cut with occasional gullies.
8. Land cut with frequent gullies.
9. Land rendered useless for further cultivation by gullying.

In the arid and desert regions of Western States conditions were found where erosion was designated in a generalized statement, such as—

A. Mesas, canyons, badlands, rough mountain land.
R. Barren mountain tops. Areas above timber line.
W. Scab lands, shallow soils with frequent rock outcrop.

Conditions representing combinations of these nine categories were shown by grouping of the appropriate symbols. In this manner 26 separate classifications were recognized for purposes of mapping.

Certain difficulties were encountered in the arid regions where it was hard to distinguish between the normal process and an accelerated phase of erosion. As regions are more intensively mapped, such differences will be more accurately delineated on subsequent maps.

The field survey was made by counties and plotted on county base maps. These were assembled by States, which, in turn, were assembled and combined into a generalized national map (fig. 1).

The results of the erosion survey are summarized in table 1.

[2] Less than one-tenth of 1 percent.

[3] Exclusive of large cities and water area.

Of the three major types of erosion, sheet erosion was found to be the most extensive, occurring on 857,306,000 acres, in varying degrees of severity. The survey revealed that on 192,300,922 acres or 10.1 percent of the total area, an average of more than three-fourths of the topsoil (A horizon), including some subsoil (B horizon) in places, had been washed or blown away. The major part of this great area has been rendered unsuitable to further tillage under prevailing systems of agriculture. Consequent reduction in land productivity has converted former good lands into a submarginal status.

Moderately eroded lands, from which one-fourth to three-fourths of the topsoil had been washed or blown away comprised a vast area of 665,006,000 acres, or 34.9 percent of the total land area. Much of this land is still good agricultural land, but cultivated areas and heavily grazed lands on slopes are rapidly losing additional topsoil.

Gullying or trenching superimposed on normal land surfaces was found to be widespread. Severe gullying of frequent and deep trenching on agricultural cut-over forest, heavily grazed and abandoned lands was found on more than a third of a billion acres, whereas 4,177,738 acres were destroyed for further cultivation and crop production by gullies.

Wind erosion, which has developed to menacing proportions in the western plains States was recorded on a little less than a third of a billion acres. Land seriously damaged by the action of wind comprised 79,735,800 acres. In this region "dry farming", overgrazing, accompanied by periodic drought, favor active wind erosion. Fallowed lands are sometimes blown away to the depth of plowing by one wind storm. The wind-blown soils are sorted by the wind; the fine and fertile particles are carried aloft and blown beyond the area in great dust clouds or "black blizzards", whereas the coarser and sand particles are left behind to form drifts and hummocks. All together 9,201,700 acres of land have been essentially destroyed for cultivation by the spectacular phenomenon of wind erosion.

Other consequences of national importance follow in the train of soil wastage from accelerated erosion. In regions of wind erosion, sand drifts, the residue of wind-sorted soils, overwhelm good land, roads, fences, orchards, and houses. Such regions are menaced with the ultimate development of wandering sand dunes. The control of wind erosion within the grassland plains is, however, not as formidable a problem as that of water erosion throughout the more humid regions.

Accelerated water erosion in removing the physical body of the soil also extracts plant nutrients. It is estimated by Lipman (1934) that the losses of plant nutrients in the processes of accelerated erosion exceed those extracted by crop plants. Maintenance of the integrity of the soil becomes in this way one of the prerequisites of conserving soil fertility.

Further consequences of accelerated erosion appear as troublesome outwash debris, sediments, and increased flashiness of flood flows. Deposition of erosional debris on bottom lands in reservoirs and in stream channels impairs land productivity and the utility of water resources. The covering of formerly rich bottom lands with silt and sands excavated from eroding slopes of tributary watersheds has impoverished important areas in the East as well as in the West.

Silting of reservoirs is taking place at exhorbitant and ominous rates in agricultural and grazing regions where accelerated erosion is active. Serious inroads have already been made on developed water power, municipal water power, and irrigation reservoir storage. The irrigated agriculture of the West is seriously menaced by the rapid rate of silting of great reservoirs as a result of extensive acceleration of erosion on overgrazed range lands of tributary drainages.

Shoaling of river channels with sorted erosional debris interferes with the orderly development of water courses. River grades are steepened and flow lines elevated. Increasing volumes of sediments are progressively delivered downstream into succeeding streams of the general river system. The capacities of stream channels are thus reduced and accentuate hazards of overflow.

Accelerated erosion tends to increase frequency and height of flood flows through the increased volume and flashiness of run-off and decreased discharge capacity of alluvial channels. The volume of run-off is increased by reduced permeability of eroding soils and lessened time of possible percolation. Flashiness of run-off is developed by gully systems which increase time of concentration of torrential flow. Increased surface run-off takes place at the expense of replenishment of underground waters, and impairs ground-water supply.

In general, accelerated erosion proceeds at rates in excess of soil formation; it destroys the integrity of soil profiles, and aside from the production of troublesome erosional debris lowers the aggregate productivity of land. Soil nutrients are removed from the soil in suspension and in solution in the surficial run-off, and the cultivability of fields is destroyed by the riddling effect of gullies. Most significant is the insidious nature of the process of accelerated sheet and gully erosion by water which all too soon reaches a stage where the value of the land will not pay for the control of erosion on it. Thus, eventually, the problem passes beyond the resources of the individual landowner. Erosion unabted becomes a concern for the community, the State, and the Nation.

III

Accelerated erosion has not thus advanced in its devastating work on land without notice and study. As early as 1835 an observer deplored the progressive destruction of loessial soils in Louisiana cultivated to cotton without safeguards against erosion and their consequent abandonment (1835). Shaler (1896), McGee (1911), and Glen (1911) of the Geological Survey described the effects of acceleration of erosion upon the utility of land and upon the shoaling of stream channels. Bailey (1917) in a book entitled "The Holy Earth" pleaded for the recognition of a responsibility for preserving the productivity of the land from wastage by erosion. Bennett early called attention in Soil Survey Reports to the necessity of recognizing the effects of soil erosion in changing the character of soil profiles and as well as in depletion of soils and their productivity (1913, 1921, 1928, 1934, etc.). Students of the problems of conservation initiated a movement for the conservation of natural resources at the beginning of the present century which supported by numerous experimental studies has grown to national proportions and has made possible the act of Congress of April 27, 1935, by which soil erosion is recognized as a national menace, and the Soil Conservation Service was created a bureau of the Government to coordinate all activities for the prevention and control of soil erosion. And most fittingly H. H. Bennett was made chief of the Bureau to carry out a national program of soil conservation for which he had worked for more than two decades.

Experimental studies, which have grown from small beginnings, have played a major part in establishing scientifically a series of measurements of soil and water wastage due to soil erosion. Among these, the studies of Sampson and Weyl on grazing lands (1918), Duley and Miller on agricultural soils of Missouri (1923), of the writer in China (1926, 1927, 1929, etc.), of Dickson (1929), and Conner (1930) on Texas farm soils have established experimental methods and practice which have disclosed that erosion processes are far more active and destructive than had been suspected. In 1929 Bennett established in the Bureau of Chemistry and Soils a series of erosion experiment stations in 10 typical regions of the United States. The results from these experimental installations have been instrumental in establishing the urgent need for control measures, and for the initiation of a national program of erosion control and soil conservation. A summary of these results is shown in table 2 (1935).

Average results show grass approximately 65 times more effective with respect to soil conservation than a clean-tilled crop on same kind of soil having the same slope; and approximately 5 times more effective with respect to conservation of water.

The Soil Erosion Service was established in September 1933 under the office of the Secretary of the Interior to administer a grant made by the Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works for erosion-control activities. In April 1935 this Bureau was transferred to the Department of Agriculture, and renamed the Soil Conservation Service, and with it consolidated all activities of the Federal Government in erosion control on agricultural lands.

The objectives of the program devised and undertaken by the Soil Conservation Service are: (1) To demonstrate that the impoverishment and destruction of remaining areas of good agricultural land by continuing soil erosion can be controlled; (2) to conduct investigations and research relating to the character of soil erosion and the preventive measures needed; and (3) to lay the foundation for a permanent national erosion-control program of adequate scope to meet the acute land crisis created by wasteful methods of land utilization.

To these ends the Service has established and is actively prosecuting research and demonstration projects on a national scale. Investigations and research into the character of soil erosion and methods of control are being conducted at 12 regional erosion experiment stations. Field work of demonstrations is in progress on 40 erosion-control projects in representative watersheds of the major geographic and agricultural regions of the country where destructive soil erosion is prevalent and a critical factor in land use. Thirty-seven of these projects are essentially demonstrational in character and involve private lands. The remaining three are complete land rehabilitation and utilization projects and are located, for the most part, on land owned by the Federal Government.

The three complete land-rehabilitation projects cover an aggregate area of 35,700,000 acres in highly erodible Southwest, most of which is Federally owned. These projects involve, respectively, 16,000,000 acres on the Navajo Indian Reservation in Arizona and New Mexico; 3,200,000 acres on the watershed of the Gila River in the same States, and 11,500,000 acres on the watershed of the Rio Grande in New Mexico.

The Navajo project covers lands which contribute vast quantities of silt to the Boulder Reservoir on the Colorado River, being impounded by the great Boulder Dam, now nearing completion, and involves the preparation and application of comprehensive erosion-control, land-use, and range-control measures. It also involves reorientation of the entire agricultural-economic system of the 45,000 Navajo Indians. Completion of the work now well under way on this project will require several years. The Gila River project involves seriously eroded lands which are contributing vast quantities of silt from overgrazed range lands of the Gila River drainage to the Coolidge Reservoir. The Rio Grande project covers the most densely populated and highly productive region of New Mexico, where serious erosion threatens to force abandonment of large areas. The Elephant Butte Reservoir is being silted up at a disquieting rate with erosional debris washed out of the Rio Grande watershed, and menaces the social security of a large population dependent upon stored irrigation water.

The demonstration projects form the nucleus of the present Soil Conservation Service program. Varying in size from 25,000 to 200,000 acres each, they now cover a total of 4,000,000 acres and portions of 31 States. Each demonstration project area includes a complete drainage unit, wherein the full responses in control of flood flows and silting may be observed. Each project area has been selected with careful consideration of the representative nature of its soil and erosion problems and is typical, in this respect, of the entire region in which it is located. The 4,000,000 acres actually covered by demonstration projects on privately owned land are representative of approximately 75,000,000 acres of surrounding country, and erosion-control measures applied within the limited project areas may therefore be applied generally with efficiency to the eroding parts of this large segment of the Nation's farm land.

The plan of the erosion-control program of the Soil Conservation Service is to bring to bear all necessary technical specialties upon solutions to problems involved in erosion control and soil and water conservation. Solutions to the complex problems of an eroding area must be an evaluation of important factors and a balancing and coordination of the measures of control. The solution must be a composite one. The needs of the land determine the specialists and their activities to be marshalled and coordinated. No single line of attack is adequate. Each demonstration project, accordingly, is staffed with agricultural experts, including soil technologists, agronomists, agricultural engineers, farm-management specialists, foresters, range-management specialists where needed, and in some instances game-management specialists. The work of the project staff is coordinated by the project director, so as to develop a balanced program of erosion control. Both vegetative and mechanical measures are used in accordance with the peculiar needs and adaptabilities of each separate parcel of land.

The second step involves the preparation of a comprehensive, practical plan for the control of erosion and reduction of floods and silting over all the lands within the watershed areas. This plan is based on the physical and chemical characteristics of the soils involved, the slopes, the climate, the vegetation, adaptable crops and the agricultural practices of the area, and applies tested methods of control chosen for their particular adaptability to the particular situation. In the detailed plans careful consideration is given to needs of the farm as an economic unit in order that the property owners or operators may not suffer financial loss and that their cooperation may be obtained.

The plans for the program of control measures are based upon aerial photographic maps of the entire working area, such as can be enlarged to scales generally of 10 inches equal 1 mile for use in the field. The enlarged photographs are used as base maps, on which are mapped the field survey of four items, namely, (1) soil type, (2) slope of fields by classes, (3) condition of soil erosion, and (4) type of use. These surveys show the distribution by fields of the soils, slope gradients, and different degrees of erosion by classes, as well as the susceptibility of the cultivated, idle, forested, and grassed areas to future erosion. With these physical facts in usable form a practical farm plan is prepared in conference with the farmer for putting into effect the major control measures of soil conservation.

On a basis of carefully prepared land-use plans, 5-year agreements are entered into between the property owners or operators and the Government, whereby the owners or operators agree to carry out the land-use practices advocated by the Soil Conservation Service and to contribute certain labor and materials necessary for construction and installation of control devices, such as check dams, strip crops, terraces, contour furrows, new fences, and relocated fences. Fields too steep for safe cultivation are taken out of cultivation and seeded down to pasture or planted to forest wood lots. In return for these undertakings by the owners or operators the Government agrees to lay out the work, to provide supplementary labor and material (which the farmer cannot supply) needed to put the cooperative program into operation, and to furnish seed, trees, and shrubs, as the farmer may not be able to furnish, for the planting of areas taken out of cultivation because of their highly erodible character and consequent dangerous relation to good lands lying below.

Upon the completion of the cooperative agreements actual field work is got under way, and the plans are put into effect as rapidly as local climatic and agricultural conditions permit.

In view of the serious menace of erosion wastage to national welfare and of the complex nature of the problem, it is gratifying to report that at last the opportunity has arrived for initiating a national program of soil conservation, involving erosion prevention and control. It is one of the most important steps in conservation of natural resources taken by the Government of the United States since the establishment of national forests and the Forest Service.

TAXATION—ADDRESS BY FORMER GOVERNOR MURRAY

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by former Governor Murray, of Oklahoma, on the subject of taxation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My motives and the sentiments with which I confront you are best expressed by that matchless orator Ben Hill:

"Who saves his country saves all things; and all things saved bless him. Who lets his country die lets all things die; and all things dying curse him."

The Association for Economy and Tax Equality was organized with a view of uniting, if possible, the multitudes of factions and supporters of plans and thus making practical a movement calculated to serve the best interests of the land.

We have made nine announcements of principles, but all of the nine surround the questions of honesty, tax economy, and constitutional government. When the American people shall have been enabled to accomplish these things, other reforms will inevitably and naturally follow.

This declaration of principles goes to the vitality of all questions that confront the people.

NO MONEY, NO PENSIONS

We hear much said about old-age pensions and social security; but how are you going to provide for these things without money; and how can the money be had except through taxation; and how much money from the taxes will be left so long as one bureau out of many spends a million dollars to get to the relief clients only $300,000—where will any money be left for such social security?

Of what use to provide homesteads if they are to pay a tax that takes them away?

I hear one say, "Let the Government make it."

To use their term "inflation", which means merely making cheap the American dollar; and while a reasonable inflation could serve a good purpose, the trouble would be as it always has been, that they would follow the example of the man who found that one pill was good for his system, and took the whole box of pills.

HAPPENED IN GERMANY

That's what happened in Germany when the mark became so worthless since the war; that's what happened with the Confederate dollar, long before it was apparent that the Confederacy would fail; it was founded on nothing of value.

That was the trouble with the Continental money after the American Revolution, when so much of it was issued that it grew so cheap in comparison with the value of property and necessities of life, that it required $250,000 of it to buy the supper for four men and nearly as much to buy a pair of boots.

The paper money was termed the "Continental damn", and it was so worthless that until this day if you want to express the utter worthlessness of anything, you can do so by saying: "It is not worth a Continental damn."

Its disturbance of business and wreck of enterprise caused a group of merchants and other intelligent citizens to meet at Annapolis prior to the adoption of the present Constitution.

TO MAKE MONEY

They soon learned what ought to be done and could be done, but were prevailed upon by a lawyer, who knew that the wisest method would be to get some constituted authority before any measure should be proposed; and they merely asked the Continental Congress to authorize the Thirteen States, or Colonies, to send delegates to a convention to revise the Articles of Confederation, which was but the written Constitution of that Government.

The Continental Congress did so, and the result was the present United States Constitution. And that Convention thought they had planned whereby the mistake of finance could not be repeated by providing in our Constitution that "Congress shall have power to stamp money"—no; "to print money"—no; "to make money."

No; the Constitution didn't say either, because the makers of the Constitution knew that you couldn't make property by law, and that the only way to make property was a combination of labor, management, and creative nature cooperating.

What the Constitution said is this: "Congress shall have power to coin money and regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin."

"Coin" has a specific meaning and implies metal. What metal? Another clause of the Constitution states what metal, providing "no State shall make anything in payment of debts except gold and silver."

That is the Constitution, and that meaning was not to coin one and speculate in the other by purchase.

PACKED WITH POLITICIANS

Moreover, the Constitution was made in view of the then existing banking system, which were the Scotch banks, that could issue bank currency redeemable on demand in coin and backed by something of value, and, not as now, based upon public or private debts. But, alas, when the Supreme Court of the United States (the only time) was packed with politicians, between 1865 and '70, the decisions on this question for 75 years were overturned, and that has given us financial trouble ever since.

As stated before, a reasonable inflation of money, which merely means the lowering of the value so that it would be of the same value when a debtor went to pay as when the debt was made, is wholesome and just. But to go beyond that means wrack and ruin to business, to private enterprise, particularly to the laboring man and those holding salaried positions and to those who have invested their life savings to give them something in their old age.

WRACK AND RUIN

To all these it means wrack and ruin and a cost of living beyond their capacity to pay. And later, as in the case of Germany, which tried the experiment after the World War, found that they must needs return to a sounder principle of finance, and in doing so brought trouble upon themselves. That would be our experience did we attempt to embark upon the principle, for any purpose, of printing money to meet the situation.

We may coin money, because the coin is limited by nature, but we cannot print money, because there is no limit to the amount of paper or of the capacity of the printing press; and it would wreck all hope of prosperity as well as that little that now exists.

GROW CHEAP

The money would grow so cheap that it would start a speculation, because men would buy anything, even a dog, to get rid of it.

So, in government, the only safe way to do anything or to work any reform requiring money is to obtain that money by taxation; and to have such taxes for the purpose the Government must needs be operated on the lowest possible expense, consistent with justice and efficiency.

And here I wish to state that no one denies or ought to deny that the aged and the needy should be cared for; and it's the duty of the Government to aid the people to aid themselves and not become the manager of the people's business or mamma and papa to them.

Permit me to say in black letters:

The greatest danger to the prosperity of any country is to "monkey" with the solvency or stability of its money and currency. To increase the value of money when pay day of a debtor arrives, above its value when the debt was made, is unjust and means confiscation; and it is equally unjust and confiscatory when the value of that money is made cheaper on pay day than when the debt was created.

RECOVERY UNDER THE NEW DEAL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial and a table accompanying it from the Capital Times, of Madison, Wis., of Friday afternoon, January 24, 1936.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Capital Times, Madison, Wis., of Jan. 24, 1936]

FACTS FOR THE FAKERS

If you have that congested feeling that comes from a mental diet too rich in canned Hoover and devitaminized Hearst, we suggest that you try, for a change, the table printed in the adjoining columns as a sure-fire antidote.

The treatment will clear your system, no matter how many forced feedings of elephant (G. O. P. and Liberty League) "baloney" you may have unwittingly found yourself forced to undergo.

To complete the cure, we suggest that you cut the table out, paste it in your hat, or fold it and slip it gently into your lower right-hand vest pocket.

Whenever some interested gentleman with an armful of axes to grind tells you how much better it was under Hoover and how much the New Deal has hurt you, flip out the clipping and wave it briskly in his face.

With a little practice you ought to be able to stop his flow of invective before he can finish saying "balance the Budget" or "tax eating."

The Capital Times is indebted to the New York Post for the figures and are assured by that newspaper that it vouches for the accuracy of every figure in the adjoining table comparing the New Deal and the Old Deal. The table was prepared with the aid of expert statisticians.

No one is claiming that the Roosevelt administration is a 100-percent, flawless success, but when these old dealers come hawking their wares and tell of the promised glories of a new old deal under Hoover, Landon, Knox, or another of the pack, this interesting array of facts provides an answer that can't be beat.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

The Senate resumed consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, when the Senate was last in session, an amendment to the bill having been agreed to by the Senate by an overwhelming vote, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] moved to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the bill. At that time I suggested to him that the Senate might desire to proceed with the bill, it might desire to reconsider its action on the amendment, or it might desire to recommit the bill.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. At the last session of the Senate, when this bill was under consideration, and the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma was pending, I sought an opportunity to move that the measure be recommitted. The motion was declared out of order at that time; but since the Senator from Oklahoma has withdrawn the motion which was then pending, I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. LOGAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Company of America, Incorporated, A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the amount inserted by the Senate, insert the following: "$900,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

M. M. LOGAN,
WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
AMBROSE J. KENNEDY,
ROBERT RAMSPECK,
WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LOGAN. I move the immediate consideration and adoption of the report.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky indicate the difference between the two bills?

Mr. LOGAN. The House passed a bill allowing the sum of $968,000. The Senate adopted an amendment cutting the amount down to something less than $700,000. In the conference it was discovered that in making the calculation of deductions the Senate had made an error of something like $200,000, which I am frank to admit. The $68,000 was cut off, and the conferees agreed that $900,000 was as near as we could get to the correct amount which should be allowed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, the Chair lays before the Senate the special order, being Senate bill 3398.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3398) to establish the Air Corps Technical School, and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps, which had been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs without amendment.

Mr. COSTIGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. In order that the entire subject matter may be considered, I desire to say that during the last session of Congress I gave notice that I would offer an amendment to the bill for the Air Corps Technical School. I should like now to have unanimous consent out of order to offer the amendment, so that it may be considered with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be received.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish in or near Denver, Colo., the Air Corps Technical School and to accept on behalf of the United States, free from encumbrance or conditions and without cost to the United States, for use as a site for the Air Corps Technical School, the title in fee simple to 640 acres of land, more or less, within the city limits of the city of Denver, Colo., including the property known as the Agnes (Phipps) Memorial Sanitarium, together with existing buildings and equipment located thereon; and also, a tract of land within the State of Colorado, suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps: Provided, That in the event a donor is unable to perfect title to any land tendered as a donation, condemnation of such land is authorized in the name of the United States, and payment of any and all awards for title to such land as is condemned, together with the cost of suit, shall be made by the donor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to use whatever appropriations are available to repair, improve, and equip the present Air Corps Technical School located at Rantoul, Ill., to render it adequate to provide the necessary training. This direction to include the construction of permanent buildings and quarters for officers and enlisted men and the necessary equipment to carry on such training.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the bill read at the desk is of importance to the country as a whole. The bill was favorably reported, without amendment, by the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. The chairman of that committee, the distinguished Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], has indicated his willingness to make a statement at this time on the pending measure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, legislation providing for the removal of the Air Corps Technical School from its present location at Rantoul, Ill., is the outgrowth of extensive and prolonged study and investigation by the War Department.

The Secretary of War, in communicating with the Senate Military Affairs Committee on March 13, 1935, stated in part that in order to obtain an intelligent estimate of the factors involved he had appointed a board of Air Corps officers and directed them to make a comprehensive survey of all localities involved. After personally investigating some 86 different sites in all sections of the United States, this board came to the conclusion that the present location at Rantoul, Ill., was unsuitable as a location for the Air Corps Technical School, and that the best location for the school it could find, after investigating these 86 sites, was Denver, Colo.

After receiving the extensive report of the board of Air Corps officers, a subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee, of which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] was chairman, gave the matter further study. Hearings were held on two different occasions. Representatives of interested parties were notified of these hearings. War Department representatives and several members of the board of officers were present for questioning by any who were not satisfied with the board's findings.

Following these hearings, the testimony obtained, the board's report, and the subcommittee's report were carefully considered by the Military Affairs Committee. It is readily seen, therefore, that this matter has not been undertaken in haste, but that on the contrary it has been approached through deliberation and a careful weighing and analysis of all the factors involved.

The War Department was called upon to submit legislation embodying the recommendations of its board. This proposed legislation was received from the War Department, and was given to the Senators from Colorado for introduction, inasmuch as the proposed location of the school is in their State. The Senators from Colorado did not initiate this move. In reporting favorably Senate bill 3398 to the Senate on August 12, 1935, your committee pointed out that the subcommittee had found nothing to impeach the findings of the board of Air Corps officers, and that the subcommittee's report had been adopted by the committee.

The bill under consideration authorizes the Secretary of War to establish in or near Denver, Colo., the Air Corps Technical School, and to accept on behalf of the United States, free from encumbrance or conditions, and without cost to the United States, for use as a site for the school, the title to some 640 acres of land, more or less, within the city of Denver. The bill further authorizes the Secretary of War to accept a tract of land within the State of Colorado suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps. The measure carries a proviso that in the event a donor shall be unable to perfect title to any land tendered as a donation, condemnation of such land is authorized in the name of the United States, and payment of any and all awards for title to such land as may be condemned, together with the cost of suit, shall be made by the donor.

In summarizing its reasons for concluding that Denver is suitable as a location for the Air Corps Technical School, the Board listed these features:

First. Large, modern city.

Second. Good site, which will be presented to the Government, together with several valuable buildings.

Third. Excellent climate and recreational facilities.

Fourth. Good location for training in altitude flying.

Fifth. Good strategical location.

In its findings on the present location the Board pointed out that there is no bombing and machine-gun range in connection with the present site at Rantoul, and that the expense of securing one within a reasonable distance of Rantoul is prohibitive. In its findings on Denver the Board pointed out that it was stated an extensive area could be acquired for a nominal sum within a few miles from the proposed site of the school. Such a range is essential to the proper operation of an institution of this character. The Board further found climatic features of the present location to be unsuitable for the training to which the school is devoted.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs, after careful consideration, came to the conclusion that the recommendation of the Board of Officers should be carried out, and reported the bill favorably to the Senate.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, following the remarks of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the report of the Committee on Military Affairs with respect to the pending bill may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the report was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3398) to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

On March 13, 1935, the War Department transmitted to the Senate Military Affairs Committee report of a board of Air Corps officers recommending that certain property in Denver, Colo., be acquired by the War Department and that the Air Corps Technical School be located thereon. The board concludes that Chanute Field, Rantoul, Ill., is unsuitable as a location for the Air Corps Technical School, and that the best location which it has been able to find is at Denver, Colo.

Following receipt of this report of the board of Air Corps officers a subcommittee of your committee took the matter under consideration and held hearings. The subcommittee reported that it found nothing that would impeach the findings of this board of officers. The subcommittee's report was adopted by your committee, and it was directed by the committee that the War Department be notified of this action. Under date of August 7, 1935, the War Department submitted draft of S. 3398, along with the following letter:

AUGUST 7, 1935.

Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR SHEPPARD: In accordance with your letter of May 24, 1935, there is transmitted herewith a draft of bill to consummate the report of the board of Air Corps officers on the location of the Air Corps technical school.

There is no existing law permitting the acceptance by the United States of a donation of land for the purpose for which this property is to be used.

This bill, if enacted into law, would enable the War Department to secure a suitable site, without cost, for the eventual establishment of long-needed Air Corps Technical School facilities.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE H. DERN,
Secretary of War.

S. 3398 provides that the Secretary of War is authorized to establish in or near Denver, Colo., the Air Corps Technical School. It further authorizes him to accept on behalf of the United States, free from encumbrance or conditions and without cost to the United States, for use as a site for the Air Corps Technical School, the title in fee simple to 650 acres of land, more or less, within the city limits of the city of Denver, Colo., including the property known as the Agnes (Phipps) Memorial Sanitarium, together with existing buildings and equipment located thereon. The bill also authorizes the Secretary of War to accept a tract of land within the State of Colorado, suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps. The measure carries a proviso that in the event a donor is unable to perfect title to any land tendered as a donation condemnation of such land is authorized in the name of the United States, and payment of any and all awards for title to such land as is condemned, together with the cost of suit, shall be made by the donor.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado a question, if I may. The Senator is familiar with the Wilcox bill which was passed last year, introduced into the House by Representative WILCOX, of Florida, and which I had the honor to introduce in the Senate. That bill provides for the establishment of air bases throughout the United States, and leaves with the War Department, or the War Department's experts, the selection of these bases. I wish to ask whether the pending bill in any way will interfere with the free selection of those bases on the part of the War Department's experts? Will it cause or tend to cause the War Department to look more kindly toward Denver, for example, for one of the bases which must be set up in the Rocky Mountain area? Is there any connection between the two bills?

Mr. COSTIGAN. So far as I am informed, the answer to the Senator from Utah is unequivocally in the negative. However, since the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs is in the Chamber, it would appear advisable, for the sake of the legislative record, that the same inquiry be addressed to him, if he is willing to respond.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I shall state that there is no connection between the two measures, and that the selection of Denver as a site for the school will have no bearing on the selection of an air base, in my judgment.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I should like merely to say that that was the understanding which I had when we considered the two bills in the Committee on Military Affairs, and, as the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] has said, there is no reason for a connection between the two.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps the attention of the Senator from Utah should be redirected to the provision in the Wilcox bill carrying a general designation of consideration of some possible base in the intermountain region or Rocky Mountain area. I think I correctly quote language with reference to one possible Air Corps base. In referring to that it should be said that the answers already made to the Senator from Utah have been made in the light of that language and remain the same.

Mr. President, the bill before the Senate is one with reference to which the sponsors of the measure, my able colleague from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] and myself, have been treated with exceptional courtesy. It should be and is acknowledged. The measure was reported to the Senate last August, and because of the crowded condition of the calendar of the Senate at that time, following a generous suggestion by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], assented to by the leader of the Democratic side of the Chamber, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the measure was set down, by unanimous consent, for consideration on the third day of the present session.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator will not omit the opposition of both Senators from Illinois.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The Senator from Illinois, I believe, suggests that there was no dissent from that agreement on the part of the Senators from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. But opposition to the measure.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Of course; but as is shown by the unanimous-consent agreement, there was no expressed opposition from any source to setting down the measure for the third day of the session. Since that time the measure, by further unanimous consent, has been kept before the Senate in a preferred position. This gives the measure first place at this time.

Acknowledgment should also be made to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. SHEPPARD] for his valued statement today. One clear inference from that statement is that this is a measure not merely of importance to the State of Colorado but of primary importance to the efficient development of the Air Corps of the War Department of the United States.

An investigation of the record will disclose that the conclusion thus drawn from the statement of the Senator from Texas is amply confirmed. The remarks of the able chairman of the Military Affairs Committee derive added value from the circumstance that the technical committee of the Air Corps, which, unanimously, after extended investigation, reported in favor of the selection of Denver as a site for Air Corps Technical School purposes, selected some six cities, including two in the Senator's State, as possible sites suitable for the purposes of such a school, but awarded priority, for reasons summarized, to Denver.

As already indicated by the Senator from Texas, sponsorship of the pending measure became an official responsibility of the Senators from Colorado because of the location thus recommended. It was not due to any initiation of the investigation or other efforts on their part to advance, except by routine official communications, consideration of the merits of the city of Denver.

Mr. President, without unduly emphasizing the grave national intimations with respect to actual warfare abroad given by the President in his opening address to the Congress, it must now be apparent to all interested Members of the Senate and House of Representatives that new national reasons not known last summer when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into may now be urged for action on the pending bill as promptly as is reasonably possible.

The bill is designed to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado to be used for a site for that school and for an aerial bombing and gunnery range for the Air Corps. It is stated in the letter of Secretary Dern to the Military Affairs Committee, which appears in the report on the bill, that—

> There is no existing law permitting the acceptance by the United States of a donation of land for the purpose for which this property is to be used.

The bill now before the Senate is designed to authorize such an acceptance in accordance with the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs. It has become necessary to enact some such law if the report is to be given effect and if the War Department is to be put in a position to secure without cost a suitable site at Denver, as strongly recommended by the War Department, for the eventual establishment of long-needed Air Corps Technical School facilities.

It may be added in further preliminary explanation of the exact text of the bill under consideration that on May 21, 1935, by a vote of 39,395 to 15,085, the tax-paying electors of Denver, at a duly held election at which this was among the submitted questions, authorized and approved the issuance of $750,000 par value of municipal bonds to enable the city of Denver to secure and donate without cost to the United States title in fee simple to some 640 acres of land within the city limits, including the property known as the Agnes Phipps Memorial Sanitarium, together with existing buildings, equipment, and railroad spur connections, all located on this land, and also a tract of land within the State of Colorado 10 miles square, in other words, a hundred square miles, suitable for use as an aerial bombing and gunnery range by the Army Air Corps. It should be added that the special election at which these bonds were voted was held following publication of the recommendations in the report of the committee of officers of the Air Corps, and the references of that report to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs.

In the hearings on the bill no question was raised with respect to the readiness of Denver, or the legality of the steps taken by it, to comply with the necessary conditions precedent for the acceptance of the proposal by the War Department and for compliance with the conditions expressed in the pending measure.

As already stated, the bill is the legislative result of the report transmitted to the Senate Military Affairs Committee on March 13, 1935, by a technically equipped and impartial board of Air Corps officers recommending such action, for the reason that Chanute Field at Rantoul, Ill., is deemed unsuitable as a location and that the best location the board has been able to find, after extended and exhausted personal inspection and corroborative inquiries in many parts of the United States, is at Denver.

That report, which contains detailed comparative findings, was prepared by four Army Air Corps officers, Lieutenant Colonel Yount, Lieutenant Colonel Dargue, Major Lyon, and Captain Trunk, the last named a member of the board without a vote. The board, by direction of the Secretary of War, was appointed in February 1934 by the Chief of the Air Corps School to make a thorough study of the location of that school as one of the Air Corps' most important activities.

At the subcommittee hearing on that report it was developed by members of the Senate Military Affairs Committee that members of the technical War Department committee, after their appointment for that service almost 2 years ago, personally inspected some 57 different localities in many parts of the United States, and examined reports on many additional localities before making its carefully considered recommendation in favor of Denver.

When the report by the War Department, which was painstakingly considered and checked for some months after it was received by the War Department, was brought to the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate in March 1935, a subcommittee of three able members of the Military Affairs Committee—the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]—was assigned the task of holding hearings on the report. At those hearings the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON] usually presided, and he and other members of the subcommittee carefully interrogated witnesses. Hearings were held before the subcommittee on June 24, July 10, and July 25, 1935, following which the subcommittee unanimously reported to the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in favor of the findings of the board of Air Corps officers, and the Military Affairs Committee as a whole later favorably reported the pending measure to the Senate.

The bill submitted to the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee by Secretary of War Dern is the one now before the Senate.

At the hearings of the Senate subcommittee objections to the report were raised by Representative DOBBINS, of Illinois, who represents the congressional district in that State in which during the World War Chanute Field, near Rantoul, Ill., was established to give the type of training now planned to be given under more favorable and up-to-date conditions at Denver through the authorized establishment there of the Air Corps Technical School. In addition to Representative DOBBINS, the resourceful Senators from Illinois urged an unfavorable in lieu of the present favorable report from the Senate Military Affairs Committee. These colleagues in both Houses of the Congress expressed dissent from the proposal to transfer this important technical Air Corps training school from the State of Illinois to the State of Colorado.

Representative DOBBINS in particular assailed the report at length because of his faith in the merits of Chanute Field, his conviction that it had been, in effect, unfairly and discriminatingly treated by the War Department in its report, and because the comparative advantages thus found of conditions in Denver for the future location of the school were deemed by him to be exaggerated and in part due to prejudice against Chanute Field and to what he contended were special inducements held out by Denver to persuade the War Department to make its recommendations.

The Senate subcommittee which heard the testimony last summer unanimously reported in favor of the official findings and the Senate Military Affairs Committee, as already appears, supported the conclusion that there was shown—I quote the words of the report—

> Nothing that would impeach the findings of this board of officers.

In consequence, on August 12, 1935, the distinguished chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. SHEPPARD] submitted the report of the full committee to the Senate. It was ordered printed, is before the Senate, and includes a favorable submission by Secretary of War Dern of the bill now before the Senate, sponsored, as already stated, by the Senators from Colorado. The Senate Military Affairs Committee in its report recommends that the pending bill be passed without amendment.

Mr. President, attention should now doubtless be first called to the comparative conclusions and summaries of the board of Air Corps officers, referred to by the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee in his preliminary statement, reciting known unsatisfactory conditions for important technical training at Rantoul, and present and the contrasted advantages of Denver, the proposed site of the school.

The Rantoul summary and conclusions are printed in part I at pages 35 and 36 of the hearings of the subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

I read, beginning on page 35 of the first part, or pamphlet, of the printed hearings, the following:

IX. SUMMARY

Chanute Field is the present home of the Air Corps Technical School. The field is a mile square, with good soil suitable for heavy foundations but with rather poor drainage due to the very flat character of the country all about. Much additional expense would be necessary to drain this field properly. The natural surroundings are excellent, the terrain is generally very level, there are few obstacles to flight, and there is plenty of room to the south and east for the expansion of the field if necessary. There is no bombing and machine-gun range and the expense of securing one within a reasonable distance is prohibitive. The field is now owned by the Government.

The climate in this section is very poor for the operations of the Air Corps Technical School. The reduced visibility, due to dense and light fog and haze, and to rain and snow, interferes a great deal, particularly in the execution of photographic machines. The unsatisfactory climatic conditions were commented upon in all departments of the school. Chanute Field is in a section where there are great extremes of temperature both winter and summer, the thermometer recording temperatures in the winter well below zero, with an average of 38 days continuously below freezing, and in the summer going many times to over 100, with 60 days having temperatures over 90. The humidity is high, making the cold weather very penetrating and the hot days of the summer very uncomfortable. Many days are lost as far as flying operations are concerned, and it is seldom the school year comes to an end without the omission of some of the scheduled flying missions.

Morale at Chanute Field is exceedingly low, and many of the conditions creating this situation would remain even though the fine new construction of a permanent school were placed at this location. While the low morale may in small part be due to the very dilapidated condition of the buildings on the field, other conditions in this vicinity over which the War Department has no control are believed far more responsible. Living conditions are unsatisfactory; recreational facilities are lacking; there is little exchange of civic and social courtesies with the people in the neighboring towns, the interest of these towns, and particularly of Rantoul, is primarily for their own economic purposes. The location is isolated in the great open prairie land of Illinois. Rantoul is too small a town to properly absorb an institution approximately equal in population to its own size. It is obvious many of these conditions will not change and will always be adverse to good morale.

The transportation facilities at Rantoul are very limited, other towns and cities are too far away to be readily accessible; health suffers somewhat on account of the temperature, climate, and rapid changes of weather; schools are good but limited.

The water is exceedingly hard and a source of great annoyance both in the home and in the conduct of some of the work in the course. Electricity service is very poor and it cannot be wholly depended upon for precision work in the school; other fuels except hard coal are available at fairly reasonable prices.

The geographical location of Chanute Field is good in relation to other Air Corps stations, recruiting areas, and supply points. It is also a good strategical location for a school.

The conclusions of the War Department's official board, printed immediately following the foregoing detailed references to Rantoul, are as follows:

Chanute Field, Rantoul, is considered unsuitable as a location for the Air Corps Technical School. The following principal reasons taken together lead to this conclusion:

(a) Rantoul is too small to properly absorb an institution of this kind which has almost as large a population as the town itself.

(b) A poor climate that interferes seriously with the conduct of flying operations in the course of instruction at the school.

(c) Very poor morale conditions which are in great part not subject to change.

(d) Relatively poor transportation facilities.

(e) Utilities not entirely satisfactory.

In contrast to this summary—which is read, not as testified to from the personal knowledge of the Senate sponsors of the measure but as part of the official findings recorded in the committee hearings—there should also be mentioned the corresponding findings of that committee with respect to Denver. Perhaps the following conclusions, at the end of the detailed discussion of conditions in Denver, printed on pages 40 and 41 of part 1 of the hearings of the subcomittee, should be here read:

Denver is a fine city of 300,000 inhabitants, which the board is certain would take a great interest in the school and would cooperate fully in its support. The type of citizenry is exceptionally high, with the percentage of American-born considerably above average.

Every type of cultural advantage is at hand and readily available.

Recreational facilities are exceptional due to the progressive attitude of the city and to its close proximity to the Rocky Mountains.

The site proposed is excellent and sufficiently close to the city to afford the personnel all of its advantages.

The climate affords all changes of season, and while it has its cold periods in winter it should not interfere materially with flying operations. The summer climate is good. The altitude has its advantages and its disadvantages as stated in paragraph VI 4. It is thought that the advantages outweigh the disadvantages. There is practically no fog or haze and normal visibility is very great due to the high altitude.

Denver is not particularly well located with respect to other Air Corps stations. It is 700 miles from the present center of Air Corps population.

Denver has a very low annual rainfall. This is compensated for by an adequate water supply which is furnished at a reasonable rate and which makes irrigation inexpensive. The soil is fertile when irrigated.

The cost of living, including foodstuffs, servants, and rentals, is average. Building materials and labor are average.

Schools and religious facilities are considerably above average. In fact, they appear to be superior.

All utilities are available and reasonable in cost.

Rail transportation facilities are excellent. Switching facilities to the site would be furnished by the city.

Communications are on a par with other cities of the same size.

Denver has every attribute to make it popular with the commissioned, enlisted, and civilian personnel pertaining to the school.

Paragraph VI, 4, referred to in the summary just quoted from the printed hearings, is also printed on page 40 of those hearings, preceding the summary.

The board's conclusions with respect to Denver to be compared with those with respect to Rantoul are as follows (hearings, p. 41):

Denver is considered suitable as a location for the Air Corps Technical School for the following reasons, which, taken together, lead to this conclusion:

(a) Fine, large, modern city.

(b) Good site which will be presented to the Government, together with several valuable buildings.

(c) Excellent climate and recreational facilities.

(d) Good location for training in altitude flying.

(e) Good strategical location.

Senators here will have noticed the reported absence at Rantoul and existence at Denver of an available adequate bombing and aerial gunnery site. There was no offer for Rantoul of such a site; but the record sets out the offer and availability of such a site at Denver, its personal inspection by Captain Brophy, and a report thereon by him to The Adjutant General in Washington. That report will be found at the end of the second part of the printed hearings before the Senate subcommittee, accompanying its report to the Senate. It is at page 42, and I ask that it may be here incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

OFFICE OF THE AIR CORPS INSTRUCTORS,
COLORADO NATIONAL GUARD, LOWRY FIELD,
Denver, Colo., December 29, 1934.

To: The Adjutant General, Washington, D. C.

1. The following information anent bombing and gunnery range for proposed Air Corps Technical School, Denver, Colo., is hereby submitted:

(a) Description of range:

(1) Size, 10 by 10 miles.

(2) Location, approximately 12 miles east by southeast of proposed site of school; 19 miles from city of Denver.
(3) Terrain, slightly rolling prairie land.
(4) Approach to range, no obstructions.
(5) Emergency landing fields, at least four available on range.
(6) Approach from school, several lanes over uninhabited area, with good emergency fields.
(b) Terms.
The terms upon which bombing and gunnery site can be obtained cannot be stated at this time. I have contacted the chamber of commerce of the city of Denver, and they advise me that they will immediately take the matter under consideration and notify me as soon as possible what they will do toward providing this land to the Government. Because of their action with regard to the present site of Fitzsimons General Hospital and their proposed tender of land for the location of the Air Corps Technical School, it is my belief that the city of Denver will provide the gunnery and bombing range without expense to the Federal Government. The chamber of commerce reply anent the subject of terms relative to gunnery and bombing range will be forwarded immediately upon its receipt.
2. After both an aerial and a ground survey of the proposed gunnery and bombing range I am convinced that same is adequate and provides all requirements for its purpose.

NORMAN D. BROPHY,
Captain, Air Corps,
Instructor, Forty-fifth Division Aviation,
Colorado National Guard.

Mr. COSTIGAN. So significant, according to the testimony, is a proper bombing and aerial gunnery site, and so serious is its continuing unavailability at Rantoul, that it can hardly be too emphatically stressed. The facts are laden with enormous potential consequences. And there is no dispute about the facts.

Answering a question on this subject propounded by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], Colonel Yount, when testifying before the subcommittee, discussed its importance for the Air Corps Technical School. Indeed, his statement on the nature of any instruction given by the school, for fuller understanding of the pending measure, doubtless ought to be detailed at this point in my remarks. I read from page 52 of the second part of the published hearings:

Senator MINTON. What do they do at these schools?

Referring to the Air Corps Technical Schools.

Colonel YOUNT. The exact curricula for this school is the training of officers and enlisted men in care of, operation, maintenance, and repair of Air Corps equipment. It is not a flying school, excepting that there is considerable flying which is incident to the curriculum and the testing of the equipment.
The exact courses which are taught there for officers are aircraft engineering, both airplanes and engines; armament; communications, principally radio; photography; special maintenance engineering; and certain other courses for officers of the National Guard.
For enlisted men the courses are airplane mechanics; aircraft armaments, which have to do with the question of machine guns and bomb racks and releases; and aircraft welders; and sheet-metal workers; parachute riggers; photographic and radio mechanics; and supply and technical clerks.
Senator MINTON. What is the personnel of the field?
Colonel YOUNT. For the next year—it has been very depleted during the past year, due to the very dilapidated condition of the buildings—the next year they have planned to train about 600 students. Of these, 250 will be especially enlisted out of the extra enlisted personnel recently authorized by Congress, and about 350 especially selected men sent from other Air Corps stations.
When the field was built, I believe it called for 86 officers and around 1,000 enlisted men.

Then, referring more particularly to the precise activities of the institution:

This school is considered one of our most important schools, and one for which we have a crying need at the present time. The question of technique is becoming so important, the question of training and having trained officers and enlisted men on every field who are thoroughly familiar with this equipment, is of the highest importance.
In fact—

And there is no more important statement in the report than this:

In fact—

Said Colonel Yount—

it involves the lives of men, and so the War Department naturally is very anxious that this matter should be settled so that we can go ahead wherever the school may be located and carry out this course of instruction which we consider to be one of our most important.

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] at this point in the testimony propounded, and the witness answered, another question:

What particular part of that curriculum is affected by the location of the school?
Colonel YOUNT. The particular parts of the curriculum which we feel are affected by the location of the field are the courses in photography and the course in armaments.
Of course, in photography, as given at the present time, at Chanute Field, there is considerable lacking, due to the fact that we have a great deal of foggy, hazy, rainy weather, when it has been impossible to carry out the curriculum.
As far as the flying is concerned, in practically all of these courses, we have a very through theoretical course, in classrooms and in the laboratories, and this classroom and laboratory work is followed by practical demonstrations in the air.
Of course, photography can't be more than half taught on the ground. The men must be taken into the air to teach them the use of the apparatus. As far as our armament is concerned, we feel that the greatest thing which is lacking at Chanute Field is a possibility of a bombing field and a machine-gun range. Up to the present time, the course of instruction has been purely theoretical, and men have been taught how to build or put together the various pieces of armament appartaus, machine guns, sights, etc., on the ground, but they have not had an opportunity to take that apparatus into the air and actually test it under service conditions.

I trust that Senators who are listening realize the import of this particular statement of Colonel Yount, a technically qualified expert on Air Corps problems. One of the reasons, he asserts, calling imperatively for the removal of this school from its present site to a more favorable location, is that under present conditions this important branch of the school's activities, involving the lives of men, is on a theoretical basis due to the lack of a bombing and gunnery field such as has been offered voluntarily to meet the needs of this school by the city of Denver, by vote of the taxpayers, and without cost to the Federal Government.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. It is proposed in the Senator's bill to permit the Government to accept a grant of 640 acres of land. Is that correct?

Mr. COSTIGAN. That is part of the proposal.

Mr. DIETERICH. Are any further areas of land offered by the city of Denver so far as the Senator's bill is concerned?

Mr. COSTIGAN. On lines 3 and 4, page 2, the Senator from Illinois will find this description, in part, of what the War Department is authorized to accept from the city of Denver:

Also, a tract of land within the State of Colorado, suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps.

Mr. DIETERICH. But that has nothing to do with the donation that is offered by the city of Denver through its chamber of commerce, has it? Furthermore, that is not a definite location. Am I correct on that point?

Mr. COSTIGAN. A definite location is reported upon, as already indicated to the Senator from Illinois, as inspected and, so far as the personal inspection permitted, approved by Norman D. Brophy, captain of the Air Corps, under date of December 29, 1934, in a letter addressed to The Adjutant General. As already stated, I may say to the Senator from Illinois, the letter will be found on page 42 of the printed hearings.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator any further, but I wish to be clear on that point. At present the Government owns a 640-acre tract at Rantoul, upon which its present equipment is located. The bill authorizes the Government to accept a similar tract in or near Denver. So far as the bombing range is concerned, it is as indefinite in Colorado as it is in Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the testimony of the witness, Colonel Yount, when referring to the prospects of both flying and bombing, is based upon technical conceptions only.

There has been no real attempt at flying in the field at Rantoul. He merely draws a deduction as to the prospect of what might follow from what he assumes are the conditions around him. May I not ask whether it is not equally true as to Colorado that no attempt has been actually put afoot to try the matter out? It is a mere technical conception on the part of this officer, his judgment as to how one locality might operate as against another, but is not based upon actual experience.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] refers at this moment to actual bombing operations in Illinois and in Colorado, what he says is obviously true; but if an intimation is attempted to be given to the Senate that there is some doubt about the unavailability of the field at Rantoul or the availability of a suitable site at Denver, the record clearly does not sustain that intimation.

Moreover, as already stated, we have the affirmative testimony of a highly qualified expert, Colonel Yount, as to the importance of such a site. We have, in addition, the admission in the record of the absence of such a site made by Representative DOBBINS in the hearings before the committee on June 24. I read from page 14 of the printed hearings, beginning with a question by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]:

Senator MINTON. Well, there was some question or comment about a bombing field. You didn't touch on that.

The statement was addressed to Representative DOBBINS who was appearing at that time before the committee in opposition to the report. The printed record proceeds:

Congressman DOBBINS. Yes. A bombing field would be available, I think, at Denver, at an expense that would be a very great advantage over the cost of any bombing field that could be provided in the vicinity of Rantoul. In fact, the cost would be prohibitive in getting a 10-square-mile area in Rantoul. It would cost between five and ten million dollars to clear off and take the habitations away from an area of land 10 miles square in the vicinity of Rantoul, and I think it would be prohibitive.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. But there was no location of an aerial bombing field inspected by this board of Army Air Corps officers in Colorado.

Mr. COSTIGAN. A representative of the board, as already stated, inspected an area and reported in favor of it.

Mr. DIETERICH. That is not described in the bill, is it?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There is no description of a particular tract of land. There is, however, a very definite authorization to the Secretary of War by the terms of the measure to accept 640 acres of land, more or less, within the city limits of Denver, together with existing buildings and equipment, also a tract of land within the State of Colorado suitable for use as an aerial gunnery and bombing range by the Army Air Corps.

Perhaps, in view of the questions raised by the Senators from Illinois, a reference to the language used by Captain Brophy should be made more definite by reading at least a portion of it. The entire statement will be found printed at page 42 of the hearings, and by unanimous consent has already been ordered printed in the RECORD of my remarks.

Under date of December 29, 1934, to repeat, Captain Brophy wrote as follows to The Adjutant General:

1. The following information anent bombing and gunnery range for proposed Air Corps Technical School, Denver, Colo., is hereby submitted:

(a) Description of range:

(1) Size, 10 miles by 10 miles.

(2) Location, approximately 12 miles east by southeast of proposed site of school; 19 miles from city of Denver.

(3) Terrain, slightly rolling prairie land.

(4) Approach to range; no obstructions.

(5) Emergency landing fields; at least four available on range.

(6) Approach from school; several lanes over uninhabited area, with good emergency fields.

(b) Terms.

The terms upon which bombing and gunnery site can be obtained cannot be stated at this time. I have contacted the chamber of commerce of the city of Denver, and they advise me that they will immediately take the matter under consideration and notify me as soon as possible what they will do toward providing this land to the Government. Because of their action with regard to the present site of Fitzsimons General Hospital and their proposed tender of land for the location of the Air Corps Technical School, it is my belief that the city of Denver will provide the gunnery and bombing range without expense to the Federal Government. The chamber of commerce reply anent the subject of terms relative to gunnery and bombing range will be forwarded immediately upon its receipt.

2. After both an aerial and a ground survey of the proposed gunnery and bombing range I am convinced that same is adequate and provides all requirements for its purpose.

This report should be supplemented by further reference to the vote of the taxpayers of Denver on May 21, 1935. The question was submitted to the taxpaying electors in the following words:

Shall the city council of the city and county of Denver issue negotiable interest-bearing bonds of the city and county of Denver, in the sum of $750,000, for the purpose of acquiring or contributing to the acquiring of such lands, buildings, and building sites and railway trackage as may be necessary and selected by the War Department of the United States for the location of its proposed Army Air Corps Technical Training School and its proposed bombing field, or either of them, should both not be located in or near the city and county of Denver, as as is in the judgment of the mayor and his cabinet and the city council may be deemed necessary in cooperation with the Federal authorities, such bonds to be issued and sold only when and as the Federal Government shall comply with its agreed part of the undertaking, hereinbefore described, and such bonds to bear interest at a rate not to exceed 4 percent per annum payable semiannually to mature as follows.

There follows a specification of five different groups of bonds, which I shall ask to have incorporated in the RECORD at this point without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1947	$75,000
1948	75,000
1949	75,000
1950	75,000
1951	75,000
1952	75,000
1953	75,000
1954	75,000
1955	75,000
1956	75,000

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. Some of the lands to be acquired are located within the corporate limits of the city of Denver. The aerial bombing tract may not be located within the corporate limits of the city of Denver. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the question I am propounding. Does he, as an eminent attorney from Colorado familiar with its laws, consider that this is a proper municipal purpose for which to bind the taxpayers, in order to raise this fund for the city of Denver, and has there ever been a test of whether or not they could do that? Has there been any similar case which would indicate that it was within their corporate power to levy a tax upon the property of the city of Denver for the purpose of giving it to the Federal Government for some air activity?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The city and county of Denver, so called by virtue of its exceptional and self-governing municipal organization, authorized by an amendment to the Colorado constitution some years ago, purchased and has long controlled with similar authority various tracts of land some miles from Denver known as the Denver Mountain Parks. Very large powers have been given to Denver, and it is my judgment—confirmed, I think, by the judgment of attorneys who have inquired into the authority for such action in passing on the validity of bonds—that there is no valid legal or constitutional objection to the particular bonds authorized by vote of the taxpaying electors at the election in May 1935, to which reference has been made.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me for an inquiry?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I gather from the interrogatory of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] that his only concern in the matter is lest the city of Denver should be unable to provide the site for the bombing field. Other than that, he would have no objection. Could he not be told of the adequate assurances and guarantees by responsible citizens of Denver to that effect, even though there should be some legal question as to the city's rights?

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois for the purpose of answering the inquiry of my colleague.

Mr. DIETERICH. With the indulgence of the senior Senator from Colorado, I might say, in order to disillusion the junior Senator from Colorado, that what he mentioned is not my only concern, and I expect to state briefly and plainly what the concern of Illinois is in trying to prevent the chambers of commerce of the State of Colorado from buying an institution which is now located in Illinois. That is the principal concern which Illinois has in this matter.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, the record will be searched in vain, in my judgment, for any affirmative or other support of the implications conveyed in the last statement made by the Senator from Illinois.

Before I continue I should say that my attention has just been informally drawn to the fact that certain Members of the Senate did not hear the detailed statement with respect to the vote of Denver taxpayers on the question submitted concerning the issuance of bonds authorizing the purchase of the land for use in part as a bombing field. I therefore repeat that on May 21, 1935, bonds in the total amount of $750,000 par value were authorized to be issued by Denver for the purposes repeatedly specified, and that the vote of the taxpaying electors, who, pursuant to our self-governing home-rule amendment to the Colorado Constitution, determine such questions, was 39,395 in favor and 15,083 against; approximately two and a half times as many voting in favor of this bonded obligation as voted against, all qualified voters being taxpaying electors.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator says that the vote was confined to taxpaying citizens of the city of Denver. Is there a law providing that those who are not property owners are not permitted to exercise their right of franchise on whether or not the city should do such a thing?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The provisions of the constitutional amendment giving home rule to Denver, and the Denver charter provisions adopted in conformity, are construed as requiring a vote of taxpaying electors in such instances, and such a vote was had. So far as known, until now, there has been no technical question raised, if one is now raised, as to the validity of these proceedings. Of course, the War Department is under no obligation to accept, and it is certain that it would not accept, other than fee-simple title to land which is or may be tendered under the provisions of the pending measure, if it becomes law.

What I have been endeavoring to say on the subject of the bombing field is that the unchallenged testimony of technically highly equipped officers of the Air Corps discloses the value in addition to theoretical training in this important field of aerial preparedness. It also discloses an admission by the Representative from the part of Illinois in which Rantoul is located of the absence of any suitable available location there for these purposes. The prohibitive cost is specified by him.

It ought without that admission to be obvious to anyone familiar in general with conditions in the vicinity of Rantoul, Urbana, and Champaign that those communities are located in a rich agricultural region of the great State of Illinois, and that, even if such an area as a gunnery site were available at moderate cost, there would be special dangers to people in that vicinity involved in the use of such a site which would not attach to available far-stretching, largely unoccupied lands in the vicinity of but outside of Denver. There it is possible to segregate a tract of land 10 miles square and to safeguard individuals in that vicinity.

Pictures which I have here for the inspection of any Senator who cares to inspect them illustrate the nature of the considered site in the vicinity of Denver.

Surely some of the questions presented by the Senator from Illinois with respect to problems heretofore undisputed may well surprise members of the Committee on Military Affairs who have followed the testimony so far given and are familiar with the careful and specific reasons assigned by the War Department for the removal of the Air Corps Technical School from its present site in Illinois.

Lest there be further similar questions presented hereafter, there should be definite reference to the opening statement of Representative DOBBINS at the first hearing of the subcommittee. Representative DOBBINS in his opening statement frankly gave the following information, which is of importance not only for what it says but also for its implied support of the accuracy of much of the final report of the officers' committee.

I quote on page 2 of the printed proceedings from that statement of Representative DOBBINS:

> Champaign County is in a flat, plain country, and the location at Chanute Field is characteristic of the rest of the country.
> It was established during war times as a practice field, and then developed as a technical school about 14 or 15 years ago. The improvements there are the greatest drawbacks—old wartime buildings—both as to housing and technical construction. They have had two bad fires within the last 5 years which have depleted the technical facilities of the school.
> In considering the student personnel of the field, it runs at present, I think, about 600—a maximum figure, I think, has been something like 1,000 students. I think instruction is given not only to mechanics, enlisted or drawn from civil life, but also the official personnel of the Army.
> The first agitation for moving of the school was with reference only to the question of Dayton, Ohio, where, as you know, a considerable amount of Air Corps activity is centered. There was quite a contest between the Illinois people and the Ohio people on that question for several years. The result of that conflict was that the improvements in the field were not made.
> In 1932 something like a million dollars was appropriated for new construction. Advertisements for bids were taken and had been received, and contracts were about to be let, when in the winter of that year, in December, the appropriation was canceled and the funds appropriated for that purpose were covered into the general appropriation for the Army, without specification being made as to how it was to be expended. From that time to this the need for improvements to the field has increased. In 1934, early last year, the War Department was understood to be the sponsor of a resolution, which was introduced by Representative McDuffie in the House of Representatives, proposing the creation of a special commission to study, to make a study, of different locations and report upon a proper location for that school.
> The resolution was not adopted, but while pending this special board, whose report is before you, was created by order of the Secretary of War for three Air Corps officers. They were to prepare a report on each of the places visited, and continued their survey for 6 or 8 months, visiting, I think, over 100 locations—up in that neighborhood, at any rate.

It must then be evident that for many years there has been substantial dissatisfaction among those responsible for the administration and development of the Rantoul school over conditions prevailing at Chanute Field and in that vicinity; that various efforts have been made from time to time to find a more suitable location; that extreme precautions have been taken to determine a present suitable location for such a school, and that finally, and as a result of detailed, country-wide inspection, such a location is now unanimously favored at Denver.

I think, Mr. President, that there is little else that needs to be said unless new reasons for subsequent discussion should develop.

Summarizing what I have been endeavoring to say, the history of this school discloses that after years of evident dissatisfaction, in February 1934, continuous efforts by the War Department to find a more suitable location than Rantoul were renewed. The deficiencies in training facilities and other factors making for lowered morale; the climatic, photographic, necessary aerial training, and other limitations of the present site, not faced at the proposed new location, the detailed and careful tests applied in seeking new and better conditions have been specified.

The ability and impartiality of the Army officers pledged on their honor to investigate and report fairly on other possible sites with a view to securing the most suitable of such sites, the care which was exercised by superior Army officers through some 5 months to check the accuracy of the report before it was submitted to the Senate, the review of the merits of the case by the Senate Military Affairs Committee, the patient examination by the members of that committee of the testimony and arguments presented in favor of retaining the school at the present site at Rantoul, and the final approval for Senate consideration of the steps taken by the War Department, including the pending measure, are all part of the record.

I need not add to what I have said any special emphasis on the pressing importance, as well as the scientific justification of the pending bill. Those features have been sufficiently reviewed. Even those members of this body who with special conviction passionately resent civilization-destroying wars, their multiplied cruelties, and their futilities, may well recognize in such a measure as this more efficient safeguards than have heretofore had first place in the help given by the Congress to the Air Corps Technical School. This is not a new problem, but the pending measure has the value of providing more adequate treatment of existing responsibilities.

The pending bill, therefore, comes before the Senate with an up-to-date emphasis which few will care to dispute. The scientific evidence of technicians who support it justifies the conclusion that unless it is acted on with reasonable promptness, the cost of delay or defeat will be national and will be paid in relatively inadequate training and efficiency and in the lives not only of Army fliers but also those who depend on their trained knowledge and skill. The warning has been authoritatively sounded and with special reference to this anticipated legislative proposal. The evidence is conclusive; the findings have been made with unusual deliberation by competent witnesses on the basis of appropriate tests, minutely and expertly applied and checked by Members of the Senate who are exceptionally qualified to determine credibility. It is hoped that favorable action on the pending bill will no longer be deferred.

Mr. DIETERICH obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield——

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Johnson	Pittman
Ashurst	Coolidge	Keyes	Pope
Austin	Copeland	King	Radcliffe
Bachman	Costigan	La Follette	Reynolds

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I believe I can say without any impropriety that I have not been given to quarreling with any agency of the Federal Government in the matter of performing the duties which devolve upon it. If I felt that this investigation had been made as fairly, as openly, and as thoroughly as the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] represented that it was, I should not be here talking to this body now.

If I felt that there had been exhibited a desire to find the location in the United States most suitable for the establishment of this institution, one that would take into consideration everything necessary to be taken into consideration in order that the institution might give thorough and efficient training to that class of citizens who during war must be learned and skilled in the matter of aviation and in the matter of those destructive forces which aviation carries in the war, I should not be talking to this body at this time.

If I felt that my own State had not been discriminated against—not by the United States Senate but by some subordinate officer to whom perhaps the flat prairies of Illinois did not appeal, those prairies which produce the men and produce the goods and pay the revenues in their just proportion to this Government—if I did not believe there was a discrimination of that kind I should not be talking to the Senate today. I should not ask the indulgence of your time and attention.

Rantoul Field was established shortly after the World War. The activities of Kelly Field, in Texas, were moved to Illinois. Sufficient land was acquired, and at that time temporary buildings were either in existence or were constructed for the purpose. It is an established institution of that State.

I realize that it is rather difficult to get Senators who are not very much interested in the establishment of institutions of this kind—possibly because their own States have not had the opportunity to have similar institutions established there—to take any other course than to say, "If a proper board has been appointed, if a Federal investigation has been made, if the proposed site has been investigated in the proper manner, we do not care to disturb the situation." I realize that is the ordinary logic which moves a Senator in the discharge of his duties.

I say to the Senate here and now that I am not given to suspicion. I am not given to charging bad faith to anyone. I am one of the last persons in the world who would raise his voice to charge anyone with bad faith in any agency of his Government, especially in those agencies of defense of his Government. There are some things connected with this proposal, however, which were not brought in by any Member of the Congress. When chambers of commerce become ambitious to build up their communities, become ambitious to have institutions taken from somewhere else and brought to them, they sometimes do things which are not in accordance with the line of ethics pursued in the Congress of the United States.

The question which presents itself to the Senate is this:

Here is an institution, established in one State, which is sought to be removed from its present location and established in another State. It is not a question of finding a location for an institution which is not in existence, the building of which is only contemplated. It is a question of taking an institution away from a State. If it were the establishment of a new institution, the question would be altogether different.

True, conditions at Rantoul Field are not good. Why that field was not properly prepared for a flying field, no one except those who had to do with the expenditure of the appropriations can tell. Appropriations have been available year after year to correct the drainage of that field, about which this commission complained, and to erect at the field permanent buildings to take the place of those whose decay and depreciation is said to have caused a bad morale. The appropriations were made, and the money was lying in the Treasury, but no appeal could induce the authorities to do for this field what they should have done, and what they expect to do if the proposed field is established in Denver.

I had some concern about this matter when I first came to Congress. It is a matter which was discussed in Illinois. It was involved in a scheme of politics which I was never able to see through, never was able to fathom, never was able to understand. When I went to the War Department, which had charge of these activities, when I came here as a Representative at large from Illinois, I tried to get them to spend the available appropriations and place that field in a proper condition for the purposes for which it was intended.

I was told by the Department that they intended to consolidate these activities; they intended to move this field to Dayton, Ohio, where other air activities were located, so that when men attended this technical school they could have the benefit of the additional and broad training in flying which was going on at the Dayton field. I was told that they wanted to do that as a matter of economy. It was a matter of raising the efficiency of the field.

When they told me that, they had no quarrel with me, because I said, "If this will render the training of these men more efficient, if it is a matter of consolidating these activities, if it is a matter of economy, I am big enough to go back to my people and tell them that they need not hope to retain an institution in the State of Illinois when those considerations are against it"; and I told them that.

That, however, evidently is not what was in mind. Up to that time, not one finger had been raised to condemn or impeach this field. Up to that time, so far as anyone could gather from that Department of the Government, the field was absolutely suited for the activities for which it was intended so far as climate, terrain, and everything else was concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to make an inquiry concerning a matter which has impressed me since listening to this debate. Prior to the debate I knew nothing about the questions at issue or about this bill.

The matter which has impressed me seems to me important. I may not be sufficiently informed to be right in regard to it; but it is this: For the school, and for the theoretical work connected with it, and possibly some flying, a section of land probably would be sufficient; but to put it into practice for the bombing and the shooting and the other work connected with the practical application of the theoretical work, as I understand, a very large tract of land would be required; so that somewhere in the vicinity of the school there should be a large field, I should think 25 or 30 miles square, for use in practice operations.

I am wondering, first, if my conclusion is right. If it is not, what I have suggested has no application to this case; but if it is, it is very important that this field be located somewhere where a large tract of land could be acquired without prohibitive expense; and it seems to me it would necessarily have to be located in the vicinity of the mountains, or other public lands, or other places where land would not be too expensive. Can the Senator from Illinois give us some information on that point?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; I think I can.

I realize the truth of what the Senator from Nebraska has said. That argument was brought up in connection with the matter of removing the field to Denver, Colo.

No complaint was ever made, while the appropriations were available, that there was not sufficient space for conducting the training in these bombing operations. This is a new thing that has come in. It is not even necessarily connected with this training school. The matter of perfecting the men in flying, the matter of training them in the art of bombing, has nothing whatever to do with this school. That can be carried on in the State of Illinois. It can be carried on 200, 300, or a thousand miles away; and under the present bill it is indicated that its location in the the State of Colorado is not necessarily near this school where the men are taught the technical, mechanical construction of airplanes and air equipment.

That is my answer to that question. This is the first time the War Department has said that these two particular activities, these two institutions, should be located close together. The conclusions drawn in the report—and I am going to call attention to the report—say that the necessary land could not be obtained around the present field except at prices that would be prohibitive. That is a mere conclusion. I do not know whether or not a tract of land 10 miles square is required. So far as I know, they have not such a tract of land anywhere. I do not know the price of land in Colorado. I understand that they are going to issue bonds and donate the land to the Government. It is not for me to complain about that; but I wish to say to Senators that this is the first time this important activity of the Government has been put up at auction, to be given to the locality which furnishes, in dollars and cents, the best inducements; and that proposition was not made to us in order that we might avail ourselves of it.

Why locate this field at Denver? Why not locate it at Pueblo, Colo., where the terrain is much more suitable for the purpose? Why not locate it at Colorado Springs? Why not somewhere else? Why not down in the fields of Kentucky? Why not in Missouri, among the Ozark Mountains, where they can find space a thousand times more centrally located? Why Colorado? Why Denver?

The fact is that the irresistible entertainments of the Chamber of Commerce of Denver are responsible for the removal of this field, and I shall go into that, and when I do, I go into it with reluctance. When I say that the irresistible entertainments of the Chamber of Commerce of Denver are the cause of this removal I am saying it advisedly and I am not using reckless language or thoughtless language. I am going to show the Senate why I say that and why I have a right to say it.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Without raising, but reserving, any question as to the accuracy of statements newly made by the Senator from Illinois, in view of the inquiry by the Senator from Nebraska, I think it proper to ask, because it is believed nothing not heretofore cited has been testified to with respect to reasons for earlier efforts to move the Air Corps school from Rantoul to Dayton, Ohio, whether at that time any reference was made to the availability of Dayton, Ohio, for bombing or aerial gunnery purposes?

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not want the Senator to argue his case again in my time, but if he doubts my word I can find other Senators who are interested in this matter to whom the same thing was told.

Mr. COSTIGAN. No intended suggestion of doubt of the Senator's word has been given at this time. There has been——

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. DIETERICH. I like to yield for questions, but I do not like to have this speech I am making interlined and interspersed with other speeches, because it would be hard for the printer to cut the interruptions out and find out what I was saying.

Mr. COSTIGAN. If the Senator will pardon me, just one comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield for a question.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the Senator know whether the availability of a bombing or aerial gunnery site at Dayton, Ohio, was mentioned or considered some years ago when the proposed removal from Rantoul was under consideration?

Mr. DIETERICH. I will answer that question. So far as I know, it was not; and, so far as I know, this is the first time that has been tied on to the question of this technical training school.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator to yield for one further question?

Mr. DIETERICH. If the Senator will quietly listen until I get through, I believe I will clarify the points and save a lot of the Senator's time.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask whether the Senator from Illinois suggests that Denver, or any organizations representing Denver, had anything to do with the earlier proposals for the removal of this school? I have particularly in mind the suggestion of a removal to Dayton, Ohio.

Mr. DIETERICH. I do not suppose the Denver Chamber of Commerce was very much in favor of removing the school to Dayton, Ohio, and I doubt whether they had very much to do with the particular agitation for the removal of the school to that place.

The report made by this board of four Army Air Corps officers is based upon information obtained mostly by themselves at Chanute Field, and beautiful prospectuses, and photographs, and statements of wonderful weather conditions issued by the chamber of commerce of the city of Denver. The photographs disclose a damp, wet field at Chanute Field at a time when it was in the worst condition in which it had been for years. The photographs which they incorporated in the record, furnished by the Chamber of Commerce of Denver, paint climate of Denver as most heavenly, the skies clear and blue, and beautiful to behold. No painting like that was presented on behalf of Illinois. No; it was damp, hazy, rainy.

Bless you, when we fight wars, we cannot take the boys up along the mountain sides and into rarefied atmosphere. We have to fight them where the battles take place, and if we are to train them in a wonderful climate such as exists in Denver, if they have to go down in the swamps somewhere, they will not know what to do.

They discovered every day the atmosphere over Illinois was cloudy, and it does look bad in the record. But they did not even discover in the last 2 years a dust storm along the east slope of the Rocky Mountains. This board of Army Air officers did not even know of these storms.

As I have said, this is the first time we have heard this Illinois field impeached. Illinois may not boast of ideal weather. Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Tennessee, and all those States of the Central West, may not be able to boast of ideal weather. But we have a healthful climate and we have blue skies most of the year.

They even took the temperatures and directed a movement against the field on the theory that the weather was too hot and humid for the men to train properly—that it would distract them from their work. I do not think there is any question but that men should be trained, perhaps, in all kinds of climate and when we compare the days referred to with the winter days along the east slope of the Rockies we will strike a pretty good balance.

If we talk about danger in flying, I should rather have my boy, if something went wrong, come down in the cornfields of Illinois than fall among the rocks of the Rocky Mountains, if we are talking about safety.

It is said that this is urgent; that it should be done immediately; that the lives of our boys depend upon this being carried out immediately. Why did they not think of that from the time this field was established at Rantoul, and when the appropriations were available to go ahead and build this field and mold it into what it should be?

I guess this is one of the ordinary things with which we sometimes meet. Is there anything in the accounts of Colorado and Illinois, comparing the revenues and expenditures, that would indicate that there was an overbalance along that line, and that some institution should be removed from one State to the other so that a more just distribuion of the revenues and expenditures of the Government should take place?

I have a statement here which shows that Colorado, with a population of 1,056,000, paid $26,826,155 as revenues into the Federal Treasury to carry on governmental activities, and at the same time took out of the Federal Treasury $48,760,386.

I believe I have a right to present this matter to the Congress. I believe it is a factor which has a right to be taken into consideration in this matter. The revenues of Illinois were more than $100,000,000 in excess of what she received, with her poulation of something over 7,000,000.

I believe that is proper to be taken into consideration here.

There is something still a little bit worse than that concerning the matter, which I do not understand. There was introduced in the record a letter written to Lt. Col. B. K. Yount, of the United States Army, chairman of the Board for Recommending Site for Air Corps Technical School, Munitions Building, Washington, D. C., in which the writer says:

Confirming our telephone conversation just now:

Yesterday I was away from my office all day, being engaged in a series of conferences at the Interior Department, which did not conclude until late in the afternoon. While I was away from my office, there was received by Western Union a day letter dated Denver, Colo., August 7, addressed to me, signed "Denver Chamber of Commerce, C. A. Shinn, president"— which I just read to you over the telephone. Body of the telegram is as follows:

S-h-i-n-n, president—

"Please advise Colonel Yount, chamber of commerce, joined enthusiastically by mayor and Denver City Council and supported by newspapers, proposes to arrange for outright donation to Government of entire site with present buildings and equipment. Request this be embodied in Denver prospectus and that consideration of Denver be based accordingly. Buildings and equipment, exclusive of land, cost originally $560,000, now conservatively worth $325,000. Trackage must await further negotiation, as both railroads claim tonnage insufficient to warrant building. Please do not release to press."

But this is the thing I desire to call attention to:

As requested by Mr. Shinn—

S-h-i-n-n, this president of the chamber of commerce—and by you—

That is, Mr. Yount. There we have the chairman of the board and the president of the chamber of commerce.

I can assure you that there will be no "leak"— from this office concerning the correspondence between you and the Denver Chamber of Commerce.

L-e-a-k, leak—

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. DIETERICH. I will not brook an interruption now.

Mr. President, if that savors of fairness, I do not understand it. That letter was written by Congressman LEWIS, who represents the city of Denver, for, as I understand, the congressional district and the corporate limits of the city of Denver are coextensive.

L-e-a-k, leak! The public will not know what we have done! We have got something between us that must not come out in the light of day, and I can assure you, as I assured the president of the chamber of commerce, there will be no leak.

I was surprised to find the explanation given about this matter. Of course Colonel Yount gives a long explanation by saying that he is satisfied that it was perfectly aboveboard and honest. Colonel Yount, on whom he was not going to leak, is thoroughly satisfied there is nothing improper in the transaction. When Representative DOBBINS took the stand, his explanation was certainly a thorough explanation of what he meant:

Representative DOBBINS. I could see no impropriety in such correspondence—

I am reading now from the hearings before the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs in the United States Senate, Seventy-fourth Congress, under date of June 24, 1935. What I now read follows immediately after the letter:

Representative DOBBINS. I could see no impropriety in such correspondence, but only in their statement that they had not had such correspondence.

Evidently somebody would not have made a statement that there was going to be no leak if leaky matter did not exist.

Congressman LEWIS. There is no impropriety in the correspondence, I can assure you of that.

That is all he says in defense of it. He continues:

Now, I would be glad to submit this other information on the cost of living, and also—

And he leaves it at that. That is the explanation of a transaction which took place between the chairman of this board to locate a technical air school and the president of the chamber of commerce. That is why I am here on the floor of the Senate saying that this was not fair, and the entire record is absolutely stacked against Chanute Field. I have the highest respect for the officers of the United States Army. I think they are the most honorable, true, and patriotic men that ever lived; but they do not go out pursuing a public function concerning which there must be no leak. I do not doubt that the society and the bright lights of Denver, with all the entertaining establishments they have in that beautiful city—entertainment of any kind you want—are a little more alluring for an Army officer, and that it is more alluring for him to live there, than the uninteresting fields of Illinois on which her crops are raised.

I do not doubt that the social whirl and the entertainments of Denver might appeal more to those who spend their lives in the Service than the uninteresting corn and wheat fields of Illinois. But, on the other hand, we have the little city of Rantoul, some 10 or 12 miles distant from the field, connected by ample superhighways to the university city of Illinois, to the seat of learning and culture, to the place near which you want your boy brought up, to the place where if you had your choice you would rather have him making contacts than going down the brightly lighted streets of the beautiful city of Denver, with her western tinge and her western allurements.

That is why the Senators from Illinois are protesting against the proposed action. Springfield, Mo., wanted this field; and anyone who has looked around the terrain and the surroundings of Springfield, Mo., for bombing fields and everything else, knows it has better fields than Colorado. The Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] knows of fields in his State that are better equipped than the proposed field in Colorado, that have better surroundings, and are better places in which to train men.

Mr. President, even the difference in the cost of living and foodstuffs as between Denver and the community in Illinois was gone into. Can Senators imagine such a thing? They had that record stacked against us, until Representative DOBBINS—for which I want to say that he deserves the thanks of the district which he represents—went into the matter, made comparisons, took out a great deal of the cloudy days which they had stacked in the record against us, and reduced the cost of living which they had raised up. I know that one can live cheaper in Illinois and in Iowa than one can live in Denver, Colo.

I have stated what is back of the bill and why we are protesting the removal of the field. I say that the committee could have done nothing else from the record which was made, because the chairman of the board, who did not want any leak and had to be assured there would not be any leak, stacked the record the way he wanted it.

Mr. President, I make a promise—not a threat—that whenever anyone talks about leaks and leaking with respect to the expenditure of Government money, I am going to make it my business to see that there is not some other leak somewhere. I am going to do that in connection with my official duties.

This is the first time in all my life I have had occasion to say what I have said against one who was a member of a department of my government, whether State or National.

Of course the record was right. Of course they did not let that which might impel them to move leak out. It is always dangerous to have a chamber of commerce fooling along with a board which is trying to locate technical schools. Those boys just will try to sell their community in any fashion they can.

If those who desired the field moved to Denver wanted to pass off the bombing field as being prohibitive, why did they not give us a chance to see if we would donate a bombing field to them? We never did have that opportunity. Why did they not give the State of Kentucky the chance to donate land for the purpose, along those beautiful hills south of the Ohio River where the grass grows down to the water's edge?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If a proposition is brought before the Congress to move the field from Illinois to Kentucky, will the Senator from Illinois favor such removal?

Mr. DIETERICH. I shall be more in favor of that removal than to have the field moved out West. I will say that to the Senator from Kentucky. I am not in favor of putting it in Denver. I do no think it should go to Denver. I think we ought to have it where it is; but if I wanted my boy trained in these dangerous activities, I would rather have him flying over the beautiful hills of Kentucky than out West. I suppose the board considered some of those questions. They have the weather and the cost of living and everything stacked against us. There is just one place where this school can go, and that is the place where the understanding is so thorough that there will be no leak as to what happens.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield for a question.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator from Illinois whether he does not think it would be fairer for the purposes of the record to do what the Senators from Colorado must themselves do unless the record is clarified at this time; namely, incorporate fully in the RECORD the statements made by the able Representative from Denver, Mr. LEWIS, and by Lieutenant Colonel Yount, with respect to the so-called "leak" letter.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; I shall read Colonel Yount's letter. I am glad the Senator called attention to it. Colonel Yount made one of the most thorough explanations of what "leak" means that anybody ever did. When he got through, it was just as clear as mud as to what he meant by "leak." If there was any confusion before he got through, then when he got through there was still more confusion.

Colonel Yount said:

> As I remember, I called Congressman LEWIS' office and called his attention to the fact that this information had not been furnished in connection with the site at Denver and asked that it be furnished. That certainly was in connection with the site and perfectly legitimate.
> Congressman LEWIS used the word "leak." I think by using that word he simply meant that the confidence which we had asked in every case, the confidential nature which we had imposed or attempted to impose upon all of these proceedings, would continue to be kept.

That is what he stated he meant. I do not want to be unduly suspicious, but I can think he meant something else just as reasonably as he can think that is what was meant.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield further to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Does the Senator plan to incorporate in the RECORD the portion of the statement of Lieutenant Colonel Yount which precedes the conclusion read by the Senator? I refer to the language on page 56 of the hearings.

Mr. DIETERICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. My attention was diverted. Will the Senator repeat his question?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Since it is the Senator's desire that any statement be made in the form of a question, I am asking whether the Senator wishes to incorporate in full the statements of Lieutenant Colonel Yount preceding those portions of the statements which were in part read by the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DIETERICH. I have no objection to the Senator from Colorado incorporating in the RECORD anything he wants to place there, but from my very earliest years I have never made it a practice to let my adversary write my speech. I am simply telling what I understand by this, the RECORD is open to every Member of the Senate. I am not trying to conceal anything nor to have any leak. I am not afraid of any leak in this matter at all, because it is all in the record. There is no reason why the Senator from Colorado should not have anything incorporated in the RECORD he desires.

Mr. President, there are some other matters which I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIETERICH. Certainly.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is evident that this matter cannot be concluded this afternoon. I understand the Senator from Illinois desires to retain the floor.

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; I do.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the Senator therefore yield to me to ask for an executive session?

Mr. DIETERICH. I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations (and withdrawing several nominations), which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received and nominations withdrawn, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. VAN NUYS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the following nominations:

John J. Quinn, of New Jersey, to be United States attorney, district of New Jersey;

Gustav Peck, of New York, to be a member of the Prison Industries Reorganization Board, created by Executive order of September 26, 1935, establishing the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration; and

James P. Davis, of New York, to be a member of the Prison Industries Reorganization Board, created by Executive order of September 26, 1935, establishing the Prison Industries Reorganization Administration.

Mr. CONNALLY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of T. Whitfield Davidson, of Texas, to be a United States district judge, northern district of Texas, vice Edward R. Meek, retired.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Albert Hazen Blanding, National Guard of Florida, to be Chief of the National Guard Bureau of the War Department, with the rank of major general, for a period of 4 years from date of acceptance, with rank from December 1, 1935, vice Maj. Gen. George E. Leach, Chief of the National Guard Bureau, whose term of office expired November 30, 1935; also the nominations of sundry other officers for appointment, by transfer, in the Regular Army.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reports will be placed on the calendar. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY COUNCIL

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Lyle T. Alverson, of New York, to be acting executive director of the National Emergency Council.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS IN MINNESOTA

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the nominations of sundry postmasters in Minnesota.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations of postmasters in Minnesota go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters in Minnesota will be passed over.

FEDERAL HOUSING ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Stewart McDonald, of Missouri, to be Federal Housing Administrator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of Mr. McDonald.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Samuel D. Sanders, of Washington, to be Cooperative Bank Commissioner.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters, other than those in Minnesota, are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS TO THURSDAY

The Senate resumed legislative session.

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate stand in recess until noon on Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Thursday, January 30, 1936, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 27, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, our everlasting Father, we thank Thee for the fidelity and for the surpassing wonder of divine love. We pray Thee to clothe us with that spirit of charity that thinks no evil, that loves not suspicion and is slow to detect it in men. We pray Thee to deliver us from downward-weighing temptations that root us in pride and selfishness. Heavenly Father, the cries of suffering ones are in our ears; they are overcrowded with privations and driven out of courage. Do Thou direct human hands to turn their way, lingering early and late with rich blessings. Crown the Congress, we beseech Thee, with wisdom and with the wealth of mind and heart that bring forth the fruits of happiness and contentment. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 24, 1936, was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 minutes on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to state that we are about to take up an appropriation bill on which there will be general debate. The gentleman is a member of that committee, and I think, with all due deference as a Member of the House, the Speaker has the right to interpose an objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I am quite willing to withdraw my request and ask for time in general debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thanks the gentleman for withdrawing it.

WHICH CONSTITUTION?—AL SMITH KNOWS, OR OUGHT TO KNOW, THE ABSURDITY OF HIS STATEMENTS

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, "Alfred E. Smith, of America"—as he was characterized in the introduction, although his conception of America is now plainly that of a plutocratic, Wall Street owned America, rather than the liberal America he once championed—made a speech the other night, with 12 members of the Du Pont Powder Trust in the audience.

The man we have so generally liked personally and for whom we have had such affectionate regard in the past came before the Nation in the role of a foe of social-security legislation and a defender of reaction. Mask his motives as he might, praise the purposes of the American Liberty League and its clique of millionaires and billionaires as he might, there could be no mistaking why he was speaking and what he was attempting to accomplish. Glittering generalities and bombastic boisterousness about one's patriotism do not prove that what he is championing is best for his country. Because a man has come from humble beginnings on the sidewalks of New York it does not follow that he is now allied with the poor and the exploited. In this case quite the contrary is true. It is a far cry from the Al Smith who once fought for the victims of hard-hearted industrialists to the Al Smith of 1936, who consorts almost exclusively with the Bourbons and Tories of the United States.

Conspicuous was the slight mention of workers and farmers. He talked about the Democratic platform and sought to prove that its promises have not been kept, but he did this not in the sense of urging more progressive and social-justice laws but in a deliberate vein of fault-finding. It was his obvious object to tear to pieces the administration by harping on expenditures for the hungry and homeless and trying to brand them as evil and extravagant. His attempt to raise a red scare by calling the moderate reforms of the Roosevelt administration "communistic" and "coming from Moscow" was what the better Al Smith of the olden days would have bluntly stigmatized as "the bunk."

Al Smith knows the absurdity of statements about the Supreme Court settling the significance of the Constitution. He orated in raucous roars about the legislation that, according to him, did not conform to the basic law.

Somebody who read a recent issue of the American Mercury might have quoted the title of an article in that magazine headed "Back to Which Constitution?"

Of course, Al Smith realizes, as all of us do, that the Constitution has been amended a score of times. Strictly speaking, the first Constitution was not the second Constitution, for the addition of the Bill of Rights made it quite a different document than it was in the beginning—and the second Constitution was not the third, and so on. From former Governor Smith's language you would think there never had been more than one Constitution. You would imagine that it was a paper drafted spontaneously, like a national decalogue, with no changes possible throughout eternity. The very essence of our Constitution is its possibility for amendment, a right which has been exercised frequently. A man who shouts about preserving the Constitution as if it were an unalterable mandate is, in language which Al Smith has often heard among the plain people of his own sidewalks of New York, "talking through his hat."

How nonsensical to scream that administration heads should make "the Constitution the civil bible of the United States and pay it the same respect and reverence that they would religiously pay the Holy Scriptures", when all of us appreciate that the founding fathers never expected to write an immutable and everlasting code.

To be true, we respect the Constitution and we revere the wisdom expressed in this—and any other—ably prepared work of fundamental legislation. But we do not kneel before it in blind adoration as a savage kneels before a fetish. We do not bend as heathen do before an idol of wood or stone. The Constitution of the United States is a living document, affording a general statement of basic ideals and outlining a framework for our Government, but specifically authorizing adoption of new articles and sections to meet new conditions.

"Reverence!" Thanks to my common sense I have too much reverence for the authors of the Constitution to believe that they did not expect it would undergo numerous alterations in the course of decades and centuries. To contend otherwise would be to accuse them of intellectual inferiority to the average high-school student.

When they provided for changes they thereby established the clear contrast between the new American Republic and the governments of the Old World, which had rested upon the assumption that every government was ordained by the Almighty and should continue without modification unto the end of time.

Contrast the remarks of Governor Smith with the statements of Thomas Jefferson—also of America as well as of Democracy—when Jefferson asserted that no society should have a perpetual constitution or a perpetual law; that a new constitution would be desirable about every third of a century; and that sometimes "a little revolution is a good thing in any country."

Contrast Mr. Smith's words with those of Thomas Paine, who ranks with Jefferson, Patrick Henry, and James Madison as one of the greatest of the founders. All of us are aware what a vast part Paine played in the formation of an independent nation here on the Western Hemisphere. Paine, answering those who held that the Colonies should not sever relations with Great Britain "because America hath flourished under her former connection", wrote in his trenchant style:

> Nothing can be more fallacious than this kind of argument. We may as well assert that, because a child has thriven upon milk it is never to have meat, or that the first 20 years of our lives is to become a precedent for the next 20.

An excellent presentation of the view that the Constitution is not static but subject to alteration in the course of progress was made by Atorney General Homer S. Cummings in his address on The American Constitutional Method before the New York City Bar Association December 18, 1935. In the closing paragraph of General Cummings' speech is found more wisdom, more vision, and more democracy than could be discovered in a thousand violent outbursts like that of Al Smith:

> Our Government is not a logical, a documentary, or a judicial absolutism. The American constitutional method is a process of adaptation and growth, as well as a means whereby wrongs may be corrected and governmental measures may be attuned to the essentials of justice, through the orderly ways of discussion and education, as opposed to the violent changes and intolerable tyrannies by which absolute governments are inevitably characterized. Were this not true, the Constitution would be a dam against which the waters of life would beat in vain, rather than a directing channel through which the stream of national existence may safely pass.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the subcommittee of the Committee on Labor, considering the Ellenbogen textile bill, have leave to sit during the session of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Reserving the right to object, for how long?

Mr. CONNERY. The Governors of the New England and Southern States are coming here before the subcommittee and I will ask for the privilege of sitting this week, and then if necessary I can renew the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE COCONUT OIL EXCISE TAX

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the coconut oil excise tax and include therein a few tables.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor at this time in the defense of the millions of American farmers who milk cows, and in an effort to bring before Members of this House of Representatives the necessity of protecting the American market for the American producer.

Last year Congress passed a bill levying a 3-cents-a-pound tax on Philippine coconut oil, and now there is a movement on foot, by what I believe to be a gigantic lobby, to eliminate this tax and open the floodgates of the United States to the importation of foreign-produced oils.

The fact that about 4,000,000 of our farmers milk cows, and the fact that 50 percent of oleomargarine is represented by coconut oil, will give you Members of Congress who represent farm States some idea why this alleged powerful coconut-oil lobby is endeavoring to remove this 3-cent excise tax on coconut oil. These taxes became effective on June 10, 1934, and results which have come from this levy have been among the most powerful and important in benefits to agricultural products of any from any other laws passed in that session of Congress. Contrary to the arguments now being put up by those forces who are deluging Members of Congress with pleas to eliminate the 3-cent excise tax on coconut oil, the oils and fats industries have prospered because of this tax. Values have increased to the tune of $249,000,000; millions of cotton, corn, peanut, soybean, beef cattle, swine, and dairy farmers have benefited by better prices. The price of cottonseed was increased by $9 to $12 per ton. Better prices for soybean oil and soybean results have doubled the acreage of beans planted, and the purchases of Philippine coconut products, although declining in volume, have increased in dollar value. Contrary to the arguments put forth by the coconut-oil lobby, the Philippine coconut-oil producers have been benefited not only by higher prices, but the Philippine Commonwealth as a whole will benefit because they will receive this 3-cent excise tax which is collected from the American consumer, but which in turn helps to protect the American producer.

Farm organizations, such as the Farmers Union, the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, American Cotton Cooperative Association, and the National Dairy Organization have petitioned for permanent retention of this tax. In my opinion, this tax is not only fair and just, but I believe the tax should be increased. The very fact that this tax produced a positive benefit of $249,000,000 to the American producers in the first 16 months of its operation is an argument that the tax should not be changed, nor should the act be repealed.

In some of the propaganda reaching Members of Congress, especially those representing farm districts, the coconut-oil industry indicates that if they can have no more open doors to the entry of coconut oil they will so adulterate this coconut oil as to make it unfit for edible purposes. This statement, in my opinion, is mere camouflage to allay the fears of Congressmen representing the dairy and farm regions. We need only to turn back to prohibition days, when alcohol was so adulterated as to make it unfit for a beverage. Inedible oils—with very few exceptions—become edible when impurities are removed by refining. If the 3-cent tax on coconut oil is removed by a "denaturing" proviso to that effect, there will be an immediate change of condition in every fat and oil industry. A large increase in imports of coconut oil will result with sharp price declines among all oils used in soap and other inedible products; this followed by displacements, changes, and price reductions among the oils used in the edible trade.

Tables and statements of facts issued and compiled by the conference of domestic oils and fats of Washington, D. C., state that soap makers in 1934 used 341,000,000 pounds of coconut oil. They also used over a billion pounds of other oils which could in large part be replaced by coconut oil. Other industrial buyers used two or three million pounds of coconut oil. Makers of edible products used about 211,000,000 pounds more. The total coconut oil used in 1934 was 589,602,000 pounds.

If the tax on denatured oil is removed by law, it will completely change this picture both as to quantity of coconut oil used and its distribution.

First, the undenatured coconut oil now used in soaps—341,000,000 pounds in 1934—will be replaced by the cheaper tax-free denatured oil. Next, every other taxed foreign oil used in soap will be displaced, as far as possible by the tax-free denatured coconut oil. It might replace all of these oils or a total of 275,000,000 pounds now used in soaps as follows: Palm oil, 154,704,000 pounds; palm-kernel oil, 16,516,000 pounds; sesame and sunflower oils, 7,608,000 pounds; and whale and fish oils, 98,544,000 pounds—all 1934 basis.

Next, these tax-free imports would tend to displace the domestic oils now used in soaps, principally corn oil, 6,268,000 pounds; edible tallow, 1,098,000 pounds; inedible tallow, 662,858,000 pounds; and grease, 142,782,000 pounds—1934 basis.

These replacements would certainly take place unless the prices of all these domestic oils were brought down to or near the price of the Philippine denatured coconut oil. This reduction in prices of all the oils used in soap is evidently the purpose of the proponents of this proviso.

They claim, however, that this will be its only effect; that prices of edible oils will not be affected thereby.

The error in that claim is due to the fact that the oils affected are not exclusively used for soap. In every case but one or two these same oils with a little additional refining are largely used for edible purposes. Both the imported oils which are now taxed and the domestic oils now used in part in soap, once their prices are reduced and they become plentiful, will seek every possible outlet which includes all edible uses. The Philippines can continue to send millions of pounds of undenatured oil, Netherlands East Indies will send millions of pounds of palm oil, Africa and the East Indies will send millions of pounds of palm-kernel oil, and India and China sesame oil, Russia sunflower oil, and all will compete in the edible markets. Corn oil, domestic soybean oil, peanut oil, cottonseed oil, fish oil, edible tallow, oleostearine, oleo oil, neutral lard, and so forth, are all used edibly or in edible commodities. This brings us to the culmination of the whole proposal.

This whole list of oils will be forced in increasing volume to lower prices and/or to edible uses. All, without exception, are ingredients used in making oleomargarine and lard compound and other edible products which compete directly with butter and with lard. This means cheaper oleomargarine—cheaper butter—and lower-priced lard compound and vegetable shortenings—cheaper lard, cheaper hogs, cheaper corn.

The play of cause and effect set forth above is natural and inevitable. Its basis is the remarkable similarity in physical characteristics and close relation of chemical composition of every oil and fat involved in this joint industry. Every product manufacturer seeks the cheapest usable material, and each shift in supply and price affects the price of all from top to bottom.

Only a very few oils are fully inedible, all the others, no matter their conditions as crude oils, can be refined to "edible" character. The interchangeability and close-price relationships between all of these oils are well understood by the oils and fats trades and are as stated above.

PHILIPPINE-AMERICAN TRADE NOT SERIOUSLY AFFECTED BY TAX ON IMPORTED OILS AND FATS

There have been many misstatements of fact and many false inferences, guesses, and propaganda statements made with reference to this subject. The facts, disclosed by official figures, are:

I. The value of coconut oil and copra imported from the Philippine Islands to the United States has actually increased in the period since the effective date of the tax, compared with the same period before that date.

II. The balance of trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States has been adverse to the United States during almost every year of the colonial relationship. The tax law has not changed this situation in any material way.

I

This tax law became effective June 10, 1934. The law was passed May 10, 1934, and its passage had been forecast for about a month prior to that date, so during both April and May 1934 there were heavy imports in an effort to escape the tax. Notwithstanding the heavy imports for this 2-month period, a tabulation of the imports and their valuation during the whole period from January 1, 1933, to May 30, 1934 (17 months), compared with the imports from July 1, 1934, to October 30, 1934 (16 months) shows that the value of such imports per month was about $190,000 greater in the period after the tax became effective than in the period before the tax was enacted.

The amounts and values of copra and coconut oil imports from the Philippine Islands showing this increase after the tax became effective are as follows:

Imports of copra and coconut oil from the Philippines (January 1933 to October 1934)

[Source: Reports of U. S. Tariff Commission; Monthly Summary Foreign and Domestic Commerce]

	Copra		Coconut oil
	Quantity	Value	Quantity	Value
January to December 1933	442,168,076	$6,008,775	316,078,135	$8,555,892
January to May 1934	165,505,445	1,929,172	161,776,487	4,014,548
July to December 1934	150,791,838	1,882,850	124,578,270	2,674,421
January to October 1935	344,349,054	7,584,644	286,288,889	10,197,388

Copra and coconut oil value for 17 months before tax, $20,508,377; $1,206,375 average monthly value. Copra and coconut oil for 16 months after tax, $22,343,303; $1,396,456 average monthly value. Amount and value of imports in June 1934 are omitted from this table. The law was in effect on June 10, but the official figures do not divide the month's imports between the two parts of the month.

It is well known to every economic observer and to every business man engaged in Philippine import or export business that the business between the countries for the past 35 years has been an exploitation of Philippine resources, chiefly agricultural, by interested United States fabricators of products made from their raw materials, while a few struggling United States exporters sought to build up such limited amount of export business as could be secured for a limited line of manufactured products. However, the general public has not been generally informed of these facts, and a body of sentiment has built up for American exporters who it is claimed might lose some business because the United States placed a tax on coconut oil.

The facts are that if the entire coconut-oil business were shut off—as to which there is neither intent nor likelihood—the record shows that many millions of dollars have and will continue to flow from the United States to the Philippine Islands every year, over and above their total past, present, or future purchases from the United States exporters.

The exact state of this trade, showing that in the past 35 years the buyers in the United States have poured over $360,000,000 into the island resources more than Philippine buyers have spent in the United States, is seen in the following table:

United States trade with the Philippines, 1900–34

[Source: Statistical Abstract]

	Imports	Exports
1900–10	$121,536,824	$89,391,683
1911–20	468,748,925	406,979,119
1921–30	967,209,137	700,605,809
1931	87,133,456	48,883,393
1932	80,877,402	44,986,542
1933	93,047,796	44,781,832
1934	87,811,089	47,528,316
1935 (to September)	77,504,688	37,969,759

The reasons for the showing of increased values of imports of copra and coconut oil from the Philippine Islands since the tax became effective can be readily understood if the conditions of this tax are understood.

First, it placed the tax on both the oil itself and on the oil if made from imported copra. Theretofore copra imports into the United States had been subject to no duty or tax of any kind. Next, it placed a differential between Philippine Island oil and copra and these products from other sources. This differential is 2 cents per pound in favor of the Philippines.

The results were exactly as estimated in advance by the proponents of the measure. The entire oil and copra buying of the United States has been concentrated in the Philippine trade. Not only this but the increased prices of competing domestic oils induced by the tax raised the entire price level, so both copra and oil from the Philippines was sold in the United States at higher prices.

All this has resulted, as cited above, namely, in an increase in value over a period of 16 or 17 months of over $190,000 a month in our purchases of oil and copra from the Philippine Islands.

Congressmen who are interested in saving the American market for the American producer should realize all inroads which are being made by oleomargarine, 50 percent of which represents coconut oil shipped into our country. During the fiscal year of 1934, according to data from the Bureau of Internal Revenue, there were 104,942 oleomargarine retailers in the United States. This number, from the same data, and for the year just passed, 1935, had increased to a total of 155,415. In my State of Nebraska, where, during the black months of depression and farm-poverty days, these farmers depended on the humble cow for a living, the number of oleomargarine retailers jumped from 1,680 in 1934 to 2,630 in 1935.

By continually conceding and giving here and there to the great pressure of propaganda and coconut oil lobbying, the American farmer last year lost a sale of 200,000,000 pounds of milk, which could have been used for butter purposes. This represents millions of dollars out of the American farmers' pocket.

Mr. H. G. Keeney, president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative State Union of Nebraska, who has studied the question in great detail, tells me that foreign oils have already cost the American farmer a great deal of money. He tells me that there used to be sale for animal fats, tallow, lard, and oils extracted from waste meat, which now are practically valueless, to go into the manufacture of soap and other products. Imported oils have now taken the place of these animal fats. These vegetable fats can be shipped in from the Philippines at the lowest water rate and then take a long-haul rate to the big soap factories in the East. It is this expert's opinion that while we are trying out a policy of controlled production of hogs we are importing an increasing amount of vegetable oils to take the place of animal fats. Most of the trade agreements made and in process of ratification make it easier for the importation of products which compete with agricultural products in this country.

It is because I am of the sincere belief that it will be during this session of Congress that this powerful and rich coconut-oil lobby will endeavor to eliminate the excise tax on coconut oil, that I ask the indulgence of Members of Congress to listen very carefully to my plea to show a united front when this lobby brings to the floor of this House their bill to in some way compromise or eliminate the tax against this foreign imported oil. This lobby, in my opinion, is combined with other great industries, which I believe includes the sugar industry, and the subsidized ship industry, which I had occasion to study at close quarters during the past few months. As a member of the Insular Affairs Committee, and as a guest of the Philippine people at the inauguration of their new Commonwealth, I found myself besieged with coconut-oil propaganda from the day I left my home to the time I arrived in Seattle, until embarkage on the steamer at Seattle, and on board the steamer on the high seas, through China and Japan, through the Philippine Islands and Hawaii, and even on the return trip home; and after returning to Washington again I found myself being confronted with a vast amount of printed matter and propaganda endeavoring to turn my mind in favor of opening up the gates of America to the flood of coconut oil.

I made a careful study of the copra and coconut-oil industry in the Philippine Islands and also the sugar industry. I had personal interviews with people who had a personal interest in the industries, and they told me without mincing words that a desperate attempt is being made to open the gates of America to a flood of coconut oil, and no stone is being left unturned by this powerful lobby in their efforts to change the law which Congress passed in 1934, and which has helped protect the American producer, and at the same time has been a fair treatment to the producers of coconut oil.

Careful study during this tour of the Far East leads me to believe that unless we, as representatives of the American farmers, do not protect their products, we shall find ourselves in practically the same position as some of our industrial Eastern States find themselves in their futile efforts to compete against the importation of cheaply manufactured articles which are pouring into our country by boatload from Japan. If we eliminate the excise tax we will have told these farmers who produce butterfat that they must compete with cheaply produced coconut oil from the Philippine Islands, and eventually we will have the same condition at our doors as was seen a year ago when boatload after boatload of foreign butter came into our country to compete with butter produced on our farms.

This is a warning to Congressmen, especially those representing farm and dairy regions, that they are facing one of the richest, most powerful lobbies this country has ever seen, and whose propaganda is more complete and more determined than any other we have experienced in Washington. The propaganda is carried out in such a systematized manner and with the help of great corporations in this and other countries. In my opinion, the objective of this great lobby is the enslavement of the farmer and wage earners of America. If ever America needed protection in its efforts to keep up the American standard of living, it is now.

Members of Congress should know how the American livestock farmer has benefited from the excise tax on vegetable oils of foreign origin. For several years before 1934 the price of animal fats was ridiculously low. These commodities sold far below the cost of production. Large surpluses had accumulated and hung heavily over the market. During this time tremendous quantities of coconut oil and other fats and oils were being imported into the United States at ridiculously low prices. The price level of these imported oils seemed to serve as a brake in checking any advance on price of animal fats and oils, either edible or inedible.

When the Internal Revenue Act of 1934 went into effect a perceptible increase in the price of animal fats and oils took place; an increase which eventually proved to be practically equal to the tax.

Prof. H. J. Gramlich, chairman of the department of animal husbandry of the University of Nebraska, has stated that it would be most unfortunate from the standpoint of the consumer to let them remove the excise tax.

Do not forget that all these excise taxes collected on Philippine coconut oil are held as a separate fund and are to be paid into the treasury of the Philippine Islands. The coconut-oil industry is arguing that this money does not go back to the coconut-oil industry in the Philippines, but the arguments put forward by those who wish to continue this tax is that all of the money goes back to the Philippine people, and at the same time, while not as much of the coconut oil is coming into our country, it resulted in more money going to the hands of the Philippine coconut-oil industry.

It is time to preserve the American market for the American producer. It is time to trade with foreign lands for those things which we cannot produce in our own land; for the things that our fertile acres cannot produce, and things which we cannot manufacture. It is also high time that those who are endeavoring to trade off our farm produce to realize that unless the farmer is protected all industry will fail.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCHRAN. In the last session of Congress the House passed an omnibus-claims bill. That bill went to the Senate and one bill I have in mind was passed by the Senate with amendments and is now in conference. I desire to inquire if that conference report will come back to the House on that particular bill or will it come back to the House as a conference report on the omnibus claims bill?

The SPEAKER. The conferees will report on the individual bill which was passed by the two Houses. The gentleman understands that under the Private Calendar rule, after an omnibus bill is passed by the House, it is resolved into the several bills of which it is composed so that each bill contained therein again assumes its original form. The Chair thinks the gentleman will find that there are no omnibus-claims bills in conference but that there may be some individual bills in conference that were at one time incorporated in an omnibus bill. In that case the conferees could only report on the individual bills committed to them.

Mr. COCHRAN. Then it will come back here as a conference report on an individual bill and considered under the general rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1937

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 10630, Rept. No. 1927) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10630, the Interior Department appropriation bill. Pending that, I ask the gentleman from Kansas what suggestion he has to make in respect to time for general debate?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Anything the gentleman might suggest would be satisfactory, I think.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Then I suggest that we let general debate run on through the day, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I have some requests for time tomorrow, and probably we will run into tomorrow with general debate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have also. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run on through the day, to be equally divided between the gentleman from Kansas and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10630; and pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate continue through the day, the time to be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 10630, with Mr. DOUGHTON in the chair.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman and fellow rubber stamps, departing from my custom in debate for obvious reasons, I respectfully ask your indulgence to be permitted to proceed without interruption.

Saturday night last a great feast was spread in the District of Columbia, the Nation's Capital. It was under the auspices of an aggregation which had ascribed to itself the righteous designation of the American Liberty League. There had been unusual ballyhoo, fanfare of trumpets, beating of the tom-toms, and all of the usual performance that precedes an unusual burlesque show. Even in spite of that, I fancy the meeting would have created but little attention, probably would not have even gained the front pages of the daily press except for the fact that a very personable, likeable, and distinguished former Governor of New York State, and former Democratic nominee of the Democratic Party, was scheduled to make a speech, in which it was freely predicted that he would pay his respects to the New Deal in general, and give particular "hell" to the present administration. Some years ago a very enterprising manager of a county fair, exasperated because of his failure to secure attendance at his meetings, devised the idea of advertising that on a certain day in the fair two steam locomotives would be turned loose and run into each other at full steam ahead. So he bought two old locomotives, fired them up, put them up on the track, and set them down on either end of the fair grounds, got a full head of steam, put a string in, and pulled the throttle and turned them loose, and they exploded, to the glee and gratification of a vast crowd. A thoughtful spectator remarked, "That is just like the American people, is it not? They will go anywhere to see somebody bust "hell" out of something." So, after all of this ballyhoo, a very large audience gathered on this occasion in Washington to see the performance, and they were not disappointed. There have been many descriptions of that meeting. To my mind Heywood Broun gave the best one. He said it was a good technical performance, but otherwise "lousy."

Mr. Chairman, a very distinguished audience gathered upon this occasion—members of the American Liberty League. There were ladies bedecked in jewels and ermines. There was wealth and affluence. In all respects it was a gala occasion. If I understand correctly, the league is made up in general of three groups of people; one a group of very industrious, shrewd, and clever members of our political adversaries, the Republicans who are quite willing to enter into any honorable enterprise which may bring confusion and consternation to their enemies the Democrats on my side of the aisle. Another group is a small group of disgruntled, disillusioned, disappointed political "has beens" who have entered into this unholy alliance. Another group, quite a sizable group in this aggregation, is a company of political nondescripts. Political parties mean nothing to them except as they are able to use them and manipulate them for their own selfish interest and advantage. If they think they can gain control of the Democratic Party they are for that party. If they think they can gain control of the Republican Party then they contribute to that party's campaign fund; and oftentimes they contribute to the money chests of both parties.

But there is one thing in common between those three groups which composed that audience. That is the objective. They have declared war upon the Democratic administration, the liberal government which it is espousing, and its great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.] Actuated by widely different and separated motives, their objective is the same—the destruction of the Democratic Party, the New Deal, and the President of the United States.

They call it the Liberty League. Liberty League! O Liberty, what crimes are committed in thy name! [Applause.] Liberty League! In what liberties are they interested? As I looked over the roster of that imposing company I wondered which of their liberties were in danger. I wondered if there was gathered at that sumptuous table a single human being who had missed a meal during this depression. I wondered if numbered in that company there was a single head that had tossed upon a sleepless pillow during these fateful years because of the fear of the loss of his farm, his home, or his business, or who had drunk from the bitter cup of failure and disappointment! Liberty League! They are not interested in liberty. They are interested in license—license to use and control the functions of Government for their own advantage. [Applause.] That is what they are interested in. I could not help but wonder, as I listened on the radio—it is radio now. It used to be "raddio." [Laughter.] We have reformed our language since we got into the Liberty League. [Laughter.] Moved uptown. [Laughter.]

When I heard this distinguished speaker, there amid the guffaws and applause of the gathered guests to his sallies and witticisms and wisecracks and jibes, my mind seemed to be running pretty much along the same channel as another mind, a fellow New Yorker of the distinguished ex-Governor. The Reverend Stephen S. Wise is quoted as having said this in this morning's New York Times:

> "There was high drama, if not tragedy," Dr. Wise said, "in the spectacle last night of a most eminent American, risen from direst poverty to fame and power, who prefaced an address which dealt with the misery of one-third of the American people over a term of years, from the viewpoint of one who said of himself: 'I have supreme happiness and comfort.'
> "Can any man in these bitter years of tragedy who refers to 'my supreme happiness and comfort' qualify himself for passing on the quality of a Nation which aims not to comfort the few but to lift out of the hell of misery and starvation tens of millions who, through no fault of their own, know no happiness or comfort?"

[Applause.]

It was a strange gathering in which our erstwhile Democratic friend found himself. His unequaled ego doubtless feeding upon the applause of this sumptuous gathering, I wondered if he realized that 75 percent or more of those in attendance were people who in 1928 started a certain very well-known whispering campaign against the Democratic nominee in 1929. [Applause.] And what were they whispering? Oh, they were pointing the finger of ridicule and scorn at the Democratic nominee for the Presidency. They were kindling the fires of bigotry. They were offensively personal in their attacks. And yet Saturday night there they were applauding him, enjoying his remarks and his jibes at the Democratic Party, which had conferred upon him the highest honor that it can confer upon an American citizen. Indeed a strange spectacle.

Of course, the big news of the affair was that there was supposed to be forthcoming from this gentleman a statement of what the country might expect his attitude to be in the future, and, with characteristic dramatic effect, he told the audience. He admonished the Congress to forget the election, but he said:

> My mind is on the Democratic Convention, and I seem to see the resolutions committee coming in with a resolution endorsing Roosevelt and his administration.

Well, at least he is a good prophet, is he not? [Applause.] Now, he said:

> What am I going to do, and what are some of these other Jacksonian and Jeffersonian Democrats going to do? There is only one of two things we can do; either put on the mantle of hypocrisy or take a walk, and we will probably take a walk.

Well, that is what we might have expected. The Happy Warrior takes a walk! But let me point out to you a very definite and subtle effort was made in that speech to make it appear to the country that because of the fact that the Democratic Party had allegedly left its platform and betrayed its trust, here was a great Democratic chieftain who was now finding it necessary to part company with his colleagues and his allies. Do you catch it? Oh, he read off the Democratic platform section by section. With jibes and wisecracks he would read a section, and he would say, "That is thrown into the wastebasket." Al Smith having said that, of course, it was definitely adjudicated in the affirmative, and why waste time talking about it? Pass on to the next. He tossed all of the Democratic platform into the wastebasket and then, with tears in his heart, told us that he had the painful duty of saying that if the Democratic convention in Philadelphia should bring in such a resolution he would have to take a walk. My friends, he would not have to take a walk. He took that walk some time ago. [Applause.] You cannot walk out of some place you have never been in. He is not going to take a walk in Philadelphia. He and Shouse took the walk in Chicago. [Applause.]

How well do we remember that walk. Failing to receive the nomination, they, like spoiled children, gathered up their blocks and paper dolls and slid out of sight! Then followed months of silence. There was speculation as to whether the Governor would ever vote with his party. Not until within a few weeks before the election in 1932 did he break his silence. Then came the famous speech in New Jersey. As I recall it, he spent about 55 of his 60 minutes delivering a lecture on intolerance and lambasting the forces that had defeated him at Chicago. For the last few minutes of his speech he called the name of the nominee and called for the support of the ticket.

What then? Did he buckle in and offer his influence, experience, and wise counsel in trying to solve the tremendous problems at hand? Not he! Every time the Governor has opened up he has taken a crack at the administration. So, after all, we are not so much surprised at his attitude.

In fact, he is just about now coming to be Democracy's most famous "walker-outer." The Governor and his pals were strong for the show if they can be in the center of the main ring; strong for the parade if they can lead the procession and beat the base drum; strong for the Democratic Party if they could rule it and dictate to it; but if anybody else ever had an idea, if anybody else were ever given an honor, they take a walk.

And whom do they walk out on? He walked out on the man who had nominated him in three national conventions, and who had referred to him—what an unhappy phrase!—as the "Happy Warrior." "Happy Warrior", indeed! Well, he may be happy, but where is the warrior? He says now that the Democratic Party is being ruined; he says that America is being ruined. His heart is bleeding, and what does he do? He takes a walk! Can you imagine Jefferson, or Jackson, Woodrow Wilson, Cleveland, or Franklin D. Roosevelt taking a walk if their party and their country were in danger? They would have been in there with the fight. No; he took the walk in Chicago and is still walking; and he just happened to stop in Washington the other night on his hike. [Laughter.] Paradoxical as it may seem, the very first thing the present administration did was to carry out Al's 1928 platform of his own making—repeal of the Eighteenth Amendment.

Now, my friends, I do not want to be flippant, and I certainly am not going to be personal about this matter. I remember back a little further even than 1932; I remember 1928; and I want to ask you this question: When did the sanctity of a Democratic platform become so important in the eyes of this gentleman? I seem to remember a convention at Houston in 1928. I remember that at that time both major political parties were shot through the middle with the prohibition issue. Neither party wanted to take a definite stand on it. Our friends, the Republicans, over here, did not take a definite stand on it. There was a strong element at Houston who wanted to come out for a repeal plank. They made a fight in the committee on resolutions for an outright repeal plank. Another element wanted to avoid that issue. Finally they compromised their differences and brought in a plank on observance of the Constitution and law enforcement. They nominated the Governor of New York and sent him a telegram. Do you remember the telegram he sent Senator ROBINSON? Talking about political platforms! after expressing his gratification, he said:

> It is well known that I believe there should be fundamental changes in the present provisions for national prohibition, based, as I stated in my Jackson Day letter, on the fearless application to the problem of the principles of Jeffersonian democracy. While I fully appreciate that these changes can only be made by the people themselves through their elected legislative representatives, I feel it to be the duty of the chosen leader of the people to point the way which, in his opinion, leads to a sane, sensible solution of a condition which I am convinced is entirely unsatisfactory to the great mass of our people.

He wrote his own prohibition plank and then started running on it. He selected his own chairman for the National Democratic Committee. He got him from the other side of the aisle. Why, Johnny Raskob has never been a Democrat. He said he had never been but that he had voted for Wilson once. He said he had never been affiliated with any party. But "Who's Who" has him down as a Republican. Al selected him, however, and the public press quoted Mr. Raskob at that time as saying this—and how well I remember it; some of you other gentlemen of the South probably remember it too when he was quoted as having said in substance: "I accepted the chairmanship of the National Democratic Committee because I saw in it an opportunity to rid the Nation of the abominable affliction of prohibition."

Where was the party platform adopted at Houston? Rewritten by the Democratic nominee and the chairman of the National Democratic Committee.

And now, as my friend said the other night, I want to let you in on something. Down in the South where the Democratic fires burn all the time we were having a battle. You know, there were some people down there who wanted to take a walk. They did take a walk, and a certain Democratic nominee for the Presidency did not like it very much when other people were doing the walking. I can say to you, however, that every responsible leader in my State, including every Democratic Member of Congress, both United States Senators, the Governor, who was an ardent personal and political dry, the Lieutenant Governor, and, with one or two exceptions, every member of the State senate and house of delegates not only supported Governor Smith on his own self-made platform but took the stump, took the hustings in our own State, and in other States, advocating his candidacy because he was the nominee of a great party. Nobody took a walk on him then, none of the leaders. Personally, I openly and aggressively supported him. I made speeches all over my State, and in other States, unqualifiedly supporting his candidacy. [Applause.] But his attitude in running out on the Democratic platform at Houston was the principal cause, my friends, of my great old State, Virginia, leaving its traditional place in the Democratic column. [Applause.] I thank the gentleman for that lone applause on the Republican side. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to give you another one, as the gentleman said. He said he would not mind what was happening if we had gotten anywhere, but that we had destroyed the country and were just where we were when we started. That we were spending too much money, too many bureaus, and so forth. Do you remember a certain Jackson Day dinner in Washington in either '31 or '32, in which Governor Smith advocated a vast public-works program of many billions of dollars? Well, I remember it quite well. Well, my friends, I am one Democrat who does not claim perfection for the efforts of the present administration. There are, of course, only two groups in the country that I know of at the present that are perfect. One is our good friends on the left-hand side of the aisle, and the other is the Liberty League. [Laughter and applause.] The Democrats are just ordinary human beings and make mistakes. Perhaps there have been mistakes, undoubtedly there have been disappointments; but I will tell you one disappointment the American people have not had: When they enlisted under the banner of Franklin D. Roosevelt they wanted an honest, courageous, fearless, determined, consecrated leadership, and they have gotten this. [Applause.] If some of the efforts at recovery have run into constitutional objections, is there an intelligent person who honestly believes that the Congress of the United States or the President of the United States deliberately, willfully seeks to usurp the Constitution of the United States or to destroy it in its fundamental essentials?

Why, perhaps the A. A. A. was unconstitutional. For all intents and purposes it was unconstitutional, but at least one of the greatest and most liberal judicial minds of your age and mine, who comes from the Governor's own State, says it was constitutional. I do not feel any embarrassment if I am mistaken and that gentleman is mistaken.

The Governor says the country is being ruined. I want to read an editorial in my time, with the consent of the House, which comes from the Richmond Times-Dispatch, a newspaper that has not always agreed with all of the policies of the present administration. This is such an unanswerable argument to the flimsy claptrap of the Liberty League the other night that I want to read it to you:

RUINING THE COUNTRY

We were about to get a bad case of blues after reading an address by Merle Thorpe, editor of Nation's Business, official organ of the United States Chamber of Commerce, before the Bond Club of New York, when we chanced to glance at other headlines on the same page. Mr. Thorpe explained to the members of the club that the Roosevelt administration must assume responsibility for "the retarded business recovery", and was so convincing that we were about to put on sackcloth and ashes, or, since we have given support to a great many of the administration's measures, that famous hair shirt of which Mr. Hoover spoke.

But on the same page we ran across the headline, "Power Output at New High", showing that the first week in January had reached the record set during the second week in December. The story went on to say that the consumption of electricity in kilowatt-hours was 9 percent above 1934 and 2.7 percent above 1929, that year which almost all of us speak of with awe. Whether justifiably or not, the electric companies feel they have been worse treated by the administration than anybody else, next, perhaps, to the telephone companies, who are scheduled for an investigation. It happened that the same page carried, along with Mr. Thorpe's address and a record of power consumption, a story that earnings of the Bell System for 1935 were about $7 a share in comparison with $5.96 for 1934 and that the increase in telephone subscribers showed a net gain of 460,000 in 1935 and 298,000 during 1934.

We felt somewhat better about Mr. Thorpe's speech but decided to chase the gloom away entirely by looking over the headlines on the financial pages of the New York Times since January 1. A few of the items we culled follow:

From April 1, 1935, the low point of stock prices for the year, to January 1 of this year, the value of stocks on the New York Exchange alone (the figures are not available for the Curb Market or the markets located in a hundred other cities of the country) increased from $30,936,000,000 to $46,945,581,555. In other words, there had been restored to stockholders who have shares listed on the New York Exchange alone more than twice the amount of money the Federal Government has spent for recovery, excluding the recoverable items represented, for instance, by R. F. C. lendings. That does not take into account, of course, the millions of shares on the curb and on provincial exchanges, nor the values inherent in unlisted stocks, in bank stocks, in real-estate holdings all over the United States. Nor does it undertake to show how much money value has been restored since March 4, 1933, when the Government started spending for recovery.

But that is not all. Steel output was up 35 percent in 1935 and predictions are that durable goods will show an increase for this year of 50 percent. There was a rise of 10.64 percent in sales by chain stores, pig iron production was at a 5-year record; gold mining set a record for all time; furniture volume in the Chicago mart showed an increase of 25 percent; New England business, solidly against the administration, showed a general average increase of from 10 to 15 percent; bank clearings were up 6 percent; automobile production in the last quarter of 1935 increased 191 percent over a year ago; realty values made big gains; electric goods consumption increased by 20 percent; savings banks depositors numbered 16,000,000 at the turn of the year, with $10,000,000,000 in savings banks, a figure higher than 1929; life-insurance sales gained $2,500,000,000, the greatest year since 1930; foreign trade was up $500,000,000 for the year; dividends were at a 4-year record; the oil industry had its best year since 1929.

Freight-car loadings were the highest since 1931, and revenues for the railroads were up 8.1 percent over 1934. November operating income was up 66.7 percent for the country, with the West leading with an increase of 121.9; the East with 52.9; and the South with 25.4 percent increase. A New York Times headline said, "Rail Securities Reach Stable Basis."

Another study, made by the Northwestern National Life Insurance Co. of Minneapolis, showed in November a 29-percent increase in theater attendance; a 23-percent increase in household furniture purchases; luggage sales for winter travel, 25.4 percent increase; sporting goods, 24.1 percent better than last November; piano sales up 10.1 percent over a year ago; department-store jewelry sales up 18.1 over a year ago.

As Dorothy Parker (or was it Margaret Fishback?) said, "We feel better now." Or, as Josephus Daniels has frequently and ironically said in his Raleigh News and Observer, "This fellow Roosevelt is ruining the country."

If time permitted—and I have taken too much time already—I could quote from the Washington Star of Sunday morning, which carried the Governor's speech in which he said that the Democratic Party was ruining the country. The first column says, "Store sales rise slightly, despite cold wave—24 percent gain in the last year." The next column, dated New York, states, "Corporate earnings show an average increase"; and there is listed 10 or 12 of the big corporations that had larger dividends last year. The industrial index shows a gain over all of last year. "Virginia tobacco sales set a new record." Almost every column shows the same.

My friends, these facts refute the statement that the policies of the administration have retarded recovery and verify the statement that recovery started when President Roosevelt took office and has proceeded conservatively without intermittence up to this hour. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have a newspaper article of yesterday that I would like to give the gentleman to read.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman can get plenty of time from his side.

Mr. Chairman, it is very well that we understand just where we are. Something was said in the meeting the other night about a prodigal son that strayed from the house of his father. I believe the great Democratic Party and its leaders would be just as liberal, just as kind, considerate, and tender as that father in the days to come if and when this prodigal decides to foresake the error of his ways when he tires of that unnatural company with which he has associated himself, when he decides again—and God grant that he will—to throw his influence and his great personality back into the great fight that seeks to bring government back to the people where it belongs. [Applause.] We will welcome him back if he wants to come back again and join the forces of progress.

In closing, may I say that no one has suggested any attack upon the Constitution of the United States. The speaker thought it was perfectly proper in 1928 for him to point the way to change the Constitution, yet it seems to be a great sin now if any gentleman or any group of gentlemen have the temerity to suggest that perhaps in the years to come the Constitution might be further liberalized. Let us not forget that Thomas Jefferson believed that every 30 years the Constitution ought to be revised; that there ought to be a convention to revise it. But whatever that may be, Mr. Chairman, in the days to come, as in the days gone by, the Constitution and the Government will belong to the people, and it will be in safe custody in the hands of the American people. [Applause.] It will not need the Liberty League to protect it. [Applause.]

The recovery program of this administration moves on apace; the ship of state has weathered many storms; it has passed over rock and reef. There are doubtless others ahead of it. But I believe the great rank and file of American people, appreciating the courage and the sincerity of our leader, applauding his fine efforts in their behalf, will continue to give him their support and that there will go up to the mercy seat a fervent prayer that this great humanitarian, the great leader of the Democratic Party now in the White House, may have divine guidance, power, and strength to go forward with his great mission. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of the old adage that "Where the feathers fly is where the shot hit." [Applause and laughter.]

The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] has just orated in a most eloquent manner for over a half hour, ridiculing, attacking, and belittling Alfred E. Smith, a former candidate for President of his own party. And why? Because he just cannot take criticism, because the Democratic Party cannot take criticism, from their own members any more than they can take it from the Republicans.

What right has the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, of all others, to take the floor and criticize Alfred E. Smith when his own State turned against him when he was your bona-fide candidate for President in 1928? Where was the State of Virginia then? The gentleman from Virginia himself should be precluded from making this attack upon one of the outstanding Americans this country has produced in our day or generation, regardless of party politics.

I am glad to take some time here, as one who knows him personally and belongs to an opposite party, as one who served for years with him in the State legislature and saw him grow up there to be the leader of his party in the State of New York and later on become the outstanding Democrat in the country. The gentleman from Virginia, however, spent one-half hour, or more, denouncing Alfred E. Smith personally, ridiculing him, and did not answer at any time in his speech a single one of the criticisms made by Governor Smith in his speech a few nights ago.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I cannot yield.

On no occasion did he even attempt to answer a single one of the criticisms of Governor Smith aimed at the repudiation of the Democratic platform by the present administration. From the very beginning it was an indirect attack on Alfred E. Smith, his family, his table manners, and his use of the English language, and nothing else. If he had answered those criticisms, perhaps, I would not be justified in taking the floor at the present time. Governor Smith took up one plank of the Democratic platform after the other and showed, in a clear-cut and definite way, how each one of them had been repudiated by the Roosevelt administration. The gentleman from Virginia says that Governor Smith proposes to walk out on the administration, and why not? It is true that Governor Smith denounced the New Deal administration as being socialistic, and Governor Smith, in his political lifetime, has never been identified with the Socialist Party. How can Governor Smith walk out on his own party when his own party has gone socialistic? Here are his own words:

> Just get the platform of the Democratic Party and get the platform of the Socialist Party and lay them down on your dining-room table side by side and get a heavy lead pencil and scratch out the word "Democratic" and scratch out the word "Socialistic" and let the two platforms lie there. Then study the record of the present administration up to date.

Further on, he has this to say:

> Well, in 25 years of experience I have known both parties to fail to carry out some of the planks of their platforms, but this is the first time that I have known a party upon such a huge scale, not only not to carry out the planks, but to go directly the opposite way to the things which they promised.

This was a definite charge. Every Democrat on this side, and I think every one of you listened in, knows it is made in good faith. It would be perfectly right for a Democrat to take the floor and challenge these statements and attempt to deny them, but no one has. Not a single member of your party is able to challenge these statements, and I hope one of you will try to do so in his own time.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; I will not yield.

I hope in your own time you will attempt to answer the charges made by Governor Smith. I challenge any Democrat in Congress to undertake to do so.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman says he is issuing a challenge. Why will not the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Not in my time. I am offering the challenge now to any Democrat to take the floor and deny the specific charges made one by one with respect to the repudiation of your own platform.

Now, what is it that Governor Smith said the other night? I am going to put it in different words. I also intend to answer, as far as I am able, the challenge made in the House of Representatives by the President of the United States on January 3.

What does the opposition party propose? What do the Republicans object to about the New Deal? Governor Smith and the opposition party agree on the fundamental issue. I think every Republican will agree that the fundamental issue in the next campaign is the liquidation of the socialism of this New Deal administration. [Applause.] Political liquidation of the brain trusters who have never been Democrats in their lives and who have never been affiliated with the Democratic Party in the past. Political liquidation of such brain trusters as Rexford Guy Tugwell, Felix Frankfurter, the Cohens and the Corcorans, and other New Deal socialistic termites seeking to undermine the Constitution and our American system; and we propose likewise the retirement of President Roosevelt to private life next November. [Applause.]

We also urge the repeal of all unsound, unconstitutional, and socialistic New Deal experiments that have destroyed business confidence and prolonged the depression.

This is practically the same recommendation made by Governor Smith. We do not indict the whole New Deal. We indict the unsound, un-American, and unconstitutional measures that have destroyed confidence in this country.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FISH. I will not yield.

Governor Smith, in his speech the other night, takes exactly the same point of view as the Republican Party when he says that he stands for the preservation of the Constitution and representative government; the maintenance of the powers of the Supreme Court, of the Congress, and of the States; and a restoration of government by law instead of by Executive orders.

I cannot speak for all the members of my own party, but there was not a single statement made by Governor Smith that I cannot endorse personally, and there was no single statement made by him that is in conflict with any Republican or Jeffersonian Democrat who believes in our constitutional and representative form of government.

The one fault with Governor Smith's speech, which I consider to have been the most effective political speech made recently affecting the rank and file of the Democratic Party and those who know his record for progressive legislation in New York State for the past 30 years—my main objection to it is that it did not go far enough. It merely touched on the planks that have been repudiated; it did not go into the utter disregard of the political creed and faith of the Democratic Party; it did not discuss the principles of Thomas Jefferson; it did not take up the violations of party principles, but merely the repudiation of the planks in the Democratic platform.

What is it that the Democratic Party has stood for for the last 140 years?

Mr. CREAL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CREAL. The gentleman is speaking as a Republican, but he is making a Democratic speech. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order.

Mr. FISH. I will say this to the gentleman, that we Republicans expect a great number of Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democrats to cross over to the Republican Party in the defense of their own party faith and principles and help elect a Republican President this year. [Applause.]

Mr. FORD of California. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman from New York is making a Democratic speech.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a point of order.

Mr. FISH. For 140 years the Democratic Party has stood for certain principles of government, certain definite principles, which has constituted their party faith. It has stood for the rights and liberties of the individual under the Constitution. It has stood for State rights and State sovereignty and for national economy and against the centralization of governmental powers in Washington to interfere with the rights and liberties of individuals and of business.

This has been the political creed of Jeffersonian Democrats for 140 years in the North as well as in the South.

Why has not Alfred E. Smith the right to cry out against the present administration? You are violating not only your party platform but also violating your party creed.

We Republicans have always stood for a reasonable central government. We have always advocated a strong Federal Government at Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, what is it that Alfred E. Smith and other Jeffersonian Democrats complain about? You have been arraigning Alfred E. Smith. If he were the only Democrat to speak out, that would be one thing; but he is not. How about Governor Ritchie, of Maryland, who sat at that dinner the other night? How about Governor Ely, of Massachusetts, who was likewise at that dinner? What about former Senator Reed, of Missouri? What about John W. Davis, a former Presidential candidate of the Democratic Party? What about two former national Democratic chairmen? What about Lew Douglas, a former Member of this House? What about William R. Hearst, Bainbridge Colby, Governor Talmadge, and a host of other Jeffersonian Democrats? They are all in the same boat. Do you propose to read them out of your party? If so, say so. But when Governor Smith speaks, he speaks not alone for himself, he speaks for every one of these Democrats who know that you have deliberately repudiated your party platform and violated your political faith. Let us get back to the question of political principles and party faith, which Governor Smith did not touch upon. The "brain trusters", as I say, never before identified or affiliated with the Democratic Party, have taken the great Democratic Party far beyond any idea of centralized government, which Republicans have stood for in the past. They have taken it far, far beyond into collectivism, regimentation, crushing bureaucracy, and into State socialism where we are today. That is the definite charge. That is the one outstanding charge made by Alfred E. Smith—that the New Deal Democratic Party has gone socialistic, and has taken the Government into state socialism, and with that we Republicans agree. But this is an interparty fight between you and your former leaders. I challenge, therefore, a single Democrat to deny categorically the charges made by Alfred E. Smith. I challenge any Democrat to come upon this floor and read Alfred E. Smith out of your party, or any of the followers of Governor Smith or other Jeffersonian Democrats. That is the issue. And beyond and above that issue there is the liquidation of these men in your own party who have never been Democrats, the liquidation of State socialism, the liquidation of unconstitutional laws, of un-American laws, and of all the unsound New Deal measures.

But throughout the entire speech of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] he never answered one single charge made by Governor Smith. All he did was to ridicule him and those who attended that dinner. How can any Democrat ridicule other Democrats for attending a sumptuous dinner on Saturday at the Mayflower Hotel at the nominal price of $5 a plate when only a week before you had your own Jacksonian, Rooseveltian Belshazzar feast at $50 a plate in the same hotel? It comes with bad grace from the gentleman from Virginia to attack another Democrat for attending a dinner at a hotel in Washington at the customary price and then claiming that it was a sumptuous and luxurious repast. I am not here to protect the American Liberty League. I am not a member of it, I do not expect to become a member of it. I am not in sympathy with some of its aims and purposes, but I am glad to take this floor and uphold the character, courage, independence, and sincerity of Alfred E. Smith, a popular and able Democrat, and with a long record of achievements for social and industrial progress and justice as a former Governor of the State of New York. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE].

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, it again becomes my duty immediately to succeed the brilliant oratorical performance of the distinguished and modest gentleman from New York State [Mr. FISH]. I have no considerable interest, I might say, in the so-called and misnamed Liberty League, except in passing to comment upon the fact that the National Manufacturers Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Economy League, and the misnamed Liberty League, made up of the aggregated wealth of this Nation, have seen fit, as they had a perfect right to do, to have a banquet at which a distinguished member of the Democratic Party came by invitation and delivered an address. If 3 percent of the population of this Nation, which owns 97 percent of its wealth, can meet in banquet hall in the Nation's Capital and by flattery bribe a patriot like Alfred E. Smith to forget the jibes they uttered at him when, as Governor of New York and later as Democratic nominee for President, his heart and leadership were upon the side of the masses of the people amongst whom he was reared, and now to take the side of monopoly because he offices as Raskob's agent on the one hundred and third floor of John J. Raskob's and the Duponts' Empire State Building he is clearly within his rights as an American citizen to do so. If Mr. Smith chooses to walk out on the Democratic Party, then the Republican gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who praises Mr. Smith today, is clearly within his rights in doing so, because I am informed he also walked out on his own party in 1912. [Laughter.] It seems that the gentlemen from Amsterdam or Rotterdam and some other "dam" place in New York have a habit of walking out on their political pledges and obligations.

The whole effort in this Presidential year is for all reactionary forces who desire again to exploit the scattered and unorganized masses of American people, to deceive them by belittling the noble work which the Democratic President and the Democratic Congress have done to lift the country out of despair. When the Democratic Party assumed control on March 4, 1933, we inherited a $5,000,000,000 deficit which the Republicans left us. We inherited 16,000,000 idle workers which the Republican Party left us. We inherited 50,000,000 hungry men, women, and children which 12 years of Republican Party control of Government left us. We inherited the total break-down of the system of American business. We promptly and resolutely began the Herculean task of rejuvenating business and social life in America. What is it now that these gentlemen upon the Republican side, most of whom, I am happy to say, are my personal friends, would have the country believe we have improperly done? They do not specify. What is the cause of their constant complaints. They never specify. Are they distressed because in 1933 we voted $3,300,000,000, with $3,000,000,000 of which we put 3,000,000 men back to work under the N. R. A.; that we feed 50,000,000, American citizens Republican control had left hungry until hope again came into their hearts? Are these gentlemen in a bad humor because we established the Civilian Conservation Corps and put 600,000 wandering, unhappy, wretched American men to work—men whom the maladministration and futile legislation of the Republican Party for 12 long years had made wretched in this land of plenty? Are they in a bad humor because we gave them happiness and plenty and enabled them to help their families? Do these gentlemen regret—and is that what is the matter with them—that our Home Owners' Loan Corporation was such a success; that it saved 1,072,000 homesteads in towns, villages, and cities from foreclosure? Would they have preferred that the financial institutions, mortgage companies, and Wall Street foreclose and own those 1,072,000 homes? Are we not a Nation of home owners? Would there be any permanent Government but for the solidity and stability of the family and the home? Are they angry at the Democratic President and Congress because we have saved over 500,000 farms from foreclosure?

Eighty percent of the farms of the Nation were in debt and in arrears with taxes, interest upon their mortgages, and partial payments upon their mortgages when the Democrats took over the reins of government on March 4, 1933; but now there are 10 percent only of those farms that are in distress. Their taxes have been paid. Grocery accounts have been paid by the farming masses. Their interest and matured mortgage notes are paid. Their notes to banks which, in turn, had been rediscounted with the central reserve banks, have been liquidated by the sale of their crops at fair prices. Happiness is in the hearts of 40,000,000 people who produce the food and raiment on which this Nation subsists. Are these Republican gentlemen in distress of mind because the Democratic Party at the beginning of the New Deal found wheat selling at 19 cents and caused it to be selling now at $1 per bushel? Are they in distress because 2,000,000 farming families in the South, who buy one and one-half billion dollars annually from northern manufacturers in food and merchandise and manufactures, can now buy that much, when they could not have bought even $1,000,000 worth if 1933 conditions had continued to prevail? There were 2,000,000 farm families in the South, meaning 10,000,000 people, who were receiving in March 1933, four and a half cents a pound for their cotton when it had cost them 8 cents a pound to produce it; but for the last two and a half years they have been receiving 12 cents a pound, so that prosperity has returned in the South, and we are again the heaviest purchasers from northern manufacturers of any section of this country. Would they have us go back to the time in 1932 and 1933 when even Wall Street no longer had an idea how to rejuvenate the country; when we had not a Republican statesman upon this floor in the 3 years from 1929 to 1933 to utter even one sane constructive thought? Would they have us go back to the time when the few rich got richer in the sense of foreclosures and in the sense of taking away all of the valuable equities people had all over the Nation, leaving the Nation strewn with the wreck of human hopes and filled with the cry of human despair?

This is a fight in which the American people must make up their minds whether they will keep as the proceeds of their annual toil not only barely enough for existence but enough in addition to give to their families the civilizing influences of modern life, or will again submit themselves, by electing a monopolistic Republican administration, to the control and dominance of greed? I shall never believe it. My people in Texas are free and happy again. Your people on the golden coast of California, in the mighty Corn Belt of the West, all along the Ohio River in the agricultural districts, in industries everywhere, are happy and prosperous. Four hundred and fifty thousand coal miners under the N. R. A., for the first time in their lives, became free and happy people. They and their families make 3,000,000 people. When the Supreme Court killed the N. I. R. A. it killed hope and happiness in the hearts of 3,000,000 people. But by the labor disputes bill we have restored that, and again we took the side, as we ought to have taken and as the Democrats always take, of the general common good.

This is a fight throughout this Nation between the selfish and greedy portion of aggregated wealth, upon the one side, striving to monopolize everything the American people make every year above enough to keep their soul and body together, and a general diffusion of the rewards of American labor, upon the other side.

If those men who gathered at the misnamed Liberty League dinner could see it in its proper light, they would rejoice that the New Deal had saved, first, themselves from wreck and chaos, and, second, restored happiness and general prosperity to the whole country, and would be willing that there be a policy of live and let live, instead of allowing the selfish, greedy portion of big business and great wealth to dominate the councils of their group.

Those who sat at that feast of the so-called American Liberty League the other night represented $1,000,000,000 of wealth. Twelve members of the Du Pont family alone sat there, men who contributed 61 percent of the $600,000 budget last year of the Liberty League in order to keep the ballyhoo going; and those 12 members of the Du Pont family and their business associates alone have $500,000,000 of wealth. Yet, how much better are they than the farmer in the State of Maine hoeing potatoes? How much better are they than the coal miner in the State of Pennsylvania who goes down into the bowels of the earth, risking his life in order to keep the homes and industries going?

The Democratic Party has never overtaxed wealth, never confiscated wealth, and we will not overtax or confiscate wealth; but rather than repeat all the suffering, the woe, and the agony of this depression which was brought on this country by Republican administrations over 12 long years, rather than put that again upon the masses, I am willing to tax down to the bare net all income of all the Du Ponts and the rest of them who have pillaged the country.

Justice to all, special privileges to none. Think and legislate in terms of the general common good, not class advantage. It is not the rich special classes, but it is the general masses who make our America great and strong. Thus only can the general diffusion of prosperity come, bringing with it to the hearts of our people everywhere the sense of justice and universal happiness and the ennobling feeling that such a country is worth living for, worth working for, and, if need be, worth dying for.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose in taking the floor to defend Alfred E. Smith; that great American needs no defense whatever at my hands, nor by anyone else, either in this House or any other place in this great country. I care not how biased you are, you must admit that the speech delivered by Mr. Smith last Saturday evening was an epic in American politics. The man you denounce on the floor of this House, the man who rose from a newsboy on the sidewalks of New York, overcoming obstacles under which many of you would bend, and finally becoming the nominee for President of a great major party—such a man needs no defense at my hands, I can assure you.

I notice there have been some criticisms of Mr. Smith's speech. One of the most bitter came from a man named Broun, Heywood Broun, a radical, who ran for Congress on a radical ticket in the State of New York in 1932. Mr. Smith's speech, of course, would not appeal to a radical. We do not expect that it will appeal to a New Dealer, because the two terms are synonymous.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to yield.

You have criticized Mr. Smith because he said that he would either have to don the cloak of hypocrisy or take a walk this year. Well, Mr. Smith would not be the first one to take a walk. I remember away back in 1896, when your great party proposed to debase the currency of this country, some of the best Democrats in the land took a walk, and, as I recall, they put up a gold Democrat ticket headed by Palmer and Buckner; and it is to those Democrats that we can give thanks for having saved the currency of our country from being debased.

If Mr. Smith takes a walk, he will not be the first one to do so. The people of Virginia took a walk in 1928; so did the people of North Carolina; so did the people of Tennessee; so did the people of Kentucky; so did the people of Texas; and so did the people of Oklahoma, all Democratic States. Why did they take a walk?

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] had something to say about the condition of the country when the New Deal took over the reins in 1933. Yes; the country was in bad shape. We were in the midst of a bad depression; but, my friends, that depression was caused by the war that you promised the American people to keep us out of in 1916, and I do not think you are going to fool them again.

The gentleman from Virginia says that prosperity in this country is growing apace. That is news to the rest of us. According to the latest available figures, there are 20,000,000 people on relief in this country right now and 11,000,000 out of work. If you add to the number of people out of work those engaged on Government-made work, W. P. A. work, you will find the total about 13,000,000; at least 2,000,000 more people out of work now than there were when Mr. Hoover left the Presidency. Talk about going apace! Of course, you are going apace, as Mr. Smith told you; you are going through the window, three letters at a time.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; I do not care to get into a controversy with anyone now. I am merely making a few observations.

Mr. Chairman, getting back to Mr. Smith, I think it ill-behooves any man on either side to get up on the floor of this House and criticize him. We must go back to the immortal Lincoln to find a man whose life is a parallel to that of Mr. Smith. Think of the obstacles that he overcame, growing to manhood in the most squalid part of New York, and having to fight every inch of the way, overcoming all disadvantages and finally becoming the standard bearer of the great party of Jefferson, Jackson, and Grover Cleveland. I do not wonder that Mr. Smith cannot go along with this radical program. Many of you old-fashioned Democrats, in the privacy of the retiring room, are just as severe in your denunciation of the New Deal as was Mr. Smith on Saturday evening. There is this distinction, however, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Smith places his country first and his own political welfare second, while some of you political bellhops place your own political welfare first and the welfare of your country second. [Applause.]

I thank you.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, every lawyer knows that when you want to get the true meaning of a document you take the whole document. You consider it from first to last, and if any small part of it seems to disagree with the document as a whole, then that small part must be harmonized with the spirit of the whole document.

As to both the platform of the Democratic Party and the Constitution itself, I believe that any fair-minded person reading from first to last will agree that Mr. Roosevelt's administration has been in full keeping with the spirit of both. [Applause.]

"Save liberty", shout the Liberty Leaguers. "Save the Constitution", shout the leaders of the Republican Party.

Wall Street is the powerful, invisible holding company in the background, while the Republican Party and the Liberty League are the operating companies. There is an unholy alliance between these groups and big business. There is more than an alliance; there is a conspiracy; a conspiracy for the purpose of destroying President Roosevelt and discrediting his program.

These spokesmen of big business would make it appear that the Constitution is not safe in the hands of the Democratic administration. They would lead the people to believe that liberty itself is at stake and that the only hope for the future is to destroy Roosevelt and return the Republicans to power.

This long, loud wail for the Constitution is just about as convincing as the blubbering of paid mourners at a Hottentot funeral. They are not fooling anybody but themselves. Their real purpose is to wreck President Roosevelt's program of social justice and economic security.

The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution have suddenly become very dear to the big business leaders. Although they have for many years trampled under unhallowed feet the Constitution's guaranty of human rights, they now come out with pious faces and unctuous voices to invoke that same Constitution for the protection of their ill-gotten gains.

THE SPIRIT OF THE CONSTITUTION

In order to get a true meaning of the Constitution you must keep the whole instrument in mind. When Mellon and Morgan, the Gold Dust twins, were running the Government they passed by the preamble to the Constitution and most of the guaranties of human liberty and picked out the property clause, which they made the whole Constitution. But, taken alone, that does not represent the spirit of the Constitution.

I can take isolated passages of Scripture and prove by the Bible that you should go hang yourself. For instance, the Scripture says, "And Judas went out and hanged himself." It further says, "Go thou and do likewise." And it also says, "What thou doest, do quickly."

And now if the Liberty Leaguers will do that, we will do better by them than was done by Judas. We will take them down and bury them, because "we don't want 'em a-hangin' around."

No one has more reverence for the Constitution than I, but I do not propose to single out one phrase and give it a meaning inconsistent with all the rest of the document. Mr. Roosevelt's program is in harmony with the spirit of the whole Constitution. It harmonizes perfectly with the true intent and purpose of the instrument. There is no inconsistency or lack of agreement between his humanitarian program and that document.

The Constitution was never intended to used as a refuge for predatory business. If Thomas Jefferson, James Madison, Andrew Jackson, and Abraham Lincoln knew that the Constitution was used to shield the exploitation of humanity, they would turn over in their graves. The fathers intended that it serve the very opposite purpose. The Government was set up to promote human welfare.

Let me quote a few lines from the Declaration of Independence:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed * * *.

We, therefore, must conclude that governments are set up for men, and not men for governments.

No one can read the entire Constitution and not be convinced that it was ordained to promote human welfare and happiness. The spirit and purpose of that great document are set forth in the preamble. Those who are now shouting "Save the Constitution" from the humanitarian program of Roosevelt must have overlooked the preamble.

Listen—

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, provide for the common defense, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity do ordain and establish this Constitution.

There you have the very essence of the Constitution. Can there be any question that it was established to promote the general welfare of the people? The reason that it became necessary to have 12 men in the jury box was because the judges and legal men kept their eyes so close to the naked letter of the law that they lost sight of the spirit of the law. Thus, the very law that was set up to insure justice was used to defeat justice. Let me illustrate it.

There was a widow in western Oklahoma who sold some mortgaged hogs and used the money to feed and clothe her five little children. She was not able to hire a lawyer; the judge appointed one. The woman had no legal defense, but the young lawyer told her to come on to court, and then she took the witness stand to tell the truth.

The judge asked her if she knew that the hogs were mortgaged when she sold them. She said, "Yes." Then he asked her why she sold them. She pointed over to the bench where there were five little children. She said, "To feed my babies."

The legal mind of the judge saw only the cold letter of the law and it broken. The judge in his mind said, "Guilty."

But the jury, the 12 good men and true, saw 10 little bare feet and five little hungry mouths, and they said, "Not guilty." They saw the operating of a greater law, the law of justice. They saw a little mother obeying the law of life, fighting the world for her offspring. "Not guilty." They refused to see justice defeated by the very law that was set up to insure it.

It is the duty and purpose of government to protect the weak against the strong. It was never intended by the authors of the Constitution that it should be used by the strong to give them additional advantages over the weak, but rather that it should protect the weak from the exploitations of the mighty.

LIBERTY LEAGUE

Soon after President Roosevelt was elected skipper of the old ship of state and began steering it back to its true course, there was founded an organization called the Liberty League. Its membership is made up of some of the wealthiest people in the United States. The keen sense of humor of the founders of this organization caused them to name it the Liberty League. I suppose their intention was to play a joke on the American people. The same sense of humor that causes wags of a community to name a fat man "Slim", or to call a tall man "Shorty", must have prompted the name of the Liberty League. Did you ever see a real coal-black Negro that somebody did not call him "Snowball"? [Laughter.] Well, by that same token, they called this organization the Liberty League. You can label a bottle of castor oil "Pure Honey", but it doesn't change the contents. It looks very much like honey, but the label will not keep you from gagging when you take it.

"Rugged individualism" is another beautiful label, but during the regime of rugged individualism the wealth of the country was concentrated into a few hands, until 10 percent of the families owned 90 percent of the Nation's wealth. Under that regime, thousands of small businesses were driven into bankruptcy. Under that regime, there came into existence the fetid sweatshop and the inhuman institution of child labor. As a result of that dog-eat-dog regime, of the gold-plated policy of rugged individualism, 1 percent of the families of the Nation came into possession of 59 percent of the Nation's wealth, and 15,000,000 people were given the same kind of liberty that the Liberty League would save. They were given the liberty to beg, steal, or starve.

The survival of the fittest is the law of the jungle, but the fathers set up a Government to replace this law of barbarism with the humanitarian law of equal opportunities, and guaranteed these rights to the people of the United States by ordaining the Constitution as the supreme law of the land.

That law was intended to prevent the strong from exploiting the weak, it makes no difference whether that strength is mental, physical, or financial, it must be held within bounds. The Constitution recognizes and protects the rights of every individual.

But right is a relative term. One man's right ends where another's begins. Each individual right is limited by the rights of other individuals. One man's right to make money is tempered by the other fellow's right to live.

Right is a relative matter, as illustrated by the story of the Irishman who heard of free America, where there was so much liberty. As soon as he landed at New York he started walking up the street, breathing in the free air, enjoying his liberty. The first man he saw whose face he did not like, he socked on the nose. The officers took the Irishman to jail, but he protested vigorously, saying that he understood that a man had liberty over here in America. The old judge says, "Yes; but your liberty ends where the other fellow's nose begins."

The Liberty League is not thinking of liberty. They are thinking of license. They should be named the "license league." There is a vast difference between liberty and license. Liberty means a man's right to the opportunity to earn a living; it means the right to some of the sunshine of life. It means the opportunity to feed his children when they tug at his coat and ask for bread. It means the right to food, clothes, and shelter for himself and family in return for his toil.

But that is not the kind of liberty the Liberty Leaguers have in mind. They are not thinking so much of the liberty of millions of people as they are of the license to exploit them. It is not liberty they want, it is license—license to exploit their fellow man, license to run an unrestrained stock market, license to corner the markets of the world, license to form pools and get millions at the expense of the people, license to form monopolies in order to exploit the consumer.

CONSTITUTION IN SAFE HANDS

The Republicans shout, "Save the Constitution." These self-styled, self-annointed, self-appointed defenders of the Constitution would save it from what? Why, from destruction by the Democrats. And is not that good, when the entire Bill of Rights of the Constitution was written by the father of the Democratic Party, Thomas Jefferson himself? And now the Republicans would save that document from destruction by the Democrats.

Why the Democrats have taken care of the Constitution when there was no Republican Party. The Democrats have taken care of the Constitution during the periodic deaths of the Republican Party. When Thomas Jefferson was elected President in 1800, the Federalist, the then Republican Party, was as dead as a door nail. They did not even have a ticket in the field. The Democrats took care of the Constitution then without the aid of the extinct Republican Party.

Then again, when Andrew Jackson was elected President, you see the second demise of the Republican Party, and once more the Democrats were the sole and only custodians of the Constitution, but it emerged unimpaired.

Furthermore, do you remember the last hectic days under the last administration, when the clouds of depression began "Hoovering" over us? [Laughter.]

The soup lines lengthened. Communism was knocking at our door. There were food riots. The feet of the unemployed wore down the grass in our public parks. Want and misery were on every hand.

One morning we picked up the newspaper and read where the banks in Arkansas had closed. Next the banks in California went, and Minnesota followed with her bank holiday. Then Ohio closed, then Michigan, then New York.

Grim-faced men stood in little groups on the street corners and whispered to each other, "What is going to happen to our Government? Will the Constitution stand?"

In Russia, Joseph Stalin smiled to himself. In Germany Adolf Hitler pointed to the United States as an example of the failure of democratic government.

In that critical hour, out of the ranks of the Democratic Party arose a leader, calling the people to a crusade, a crusade against selfishness, a crusade for the forgotten man, a crusade to place human rights above property rights, a crusade for a New Deal; that means but one person; that spells but one name, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

Like a thunderbolt, he moved in and started action. And what I mean is, he moved in, and the crisis was averted.

But now the Republican Party, whose policy of favoritism allowed a bunch of financial highbinders to steal this Nation blind, whose do-nothing leader sat there in the White House and allowed millions of workers to be thrown out on society by the men whom they had enriched by their toil, now this party, flanked by the big business leaders, whose selfish policies brought this Nation to within 6 inches of red revolution are telling the people to save the Constitution from the Roosevelt administration. Why, man alive, the Roosevelt administration not only saved the Constitution but actually saved democratic government in the United States.

This is now the third time that the Democrats have saved the Constitution when there was no other party to save it. And now the twice-dead Republican Party is once more flat on its back, gasping for breath. Yes, sir; the Republican Party is under the oxygen tent, and a few die-hards are trying to keep life in it until the next election by pumping in fresh air from the grass roots.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAWS

What do these Republicans base their howl of "Save the Constitution" on? On the fact that the Supreme Court knocked out three recovery measures. Why, they would have you believe that the Democrats cannot be trusted with the Constitution. Let us examine the record. Congressman FLANNAGAN, of Virginia, last August inserted a very interesting chart into the RECORD of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, page 13134.

Up to May of 1935 altogether 67 laws have been declared unconstitutional since the beginning of this Government. Twenty of those laws were passed by Democratic Congresses, four were passed by Democratic Houses and Republican Senates; one was passed by the first Congress that assembled, which was nonpartisan; and now comes the surprise. For those Republicans who have forgotten their history and are going about shouting "Save the Constitution", 42 of the laws that have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court were passed by Republican Congresses and only 20 by Democratic Congresses.

But, you say, that is because there have been more Republican Congresses than there have been Democratic Congresses; but that is where you are wrong. The record shows that there have been 33 Democratic Congresses and 27 Republican Congresses. The other Congresses were either nonpartisan or else the House was of one political party while the Senate was of the other. Now, therefore, although the Democrats have had six more Congresses than the Republicans, yet the Democratic Congresses have passed only 20 unconstitutional laws, while the Republicans have passed 42.

But let us go a little further into the record. These self-styled, self-anointed defenders of the Constitution are shouting, "Save the Constitution from the Democrats." Theodore Roosevelt was a great President; no one denies that; but six of the laws passed during his term of office by a Republican Senate and a Republican House were declared unconstitutional by a Republican Supreme Court.

Then, again, everybody agrees that Abraham Lincoln was not only a great President but a great constitutional lawyer; and yet seven of the acts passed by a Republican House and a Republican Senate during Lincoln's term of office were declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

That is not all; during President Grant's term 12 unconstitutional acts were passed; 10 of these were passed by Republican Congresses and the other 2 by a Republican Senate and a Democratic House. In other words, over half as many unconstitutional acts were passed during the administration of one Republican President as were passed by all the Democratic Congresses and Presidents since the ratification of the Constitution.

Well, so much for the stubborn, unanswerable facts. The leaders of the Republicans forgot to look up the facts before they started their theme song of "save the Constitution."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Referring to the record of Theodore Roosevelt, it will be recalled that he himself recommended that the decisions of the Supreme Court on important questions be submitted to a referendum of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Oklahoma 5 additional minutes.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Now, let us compare the record of the Republicans with the spirit of the Constitution and determine whether or not their policies have been in harmony with the intent and purpose of that sacred document. It is not necessary to enact legislation in order to violate the spirit and purpose of the Constitution, but if the policies of the Government are not in harmony with the intent and spirit of the document, the instrument is rendered null and void, even though there may not be an enactment on which the Court can rule.

In the first place, if the A. A. A. law was unconstitutional because it taxed all of the people for the benefit of some of the people, then what about the tariff, Governor Smith? If the A. A. A. farm program is unconstitutional, then certainly the tariff violates at least the spirit of that same document.

Then, again, trusts and monopolies violate the spirit of the Constitution, for its purpose is to grant equal opportunity to large and small alike. But for 12 years under the Republican regime of rugged individualism small and independent businesses were forced into bankruptcy by the most questionable methods employed by the gigantic corporations. Where were the Constitution savers then? Why, they were the directors of those same corporations.

Then, again, the spirit of the Constitution was violated when they sought to curtail representative government by the use of money. We saw the wealthy pay more for seats in the Senate than for seats in the stock exchange. Then we saw the Republicans vote to seat these Senators, thereby approving such flagrant violations of the spirit of the Constitution.

Then, again, the marines were kept in Nicaragua from 1912 to 1932 in violation of the spirit of the Constitution. They were kept there at a cost to all of the people of $6,000,000 to protect the private investments of eighteen and a half million dollars of some of the people. Where were the Constitution savers then?

Furthermore, not only the spirit but the letter of the law was violated in 1920 during Mr. Harding's administration when Mellon, Morgan, Mitchell, and Mills, the four horsemen of the depression, changed the rediscount rules so drastically as to destroy billions of dollars of credit and increase the value of the dollar five times. And although the Constitution specifically says that "Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof", yet we heard no cry of "Save the Constitution" from any of the present members of the Liberty League, because it was their dollars that would be increased in value.

Then again, this sudden change of the value of the dollar caused farmers to lose their farms and homesteaders to lose their homes. They could not pay their debts in the same dollars they had borrowed. Consequently their homes were foreclosed. That property was not taken by "due process of law," but by a financial coup planned and sprung by those who are either members or eligible to membership in the American Liberty League.

Then again, the purpose and spirit of the Constitution is to establish justice, but where were the Constitution savers when our old settlers and pioneers were being foreclosed from their homes by that financial coup which created a dishonest dollar? Where were these Constitution savers when this unconstitutional injustice was being perpetrated? Why, they were busy foreclosing the mortgages, but when President Roosevelt stopped those foreclosures and threw away the auctioneer's hammer they began to shout, "Save the Constitution."

The past record of those who are now shouting "Save the Constitution" does not square with the precepts of that document. Listen, "We, the people of the United States * * *." Not we, the bankers; not we, the capitalists; not we, the Liberty League; but "We, the people."

Let me ask you, do we form a more perfect union by permitting policies that make the rich richer and the poor poorer?

Do we establish justice when men who have labored all their lives creating wealth for others are thrown out on society to starve or steal?

Do food riots, soup lines, and hunger strikes insure domestic tranquillity? Are you providing for the common defense when poverty and hunger opens the door to communism and prepares the way for radicalism?

Is the general welfare promoted when the gaunt wolf of starvation crouches at a million doors in a land where granaries are bursting with surplus grain?

Then, again, do we secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity with 15,000,000 unemployed and millions of others in economic slavery?

Governor Smith accused our administration of being socialistic and communistic. But the fact is that Mr. Roosevelt saved this country from communism.

Three years and some months ago I was in New York City—Mr. Smith's home city—and I saw two long lines of people; one was composed of well-dressed people standing in line for the privilege of paying 65 cents to go into a show; the other was a line of poorly dressed men and women who were waiting their turn to get a bowl of soup.

We have made mistakes, that is true, but we have made them on the side of humanity. These mistakes have been inconsequential to the good that has been accomplished. The criticisms have been as superficial as the mist that wraps Niagara's mighty shoulders in comparison to the great undercurrent stream of relief that has gone forward to a distressed people. [Applause.]

If Governor Smith fears communism, then he should approve the efforts of this administration to remove the causes of radicalism. Misery and suffering had opened the doors to communism, and communism was stalking in. Soup lines are the best places to hand out red propaganda and have it take root.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the gentleman know whether or not any of those men that he saw in that line have since joined the American Liberty League? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I am sure they have not.

But the "sin of it is", to use one of Governor Smith's favorite phrases, that the Liberty Leaguers have ridden around in private cars so long that they have gotten a "fatty degeneration" of the point of view.

Governor Smith has come up from the sidewalks of New York, but he has come up too far. The forty-seventh floor of the Empire State Building is a long way from the fish market.

Governor Smith called our President a dictator. Well, I want you to know, Governor, that no lily-fingered, milk-livered man can stand up against the crowds you have joined. We Members of Congress have not forgotten the pressure your utility friends put on us, nor the money they spent in doing it.

Yes, Mr. Roosevelt is a leader who leads. He is leading us out of this depression, and we will follow his leadership in the next Presidential campaign and roll up another great victory for the plain, common people—a victory like the Democrats rolled up in Kentucky last November; a victory like the Democrats rolled up in New York in the recent election of Congressman BARRY, right under the very nose of the Liberty League.

Governor Smith says he is going to "walk out" at Philadelphia. He must be getting tamer, because he ran out at the last Democratic convention. Well, we worried along without him in that election, and I suppose we can do it again.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Can the gentleman think of antipodes being further apart than HAM FISH and Al Smith?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Now, the Republicans holler, "Extravagance." Extravagance for what, may I ask? For feeding the unemployed. Whose depression is this, anyway? The nerve of the Republicans charging the Democrats with extravagance for feeding people who have been turned out of employment by a Republican depression is indeed refreshing. It reminds me of the boy who murdered his mother and father and then plead to the court for mercy on the grounds that he was an orphan. [Laughter.]

Yes; Roosevelt has spent money trying to feed those hungry human beings, and has thereby done much to prevent radicalism in this country. The best answer to radicalism is liberalism. Governor Smith, if you and the other business leaders destroy Roosevelt, you are sawing off the limb between yourselves and the tree. He is the one man that is saving us from a radical turn to the left. He is liberal enough to give relief, and that is the only answer to radicalism.

Perhaps some of the measures it was necessary for Congress to pass in order to avert a crisis have technically conflicted with the letter of the Constitution, but if you take the whole humanitarian program of Roosevelt and compare that with the platform of the Democratic Party and its avowed purpose of promoting human happiness, and then compare that administration with the Constitution, you will find Mr. Roosevelt's administration is completely in harmony with that document.

Instead of destroying the Constitution, it will breathe the breath of life into it, and make it a living, effective instrument. It will make it what its framers intended it to be, a tower of strength for the weak and a haven of refuge for the distressed.

The Liberty League shouts, "Save the Constitution."

The Roosevelt administration will save the Constitution. We have saved it from inactive, inoperative oblivion, and put it into force.

We will also save it from the dead-letter morgue of another Republican administration.

Do you think that it satisfies hunger to say to hungry men, "We will save the Constitution for you"? Do you think that helps them when their old stomachs are flappin' like a pair of rayon bloomers in an Oklahoma windstorm to tell them about the need of balancing the Budget?

You shout, "Save the Constitution!"

We answer, "Save human beings from the wretchedness of poverty."

Save the Constitution? Save 15,000,000 people from unemployment.

Save the Constitution? Save the stockholders from being robbed of their dividends by the holding companies.

Save the Constitution? Save the consumer from paying exorbitant rates to the power companies.

Save the Constitution? Save the investors from being swindled by stock-market pools.

Save the Constitution? Save the small businesses from the cut-throat competition of the big corporations.

Save the Constitution? Save millions of mothers who die in childbirth for the want of medical care.

Save the Constitution? Save millions of women from the evils of the sweatshop.

Save the Constitution? Save millions of children from the curse of child labor.

Save the Constitution? Save the home owner from foreclosures.

Save the Constitution? Save the feeble old fathers and mothers from the humiliation of the poorhouse.

Save the Constitution? Save farmers from bankruptcy.

Save the Constitution? Save the wage earners from economic slavery.

Put the humanitarian program of Mr. Roosevelt into law and you have saved the Constitution.

This is more than a political campaign. It is a fight between the people and the corporations. It is a contest between profits and blood, between men and money. It is a test whether or not we will have a government in harmony with the whole spirit of the Constitution or whether the property clause will dominate the entire Government. It is a test determining whether or not human rights are more sacred than property rights.

We have on our side Roosevelt, the fearless, lion-hearted leader. On the other side is the wolf of Wall Street. We have him in the corner. He is showing his teeth. Roosevelt is going in to finish him.

Let every patriot, regardless of previous party affiliations, support this great champion of human rights, and save once more constitutional government for the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, for perhaps the first time I wish to indulge myself the pleasure of a political speech. I wish the gentleman from Oklahoma, who preceded me, could meet Al Smith this morning. I think Mr. Smith would tell him a story similar to this one of the actress. A young man fell violently in love with this actress. His grandfather called him aside and argued with him about it. He said, "Young man, I was in love with her once myself, when I was young; but, oh heavens, how she has changed!" I think that is what Al Smith tried to tell the country last Saturday. Commenting on another phase of the remarks by the gentleman from Oklahoma, I would say that the Republicans have been in power so much and the Democrats so little of the time it is small wonder there were 42 decisions of the Supreme Court against the Republicans and only 20 against the Democrats. I cannct argue that until I know the quality of the decisions and the importance of the issues at stake. It reminds us of the old Dutch governor who, when evidence was produced by both sides, merely weighed it according to its avoirdupois. I sympathize with these older Democrats who also loved the actress of the former day and who, down in their hearts, still love her, and have to endure in silence the great change that has been manifest in their Miss Democracy. Many of them have approached me and told me their true feelings regarding the socialistic doctrines now engrafted on their party. I sympathize deeply this afternoon with the Democratic Members from the State of New York. The excoriation of their beloved leader of so many years must have seared their souls. Will they take it silently? I shall hope that a New York Democrat will stand here before the day is over and reply to Virginia.

Those who have preceded me on that side have simply abused Mr. Smith personally. They have not answered a single argument of his speech. Mr. Smith was careful to say about as follows: "I represent nobody; I am perfectly happy because I do represent nobody, not even the Liberty League—they merely invited me here to speak." But you received awful bruises from his speech, and we see the marks on your faces. Mr. Lewis W. Douglas has handed you many; Governor Talmadge has handed you many; ex-Senator Reed and a host of others who used to love the old Miss Democracy have handed you additional bruises and you have said nothing about them. But now that you have had a real one given you by a greatly beloved personality of your own party you this afternoon drag him into court to be indicted and with the hope that he may be punished. A poor colored woman was thus brought into court. She had a dreadful bruise on her cheek, and, when asked how she got it, said, "It was given to me by my gentleman friend." So you are trying to indict one who is, perhaps, the greatest friend of the Democratic Party. The judge—the great American public—will now determine whether or not you provoked and deserved the punishment he inflicted more in sorrow than in anger. Mr. Smith set forth in plain terms the explanation of the resounding blow he felt forced to deliver. Mr. Smith said that he would probably take a walk. He was going to walk out of what? He emphasized what he would be forced to walk away from. He said, in effect, "I am walking out of the socialistic party that has swallowed up my own party." He is not walking away from the Democratic Party. You should fully understand that fact. He told you to again take up the Democratic platform of 1932. Will you excoriate him for that appeal? Many, many times he and others have warned you against accepting a socialistic platform. Regarding the framers of these socialistic measures he said, "I never heard of them; I would not know one of these under secretaries if you would show him to me; they are not Democrats of whom I have ever heard." This socialistic party is what he is walking out of, not the Democratic Party.

And many of you—if you dared say what is deep down in your hearts—would express similar serious misgivings over what has happened to your party. You deified your candidate of 1932 and promised to bow down and obey. In consequence Congress is now only a rubber stamp. In one vote we gave him, to spend as he pleased, the vast sum of $4,800,000,000. Never in my political life did I get such a shock as when my friend from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, sitting in front of me—cast his vote for that measure. After all those years of watching and objecting to every small expenditure the exact method of which could not be proven, he suddenly capitulated to the spendthrifts and wasters. The Democratic donkey, like the old gray mare, ain't what she used to be. Perhaps that is one reason why we read in the papers so constantly that Congress has fallen "to its present low estate."

I call your attention now to Governor Talmadge, of Georgia. I have not the time to read all that he says in this article, but I do not want you to miss this political gem. I do not know him, of course, but sometimes even unpopular men can say something in rhyme or epigram which is so pertinent and expressive that it is really helpful. He draws our attention to these socialistic reform measures, most of which are being proven unconstitutional and proving un-American. Limericks often aptly express the logic of a situation, and I was interested to read at the end of Governor Talmadge's speech the follow lines, in his usual picturesque style:

I thank my God the sun and moon
Are both stuck up so high,
That no presumptuous hand can stretch
And pluck them from the sky.

If they were not, I do believe
That some reforming ass
Would recommend to take them down
And light the world by gas.

[Laughter.]

Somebody from Texas dared to boast about the N. I. R. A. this morning. I did not know there was anyone left who would even suggest that the N. I. R. A. was really good legislation. The A. A. A. has gone. Others are going. What will be left? Later on, when you are tempted to boast of some of your other reforms, I shall wish to have something to say about the meager results obtained, compared with the enormous expenses already incurred and which must be continued almost indefinitely.

The gentleman from Virginia who made the opening speech this morning was probably not, at heart, with Al Smith in 1928, since his State voted for Hoover. My good friend from Virginia can do better than he did today. He should not employ the arts of the demagogue on Governor Smith. He received great applause from your side when he said probably there was not a man at the Liberty League dinner who had gone without a meal during the last 2 or 3 years. That is a demagogic utterance. It is not argument. It is not answering Governor Smith. He was evidently selected to reply to the arguments advanced by the Governor. He did not even attempt to do so. I know but little about the Liberty League. I do not belong to it myself. But I thank them for any contribution they may make to me or to you, by providing us with information. I am not identified with the organization. It am not one of those who has any reason whatsoever to join in protecting what some of us have characterized as "entrenched greed", and I do not for a moment believe that the league does stand for that sort of thing. Yet, if we should attempt to champion it we, too, would come in for violent abuse.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Is my friend from Massachusetts jealous of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] because he received applause?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no; but I am sorry for any gathering that will applaud demagogic appeals. This seems to be a court this afternoon. You are sitting here to try Al Smith. I wish you to be like the judge the gentleman from Texas would be if he were sitting on the bench in a trial. If a lawyer attempted to draw tears from the jury by such a type of appeal, I am sure that he would remind them in his charge that the facts are what they have to consider, not the emotional appeal.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman from Virginia did get applause, and I have not heard any yet for the gentleman's speech.

Mr. EKWALL. You will in just a few minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not come here attempting to bore for tears or court applause.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman not think if he brought the Members of the Senate and the Cabinet over to hear him he would have gotten some applause?

Mr. GIFFORD. I am not looking for applause, I am not sorry to say. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] portrayed the improvement in business. I asked him to yield. I would not have done it had I known that he had stated his refusal to yield at the beginning. He was very wise. The gentleman had read the papers so assiduously on yesterday. Well, I read them also. I noted the downward trend of business during the last 10 days or 2 weeks.

I noted the plight of our dollar in nearly all the nations of the world, as set forth in the newspapers yesterday. What is the reason for it. What has happened lately? It was not Al Smith's speech that caused it. We know the cause, however. Keep on balancing the Budget the way you are doing. You cannot continue to fool the people after the Budget debacle of the past 2 weeks. Business knows and financial experts know what it means, and since there is no attempt being made to raise additional revenue they have good reason to fear further tinkering with the currency itself. Of course business has been improving, in spite of all this. Governor Smith told you why in his speech. I did not expect to speak this afternoon, but I recognized that you were holding court on Governor Smith, and I did not wish a demagogic, personal attack resorted to when Mr. Smith has presented such a plain, clear-cut case that merits real argument.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not true that it is rumored the Republican Party is going to nominate Al Smith for President?

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not think so. One of you fellows said once that any Democrat was better than any Republican.

Mr. BLANTON. Is not that so?

Mr. GIFFORD. I believe the gentleman thinks so. Looking over this Republican delegation can you not find one big enough to match the poorest of your membership? I fear the gentleman thinks not.

Mr. BLANTON. That is not our fault.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. EKWALL. I just want to admonish the gentlemen on the other side that if they will only be patient, we will show them a candidate who will run them clear out the back door next time.

Mr. BLANTON. When? Who?

Mr. HOUSTON. Who? Name him.

Mr. GIFFORD. Al Smith told them there is only one pair of ears the news has not reached yet.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman heard the orator from Oklahoma optimistic for the Democrats. Does the gentleman think he reads the Literary Digest?

Mr. GIFFORD. If he does not, I have the Digest poll right here and shall be glad to read it to him. Of all the oratorical speeches that have been made here this afternoon, no one has even attempted to answer Governor Smith; they were personal attacks. Must we wait until tomorrow night, holding our breath in expectation, that the leader in the other body will annihilate his former party candidate, who rode with him in 1928 as candidate for Vice President?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is my friend from Massachusetts supporting the Borah-Fish ticket?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no. I have no candidate as yet.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought maybe that was the ticket our good friend was referring to.

Mr. GIFFORD. I am telling my people in emphatic terms that all we desire is a good candidate; that the next campaign is to be on issues. Has not the gentleman heard about that? And we have plenty of issues, as important as any ever presented to the country, particularly the Constitution. It will be a campaign of real patriotism. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GASSAWAY].

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Chairman, every time I hear a speech like Al Smith's speech it makes me think more of Judas Iscariot and Aaron Burr, especially when I stop to consider that Al Smith was made by President Roosevelt.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GASSAWAY. Yes.

Mr. EKWALL. Are both those gentlemen members of the Democratic Party? [Laughter.]

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Roosevelt is. Incidentally, I want to apologize to this House for the fact that I made 104 speeches for Al Smith in 1928.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GASSAWAY. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Can the gentleman give me some suggestion as to why no gentleman of the Democratic Party or from New York State, or from the North has seen fit to answer Al Smith's charges or to defend them?

Mr. GASSAWAY. I do not know about that, but I would sure enough like to answer them; and I believe that any man with common intelligence or decency could answer them. I will say to the gentleman that he is just taking up some of my time, and I have used only 2 minutes' time since I have been in the House. Al Smith was most certainly unfair and unkind to a friend who had been kind to him on two specific occasions that I know of in a national convention and nominated him for President of the United States.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question before he proceeds?

Mr. GASSAWAY. No; the gentleman just wants to use up my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MILLARD. The gentleman stated that the President had made Al Smith. Is not the gentleman mistaken? Did not Al Smith make the President?

Mr. GASSAWAY. No; and the gentleman knows better than that.

Mr. MILLARD. The people of New York believe to the contrary.

Mr. GASSAWAY. Well, Roosevelt happens to be President and Al Smith is not President. That takes care of that matter.

Mr. Chairman, I just come from the State of Oklahoma, but I know what is fair and square. The gentleman on the other side are just popping off a little bit about Al Smith's speech the other night, but they do not like him any better than I do. There is not a decent Republican here who likes him. Take the Republican Members who sit on the Judiciary Committee with me. I love them, and they know I do. Those Members do not admire Smith. No. They despise him just exactly as I do. Al Smith has turned—I do not know for how many pieces of silver, but he has turned against his friends. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that we Democrats ought to consume a great deal of time condemning the Republicans. Do you know that most of us who call ourselves Democrats, and may I also include Franklin D. Roosevelt—one of the most progressive and humanitarian men that ever occupied the White House—would not have been elected to office had it not been for the Republicans voting for the Democratic candidates? In the primary election in 1932 there were but 750 registered Democrats and 33,000 registered Republicans in the district which I represent. I was successful in securing the Democratic nomination.

Mr. MORITZ. Will the gentleman yield and tell us what his total vote was on the Democratic side?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes. In the general election that vote of 750 increased to 34,000.

Mr. Chairman, in 1932 our country was in a terrible plight and had it not been that a man like Roosevelt was elected President we would have had a revolution.

I am now going to tell you something that most of you do not know. On about the 5th of January 1932 I was one of 25,000 men who came to Washington, led by Rev. James R. Cox, pastor of St. Patrick's Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.. At that time I was a member of the Legislature of Pennsylvania. When I heard that Father Cox, the champion of the oppressed, was going to lead this army I did not hesitate to inform my colleagues in the legislature that I was going on that march with Father Cox, who had the courage to lead an army of unemployed to Washington to see if something could not be done for them. May I inform the Members of the House the unemployed men who came to Washington were desperate—in fact, I heard many of them say they would be willing to storm the White House if Father Cox would say the word.

Mr. Chairman, since President Roosevelt has been in office there has been no march of the unemployed to Washington. He has prevented that by the humanitarian legislation he was instrumental in having Congress pass. It is a fact that some of the legislation which has passed was declared unconstitutional.

For example, when the N. R. A. was functioning the salaries of employees were increased and the hours of labor were decreased. This morning I was informed by an elevator operator that he is now working 12 hours a day and does not get a day off in a month. He said that when the N. R. A. was in effect he worked only 8 hours a day and 6 days a week. Since the repeal of the N. R. A. the salaries of the employees in many of the chain stores and other business institutions were decreased and the hours of labor have been increased.

Let us take the Social Security Act, which provides pensions for the aged, unemployment insurance, and other worth-while measures. It is true that the pensions provided for in the bill for the aged are inadequate but, nevertheless, the act in itself is an excellent foundation on which adequate pensions and other constructive legislation can be based. In other words, a great deal of the legislation which President Roosevelt sponsored is outstanding, because it applies not only to the unfortunates of our country but also to all who labor for a livelihood.

We Members of Congress can solve the economical problems of our country if we will permit ourselves to be actuated by humanitarian motives instead of selfish ones. The opponents of the New Deal maintained that the legislation the President has sponsored is socialistic and communistic. If socialism or communism means employment for the unemployed at a saving wage, adequate pensions for the aged, unemployment insurance, abolition of poorhouses, and wiping out the slum districts of our country, then, damn it, let us have socialism or communism!

I hope that the time is not far distant when the Democrats, Republicans, Farmer-Laborites, Progressives, and those affiliated with all other parties will put party politics aside and pass legislation which will benefit humanity. There is no need for a depression. The people should be employed at all times. Our natural resources are inexhaustible. They are not worth billions of dollars but are worth trillions of dollars.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman states that our resources are worth trillions of dollars.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes; I said trillions.

Mr. KNUTSON. A trillion is a thousand billion, as I recall. Then we cannot depend upon Government figures, which gave the total assets of this country in 1929 as $350,000,000,000, or only about one-third of a trillion.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The amount to which you have referred, the $350,000,000,000, means the property and resources now in operation. I still maintain that our undeveloped resources are worth trillions of dollars.

Mr. KNUTSON. And the gentleman could go further and talk about the fertility of the soil and the stuff we are going to take out of the soil in the next thousand years, which would bring our potential assets up to quadrillions.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Yes; they are really worth that. Our developed and undeveloped natural resources should not be determined by those metals called gold and silver. They could evaporate overnight and we would not starve or thirst to death. Is it not a fact that we can destroy a tree in less than 5 minutes, but it takes many years to grow a tree?

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. MORITZ. I want to congratulate the gentleman on saying that there is nothing sacred about political parties. The gentleman has shown this, because the people of Pittsburgh have all turned Democrats because that was their only salvation. [Applause.]

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. In conclusion I wish to state that next November the citizens of the United States will decide whether or not they believed in the legislation sponsored by the President. The fact that many of the labor organizations in the Unted States have already endorsed President Roosevelt's policies is a good indication that he will be reelected to the high office he now holds. The Republicans and Democrats ought to unite in behalf of Roosevelt because his legislation is nonpartisan. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I have observed the distress and dismay of my brethren on the Democratic side today with great sympathy, and while the role of a peacemaker in a family row is always dangerous, if they will permit me, I would like to make a suggestion as to the easiest way out.

The Democratic Party, for which I have real respect—if I were not a Republican I would probably be a Democrat—I am a Jeffersonian Democrat in much of my thinking now—the historic old Democratic Party looks to me like a fine, venerable gentleman of high standing who got along in years and being somewhat lonely decided to marry a young wife. She was beautiful, brilliant, spoke his language, and seemed designed by Providence to inspire and comfort his declining years; so he married her.

Everything went along beautifully for a few months. Then she began to change. Women will. She began to speak in loud, dictatorial, and domineering tones when he came home, telling him what to do, and how and when to do it—"must" legislation, for instance. Then she went out and without his consent or authority ran heavy bills in all directions, which he did not feel quite able to pay, but which he felt compelled to pay in order to protect his good name. Then, worse still, she began to go out with strange men described by the neighbors as "brain trusters." At last came the dinner Saturday night, which threatens to become the most embarrassing episode in the old gentleman's experience.

I have been surprised that some of these New Yorkers have not stood up here today for Al Smith. He is their leader, and he will continue to be, come hell or high water.

Now, I want to suggest to this venerable, high-class gentleman a course of procedure which I think he ought to take, and which will restore his peace of mind and reestablish him in the confidence of the community. I think he ought to apply at once for a divorce on the ground of extreme mental cruelty and incompatability of temper.

Mr. EKWALL. And desertion.

Mr. EATON. And desertion, and I believe that he will be granted that divorce in the court of public opinion, and without alimony. Now, my beloved Democratic brethren, that is as far as I can go. I do not know whether you will take my advice or not, but it is offered in the spirit of helpfulness in this hour of your deep distress and grief.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I am of a yielding disposition.

Mr. BEITER. And that alimony will be paid, I suppose, by the Liberty League.

Mr. EATON. Well, if you want to work it off on somebody else, that will show that you are smart. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks made earlier in the day.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, there have been so many political speeches delivered today that any further attempt on my part to continue that sort of discussion would lack interest and probably result in the evacuation of the House. I want to talk about a more important subject—a subject that every man and woman in this House ought to be constantly talking about, thinking about, and doing something about; a subject that the world is seriously seeking an answer to today.

Talking about Republicans and Democrats, about their being liberals or radicals, or talking about a Democrat and referring to him as a socialist is all thin air when you think of what is happening around us. Hidebound, reactionary Republicans and progressive, forward-looking Democrats are found today in movements that would be alarming to the average Member, whether he sat on the Democratic or Republican side of the aisle a few years ago. Men are coming to Congress with ideas which are strange to both radicals and reactionaries of a few years ago.

Why this change? It is coming about, my friends, because we have not yet solved the one enigma of the century, and that is the problem of distribution. We can stand here and talk politics from now until doomsday, yet people back home will leave both parties unless we solve that problem of unemployment.

A few days ago we were treated to a very interesting philosophical address by that distinguished student and scholar from Texas, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary. He told us of the coming of the Triple A, of the great benefits which resulted to agriculture from that Act. He told us in no uncertain terms that agriculture was the basic industry upon which the prosperity of every other industry depended. He explained to us that under that act, an affirmative and direct act, agriculture had prospered and that its income had risen from $4,000,000,000 in 1932–33 to approximately $7,000,000,000 last year.

He told us how wheat had struck the lowest price in a century when it sold for 42 cents in the concluding year of the previous administration, and how it had reached a new high under the present administration when it went over 96 cents. Above all, he admonished us to hold that gain and to hold it by law, by giving our thought, time, and attention to it to prevent that low price level from returning to scourge this Nation again.

There is another matter as important as is a prosperous agriculture, which I desire to discuss with you today, and I want to explain to you the recent attitude of both political parties insofar as the labor question is concerned. The Democratic Party traditionally has been the friend and advocate of direct labor legislation. The Republican Party has been the traditional advocate of indirect labor legislation.

Since the turning of the century, we have had two progressive eras in the political history of our country—one under the late Woodrow Wilson and the other under the present President of the United States. If you look at the record, you will agree with me that in both administrations the Democratic Party attempted to solve the labor question by direct, affirmative action. On the other hand, the Republican Party, not content with the repeal, modification, or weakening of those direct attempts, went on to settle the problem by giving to the special interests of the country protective-tariff legislation, by modifying, diminishing, and reducing taxes on wealth, and giving industry a freer hand by which it might work out its destiny, leaving labor to the crumbs that might be dropped to it.

The Democratic Party, in keeping with its tradition, enacted the N. I. R. A.

In order that I may not be criticized, I have here in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the roll call listing the men and women of this House who took their stand in this Chamber for or against that measure. I find, on reading the RECORD, that there were Members on both sides of the aisle defending it because of its being constitutional, and I also find a few individuals on both sides opposed to the legislation because, in their opinion, it was not constitutional.

When the N. R. A. was passed there was not only an authority given by direction, there was a mandate to wipe out child labor and to eliminate the sweatshop. There was also authorized the shorter work periods and higher wage scales. And after you digest the philosophy of the N. R. A., if you will look over the labor legislation under Woodrow Wilson, you will find there a similarity that will prove the point I am trying to make, that there was an attempt by direct action to solve the labor problem.

During the administration of Woodrow Wilson an effort was made to increase the wages of labor and give labor the right to collective bargaining. Also an effort was made to destroy the injunction against labor. An effort was made to wipe out the "yellow dog" contract against labor, and labor was given the dignity and prominence accorded to industry, a place in the Cabinet of the President.

Direct and affirmative action was not only given the administration in the days of Woodrow Wilson but under President Roosevelt we find a similar effort to give labor the right to bargain collectively and an act to prevent the "yellow dog" contract. Also another measure to destroy the power of injunction against labor and give labor the right, through its own organized power, to shorten work periods and increase wage standards.

We did this not by indirection, but by direction. The Democratic Party undertook to solve it, not by indirection, the philosophy of the Republican Party, but by direction, by positive, friendly acts of Congress.

The N. R. A. restored 3,000,000 jobs to the unemployed. It buoyed up the buying power by approximately $3,000,000,000; but machines and power have destroyed more labor opportunities since the coming of the N. R. A. than N. R. A. could create. More than that, there are over a million boys and girls becoming of working age each year, and with lessened and diminished working opportunities they only increase the number of unemployed. Unless something akin to the N. R. A. is adopted, unless that twilight zone which allows the exploiters of labor to escape between Federal and State authority, then by 1945, if labor-saving devices continue in the future as they have in the past, there will be 20,000,000 wage earners in America without work.

Today there are 17,000,000 of our population between the ages of 45 and 60 years, and the bars are up against them in industry; they are, in the estimation of some, too old to meet the requirements of the high-powered, efficient machines of today. But again, the affirmative and positive action of the Democratic Party must take place or we do not solve the labor problem.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield gladly.

Mr. McCORMACK. In connection with the N. R. A. the gentleman has made a very powerful and constructive speech, which I think most of us agree with. I know I agree with it. I think this is a very excellent place to put in the RECORD that before the passage of the N. R. A., business, with practical unanimity, urged the Congress to pass N. R. A. legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield briefly in another connection at that point?

Mr. MEAD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether the gentleman has secured permission to revise and extend his remarks, but inasmuch as our party is being constantly assailed about some of the New Deal measures I trust the gentleman will incorporate the vote to which he has just referred on the adoption of the N. R. A. and indicate which Democrats and which Republicans voted for it.

Mr. MEAD. I shall be very glad to do that.

In following up the statement made by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK], let me say there was little opposition in this House or in the other Chamber or in the press or as far as public opinion was concerned when we were passing recovery measures. When we were passing recovery measures in this House—and that included the A. A. A., the N. R. A., and the rest of the so-called alphabetical list which applied to recovery—we were the white-haired boys of the exploiters of American labor.

If we dared to vote against our President, then we were marked men back home. It was not until we had completed the recovery program, after we had taken care of the wreck and ruin by opening the Treasury through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and other media in order to rehabilitate the insurance companies, the railroads, the banks, and other industries from their losses, only when we turned to prevent the coming of another wreck, only when we turned to reform measures, that we were put on the spot and denounced by big business throughout the country. [Applause.] Now they attack the reform program by condemning the recovery program which they favored and which saved them.

Now, so that you will be sure I am right, I say our philosophy of recovery and reform in no way retards recovery.

There is nothing wrong, as I see it, with the program adopted, with the help of many of the Republicans in this House, looking toward recovery and reform, because this is the record. And every morning, in order that you may enjoy your breakfast, let me make this suggestion to you: After glancing at the news look at the financial and market pages of our papers. You will find that production is almost back to the high peak of 1929. You will find earnings, dividends, and profits soaring to new heights, prices of stocks and bonds looking better than they ever did.

However, proving that I am right, that we have a problem difficult to solve, that we have an enigma which challenges the wisdom of statesmen the world over, one that is giving an opportunity to those outside of political parties to attempt, either by good methods or bad, to solve this question, new leaders are coming up in our midst because of the growing problem of unemployment and the discontent and unrest associated with it. That is true in this country and in every other industrial country of the world. Unless we put our minds to the task and solve it, someone will solve it for us; they will solve it in their own way without any aid from us.

I said a moment ago the Democratic Party has an affirmative plan and the Republican Party has one of negation. I want to summon a great Republican as my witness today to prove that statement. This is his letter to the chairman of the Republican National Committee. It is signed by Frank E. Gannett, publisher of a chain of conservative newspapers:

> As a Republican, I earnestly urge the national executive committee and all leaders of our party to concentrate on these issues:
> 1. How can the American economic system be made to function, within the Constitution, so private business can put 10,000,000 idle back to work?
> 2. How can the income of agriculture be raised, by constitutional means, so that the wage of ten and one-half million Americans gainfully employed in farming shall be more than $1.39 a day, including the A. A. A. benefits, as in 1934?
>
> Our program must be affirmative, not merely negative. We must convince the country that our policy can restore the whole people's well-being with economic freedom; that we can make capitalism function again under the Constitution so as to restore prosperity to farm and city, give equality of opportunity to all, and the added social security of as many jobs as there are workers.

"Our program", he says, "must be affirmative, not merely negative"; and this is just what I have been saying. The affirmative, positive advocate of labor is the Democratic Party, and in the only two progressive eras since the turn of the century we find that to be the record. They tried by all practical means to ban child labor, to give labor the right to organize and bargain collectively, to shorten the work period and increase wage standards. To ban the injunction and "yellow-dog contracts" used against labor. The Democratic Party made the American sailor the freeman of the seas; it gave our wage earners liberty of action. The Democratic Party is the positive, affirmative voice of American labor.

In concluding his letter Mr. Gannett proves my argument, because he says:

> Our program—
> Referring to the Republican program—
> must be affirmative, not merely negative.

Mr. Chairman, the one big problem confronting the American people is the problem of unemployment. The one party that has a program, a positive, direct program, is the Democratic Party; and the one party that can and will, because it has the courage, the vision, the leadership, and the progressive spirit to solve this question, is the Democratic Party. [Applause.]

What is the difference between the two parties today? The Democratic Party has a positive plan and you know its every detail. The Republican Party must, of course, have a plan and you all know its details. They believe in balancing the Budget; in reducing the taxes on wealth; they believe in a restoration of tariff barriers; they believe in the elimination of Federal relief agencies; they would stick to gold when almost every other nation sought to leave it for a controlled currency. What would happen if we balanced the Budget at this time? We would have to abandon the 9,000,000 urban workers and the 10,000,000 rural workers of the country. Local government or private charity could not take care of them, and suffering, even starvation, would be the result. If we balance our Budget by reducing taxation, then the program of social legislation, including unemployment insurance, old-age insurance, widow and dependent-child benefits, will, of course, have to be repealed. It means the youths who are now working in the camps will be consigned to the street corners. It means that the public-works program and the W. P. A. program that have given work opportunities to our people will be abandoned and those there employed will join the ever-growing army of the unemployed. This cannot be done; this will not be done.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MEAD. Our plan will insure a permanent public-works program. The youth of our country—those boys who, becoming of working age and armed with a diploma, walk from employment agency to employment agency, only to be disappointed—will be given the satisfying experience of finding a job where they can enrich this great Nation of ours. Our public-works program will be continued especially for those men between the ages of 45 and 60 who are boycotted now by industry. If industry does not take them there is only one agency in the world to which they can turn, and that agency would be less than human if it did not take them. That agency is the Federal Government. Our party will take care of them by the continuation of a permanent public-works program that will favor these groups now unable to find employment in industry.

We will continue our affirmative and direct attack by insuring through every legal means an opportunity for the worker to increase his wages and to reduce his working period, an example we set when we passed the 5-day week for postal employees. When the 5-day week becomes universal, then we shall have diminished our problems to the point where normal thinking will set in again, to the point where we shall be able to solve without difficulty our remaining questions.

We find Republicans leaving their party, becoming Progressives, Farmer-Laborites, or associating with the Democratic Party, because they are dissatisfied with their party's negative labor program. I cannot blame them, because they are looking for direct action, and if they cannot find it in the old conservative party, then they are going to leave that party, as they did when State after State west of the Mississippi River turned to the Democratic or Progressive Parties.

The old theory that the situation will adjust itself if we but take care of wealth and of industry is now but a relic of a backward age. It will not work in this machine age.

For 30 years, since the coming of the automatic machine, this problem has grown worse. If it had not been for the tremendous rise in business volume during the last 3 years we would have had an unemployment problem of nearly 20,000,000 instead of less than 9,000,000. We are rapidly becoming a nation of machine attendants; the electric eye throws open the gates and the doors; electrical devices run our elevators; telephones are operated without the switchboard operator; locomotives are bigger and more powerful; airplanes are more rapid and carry greater loads; ships are speedier and carry tremendous tonnage. We now have the mechanical robot, the electric eye, the electric-power motor, remote-control devices, and other labor-saving contrivances; Henry Ford tells us that the time is coming when the machine will manufacture the machine. All man will have to do then will be to enjoy the machine if he has any purchasing power left to buy the machine.

Either we will control the machine or the machine will control us, and we will never control it by indirect action or by the negative plan of the Republican Party.

I am inserting herewith in my remarks the roll-call vote on the national industrial-recovery bill—H. R. 5755—as requested by Mr. BANKHEAD:

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. RAGON. On that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 325, nays 76, answered "present" 1, not voting 28, as follows:

Yeas—325: Adair, Adams, Allgood, Almon, Andrews of New York, Arens, Arnold, Auf der Heide, Ayres of Kansas, Bacharach, Beam, Beedy, Beiter, Berlin, Biermann, Black, Blanchard, Bland, Blanton, Bloom, Boehne, Boileau, Boland, Boylan, Brennan, Britten, Brooks, Brown of Kentucky, Brown of Michigan, Browning, Brunner, Buchanan, Buck, Bulwinkle, Burch, Burke of California, Burke of Nebraska, Burnham, Byrns, Cady, Caldwell, Cannon of Missouri, Carden, Carley, Carter of California, Carter of Wyoming, Cary, Celler, Chapman, Chavez, Church, Claiborne, Clark of North Carolina, Clarke of New York, Cochran of Missouri, Coffin, Colden, Cole, Collins of California, Colmer, Condon, Connery, Cooper of Ohio, Cooper of Tennessee, Cravens, Crosby, Cross, Crosser, Crowe, Crowther, Crump, Culkin, Cullen, Cummings, Darden, Dear, Delaney, DeRouen, Dickinson, Dickstein, Dies, Dingell, Dirksen, Dobbins, Dockweiler, Dondero, Doughton, Douglass, Doutrich, Doxey, Drewry, Driver, Duffey, Duncan of Missouri, Dunn, Durgan of Indiana, Eagle, Eicher, Englebright, Evans, Faddis, Farley, Fernandez, Fiesinger, Fitzgibbons, Fitzpatrick, Flannagan, Fletcher, Focht, Ford, Foss, Foulkes, Frear, Fuller, Fulmer, Gambrill, Gasque, Gavagan, Gibson, Gilchrist, Glover, Goldsborough, Goss, Granfield, Gray, Green, Greenwood, Gregory, Griffin, Haines, Hamilton, Hancock of North Carolina, Harlan, Hart, Harter, Hastings, Healey, Henney, Hess, Higgins, Hildebrandt, Hill of Alabama, Knute Hill, Samuel B. Hill, Hoeppel, Hoidale, Holmes, Howard, Huddleston, Hughes, Imhoff, James, Jeffers, Jenckes, Jenkins, Johnson of Minnesota, Johnson of Oklahoma, Johnson of Texas, Johnson of West Virginia, Kahn, Kee, Keller, Kelly of Illinois, Kelly of Pennsylvania, Kennedy of Maryland, Kennedy of New York, Kenney, Kleberg, Kloeb, Kniffin, Knutson, Kocialkowski, Kopplemann, Kramer, Lambeth, Lamneck, Lanzetta, Larrabee, Lea of California, Lee of Missouri, Lehr, Lemke, Lesinski, Lewis of Colorado, Lewis of Maryland, Lindsay, Lloyd, Lozier, Lundeen, McCarthy, McClintic, McCormack, McDuffie, McFarlane, McGrath, McGugin, McKeown, McLeod, McMillan, McReynolds, McSwain, Major, Maloney of Connecticut, Maloney of Louisiana, Mansfield, Marshall, Martin of Colorado, Martin of Oregon, May, Mead, Meeks, Millard, Miller, Milligan, Mitchell, Montet, Moran, Morehead, Mott, Muldowney, Murdock, Musselwhite, Nesbit, O'Brien, O'Connell, O'Connor, O'Malley, Oliver of Alabama, Oliver of New York, Owen, Palmisano, Parks, Parsons, Patman, Peavey, Peterson, Pettengill, Peyser, Pierce, Polk, Prall, Ragon, Ramsay, Ramspeck, Rankin, Rayburn, Reece, Reilly, Richards, Richardson, Robertson, Robinson, Rogers of New Hampshire, Romjue, Rudd, Ruffin, Sabath, Sadowski, Sanders, Sandlin, Schaefer, Schuetz, Schulte, Scrugham, Sears, Secrest, Shallenberger, Shoemaker, Sinclair, Sirovich, Sisson, Smith of Virginia, Smith of Washington, Smith of West Virginia, Snyder, Somers of New York, Spence, Steagall, Stubbs, Studley, Sullivan, Sumners of Texas, Sutphin, Swank, Sweeney, Taylor of Colorado, Taylor of Tennessee, Thom, Thomason of Texas, Thompson of Illinois, Thurston, Tobey, Traeger, Treadway, Truax, Turner, Turpin, Umstead, Underwood, Utterback, Vinson of Georgia, Vinson of Kentucky, Wallgren, Walter, Warren, Weaver, Weideman, Welch, Werner, West of Ohio, West of Texas, White, Whittington, Wilcox, Williford, Williams, Wilson, Withrow, Wolcott, Wolverton, Wood of Georgia, Woodruff, Woodrum, Young, Zioncheck.

Nays—76: Allen, Andrew of Massachusetts, Ayers of Montana, Bacon, Bailey, Bakewell, Beck, Bolton, Brumm, Busby, Carpenter of Kansas, Carpenter of Nebraska, Cartwright, Castellow, Cavicchia, Chase, Christianson, Cochran of Pennsylvania, Collins of Mississippi, Connolly, Cox, Darrow, Deen, Ditter, Eaton, Edmonds, Elizey of Mississippi, Eltse of California, Gillette, Goodwin, Guyer, Hancock of New York, Hartley, Hollister, Hooper, Hope, Jacobsen, Jones, Kinzer, Kurtz, Kvale, Lambertson, Lanham, Lehlbach, Luce, Ludlow, McFadden, McLean, Mapes, Martin of Massachusetts, Merritt, Monaghan, Parker of Georgia, Parker of New York, Powers, Ransley, Rich, Rogers of Massachusetts, Rogers of Oklahoma, Seger, Shannon, Stalker, Stokes, Strong of Texas, Swick, Taber, Tarver, Taylor of South Carolina, Terrell, Tinkham, Waldron, Watson, Wearin, Whitley, Wigglesworth, Wolfenden.

Answered "present"—1: Wadsworth.

Not voting—28: Abernethy, Bankhead, Buckbee, Cannon of Wisconsin, Corning, De Priest, Disney, Dowell, Fish, Gifford, Gillespie, Griswold, Hornor, Kemp, Kerr, Marland, Montague, Moynihan, Norton, Perkins, Pou, Randolph, Reed of New York, Reid of Illinois, Simpson, Snell, Strong of Pennsylvania, Wood of Missouri.

So the bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The Clerk announced the following pairs: Mr. Corning (for) with Mr. Wadsworth (against); Mr. Bankhead (for) with Mr. Snell (against); Mr. Randolph (for) with Mr. Griswold (against); Mr. Pou (for) with Mr. Reid of Illinois (against).

Additional general pairs: Mr. Disney with Mr. Dowell; Mr. Montague with Mr. Simpson; Mr. Fish with Mr. Perkins; Mr. Kemp with Mr. Reed of New York; Mr. Gillespie with Mr. Buckbee; Mr. Hornor with Mr. Gifford; Mr. Strong of Pennsylvania with Mr. Moynihan.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, being paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. CORNING, I withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we must realize that 1779 is not 1936, and what might solve the labor problem in those days will not solve the labor problem of today.

Messrs. Gilbert & Colt, America's Power Resources, New York Century Co., estimated that in terms of manpower "it would require the labor of 3,000,000,000 men to accomplish the work done annually in the United States by our energy resources."

Wayne W. Parrish and Harold F. Clark, in their excellent article in Harper's Magazine entitled "Chemistry Wrecks the Farm", say:

The elimination of the horse by the gasoline engine has reduced the consumption of food as sharply as if 40,000,000 persons had stopped eating.

And quoting from other sources:

Every industry is hell-bent on cutting the cost of labor by the use of labor-saving machines. We rush in to cut labor costs and by cutting out labor we reduce the power of laborers to buy our goods. How silly our little minds think?

The seriousness with which labor-saving machines and automatic production are taking jobs away from human beings may be realized when it is learned that 75 workers can produce as much today as 100 did in 1929.

Furthermore, it is estimated by the United States Department of Labor that automatic production using coal, oil, and water power has provided the same thing as 50 servants for every workingman in the country. Thus if we were a hand-labor country there would be 50 jobs for every workingman.

The automobile industry is the best-known example of mass production and the consequent elimination of skilled workmen. For example: A western motor-car company is turning out more than 8,000 automobile frames a day with less than 100 push-button employees in the plant. This same production a few years ago would have required 20 times that many workers.

By the natural process of inventing more and more labor-saving machines there will eventually be very little work for anybody to do. And if there isn't any work to do, nobody will have any money to buy anything with and we will have a perpetual depression. We are on our way to that "utopia" today but don't know it.

One of the latest "marvels" for the destruction of labor is a new device which will do all the hand picking of cotton with machines and thus destroy employment for 4,000,000 cotton pickers. Perhaps 1,000 people will be employed to make these machines, but 4,000,000 workers may be added to the relief rolls.

The worshippers of science, invention, progress, and civilization claim that these marvelous inventions may destroy jobs; but they reduce the cost of goods, add luxury to life, and those thrown out of work find employment elsewhere.

Where is this "elsewhere"? Another name for this "elsewhere" is the C. C. C., the W. P. A., the P. W. A., or the relief rolls. There are 9,000,000 suffering souls seeking jobs in this "elsewhere" today.

The idolaters of invention argue that when the steamboat and the steam engine were invented people talked like we do about the destruction of employment. However, these inventions were not labor-saving—they were labor-making inventions.

But America will be safe in these trying times through the intelligent, progressive, and courageous leadership of the Democratic Party and our great party leader who presides over the Republic's destiny today.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL].

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, I want to discuss a problem this afternoon in which both parties are interested, a problem which I believe is one of the most important confronting Congress. I refer to the old-age pension. I have been a supporter of an adequate old-age-pension law ever since I served my first term in a legislative body in 1921. For 15 years I worked patiently for that cause, hoping that the time would come when the worthy aged of our land would be properly and adequately cared for. While many States have passed so-called old-age-pension laws, these laws are wholly inadequate. Public sentiment now has crystalized to a point where that public not only supports but demands that adequate laws be passed caring for our aged people.

Today many plans are being advocated. The plan that has been discussed most and that claims the greatest support is the Townsend plan. It is that plan I desire to discuss this afternoon. However, before entering into the discussion permit me to say that I feel very kindly toward those, whether Members of this body or not, who are supporting any old-age-pension plan, including, of course, Dr. Townsend and his supporters. I willingly and readily concede to them the same sincerity, the same honesty of purpose, and the same desire to help the aged that I claim for myself. Permit me to say further that, in my humble opinion, Dr. Townsend has done as much or more than any one individual to crystallize public sentiment in favor of an adequate old-age-pension law.

While there are two McGroarty bills, and while there is some talk of a third and revised McGroarty bill being introduced, the Townsend plan I am discussing this afternoon is that advocated by Dr. Townsend himself, both in his official organ, the Townsend Weekly, and in the testimony the good doctor, his agents, actuaries, and supporters gave before the Finance Committee of the Senate and the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives.

The following is the Townsend plan as I understand it:

First. Each retired person 60 years or over, except criminals, will receive $200 per month. The recent statement on the front page of the Townsend Weekly leaves no question as to the amount to be paid, and reads as follows:

> Two hundred dollars per month stands. There has never been, nor will be, any compromise on the $200 per month provision in the Townsend demands. All statements to the contrary are false.

This $200 must be spent each month to qualify the applicant for the next month's pension.

Second. Just what will the Townsend plan cost annually? According to the hearings before the House and Senate committees, there are approximately 11,000,000 people in the United States who are 60 years old and over. This number will, of course, increase from year to year as the population increases. Of the 11,000,000, it is reasonable to assume that one-half, or 5,500,000 are women, most of whom are married. The percentage of women whose age is 60 years or more, who are either engaged in business or employed is very small. The percentage of these women who would fail to qualify under this law because they are earning more than the $200 per month is infinitesimal. Remember the testimony of Dr. Townsend that everyone, regardless as to his wealth, could qualify under the law. Of the 5,500,000 men who would qualify, a small percentage would, in my judgment, be engaged in business or employed, earning over $200 per month, and certainly the percentage of those who would fail to retire to obtain this pension would be extremely small.

Assuming that 10 of the 11 million people qualify at $200 per month, the total cost will be $24,000,000,000 each year. It is upon this amount that my computations are based, as well as upon the testimony given at those hearings. Should you, however, desire to take a smaller number, or only 8,000,000 people, you may do so and simply take 80 percent of the cost figures submitted in the tables to be introduced later. The tremendous expense of administering this law is not included in this $24,000,000,000 annual cost. Thousands of bookkeepers and accountants necessary to keep the records, make up the pay rolls, and the traveling expenses; the vast army of employees who will scrutinize 10,000,000 accounts monthly, checking over the value of each article purchased to make sure that the $200 is spent monthly before the applicant can qualify for the next month's pension—all this cost is not included.

Third. Just how is the $24,000,000,000 to be raised annually? Dr. Townsend and his supporters advocate a transaction tax of 2 percent, with authority in the President to increase the tax to 3 percent. Let us see just how this tax operates and will be paid. According to Dr. Townsend's testimony before the Ways and Means Committee, each citizen, including, of course, every farmer, must be licensed and pay a tax on every transaction he makes. I quote from page 688 of the record:

> Mr. HILL. Turning to section 3, that provides the means for raising the money with which to pay these pensions. It provides a tax of 2 percent on the gross dollar value of each business commercial, and/or financial transaction done within the United States. That may be increased under the provisions of this bill 50 percent or decreased 50 percent by the President?
> Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes.
> Mr. HILL. That would include practically every business transaction of every nature?
> Dr. TOWNSEND. Yes, sir.
> Mr. HILL. It would include, of course, the sale by a manufacturer to a wholesaler; the sale by a wholesale merchant to a retail dealer; there would be a tax on sales from the retail merchant to the consumer. That is in the ordinary channels of commerce or business. Would it apply to a farmer who sold a cow or a pig?
> Dr. TOWNSEND. Certainly. The farmer will have to be registered. He will have to take out a license the same as anyone else.
> Mr. HILL. Would it apply to a housewife who sold a dozen eggs?
> Dr. TOWNSEND. The farmer and his wife——
> Mr. HILL. Or a pound of butter?
> Dr. TOWNSEND. The farmer and his wife will constitute one set of licensees, of course; one business. Their aggregate sales will have to be computed at the end of each month.

Take a concrete illustration. The farmer purchases a flock of sheep, pays a 2-percent transaction tax, adding it, of course, to the cost of the sheep. He shears those sheep, sells the wool to the buyer, paying and adding a 2-percent tax. The buyer sells the wool to the jobber, paying and adding a 2-percent tax. The jobber sells the wool to the woolen mill, paying and adding a 2-percent tax. The woolen mill sells the manufactured garment to the wholesaler, paying and adding the 2-percent tax. The wholesaler sells the garment to the retailer, paying and adding a 2-percent tax. The retailer sells to the consumer or user, paying and adding a 2-percent tax. The consumer pays the entire pyramided tax plus the additional overhead expense of each company or individual through whose hands it has passed from the beginning. If there ever was a tax that was paid by the consumer, and practically every tax is paid by the consumer, the transaction tax is that tax.

There is only one way that that tax can be figured, and that is upon a per-capita basis. Twenty-four billion dollars will have to be paid annually by 122,775,046 people, taking the 1930 census. Without figuring the tremendous overhead mentioned before, the per-capita cost is $195 for each man, woman, and child in America. The breadwinner of the family will have to earn enough to pay this tax for himself and those dependent upon him. A man with a wife and four children would have to pay $1,140 each year. I have personally computed the cost of the Townsend plan on a per-capita basis and compiled a table for each of the 11 counties in my district. I have also compiled a separate table for each of the 11 counties in my district, showing the cost by townships. These tables show the population under the 1930 census, the assessed valuation of each township, city, and county in my district, and what it will cost that township, city, or county annually if we have the Townsend plan in force.

I here ask unanimous consent to place into the RECORD table 1, which gives that information for the 11 counties in my district; table 2, which is the same computation for my home county of Missaukee by townships, one of my smallest counties; and table 3, which gives the same computation for the county of Muskegon by townships and cities, the largest county in the district.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The tables are as follows:

TABLE I.—Annual cost of Townsend old-age-pension plan on a per capita basis by counties, and population and assessed valuation of each county in the Ninth District of Michigan

County	Population	Assessed valuation	Annual cost
Mason	18,756	$15,244,365	$3,563,640

Mr. ENGEL. I call attention to the fact that according to the 1930 census the population of the Ninth District of Michigan was 214,318. The assessed valuation in 1935 of the entire district was $170,068,470. The annual cost of the Townsend plan to the Ninth Congressional District on a per-capita basis would be $41,791,010, or 24.6 percent of the assessed valuation of the district. This annual cost ranges from 39.6 percent of the assessed valuation of my home county of Missaukee to 21.3 percent of the assessed valuation of the largest county—Muskegon. The little county in which I live has a population of 6,992. The assessed valuation is $3,443,485. The annual cost of the Townsend plan to that county would be $1,363,440. In other words, Missaukee County would pay each year a sum equal to 39.6 percent of its assessed valuation. Muskegon County, the largest county in the district, has a population of 84,630. The assessed valuation in 1935 was $74,669,575. The annual cost on a per-capita basis would be $16,502,850, or 21.3 percent of the assessed valuation, and bear in mind, this would have to be paid each and every year.

In 1931 the city of Detroit owed, as I recall it, $426,000,000. These obligations were outstanding in bond issues and notes and most of them were to be paid in 20 or 25 annual installments. These bonds had been purchased mostly by banks with depositors' money and life-insurance companies with moneys paid in premiums by the public generally. Due to the apparent inability of the city of Detroit to meet both principal and interest, these bonds had dropped from 100 to 57. If these bonds went into default, it meant that in all probabilities they would drop in value to 25 cents on the dollar. It was to prevent this from happening that the governor called a special session of the legislature at the request of the city of Detroit and its businessmen, in trying to solve this problem. Two Members of the Senate and two Members of the House were appointed on a committee to revamp a bill which had been introduced. I happened to have been one of the two Members of the Senate appointed on that committee. The bill was introduced and passed, authorizing the issuing of an additional $20,000,000 in bonds to pay interest and prevent this $426,000,000 in obligations from going into default. The city of Detroit was unable to pay the interest on these obligations and the actual installment of principal on a 20- to 25-year basis.

If anyone had then or would now advocate the payment of this tremendous obligation in two annual payments of $213,000,000 each their judgment would certainly be questioned, to say the least. The Townsend plan on a per-capita basis would cost the city of Detroit each year $305,889,090. It would cost Wayne County, in which is located the city of Detroit, each year $368,344,470 on a per-capita basis. The accumulated unpaid debt of the State of Michigan and every subdivision within the State is $800,000,000, deducting, of course, moneys in sinking funds. This includes the unpaid balance of a $50,000,000 State highway bond issue, a $30,000,000 soldiers' bonus bond issue, and a war loan bond issue. It includes bonds issued by township and counties for roads and buildings, by cities for waterworks and parks, by school districts for schoolhouses; in fact, it includes every debt of every political subdivision and municipality in the State. Many political subdivisions of Michigan have found it impossible to pay the interest on this tremendous debt; and, of course, have found it impossible to make the payments of principal on a 20- or 25-year basis.

If I were to advocate a plan in either the State legislative body or in Congress, if such a plan were constitutional, to compel the State of Michigan and every municipality in that State to pay this tremendous debt in one payment, again my judgment would be questioned, to say the least. The Townsend plan on a per-capita basis would cost the State of Michigan each year $944,253,375. In other words, the Townsend plan would cost the State of Michigan $144,253,375 more each year than the total accumulated outstanding debt of the State and every political subdivision of the State.

If these computations do not demonstrate the absolute impossibility of financing the Townsend plan, there is nothing further that I can say except perhaps to quote Dr. Robert H. Doane, of New York City, who was one of Dr. Townsend's witnesses and testified at Dr. Townsend's request. On page 1121 of the hearings before the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, we find Dr. Doane, in answer to questions of Congressman WOODRUFF, of Michigan, using the following language:

The way I approached that problem from the start was whether or not we could afford to support this additional service charge—

I view this as a pure service charge—against our ability to produce in terms of physical income at current rates an additional $24,000,000,000 on top of that. Of course, my first reaction was that it could not be done, and my reaction is yet that it cannot be done in that maximum amount. I think it possible to introduce the idea in a modified form that Dr. Townsend or others, or this committee, may devise, taking on just a small number. You may even change the pension from $200 to a smaller figure, and after a period of years you might be able to care for three to four million additional income recipients. But to take in all of the full ten or eleven million in that age group immediately, I think none of us have the remotest idea that it is possible.

I realize the argument about the increase in business, but in the final analysis, 1 person out of every 12 is being paid $2,400 a year without working. The other 11 will have to earn that $2,400 by the sweat of their brow. The other 11 will have to manufacture for nothing whatever the one buys with his $2,400 each year. Some have argued that inflation would be a good thing, and it could be argued that inflation would help to wipe out the tremendous debt of the State and its political subdivisions, but they forget that these obligations are held by banks and life insurance companies, that the money which was loaned to Michigan by these banks and life insurance companies was not the money of the banks nor the money of the life insurance company, but the money of the depositors, the money of the insured, the money that will ultimately belong to the beneficiary of the policy. To wipe out or reduce public and private debts by inflation would wipe out every life-insurance fund, bank deposit, and trust fund in America.

I wish to repeat again that I have only the kindliest feeling for all the advocates of old-age pensions, whether they be Townsendites or others. I again say that I concede to them the same sincerity, the same honesty of purpose, the same desire to help the aged that I claim for myself. But what I want is an old-age pension that will pay a definite sum monthly now. Michigan passed one old-age-pension law in 1932, financing it with a head tax. The aged looked forward hopefully to monthly payments, only to be bitterly disappointed. In 1934 a second law was passed in Michigan. Again the aged looked forward eagerly, hoping that they might receive some aid. Today they are receiving $8 and $10 a month, a sum that is absolutely inadequate.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. ENGEL. If we keep on with a plan of this kind, which I believe is absolutely impossible, the time when these aged people will receive real help will be postponed again. Would it not be a wonderful thing if on the 1st day of every month an old couple could go to the post office and get a check for $60? Would it not be a wonderful thing if they could depend upon that amount monthly, without strings attached as to spending but to spend as the pensioners saw fit and without having Government employees coming into their homes to see what the money was spent for? Not perhaps everything that we would like, but a beginning.

I recognize the absolute inadequacy of the present law. I am willing to do everything I can to bring about the passage of a law which will place a definite sum into the hands of every aged person on the first day of every month, commencing not next year, or the year after, but now. I cannot see my way clear to support a proposition such as the Townsend plan, which in my judgment is absolutely impossible, and delays again the time when a real old-age-pension law is adopted that will pay a definite amount on the 1st day of each and every month.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I will.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman think that the present law we have is adequate?

Mr. ENGEL. I do not.

Mr. HOUSTON. In my State I have learned—last week—that under the provisions of our law and State requirements it averages $7.50 a month. Does the gentleman think that is adequate?

Mr. ENGEL. I do not.

Mr. EKWALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. EKWALL. Do not you think it would be fair if the Government would pay the same rate, regardless of any particular State—treat all the people alike—and let the States augment that payment?

Mr. ENGEL. The question as to the amount paid by the Federal and State Governments will have to be worked out.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want to accord all sincerity of purpose to those who advocate the Townsend plan. I did that on the floor the other day. But I want to ask the gentleman what sort of sincerity are we going to consider it when our splendid friend, the gentleman from California, over the radio 2 or 3 days ago, said: "I am appealing to you for the Townsend plan as embodied in the McGroarty bill to go out and defeat every Congressman who will not vote for the Townsend bill." That is from one of our own colleagues. Does the gentleman think that is the thing to do?

Mr. ENGEL. I think everyone in my district has a right to differ with me and to vote against me if he desires. The gentleman from California is trying to bring about a reasonable compromise in the passage of an adequate old-age-pension law. I have no objection to any one of my colleagues opposing me in my district because he differs with me on this or on any other question.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Has the gentleman figured out how much it would cost individually, per capita, to pay people over 60 years of age $200 a month?

Mr. ENGEL. Basing the figures on 10,000,000 pensioners and the total cost at $24,000,000,000 a year, the per capita cost would be $195 a year, using the 1930 census. If you pay 8,000,000 pensioners, the cost would be $19,200,000,000 a year, or a per capita cost of about $160.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman is a lawyer, I believe?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. I notice a question by my colleague from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL] in which he indicated he wanted to pay the pension directly throughout the United States instead of contributing to the States. Does the gentleman think that that would be constitutional?

Mr. ENGEL. Personally I do not, but, of course, I feel this problem is important enough to have it solved permanently and, if necessary, to so amend the Constitution.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman says that he is in favor of a pension which will pay $60 a month.

Mr. ENGEL. Sixty dollars per couple.

Mr. MOTT. How many eligibles did the gentleman have in mind when he arrived at that figure?

Mr. ENGEL. I had in mind to start with people 65 and over.

Mr. MOTT. I asked how many eligibles.

Mr. ENGEL. I had in mind particularly the figures of the social-security bill. As I recall the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means—and I stand subject to correction—an old-age-pension law such as was passed, which would pay $30 per month—$15 a month by the Federal Government and $15 a month by the State—to the aged who were 65 years old or more, would cost approximately $800,000,000 a year. I think that was the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. MOTT. And the gentleman thinks that $800,000,000 or $900,000,000 a year would be an adequate pension to everyone in the United States who needs a pension?

Mr. ENGEL. I would not say that; but I say eight or nine hundred million dollars a year is a handsome sum to start with, and I think we might better start with eight or nine hundred million dollars and pay it than to pass a law to pay twenty-four billions a year and not pay it.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ENGEL. Yes.

Mr. EKWALL. My genial colleague from Oregon, the ex-Governor, wanted to know whether you thought this suggestion of mine was constitutional. Does the gentleman not think it would be as nearly constitutional as it would be to tax all of the people of every State to pay their share, and then to deny people of certain States such Federal money because the States themselves were too poor to pay their share?

Mr. ENGEL. I would rather not get into a constitutional argument, because I realize there are a great many controversial questions involved. I say let us try to pass a law which will place into the hands of every old couple $60 on the first day of each and every month.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY].

Mr. McGROARTY. Mr. Chairman, first of all I want to set my esteemed and very much beloved friend from Massachusetts right. He seems to be hurt at the statement that I made over the National Broadcast a few evenings ago, namely, that my advice to the supporters of the Townsend old-age pension plan at the coming election is that they should at the coming election vote for candidates favoring that plan regardless of party affiliations. What is wrong with that? If in the gentleman's district he is running for Congress and favors a high tariff, and I favor a tariff for revenue only, would he expect me to vote for him? Would not I have a right to campaign against him? There is nothing wrong or unjust about that. Politics is the same as war, it is the same as football. You must go out to win. We are for the Townsend old-age-pension plan, and we are out to win, and that is all there is to it. There is nothing unjust or unfair about it so far as I can see.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. I listened so carefully that I ask the gentleman to put that speech he made over the radio into the RECORD so that we may judge of the exact language. I think it is unusual for a colleague to indirectly or directly in a speech advocate the defeat of his colleagues if they could not endorse the Townsend plan.

Mr. McGROARTY. I made the speech extemporaneously, and it would be very difficult to have it inserted into the RECORD, but I do not see anything unethical about that, even. If I am for the Townsend plan, as I am in my district, and some of my constituents are opposed to that plan, certainly I would not take offense at those constituents voting against me. They ought to vote against me, and they should advise others who feel like them to vote against me. It is not necessary that all of us who are here should always be here. Other men can take our places. They have done it in the past and the Republic still endures.

I want to correct the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ENGEL]. He and others keep insisting that the pension must be $200 a month. Why do they not give the McGroarty bill credit for what it says. It says "not to exceed $200 a month."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does not the Townsend Weekly of December 30 say $200 and nothing less? Is that your plan?

Mr. McGROARTY. I heard the gentleman from Michigan the other day in a very angry mood, and I regret it. The gentleman is a young man.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Only 61.

Mr. McGROARTY. You are burning yourself up. You are expending such vitality with your emotions that I dread what may happen to you. Why can we not discuss these things calmly?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman answer my question? Did you not say in your paper $200 a month?

Mr. McGROARTY. It is not my paper.

Mr. HOFFMAN. In the paper called the Townsend Weekly. Does the gentleman stand for $200 a month or does he not?

Mr. McGROARTY. There is something in the New York Times this morning. Did I say it? I do not own the paper.

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; but do you stand for $200 a month, or do not you?

Mr. McGROARTY. I stand for the McGroarty bill, not to exceed $200 a month. I wish it could be $200 a month. The bill says "not to exceed $200 a month."

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then you do not stand, as the paper says, for $200 a month?

Mr. McGROARTY. If we can get it; yes.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. The Townsend Weekly is owned by Dr. Townsend, is it not?

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes; I understand so. I do not know.

Mr. ENGEL. The statement which I read in the RECORD was taken from the Townsend Weekly, right on the front page.

Mr. McGROARTY. Why hold me for that? I am standing for my bill, not for the Townsend Weekly or anything else. Why do not you be fair about these things?

Mr. ENGEL. I am fair.

Mr. McGROARTY. Why quibble? I hate this quibbling. It lessens my regard for this House of Representatives—quibbling. That is just quibbling and nothing else. Read the bill. I stand on the bill.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I recall, when Dr. Townsend appeared before the Ways and Means Committee he merely stated that $200 was something to shoot at. Evidently they are shooting at it.

Mr. McGROARTY. I thank the gentleman. That is it exactly. I had not the wit to say that, but that is the situation exactly.

We advocates of the Townsend plan of old-age pensions realize that we are facing a hostile Congress. There is no use quibbling about that. We know that. That is another reason why we are forced to go to the country in this year's election. We have a right to advise the people of this country to send to this Congress by their ballots this year those who favor the Townsend idea of old-age pensions. Nobody has a right to deny us that. I am a Democrat. Nobody can drive me out of my party. Al Smith cannot do it. Franklin D. Roosevelt cannot do it. I stay in the Democratic Party. I was born in it, reared in it, and I am going to stay in it. Nobody can drive me out of it, but I will favor a man for Congress, even against my own party if my party is against it, who favors the Townsend plan. That is legitimate warfare, and this is war to lift the old people of this country out of want and despair and fear. We want a pension for them. If we can get $200 a month, it will put them in luxury. They have a right to luxury, the same as anybody else. They have a right to it. Because a man is poor they say he must always stay poor. Most every man I know over 60 years of age is a better man than I am. He has a right to whatever luxury he can get, whatever comfort he can get. We also contend, if you had the sense, if you could just get it into your heads, that an act of legislation like this would not only take care of these old people but it would bring about full recovery. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan not to think that because we are not fighting every minute on this floor that we are laying down. We are not doing it. We are watching every opportunity we can get. The Townsend movement is not waning, let me tell the gentleman that. Do not think it is. Do not fool yourselves. It is not waning. It is growing stronger every day that passes. We are going to make a fight and we are going to make it to the people at the next election. That is what we are going to do, and we are not going to make any bones about it, either.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have two questions that I should like to ask the gentleman: One is, whether he agrees with Dr. Townsend when he says that this is not primarily an old-age pension, but it is primarily a means of distributing purchasing power. The next question is this: If it is a means of distributing purchasing power primarily and an old-age pension secondarily, whether the gentleman is in favor of raising the amount of taxes that the American people must pay, 300 percent? This question is based upon the fact that for all public purposes we raise at the present time about $7,000,000,000, and that under the Townsend plan or the McGroarty bill, it will be necessary to raise three times that much?

Mr. McGROARTY. Now the gentleman asks me to answer for Dr. Townsend. I cannot do it. He answers for himself.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No. I am asking the sponsor of the plan that is before the Congress of the United States.

Mr. McGROARTY. When the time comes, and it is at hand——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from California 10 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I want to withdraw the request that I made that he put in the RECORD the speech he made over the radio. Our colleague has told us so plainly that every Democrat here who did not believe in the Townsend plan should be defeated, that the speech he made over the radio does not need to go in the RECORD. I withdraw my request.

Mr. McGROARTY. All right. I do not try to hedge on what I say. I am not a politician. I am a Democrat elected from the most rock-ribbed Republican district in the United States. I do not want to come back to this Congress, but if I want to I can.

Now, do not be afraid of being reelected. I admire the gentleman from Massachusetts. He is against the Townsend bill; he says so, he does not give a whoop who knows it. I respect a man like that much more than I respect a man who does not believe in a thing but who, in order to keep some office, will say he does. [Applause.] I would not do a thing to take a vote away from the gentleman in his district. I admire him.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I have just a few minutes more.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I did not ask my questions in any partisan spirit at all; I was very sincere when I asked them. I really desire the gentleman to answer; I want to know the whole situation.

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes. I stated I could not answer for Dr. Townsend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me preface my interrogation by saying that I am seeking information, as I am not familiar with what is in the gentleman's bill. Do we understand that the gentleman now takes the position that he does not necessarily insist upon a minimum of $200 a month for each person but that he lays down a formula of taxation and whatever amount of money is raised shall be appropriated monthly pro rata among the people who are eligible?

Mr. McGROARTY. That is correct; the gentleman is exactly correct.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Does not the gentleman from California think it is about time for Members to quit talking and concerning themselves about what somebody outside of Congress says the Townsend plan is, but instead should study the revised McGroarty bill and decide whether they are for it or against it?

Mr. McGROARTY. Exactly; that would be a very wise and sensible thing to do.

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGROARTY. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. I do not wish to evoke a controversy with the gentleman; I am merely asking for information. At the last session of Congress the gentleman introduced several different versions of the so-called Townsend plan.

Mr. McGROARTY. No.

Mr. LAMBETH. They were different bills, I will say. Will not the gentleman tell the House just what are the provisions of this latest version of the Townsend plan?

Mr. McGROARTY. My colleague does not want me to use the rest of the day, does he?

Mr. LAMBETH. I thought the gentleman could summarize it briefly.

Mr. McGROARTY. Why does not the gentleman read the bill for himself; why ask me to read it? [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman concludes, will he answer my questions?

Mr. McGROARTY. Will the gentleman from Michigan state his questions again?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I will put them one at a time. First, does the gentleman agree with Dr. Townsend when Dr. Townsend says that the plan which, I understand, is embodied in the McGroarty bill is not primarily an old-age plan but is primarily a means of distributing purchasing power?

Mr. McGROARTY. The gentleman is asking me if I agree with that?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. McGROARTY. I do not agree with Dr. Townsend in everything. For instance, he proposed a third party the other day. I do not agree with him in that.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the gentleman agree in the statement Dr. Townsend made to the effect that his plan was primarily one to distribute purchasing power?

Mr. McGROARTY. If the gentleman asks me, it is both; it does both things.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What is the primary purpose of the bill?

Mr. McGROARTY. What difference does it make which you place first, the cart or the horse? It does not make any difference. My dear friend, do not quibble about these things; get down to brass tacks. [Applause.]

Mr. WOLCOTT. Will the gentleman answer my second question now?

Mr. McGROARTY. I cannot stand here all day answering questions. I say to the gentleman to look them up for himself; he can read and write.

There is a very important matter I have on my mind, and I want to speak about this matter to my fellow Democrats, for I do not think the gentlemen on the other side would be inclined to respond to my appeal. I am going to talk to my own people now on this side of the House. There is a petition on the Clerk's desk with 214 names on it—a petition to discharge the Rules Committee from further consideration of the Frazier-Lemke bill. We need only four more signatures to this petition. I want four Democrats today who have not already done so to sign this petition. Let not the sun go down on your delinquency. It will answer two charges made against us as Democrats if you do. First of all, it will answer the charge made against us that we are gagged.

It will be flung in our faces all summer long until the polls close in November that we gagged ourselves or permitted ourselves to be gagged. If this petition is signed, it will give the lie to our opponents. It will prove that we were not gagged, no matter what the requirements were. It will prove that the Democrats of this Congress were courageous and conscientious enough to break the rules. Two hundred and fourteen names are an awful lot of names to get for anything in this Congress. It ought to be enough without begging for four more names.

Another charge that will be flung at us, which we can disprove if we add four more names to this petition, is that we are a rubber-stamp Congress. The filing of this petition will prove that we are not a rubber-stamp Congress. I do not know whether I will vote for the Frazier-Lemke bill or not, but I believe that any bill that has merit has the right to be debated on the floor of this House. That is what I believe, and that is the kind of a Congressman I want to be.

I suppose what I am about to say will fall on deaf ears, but why should it? Are there not 4 other Democrats in this House who will join the 214, whether they favor the Frazier-Lemke bill or not? What kind of people are we? I do not know why the Committee on Rules refuses to come out and fight because it has a challenge. I do not know the personnel of the Committee on Rules, but I do know its chairman, and his name is O'CONNOR. The blood of Irish kings flows in his veins. [Applause.] He is the first O'CONNOR in all history who refuses to come out and fight when he was dared to. Do you think the rest of us here in this House who belong to that great historic race of Phoenicians would refuse to come out and fight? It is that great race which produced the greatest fighting man of all times, Hannibal of Carthage, who picked up a nondescript army and chased the legionnaires of Rome all over the map for 15 long years. Where are the O'Connors, the O'Neals in this House; the O'Connells; the O'Byrns, in whose veins not only courses the blood of the O'Byrns but of the O'Briens on their grandmother's side? Do they refuse to do this? Where are the McFarlands, the McReynolds, the McSwains, the McAndrews, and the McCormacks? Do any of us be dared to fight and not come out in the open? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. GREEVER].

Mr. GREEVER. Mr. Chairman, the morning papers carried the sad news to the Nation of the death of Dr. Elwood Mead, Commissioner of Reclamation, a former Wyoming citizen.

Those of us in Congress from the Western States feel that the passing of Dr. Mead is an irreparable loss. There was perhaps no man in the country who had as thorough an understanding of the problems of irrigation and reclamation as had Dr. Mead. His entire life had been devoted to that subject.

He was born in Switzerland County, Indiana, and entered the field of engineering at a very early age as a rodman. He worked his way through Purdue University by teaching and by working for the county as surveyor, graduating from that institution in 1882. Immediately upon graduating he served 1 year as United States assistant engineer on improvements then being made on the Wabash River, and at the end of that year became professor of mathematics at the Colorado Agricultural College, and was appointed assistant State engineer for the State of Colorado. He rapidly acquired a reputation as one of the country's leading experts on irrigation, and in 1886 when the chair of irrigation engineering was established at Colorado Agricultural College, Dr. Mead was appointed to that position. In 1888 he resigned from this position to become the Territorial engineer of Wyoming and wrote the irrigation provisions of the new State's constitution. He served for several years as State Engineer for the State of Wyoming. In July 1899, he was made irrigation expert of the United States Department of Agriculture, and at the same time became professor of institutions and practice of irrigation at the University of California. During the years 1907 to 1915, he served as chairman of the State rivers and waters supply commission of Victoria, Australia, and established a reclamation program for that country. On his return to the United States he was appointed professor of rural institutions at the University of California and chairman of the State land settlement board.

Dr. Mead was a member of the American Society of Civil Engineers and the British Institution of Civil Engineers.

For many years Dr. Mead was a resident of the State of Wyoming and left an indelible imprint upon that State in the form of his acts as State engineer and the constitutional provisions and the laws relating to irrigation in that State.

Since 1924, when he was appointed Commissioner of Reclamation by President Coolidge, he has constructed many important irrigation projects throughout the West, the largest of which is the great Boulder Dam, which was dedicated last October by President Roosevelt. Probably no man in the history of the United States has directly assisted in and superintended the construction of as much constructive and useful development as has Dr. Mead. He was a man of vision and courage. He saw the possibilities of the development of the great West and was an unflinching advocate of reclamation, which has been so important in the development of the West and of the entire United States.

Dr. Mead lived to see, by reason of the adoption of his policies, the construction of reclamation projects upon which there exist thousands and thousands of the finest homes in agricultural America. He lived to see by reason of his forward and progressive thought, the desert converted into useful and economic agricultural communities. He lived to see prosperous and thriving towns built upon these projects and great markets for eastern products established in the West, because of the fertility of the soil and the development of the resources of that great region.

It will be difficult to travel for any considerable distance through the Western States without seeing a monument to the vision and progressive spirit of this great man.

To all of us who knew him, his personality and character were refreshing. He had a kindly sympathy and a spirit of helpfulness which characterized his every thought and action. He was a man of courage and of wisdom. He was loved by everyone who knew him. His loss is mourned by the people of the State of Wyoming and of the entire Nation, and we extend to his widow and children our sincere and heartfelt sympathy.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEVER. I yield to my good friend the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. EKWALL. Is there any way that we can appropriately honor the name of our deceased friend, Dr. Mead, by naming, for instance, the Boulder Dam or one of these other dams after the gentleman?

Mr. GREEVER. I hope that some adequate expression of our high regard for Dr. Mead may be made possible by Congress.

Mr. EKWALL. I should like to see the gentleman figure that out, because if there is any way we can do that, I believe it ought to be done.

Mr. GREEVER. I think that would meet with the approval of all who knew him, and I shall personally do everything in my power to that end.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN].

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, I would not presume to put words into the mouth of my good friend, Dr. MCGROARTY, nor would I presume to say a word by way of being spokesman for Dr. Townsend, but I do think my colleague from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] is entitled to a prompt answer to the two questions which he propounded on the floor of this House this afternoon.

As I understand those questions they are, first, do you consider the Townsend plan a distribution of purchasing power? Absolutely yes. In my own personal opinion that is the essence of the Townsend plan as we now have it. There is no denying the fact that the mainspring which furnished the initial impetus for the Townsend program was sympathy and concern for the welfare of the aged, but there is likewise no disputing the proposition that at the present time the program is broad and comprehensive and takes in not only the welfare of the aged, but the problem of the unemployed, and the general problem of recovery and stabilization of industry.

Therefore, we look upon the transaction tax not merely as a source of dividing the income for a given year, but it is this, and so far as I know this is the first time it has been spoken in public—however, I claim no invention or inventive power in connection with it—the transaction tax is a mild form of capital levy and in that form is not at all limited by the amount of the national income for a given year. For this reason it does very nicely tally with the suggestion of Senator BORAH, in the current issue of Colliers, that it might well be named the "Townsend plan for redistribution of purchasing power."

If this plan is so productive of revenue and income that it produces three times the amount of national revenue at the present time, then I say there are no people better entitled to benefit from that revenue than these people who for 40 or 50 or 60 years have been law-abiding citizens in our land.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, it had not been my purpose to talk on the Townsend plan, because, frankly, I think that the less said about the plan the better for this Congress and the country; but I cannot let go unchallenged the fact that the sponsor of the plan does not see fit to give this House an answer to two questions which I think are the very crux of the Townsend plan.

I do not think there is a man in this House who is not sincerely in favor of adequate and practical old-age pensions. I think I can speak for the entire body of the Congress when I say it has a perfect understanding of the plight in which so many of our aged find themselves at the present time due to reverses attending the depression. It is the purpose of this Congress to do everything it possibly can to relieve this suffering; but I am not so sure but that the Townsend plan is, relatively speaking, the same to old-age pensions today that inflation was to the bonus for years.

For a good many years the sponsors of the bonus had to contend with the fact that every time the word "bonus" was mentioned inflation came to the person's mind. There should not have been any more connection between inflation of the currency and payment of the bonus than there was between the appropriation of $4,800,000,000 and inflation, or the year before that the appropriation of $3,300,000,000 and inflation, but for some reason or other every time the bonus has been mentioned we hear of inflation; and so every time we hear of old-age pensions this bugbear of the Townsend plan is thrown in our faces, until we have the people of this Nation scared stiff that any old-age-pension plan will embody the principles of the Townsend plan. So I am not so sure that the advocates of the Townsend plan are not doing much more harm in this Congress than they are good, especially when they will not answer what I consider a question which goes to the crux of the situation—whether they want to burden the people of the United States with a tax 300 percent greater than they are carrying at the present time—and I think a brief but conclusive answer to whether we want to adopt the Townsend plan of giving old-age pensions is embodied in this one thought.

Is the Congress of the United States ready today or at any other time to raise the tax burden of the people of the United States 300 percent? This question is predicated upon the fact that the taxes of the National Government, the State governments, the counties and municipalities and all the special taxes which are raised in the United States at the present time aggregate about $7,000,000,000. The lowest figure I have heard that would put the Townsend plan into effect is $19,000,000,000 and the highest figure I have heard is $26,000,000,000. So we can safely assume it will cost at least $21,000,000,000 to make this plan effective, and therefore the moment we would vote for the Townsend plan taxes to the extent of $21,000,000,000 would need to be raised. We would vote to raise the taxes of the people 300 percent; and I will defy any Member of the Congress to vote to raise the taxes of the people of the United States 300 percent and go back to his district and justify it.

Now, my friends, the question is simply this, whether this is an inflation plan or a plan to distribute purchasing power. If it is distribution of purchasing power it is simply another means of inflating the currency, and frankly we ought not to demagogue any more to these old people who need our help so badly.

We have had other schemes. Some people have advocated taking a dollar bill, printing only one side of it, and in each transaction putting a 2-cent stamp on the back of it. I thought it was the craziest thing every presented to the Banking and Currency Committee.

What difference is there between inflation of the currency in such a manner and this proposal, because every time you turn the dollar bill over you will put a 2-cent stamp on the back of it. The theory of one was that you would actually buy the stamps and put them on the back, and when you put fifty 2-cent stamps on the back of the bill the Treasury in some mystical manner would issue a Federal Reserve note to redeem it. There is not only an increase in the dollar value when you put the 2-cent stamp on, but you thereby depreciate the currency. I cannot see any difference between the Townsend plan for old-age pension, because in each there would be an inflation of the currency wholly out of proportion to the purchasing power.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. If the money could be raised for old-age pensions by a lottery, there would be no inflation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have not voiced my opinion of the gentleman's bill, but I think it would be a good deal safer from the standpoint of the Federal Treasury to adopt the gentleman's plan rather than the Townsend plan. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, the thing that some of us object to in this Townsend campaign is the fraud in the whole proposition. It is all right for a Member to introduce this bill, which provides, as he says, and as it does, for a division of the jackpot—$200, or whatever it may bring—to each person over 60 with an income of $2,400 or less per year; and none of us knows what it may bring. That is one thing here in Congress, but here is the thing that is not right; here is the fraud in the whole proposition. Back home, where they circulate their Townsend Weekly, they put right on the first page—and we called the gentleman's attention to the article—

Two hundred dollars per month stands.

Here is the statement in their own words:

There has never been, nor will be, any compromise on the $200-per-month provision in the Townsend demands. All statements to the contrary are false.

That is not where they stand at all. Fraud in the Townsend campaign! They have one proposition here to get our vote, and they have another proposition back home to defeat us; and I cannot see where it is right or fair for any Member of Congress to stand up and say that you gentlemen should be defeated simply because you will not adopt and support one particular thing, when we all know there is a multitude of questions here. Here are 435 of us. How many of us agree on all of the propositions that are before us? The gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY] said it does not make any difference whether some of us, or perhaps any of us, come back. That is not the question, and I am not talking now about myself and I am not talking about Members on this side, except a few of those who have been here for years. I am talking about these gentlemen on the Democratic side who have represented their districts for so many years, who have served their districts long and faithfully, and who are patriotic and loyal to the principles they believe to be right. These Townsend people want to defeat all of you just because you will not vote for some idea which one fellow has in mind, and they will advocate your defeat. That is entirely different from standing on a party platform. What do they want you to do? Let us start over here and take these 16 young people, beginning right along here with my friend from New York, Mr. O'CONNOR, and my friend from Texas, Mr. BLANTON. They want to put you fellows to work to support an old fellow like me.

Mr. O'CONNOR. We would be glad to contribute.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I know that you would contribute, of course you would, and that is the thing that keeps old people from starving, that kindness, that charity, but they want to put you all to work in order that I may have $200 a month and that my wife may have $200 a month—with an income of $4,800 a year, more money than we have ever had as a net income. The gentleman from Michigan asked a question. Here is a letter I want to incorporate, if I may, in the RECORD, and I ask unanimous consent to extend it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. This letter goes on to say:

Your letter of the 16th at hand and contents noted.

And here is the characteristic answer to every question that you ask them—the Townsend speakers—

We are very much surprised at your little knowledge in regard to the Townsend plan.

You start to argue with them, and that is what they always tell you, but perhaps I better read the whole letter. Here it is:

BANGOR, MICH., January 21, 1936.

Mr. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 16th at hand and contents noted.

We are very much surprised at your little knowledge in regard to the Townsend plan.

We have now in our little town of Bangor Townsend Club No. 1 almost 300 members, and we expect to have 400 by the 1st of March.

Practically all towns in the fourth district show the same growth. We have enough members in the 4th District that will enable us to elect either a Democrat or Republican.

You stated in your letter that the Townsend plan was getting nowhere. To enlighten you on the matter we have 21,000,000 so far who have pledged to support this movement. Do you not think the people will stand to be fooled by the Old Guard Republican Party or the Democrat Party any longer. We are awake.

This is not an old-age-pension plan, but it is a recovery plan to benefit the young as well as the older people, and bring back buying power that has been taken from us.

Please do not think that your articles in different newspapers, seeking publicity for yourself, will hurt our cause, showing plainly how uninformed with this plan you are, for every knock is a boost for the Townsend plan.

Very truly yours,

MRS. K. G. FOSTER,
Sec., Townsend Club No. 1.
C. S. CHURCH.
C. M. GEHLSEN.

You will notice that they say that the Townsend plan is not an old-age-pension plan, but that it is a recovery plan to benefit young as well as older people and bring back buying power which has been taken from them.

Then why not extend the plan? Give the pension to the young between 20 and 25 and let them get an education, so they may support themselves. Or give it to them in a lump sum and let them engage in farming, in business, in manufacturing.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] says he wants to restore buying power. What difference does it all make as to purchasing power, whether 15 men spent $200 per month, or whether 1 man spends $200 per month? Under the Townsend plan, you 15 gentlemen there are to contribute to me $200 per month and I spend it. Why not let you spend it? Is there any reason why you should not? Oh, but they say under this plan it is the law that I must spend it within the month, and that seems to be the real thing in this plan. Spend it! Spend it for whisky, if you wish, says Dr. Townsend in his sworn testimony. Just spend it! I wonder if they have forgotten that merely having a little more money does not increase buying power. Some of them make me think of this statement which was made in the Congress in 1780, so this idea of an increase in the circulating medium is not entirely new. This delegate said:

Why should we vote to tax the people, when a Philadelphia printing press can turn out money by the bushel?

Why not pay this pension in that way?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend represents the Fourth District of Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Most unworthily, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. He will remember that his colleague from the Third Michigan District [Mr. MAIN] made his maiden speech here, and forgot to even mention the Townsend plan, but when we prodded him——

Mr. HOFFMAN. When you what?

Mr. BLANTON. When we "prodded" him. When we prodded him with a prod pole. The gentleman has prodded cattle in a car, has he not?

Mr. HOFFMAN. No; I raise cows and grow apples.

Mr. BLANTON. We prodded him about his forgetting Dr. Townsend in his maiden speech, and finally got him up on the floor again today. Did he convert our friend with his speech today on the Townsend plan?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am in the same situation that I was when these gentlemen wrote me this letter in which they say that they are very much surprised at the little knowledge I have in regard to the Townsend plan. I learned nothing from his speech.

Mr. BLANTON. I just want to ask this one question. The gentleman knows about the Republican standing in the Third and Fourth Districts in Michigan. He knows that in my friend's district, the third, there are 45,000 Republicans normally, while my friend from Michigan, Mr. MAIN, received the votes of only 25,000 of them.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not know about that.

Mr. BLANTON. What became of those other 25,000 Republicans?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Like Al Smith, they "took a walk." [Laughter.]

Mr. MAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MAIN. By way of reply to the gentleman from Texas, I should like to state that the election was a special election involving one office, and it was held a week before Christmas on a very stormy day. The other voters in that Third District would be pardoned, I think, if they did not walk at all under such circumstances. I may say that the gentleman from Texas tried to prod me into some action the other day, whereas if he had read my speech carefully he would have found that I made a very significant reference to the problem of social security as well as a number of other problems that are in the lap of the Congress at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman mention the Townsend plan? No! He did not mention the Townsend plan, did he?

Mr. MAIN. I want to say that I mentioned the problem of social security. I suggest that the gentleman read that speech and ponder over some parts of it as a challenge to the gentlemen on the majority side of the House. At that time, I may say, I was reminded of the girl's definition of a typhoon. She said, "In some parts of Texas they have typhoons, and very bad ones. They get in your hair even though you keep your mouth closed." [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I read the gentleman's maiden speech throughout, and I am still pondering. I did not get anything out of the speech to put me out of that ponder.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Now, we were talking about purchasing power. Money alone does not giving purchasing power. Let me quote from the American Revolution, by John Fiske, volume II, pages 200 and 201:

The condition of American finance in 1780 was simply horrible. The "greenback" delusion possessed people's minds even more strongly than in the days following our Civil War.

* * * * * * *

As Webster truly said, the country had suffered more from this cause than from the arms of the enemy. "The people of the States at that time", said he, "had been worried and fretted, disappointed and put out of humor, by so many tender acts, limitations of prices, and other compulsory methods to force value into paper money, and compel the circulation of it, and by so many vain funding schemes and declarations and promises, all which issued from Congress but died under the most zealous efforts to put them into operation, that their patience was exhausted. These irritations and disappointments had so destroyed the courage and confidence of the people that they appeared heartless and almost stupid when their attention was called to any new proposal."

* * * * * * *

As Washington said, "It took a wagonload of money to buy a wagonload of provisions." At the end of the year 1778 the paper dollar was worth 16 cents in the Northern States and 12 cents in the South. Early in 1780 its value had fallen to 2 cents, and before the end of the year it took 10 paper dollars to make a cent.

In October Indian corn sold wholesale in Boston for $150 a bushel, butter was $12 a pound; tea, $90; sugar, $10; beef, $8; coffee, $12; and a barrel of flour cost $1,575. Samuel Adams paid $2,000 for a hat and suit of clothes.

To say that a thing was not worth a continental became the strongest possible expression of contempt. A barber in Philadelphia papered his shop with bills, and a dog was led up and down the streets, smeared with tar, with this unhappy money sticking all over him.

All this talk of creating purchasing power, of bringing prosperity, by taking money from a group of 16 people and giving it to one person to spend, as is the plan of Dr. Townsend and the gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY] is nothing but folly and nonsense.

I do not know whether the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] got into the hair of the gentleman from Texas by what he said.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, no; he did not. No one ever heard of a typhoon in Texas. We do not have them there.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I still want the gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY] to tell us why it is that here they talk about one thing and back home, when they receive these dimes for monthly dues and the quarters for membership fees and selling a newspaper, that, according to reliable reports, brings Dr. Townsend $2,000 a week and Mr. Clements a like sum, they tell their prospective members that if they join in this plan, each eligible person will receive $200 a month. Is that told to the people back home, to the aged, to the poor, when they ask them to subscribe to the Townsend Weekly at $2 each, to pay a membership fee of 25 cents, give them the opportunity of paying monthly dues of 10 cents, for the purpose of really furthering a plan to give those solicited $200 a month? Or are those statements made for the purpose of selling the paper, collecting membership fees and monthly dues? If not for the latter purpose, then why do they not follow the Townsend Weekly, with its demand for $200 a month, when they get down here and introduce their bill?

On the other hand, if the author of the McGroarty bill and you who are backing it here do not mean to support a bill calling for a pension of $200 a month, why do you not have the Townsend National Weekly print the truth about your activities?

Tell the folks who are taking this weekly, who are paying their dimes and their quarters to further this organization, who have relied upon this statement—I quote again—

There has never been, nor will be, any compromise on the $200-per-month provision in the Townsend demands. All statements to the contrary are false—whether you stand upon the McGroarty bill, which does not provide for a $200-a-month pension, or whether you stand on the statement quoted from the Townsend Weekly.

In the Townsend Weekly you are advertised as supporting the Townsend plan. Your names are on the front page of the issue of December 30, and that same page carries the declaration which I have just quoted.

Are those back of the McGroarty bill asking support of the home folks on the theory that they are working for a $200-a-month pension? Are the home folks supporting those who receive Dr. Townsend's blessing on the theory that they will get $200 a month? Is it fraud, or is it not, to tell the voters one thing, to have something else here?

Mr. MAIN. It is not fraud in my case, because I did not make those promises, and I did not subscribe to any statement other than that I would support the McGroarty bill—H. R. 7154. I will support that bill or a similar bill when it is presented, and I challenge the gentleman to prove that there was any fraud or misrepresentation in the Third District of Michigan during the campaign or at any time in my public career.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I am only making these statements generally. I am not making any charge against the gentleman from the Third District [Mr. MAIN]. My understanding is that Dr. Townsend campaigned in his district for him; that, with Dr. Townsend, he spoke from the same platform; and, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, the gentleman's picture is in the Townsend National Weekly of today, Monday, January 27, on page 6, as supporting the Townsend plan, and under that picture is this statement, in blackface type:

Representative V. W. MAIN, Republican, of Michigan, newly elected to the House of Representatives on a platform favoring the Townsend old-age-pension plan, is one of the first to receive a seat on such a platform.

They inscribe $200 a month on their flag and let it wave there. Does the gentleman stand by that?

Mr. MAIN. I stand for this, if the gentleman will yield——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MAIN. Dr. Townsend has subscribed to the McGroarty bill, and the McGroarty bill is now the Townsend plan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Then, as I understand the gentleman from the Third District of Michigan, he does not stand on the statements contained in Dr. Townsend's paper, the National Weekly. Am I right in that?

Mr. MAIN. I do not see the paper. I do not take it. I do not know what they say, but I do know that Dr. Townsend has said that he subscribes to the McGroarty bill and that the McGroarty bill as introduced will be the Townsend bill, known and cited as the Townsend plan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. But the gentleman does not stand for the $200 a month, or does he?

Mr. MAIN. I do not stand for $200 a month or for any other sum that will give to anybody any place any more than the revenue produced will provide.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, this being more or less a field day for the state of the Union, I want to quote from an editorial by a nationally known, prominent Republican publisher. Before that I want to admonish the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] that there is not anything to worry about being defeated on the Townsend plan. Most of us are going to be defeated because we did not vote for the "death sentence", as I understand it.

INDEPENDENTS DISCUSS OLD GUARD CAMPAIGN

As Republicans we must tell the country what we propose to do about it. Surely if we are against the New Deal and call it a "raw deal" to abolish child labor, give the farmer a place in the economic sun, provide for the aged, the blind, and other dependents, consider human values and give labor a square deal with capital, why not say right out that all these things are "unconstitutional" and that we favor returning to the Hoover depression by abolishing prosperity? (William Allen White in the Emporia Gazette, Republican.)

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, my agricultural district of 19 counties down in the heart of old Kentucky surrounding the Lincoln Monument was greatly perturbed over the death of the A. A. A. They are also greatly perturbed over the loss of their liberty and constitutional rights as pointed out to them at Saturday night's meeting of the Liberty League. The liberty the loss of which they lament most deeply was that of choosing one of the three exalted privileges they had under the preceding administration. They had three options: First, homelessness and bankruptcy; second, starvation and death or go naked; third, suicide. Being free American citizens, they are clamoring that this privilege of choice be restored to them, for this administration with its usurpation of power has relieved them of the necessity of choosing any of these routes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CREAL. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If what the gentleman has stated is true with reference to the lamentations of his constituents with respect to the A. A. A., will the gentleman tell us if the sharecroppers of the South, or the tenant farmers as we knew them, are of the same mind; and if they are, why it has been necessary for this Congress to authorize the appropriation of $1,000,000,000 to relieve the situation in the South with respect to sharecroppers?

Mr. CREAL. I will answer the gentleman's question by saying that he has been here very much longer than I have, and ought to know the reason better than I.

THE DEATH OF THE A. A. A.

Mr. Chairman, on January 7, about 2 o'clock, a Member of Congress asked recognition of the Chair and announced that the Supreme Court had just declared void the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Heavy applause came from the minority side of the House. He said, "I note all the applause comes from the Republican side of the House." At this mention they applauded again and in greater volume and longer than ever. On the Democratic side all was silence and gloom.

Members of the House from the Eastern States, whose chief industry is the factory, were elated. Members of Congress from the Middle West, South, and West were thinking of the disappointment and ruin soon to be given on the wires to the boys back home on the farm.

The highly organized East with its centralization of wealth, which imagines that the rest of the Union exists for their benefit, were elated and that horse laugh and elation of victory over the downfall of the farmer seemed as appropriate as applause at a funeral. I doubt if any of those applauding ever worked a day on a farm in their lives. They know nothing of the work hours from 4 in the morning until 8 at night. I can see in my mind the two pictures of these two sections of the country. One with short working hours, fair wages, comfortable homes, good schools, good roads, and good clothes, spending money for occasional entertainment, and, all in all, pleasant surroundings for comfortable living. And just back of these people towered the great centers of wealth of the Nation.

They were elated at what? The farmers stabilized prices would go down and they would be fed cheaper than ever—cheaper wages could be paid to factory workers because of cheaper food. The capitalist in the end would be the chief beneficiary.

The other picture was that of the farmers and tenant farmers with poor roads, ragged clothes, poorly equipped homes, poor methods of transportation, no amusements, or time, or money for recreation, a dismal slave-driving life. He would now have to work harder to raise more to get less.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed for the purpose, as stated by the President, as follows:

> To stop the decline and rout of American agriculture; originated in the aspirations of the farmers themselves. We sought to stop rule of tooth and claw that threw farmers into bankruptcy or turned them virtually into serfs.

For years the farmer bought his needs at prices fixed by the seller of what he bought, and sold his own product without either price-fixing agencies or limited production. For years the farmers through legislation tried to control and bring down the price of that which the farmer bought, but the capitalistic East was most all the time in control of that party which owed its obligations to them, and the effort did but little good except in small piecemeal.

Who ever heard of any shoe factory making one shoe more than they had demand for? The quantity and the price was organized and stabilized. Now, these industrial organizations seriously object to any law which will regulate farm prices and farm production, yet they have been practicing for 50 years just what they now condemn in the farm act. Who ever heard of a bunch of farmers making up money and going into court to have a law changed which affected factory industries on the pretense that it was a hardship on the factories? Who was it that jumped on the farmers' law with which he had begun to get his head above water again? It was the Republican ex United States Senator Butler, of Massachusetts, whose financial interest is in the textile mills of that State. It was brought in his name and he sat on the front row of the Supreme Court room to listen to the decision rendered in his favor. Three of the nine judges said the law was all right and six said it was unconstitutional. Once a Republican Supreme Court said the income-tax law was unconstitutional by a 5-to-4 decision. Today we have the income-tax law. Who can truly say which decision is right, that of the six or that of the three?

But there is one thing plain to the farmers of the West and the South: There never was, nor will there ever be, a law written for their benefit by eastern capitalists and their representatives in Congress. It must come from the agricultural States and their Members of Congress. The end sought by the A. A. A. was to eventually elevate farm prices to the point where a bushel of corn would buy as much factory commodities as it bought in the 5-year average from 1909 to 1914, which is termed "parity basis." The farmers voted for this program by a vote of 3,693,732 for it and only 562,707 against it, or nearly seven to one. That one out of seven who did not sign reaped the benefit from the program just the same, although unwilling to cooperate.

Did the program succeed? Figures tell their own story—milk was rated as 114 percent of the parity basis on 5-year average, flue-cured tobacco was 114 percent, fire-cured tobacco 117 percent, hogs 94 percent, wheat 80 percent, and corn 70 percent.

There is no law on the Federal statutes deader or more obsolete than the antitrust laws intended to prevent extortion and price fixing. The farmer has long tried but failed to organize production as production is organized by factories. There is no politics for the farmer except for him to know that politics is wholly a matter of geography and occupation. Any eastern capitalist would be foolish to join in with this Democratic Congress from the farm States for a farm program like the A. A. A.

And what are we to say to our farmer friend who expects to live and die on a farm casting his lot with the program of the New England States' capitalist? He would certainly be classed as one who believed it was more blessed to give than receive. This is the first time in history that an administration has dared to draw the wrath of the eastern hoarders of wealth and to openly challenge the cause of the farmer. In doing so the President has paid a great compliment to the intelligence of the farmers. He assumes that they will have vision enough to see he is for their uplifting and also assumes that they will be broad enough to stay with him to the finish of this fight.

There is no question at all involved as to whether grandpa fought in 1865 on the side of the North or South. That was permanently settled 70 years ago and will never rise again.

Are the farmers alive to the issue of the hour? Yes; the lines between the farmer and that 10 percent of the people who have 90 percent of the money are sharply drawn and should be more sharply drawn. As one who knows from personal experience the meager existence which a poor farm affords, and the labor required for existence, I know it has been said too often that farmers have the power but lack organization to stand together and get what they want.

It is one thing to read from the cold pages of a newspaper of an alinement in Congress against the farmer but quite a different feeling to see before your eyes and ears a section of this Nation highly organized for greed applauding the verdict which means more toil and less pay for the farm boys back home. Members of the House from farm districts must stand in unbroken lines. We have the votes. We should be able to rely on the farmers to likewise stand pat. They lament drawing of class lines, yet they have met behind closed doors and, by agreement, drawn the lines against the farmer's interest for their own interest for years, while the farmer innocently toiled on, unaware of the conspiracy to rob him. Poverty has sapped the courage, to some extent, of the farm people, but as the bugle calls them again there is enough Americanism left to rouse the old fire in them. This is not a military war between the States but a commercial struggle for existence of the farmers of the West, Middle West, and South to break the stranglehold of the capitalistic East.

The one infallible sign of decay and age in any nation is when a few people get all the money. We have reached that stage in America. We, as a nation, are prematurely gray. The only way to meet a controlled price is to sell a product with a controlled price. It has all been one-sided in the past. The farmer is not radical, but he wants and needs a fair, square deal and a living wage. Agriculture is the first occupation of the world. The children of man cultivated the soil before they built cities. No critic of the A. A. A. has ever offered or pretended to offer any substitute whatever. They want the system to revert to the old system with the old prices that drove the farmer into bankruptcy and lowered the standards of living for him and his children.

The farmers cannot use the 8-hour law or strike for higher wages, and, worst of all, he cannot today have anything to say about the price of his own product sold. When the farmer buys he says, "What will you charge me?" When he sells he says, "What will you give me?" This condition would ruin eventually any business in the world.

I wish every farmer of America could sit in the galleries of the House of Representatives for a few days and see and hear. He would decide that if he ever in his life expected a square deal that he would never get it from the centers of organized industry. One of these days he will break the bonds of superstition that hangs with some of them and organize with a united front for his own interest. This will result in another emancipation proclamation freeing the American farmer from bondage and slavery. Yes; this is a class issue, and it is a matter of geography and occupation, and it is the only issue of the hour.

I hope to be able, when we have regained what we have lost, to return that applause which sank into me as adding insult to injury.

I propose to vote for each and every measure, large or small, now or later, intended for the farmers' benefit, regardless of what group or class opposes it. And, also, whether it be to enhance the price of the product of the farm or to reduce the price of what he buys.

Organized greed says they have no malice aforethought toward the farmer, which, in a way, may be true, but when they fix all the terms of business to suit themselves, it results in injury to the farmer as much as if done maliciously.

This is the day the farmer is entitled to his day in court, and if a suitable substitute for recently destroyed legislation cannot be had, then a constitutional amendment is the only remedy. This would require 2 years and a fight, but since we are all enlisted for the war, regardless of its duration, let us "stand pat" until the end is accomplished. In the meantime the next best substitute for the A. A. A. must be enacted while we have the votes.

Any administration which fails to recognize farm industry as the first industry and the basis of all other prosperity is short-sighted and detrimental. Let us dedicate ourselves to the task of regaining that which we have temporarily lost and then hold it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, there always will be two major parties in the United States, one of which will be in control of this Government. That is the only safeguard for the American people. These parties will always have platforms. When one of them in power is unfaithful to the people, the people have the right and opportunity to displace them from power.

I am a party man. I believe in party government as a safeguard to the American people. In 1928, at the time of the national convention at Houston, I was a candidate for the United States Senate in Texas, and I had an awfully good chance to be elected. I had promises of support from many of the best people all over Texas. Then the Houston convention was held. I had opposed Hon. Al Smith from this floor many times on fundamental questions. He was nominated in that convention in the city in which I was born, and immediately at the place where I was making my campaign speeches that day I received a telegram from a newspaper reporter wanting to know what I was going to do now since Al had been nominated. He was trying to put me on the spot. Here is the telegram I sent him:

I am a Democrat. I believe in party government. It is the people's only safeguard. When a party ceases to be faithful to the people it can be removed. Through no other system have the people any redress. The Democratic Party is bigger than any nominee. I have never yet scratched a Democratic ticket. It is too late for me to begin now. Al Smith and I differ on some fundamental questions, but my Democratic Party has spoken and he is my party nominee. I was against him prior to his nomination, but I subject my will to the will of my party. I shall support the Democratic ticket from top to bottom, from President to constable. I realize full well it will defeat me for the United States Senate, but I have been the recipient of Democratic favor too long for me now to desert its banner. I won't be a traitor. I am still a loyal Democrat.

That is my position now and it ought to be the position of the man who received the nomination for the highest office at the Houston convention.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now, but I will later if I have time.

Mr. Chairman, I made 150 speeches that year before Democratic audiences. I spoke for my ticket from top to bottom. In the primaries were six prominent candidates running for the United States Senate. One of them was the sitting Senator, Earl Mayfield; one of them was a former national commander of the American Legion; one of them was a good woman, the national head of the Woman's Federated Clubs of the country, Mrs. Minnie Fisher Cunningham. Another was a former Governor of the State. My good friend, TOM CONNALLY, too, was one of my opponents. CONNALLY and I made 150 speeches against each other, and not an unkind word did I say about him, and not one did he say about me. I carried 79 counties against the field of six candidates in Texas, yet TOM CONNALLY beat me, although he carried only 46 counties, because in those counties were some big cities. So he got more votes than I did in the first primary and I was eliminated. The next day I took the stump for and helped elect him, and in the campaign following, although I had been eliminated for the Senate, I made many speeches for our national ticket and not one single dime did I ask from the national committee.

I paid my own expenses; I paid my own railroad fare; I paid my own automobile and hotel bills, as well as the expenses of the man who drove me. I did not "walk out" on Al or on the Democratic Party.

I am disappointed in Al Smith, the recipient of Democratic favor, the man who has received as much favor from the Democratic Party as almost any man in the United States. I am surprised that he should be a turn-abouter and a walk-outer at this time.

Mr. Chairman, during that same campaign I heard Members who are now applauding Al Smith bemeaning him, ridiculing him, making fun of him, and attacking him. Now they have taken Al Smith under their wing and are talking for him. You now have your Republican ticket enlarged. Instead of being the Borah-Fish ticket, it is now the Borah-Smith-Fish ticket that you are getting out. You gentlemen are welcome to that.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I was wondering how Texas went that year.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not responsible for how Texas went. I did my part. I carried every county in my district by a tremendous vote so far as I personally was concerned, but for the first time in the history of the Nation my district nationally went Republican. For the first time in the history of democracy the State of Texas nationally went Republican.

Al Smith ought to be a big enough man to take it and take it with a smile and not be disgruntled. You good

Republicans who believe in parties and believe in party government ought to stand up like men and espouse the cause of your own candidates and let our disgruntled alone. We will take care of them. You take care of your own disgruntled. If the gentleman from Michigan can walk up to the polls and support a ticket that is mixed up with BORAH and FISH, if he can reconcile those two antipodes that are farther apart than any two antipodes I know of, FISH and BORAH, all right. Just think of it. FISH, a great conservative, and BORAH, the great liberal. Why, BORAH is so liberal he is thinking right now, like the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] about flirting with the Townsend plan. Read the article he had in Collier's the other day. You cannot tell whether he is for it or against it. He is just flirting with it. That is a question too serious to be flirted with.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] knows that the Townsend plan had no more to do with his election than the whining of a cat on a rock fence has to do with Sunday school.

Mr. MAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Did the Townsend plan have anything to do with the gentleman's election?

Mr. MAIN. Will the gentleman send that message to the chairman of the Republican National Committee?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. But I asked the gentleman did the Townsend plan elect him?

Mr. MAIN. It was very influential in securing for me the nomination at the primary.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I want to ask the gentleman, if it caused him to be sent to Congress, when he was allotted 20 minutes the other day, in his maiden speech from this floor he never mentioned it, never even referred to Dr. Townsend or the Townsend plan, never referred to Mr. MCGROARTY, never referred to Mr. Clements, the former real-estate man of Los Angeles, who, when he hooked up with Dr. Townsend, was as poor as a church mouse and is now almost as rich as Croesus.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yield the gentleman 4 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] that while I twit him and prod him, I like him personally, and I think possibly he may live through this Townsend business.

May I ask him a further question. Since he has come from Michigan and has spoken on the floor of the House, and has been associated with the Members on both sides, does he think for one moment that there is any chance of passing the Townsend plan? May I say further, that every man here, who was not just blown in temporarily on some landslide, has done something worth while in his district or he would not stay here long. Every man here is an outstanding man in his district. Now, after having associated with them, does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] believe for one moment that there is any chance of passing this Townsend law?

Mr. MAIN. Not at this session. The gentleman has answered his own question.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman some more questions. The gentleman does not expect to do it at this session?

Mr. MAIN. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman expect to do it at the next session?

Mr. MAIN. That remains to be seen.

Mr. BLANTON. Then does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] expect to come here and undermine his colleagues and cause them to be put out of the House? Or does the gentleman expect by his logic to convince his colleagues of the soundness of the Townsend plan? How is he going to do the latter if he does not even mention the Townsend plan in his entire speech? How do you expect to change the judgment, discretion, and opinion of these Members here if you do not get up and do it by a logical argument?

Mr. MAIN. I came here interested primarily in the old people in my district and to find a way to raise revenue in order to provide for a generous pension for their maintenance. I am not interested in Dr. Townsend, and I am not interested in Mr. Clements. I am only interested in the protection of those elderly people.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] to leave that out of his remarks, because I have finally gotten the truth. He stated "he is not interested in Dr. Townsend." Of course, he is not interested in him. When he took that oath the other day to abide by the Constitution it impressed him. His whole maiden speech was on the Constitution after he took the oath, it impressed him so. He was talking about obeying and upholding the Constitution, and he heard the great leader of Dr. Townsend and of Brother MCGROARTY on this floor, my young friend, MONAGHAN, from Montana, get on the floor here and say the other day, "It is true that the Constitution nowhere authorizes you to tax all the people to pay a gratuity to a particular class."

Mr. MONAGHAN made that statement here in the presence of our friend from Michigan, Mr. MAIN, and when he heard his leader speak he dropped the Townsend plan. He is not interested in it. It is dead as Hector, and he knows it.

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] is not going to change the position of a man on this floor, and the sensible people back home are going to back up every man in this House who stands here and fights against this impossible monstrosity.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to say first to the gentleman from Texas that when I mention Senator BORAH, I mention him not as a Member of another body but as a candidate for President.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman always has that right. When a man is a candidate you have the right to mention him anywhere because the rule changes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Texas a few moments ago very properly used the word "flirting" in connection with Senator BORAH's attitude toward the Townsend plan. During the recess of Congress out in Idaho he was reported to have very kindly mentioned Dr. Townsend and the Townsend plan, which has brought him a great deal of favorable publicity through the Townsend Weekly. I think it is only proper at this time to remind the Townsend people throughout the country that Senator BORAH allowed 8 long months to go by in the last session of Congress without saying a kind word for Dr. Townsend or the Townsend plan on the floor of the Senate. He is doing the same thing now—that is, saying nothing in the Senate—and he let the opportunity go by over there in the last session to offer the McGroarty bill as a substitute for the security bill, as was done in this House, or to introduce a Townsend bill in the Senate. So I think the gentleman from Texas very properly used the word "flirting" to describe what the Senator is doing, because flirting is never meant seriously.

Mr. BLANTON. Every good lawyer in the United States knows full well that the proposed Townsend plan is unconstitutional and that it would be set aside and annulled by the Supreme Court before it could be put into effect. Not an aged person would ever receive one dollar from it. Hence it is a delusion and a snare. It is a fraud on its face. It is deceiving good people. It is taking money from them under false pretenses. It will end in their sad disappointment.

But even if it were constitutional, which clearly it is not, a 30-page report just made public, of an intensive study of it made by 18 professors in the Chicago University, shows that it would be absolutely ruinous to the country and could not raise but a small part of the money needed to pay it. I quote the following from today's Washington Daily News just off the press:

[From the Washington Daily News of Jan. 27, 1936]

TOWNSEND PLAN HELD "DELUSION" IN STUDY BY UNIVERSITY GROUP—CHICAGO PROFESSORS DECLARE PROPOSED TAX INADEQUATE TO FINANCE VAST PENSION SCHEME

The Townsend plan's proposal for $200-a-month pensions for some 7,000,000 Americans past 60, financed by a 2-percent "transaction tax", was declared "altogether a delusion" in a report made public today by the economics faculty of the University of Chicago.

The report covers 30 pages, and is the first intensive study made of the Townsend plan by an academic group of experts. Eighteen faculty members engaged in the study, under the direction of Dr. H. A. Millis, head of the university's department of economics.

40 PERCENT OF INCOME

"The vast pension scheme," says the report, "would cost twenty billions a year, which is 40 percent of the 1934 national income."

To finance this burden would "throw over all hope of preserving a sound monetary system" and cause a currency or credit inflation to the tune of 15 billion or more a year, it asserts.

The income tax proposed to supplement the transaction tax would raise only $51,000,000 a year, say the Chicago economists, and the 2-percent extra tax on inheritances and gifts would yield "not much more than $25,000,000."

TAX INADEQUATE

The transaction tax, says the report, would yield "very much less than the slogan of $200 a month implies.

"There is no ground for thinking that it could possibly produce more than $6,000,000,000 a year in anything like present circumstances. In fact a yield of over $3,000,000,000 would be surprising.

"Its administration would be prodigiously difficult, if not impossible." The report adds that, far from reviving business, it would have the opposite effect.

SCARCELY $75, NOT $200

Instead of financing $200 a month, say the economists, the transaction tax would "scarcely yield enough to pay $75 per month" to 7,000,000 pensioners, much less $200 to 10,000,000, "even without shrinkage of transactions below present levels."

And while proving ineffective to meet the claims, it "would constitute a burden strong enough to exert a strong upward pressure on living costs and a strong downward pressure on farm prices and wages." Furthermore, it is asserted, "the tax would operate in favor of large firms as against small, and in favor of chains as against independent units. Many firms would probably be wiped out."

Such a tax, the report says, would cause the "virtual disappearance (or migration to Canada) of security markets and produce exchanges." It would "reduce employment and intensify the depression by increasing business uncertainty and inducing public and private hoarding."

The Queen Anne's Record is a newspaper ably edited by William E. Grose at Centreville, Md., and in its issue of Thursday, December 26, 1935, is such a splendid editorial against robbing the aged I want to quote it, as follows:

PAUPER PENNIES

It is not often here at the Record that we decline to publish contributions to our Mail Bag.

We consider that department of the paper an open forum and letters are welcomed.

Last week we declined to publish one. It was written by Mr. G. D. Neavitt, advocating the formation of Townsend clubs in Queen Annes County.

In our opinion, to lend tacit approval to the formation of such groups in this county by printing Townsend propaganda would be violating the creed that appears in our masthead—i. e., "To espouse the best interests of the Nation, Queen Annes County, and the Eastern Shore * * *."

And we are not immediately concerned with the all-consuming objective of the Townsend plan—the payment of a $200-a-month pension to all persons in the United States who have reached the age of 60.

We are concerned, however, with the amount, albeit small, that it will cost the people of Queen Annes County to pursue the pipe dream and delusion of ever obtaining a $200-a-month pension.

It is the pittance wrung from the aged and infirm—many unable to afford it—that concerns us.

Dr. Townsend personally is a gentle old soul. True, his imagination spawned the idea, but it is not Dr. Townsend who conceived all the schemes to keep the idea alive and make it grow.

It is not Dr. Townsend who thought up all the ways to milk old people of their dollars, quarters, dimes, nickels, and pennies.

Political sharpsters and younger parasites, quick to size up the money-making possibilities of the scheme, flocked to the cause. Theirs was the job of designing the trimmings.

Knowing that no one will blow Townsend bubbles if the cost is too high, all has been geared on chicken feed.

For 25 cents a palsied hand can send for a booklet outlining the movement. For 10 cents per member per month the aged and infirm can join the club and sit in while a young or middle-aged crackpot discourses on Utopia.

For nickels and pennies many who dread thoughts of the almshouse or the sharp tongue of an in-law can buy reports, copies of the bill, buttons, banners, stickers, and doodads to fan the flames of delusion.

For a dollar rheumy eyes can read the movement's weekly newspaper and live in a world of make-believe, conjuring up dreams of the heaven-on-earth that $200 a month will bring.

Eventually the bubble will burst, but until it does younger leeches will sit in swivel chairs and fatten on pauper pennies.

Let me repeat again, that after all of the money which has been spent organizing Members' districts, and having Members threatened with defeat if they did not support the Townsend plan, when the matter came to a vote in the last session there were only 56 Members who voted for it. Not a member of the Texas delegation voted for it. All 21 Members of the Texas delegation were solidly against it. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN] were to stay here for 50 years he would never see any Congress pass a law which we all know is unconstitutional and which would ruin the United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10630) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate having proceeded to reconsider the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, returned by the President of the United States to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, with his objections, and passed by the House on a reconsideration of the same, it was

Resolved, That the said bill do pass, two-thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee."

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3328. An act to provide an official seal for the United States Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes.

DESIGN AND CONSTRUCTION OF AIRSHIPS

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a report made to the Secretary of the Navy by a committee which was appointed to review and analyze the past and present situation as to design and construction of airships and make recommendations as to their future design and construction.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following report made to the Secretary of the Navy by a committee which was appointed to analyze the past and present situation as to design and construction of airships, and made recommendations as to their future design and construction.

NEW YORK CITY, January 16, 1936.

Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The committee appointed at your request by the Science Advisory Board is intended "to review and analyze the past and present situation as to the design and construction of airships and to make recommendations as to their future design and construction."

We have understood the first phrase in the specification of our field of investigation as indicating a study historical and analytical in character and logically essential in order to proceed with the second specification relating to the future of such construction.

At the present time we desire to make a report of progress relating in particular to the basic question of the practicability of the design, construction, and operation of airships, with a reasonable assurance of their safety and reliability and with such technical characteristics as to offer good promise of potential usefulness either for commercial or military (naval) use.

While in accordance with our instructions we make no attempt to discuss the technical phases of the uses of airships, either military (naval) or commercial, we cannot present our conclusions regarding the practicability and potential usefulness of such structures independent of some recognition of the general fields in which they seem to offer effective service.

Thus referring to the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1935, and in particular to the report of Rear Admiral King to the Secretary, uses of the following character seem to be indicated:

"(1) Coast patrol service, especially detection of submarines and mines.

"(2) Guidance of troops convoys and naval vessels through mine fields.

"(3) It is also common knowledge that the large airship is looked to especially for services of the character of strategic reconnaissance and as an airplane carrier.

"For the first-mentioned services, nonrigids (blimps) and rigid airships of small or moderate size are indicated, while for the last-named service, ships of the largest size will be required."

In the commercial field we recognize the possibility of effective service for ships of various sizes, small, medium, or large, according to the various traffic requirements. Demonstration of such service in recent years is given by the Graf Zeppelin of the Luftschiffbau-Zeppelin, and is further indicated by the continuing policy of this company as evidenced not only by their construction of the L. Z. 129, now approaching her test trials, but also their announced intention of building additional ships.

We now consider, therefore, the basic question: Can a reasonably safe and useful airship be designed, constructed, and operated, and if so, under what broad conditions?

DESIGN AND CONSTRUCTION OF A SAFE AND USEFUL AIRSHIP

The answer to this question turns immediately on the meaning attached to the two words "safe" and "useful."

First regarding safety in the various means of transport. Nothing is entirely safe. Railway travel has its accidents and casualties, surface ships are wrecked, airplanes crash, and the automobile, including errors of operation, is perhaps the most unsafe of all modern agencies of transport. Yet in the face of these all too familiar occurrences, we do not contemplate giving up any of these means of transport.

The reason is partly or perhaps largely psychological. These means of transport have established themselves as a part of our modern civilization. They are performing a service which, in the mass estimate of our people, justifies their retention and development in the general scheme of the transport of persons and things, despite the numerous continuing accidents and casualties.

Obviously it is impossible to fix any definite percentage or measure of performance as constituting a safe surface ship, a safe airplane, or a safe airship. We may, perhaps, however, define a safe airship as one the performance of which, in the mass estimate of those interested in this mode of transport and with some competence of judgment, is such as to justify its present retention in the general scheme of transport and its development at least to the point of demonstrating whether or not it is or will be capable of attaining and retaining an assured and useful place among other competitive means. The point here is that quite aside from the question of safety, the airship, especially the airship of the largest size, must be considered as not yet having acquired a wholly assured place as an agency of transport, and in order to make practicable a satisfactory determination of this latter question the structure itself must be given a measure of safety which, in the mass estimate of those with some competence of judgment, will justify its further development and use to the point of definite demonstration.

In connection with the general question of airship safety and the future of the airship as an agency of transport, we have given special attention to the record of the principal casualties which have marked the development of this type of structure. Regarding these casualties, both in the United States and in Europe, we note especially two points:

1. All development of a new form of transport, and more broadly all new developments, are subject to possible hazards. This has been true in marked degree with the airplane, the heavier-than-air form of air transport. We have, however, accepted these hazards and casualties as a part of the price which must be paid for all such steps forward.

2. Our study of the record of these casualties leads us to the belief that, with the lessons which have been drawn from them, and with the general advance in our understanding of the technical problems of airship design, construction, and operation, the probability of a repetition of such casualties under like conditions should for future construction be reduced to a point which, if not vanishing entirely, may be considered as acceptable in comparison with the promise of useful service.

Regarding the question of a useful airship, we have already referred, in broad terms, to the apparent fields of potential service for structures of this character and we do not consider that further discussion of this phase of our problem is essential at this point.

Regarding the safety of such types of construction, we consider the entire record of the service of small nonrigids and of rigid airships of moderate size, in convoy and patrol services, during the Great War and elsewhere, as warranting the assertion that safe and useful ships of these types and sizes can be designed, constructed, and operated.

As regards airships of the largest size, such as the Akron type and upward, it becomes necessary to define more carefully the conditions under which a reasonable and proper margin of safety can be secured.

With reference to this type, your committee is prepared to give likewise an answer in the affirmative, as to the practicability of a safe and useful airship, but under general conditions as follows:

CONDITIONS FOR DESIGN AND CONSTRUCTION OF A SAFE AIRSHIP

1. Design in the light of the most careful and thorough analysis of world experience with airships up to the present time and including in particular all failures and casualties regarding the causes of which reasonably adequate information is available.

2. Design in the light of the most recent studies and advances in the mechanics of typical airship structures.

3. Specification of aerodynamic loads, whether due to maneuvers or to storm conditions (gusts, etc.) in the light of the most recent and careful studies based on:

(a) Approved aerodynamic theory including the most recent advances.

(b) Results of wind-tunnel research and of experience with actual ships.

(c) Recent advances in meteorological science with special reference to the structure of gusts, polar fronts, line squalls, etc.

4. Construction under conditions as to supervision and inspection which will insure the nearest practicable approach in the completed structure to the qualities and characteristics contemplated in the design.

5. On the completion of the structure itself, opportunity for operation under some cooperative arrangement between builder and owner, over a period of time sufficient to permit the taking of strain-gage readings at all critical points of the structure and other technical observations under progressively and more and more exacting conditions, maneuvers and weather, up to and including conditions approaching the most severe to be anticipated. Such period of test should not be curtailed or hurried. It is of vital and fundamental importance. It will furthermore give opportunity for the development and correction of many matters, important or otherwise, which may always be expected when a new design first takes the air.

6. When delivered for service, operation by a personnel thoroughly trained and experienced in the handling of airships and in the light of the most complete meteorological information available, analyzed for the guidance of the command by an experienced aerologist trained in the more recent advances in meteorological science.

Of these various conditions it seems proper to note at this point that for the designs of the Akron and Macon Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 seem to have been met within the measure of the information available at the time when these designs were developed. While there have been differences among experts in airship design regarding the relative value of certain general types of structure, especially as to certain features of what may be called English design and German Zeppelin design, the adoption of the general type of Zeppelin structure seems to have been justified on the ground of successful experience. And with the adoption of this general type of design the requirements of conditions (1) to (4), as based on the information available at that time and the methods of design then current, seem to have been consistently undertaken.

The history of the trial runs, however, shows that condition (5) was not adequately met.

Regarding operation as referred to in condition (6) we express no present opinion, especially in the sense of indicating responsibility for the loss of either the Shenandoah, the Akron, or the Macon. Furthermore, in the cases of these ships the question of operation as a factor involving personal responsibility for their loss has already been passed on by official naval boards of inquiry, and a review of the findings of those various boards is no part of the specified duty of this committee.

IMPROVEMENTS IN CONDITIONS FOR AIRSHIP DESIGN SINCE 1928

Regarding airship design and construction at the present time or in the immediate future as compared with the situation in 1928, when the designs of the Akron and Macon were developed, improvement in these various conditions may be noted as follows:

Condition 1. There is a large amount of actual experience available at the present time not available at the earlier period. This includes:

(a) Actual flying experience with the Akron and Macon for 3,257 hours of time and over 160,000 miles of distance, together with the special studies relating to the conditions surrounding the loss of these two ships.

(b) The experience of the Graf Zeppelin in demonstration flights around the world and in commercial flights during the past 6 years aggregating some 11,868 hours of flying and covering some 736,289 miles of distance. Through the kindness of Captain Eckener and his governing board in permitting both officers of the Navy and American engineers in civil life to participate in the trips of this ship in regular flights between Europe and South America, the salient features of this long and successful period of airship operation are at the disposal of American designers in connection with the development of new designs.

Condition 2. In recent years there have been developed certain advances and refinements in the theoretical treatment of the mechanics of structures such as airships, all of which will aid in obtaining enlarged assurance of the desired and contemplated relation between the loads assumed and the strength of the structure provided to carry such loads.

Condition (3). The importance of aerodynamic loads and of due allowance for their effect on the structure has received continued and careful study over the period since the preparation of the Akron-Macon design and there has been a continued accumulation of information which, we believe, will serve as a more adequate basis for the estimate of such loads than was possible in 1928. In addition, this committee has now under investigation certain phases of this general problem, especially as regards the aerodynamic load on fins and its distribution, together with studies on the structure of gusts and their influence on airship structures as a whole or locally. We have also in mind recommendations for further studies on this particular subject, all of which should aid in making practicable a more adequate estimate of the loads to be provided for, due to various combinations of aerodynamic conditions.

Likewise, in meteorology, since the period of the design of the Akron and Macon, there have been great, even revolutionary, changes in the technique of accurate forecasting. It may be assumed that there will always be a possible hazard for airships, or for any aircraft, in extreme weather conditions; but with these more recent advances in the science of meteorology and with the enlarged information now available from more numerous sources and points of observation, it would seem that there should be no serious difficulty in avoiding such extreme hazards. Here, again, the 6 years' experience of the Graf Zeppelin seems to furnish proper grounds for this general conclusion.

On the whole, therefore, and with special reference to airships of the larger sizes, we believe that it is practicable to design, construct, and operate such airships with a reasonable assurance of safety and with a presumptive life which should serve to permit of a demonstration of their capacity for useful service, whether commercial or military (naval).

RECOMMENDATIONS AS TO FUTURE CONSTRUCTION

It has been already pointed out that the experience with large airships in the United States has not as yet been sufficient to give ground for a wholly settled opinion as to the character and extent of their potential usefulness, either commercial or naval.

In view, therefore, of our expressed opinion as to the practicability of the design, construction, and operation of such airships with a reasonable margin of safety and with the presumption of capacity for useful service, it is the unanimous opinion of this committee that the best interests of the services in which airships give promise of useful and effective service, both commercial and naval, require a continuing program of construction and use.

And in pursuance of this opinion it is our recommendation that the Navy Department should continue with a positive, carefully considered program of airship construction, including nonrigids and rigid ships of small or moderate size as service requirements might indicate, and extending to a ship or ships of large size, to the point, at least for the latter, of furnishing ground for definite conclusions regarding the capacity for useful naval service of constructions of this character.

We further recommend most strongly that the first large airship built under such a program should, at least for a time, be considered not an adjunct to the fleet but, rather, a flying laboratory or flying training ship, not only for extensive technical observations of the structure under operating conditions but also for enlarging our knowledge regarding the best conditions of service for such vessels and, as well, for giving opportunity for the training of officers and crew in the technique of handling airships under all conditions of weather and service.

In a subsequent report or reports we shall, with suitable recommendations and supporting documents, present in some detail material more fully and directly responsive to the technical phases of your letter of instructions.

Respectfully submitted.

LOW-COST HOUSING

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on low-cost housing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, less than a year ago the senior Senator from New York [Hon. ROBERT WAGNER] introduced a bill in the Senate—S. 2392—in an effort to meet the housing situation in the United States. Its title told the story. It was a bill "to promote the public health, safety, and welfare by providing for the elimination of insanitary and dangerous housing conditions, to relieve congested areas, to aid in the construction and supervision of low rental dwelling accommodations, and to further national industrial recovery through the employment of labor and materials."

With the consent of the Senator, I introduced the same bill in the House on January 20, 1936, H. R. 10386.

I believe it will be agreed by many Members of this House that social ills and moral dangers are brought about through neglect in providing wholesome and proper housing for families of moderate income.

Our Government has been and will continue to be compelled to pay in impaired vitality and health of a large part of its people for its failure to recognize the seriousness of this situation.

Delay and inaction have less excuse now than ever before. H. R. 10386 has been devised for dealing with this basic and all-important problem, which is rational, economically sound, and thoroughly American. Clean American life requires good homes, decent living and working conditions, and adequate space for play. Efforts to meet the situation are of two main types, restrictive and constructive. Of the former type is the unevenly distributed system of regulatory laws and ordinances which set up minimum standards of light, air, sanitation, and safety by an exercise of the police power in the interest of health, morals, and general welfare. Under the second heading are classed employers' housing and the housing erected by limited dividend companies, insofar as they produced better housing at cheaper cost than private business enterprise.

It should be clearly understood, however, that restrictive housing legislation involves an expansion of the functions of government, limiting the right of the individual to do as he likes with his property at the point where the community believes the health, morals, or safety of others are liable to be endangered. Such regulations are always resented and fought by owners of insanitary and dilapidated old houses and by those builders and real-estate developers who want to overcrowd the land with shoddy buildings in the future.

In studying means of advancing the President's forward-looking policies of rehabilitating our Nation, the problem of providing adequate homes and living conditions for America's lower-income earners presented itself prominently. His recognition of the great social evil of the slum gives us cause to hope that the program now directed toward its abolition may be continued and enlarged until the sought-for goal is attained.

Innumerable records made by the cities themselves, the researchers of P. W. A.'s own Housing Division, and surveys of the United States Department of Commerce, all show that the maintenance of slum areas costs from 3 to 10 times the aggregate of their tax contributions.

When it comes to slums, we are financing annually a terrible deficit. Here is a perennial unbalanced budget that does not give the Liberty League and the United States Chamber of Commerce or the Wall Street bankers the slightest concern. Literally, we are subsidizing the most shameful phase of our civic life. As long as the need for parks and playgrounds and hospitalization is recognized there is also need to recognize good housing for those of small incomes. We have been using millions of dollars of public money annually for many years to pay the cost of slums, to perpetuate our lowest income group in worse than medieval squalor. Here, in very truth, is a sordid investment of the taxpayers' money in vice and crime and disease. As the philosopher said:

When millions of people are still living in hunger, pain, degredation, and slavery, all work which has not for its purpose, direct or indirect, the alleviation of human suffering is either useless, futile, or criminal.

"Disaster spreads death in forgotten slum-clearance area" was the headline of a first-page story in a leading Buffalo paper January 2, 1936.

Five persons lost their lives, and six others miraculously escaped death—

Continues the gruesome story. Victims trapped under crumbling ruins of building in LeCouteuleux Street.

The explosion crumpled the 40-year-old building with a crash that rocked the entire downtown area. It dragged down into the ruins two women, a man, and four children. Some of the oldest buildings in the city are located there. Many were built in the 1830's. After the district saw the peak of its prosperity around the time of the Civil War, the area had a reputation carried around the world by sailors as one of the "toughest places in the United States, equaling the Barbary Coast for crime of all kinds."

This building and this area are typical, whether in Buffalo, Chicago, New York City, or San Francisco. Some of the cheapest and most undesirable places house from 1 to 50 families and provide little wooden cubicles about 7 feet by 10. A floor formerly used for business or manufacturing, with windows at the front and rear, is divided off into as many of these little cubbyholes as space will permit. Only a few have direct light and ventilation from the outside. Bathing facilities are poor and scant. Some houses have a water supply inside, the others have only a yard hydrant which compels families to carry in buckets the water supply for cooking, scrubbing, bathing. Many outside brick walls are cracked and in need of painting; some chimneys seem ready to topple; many rooms need artificial light all day; and the narrow passages of cobbled streets, the dead-end streets, and the courts have little light at night. Overcrowding is prevalent, and there are many instances of a whole family in one room.

There are still 10,000 privies in Philadelphia, and many of the courts have open gutters for surface drainage. The tuberculosis death rate in the congested Negro sections is from three to five times as high as that of the city as a whole.

In Cincinnati there are about 12,000 tenement houses, and a survey discloses that of the buildings visited 70 percent of the rooms are dark, 3.7 percent are damp, and that there were but 80 bath tubs in 1,706 apartments.

New York City has had a housing and health problem from the earliest days. The city was originally built up with one-family dwellings. When a neighborhood lost social standing, property was neglected, and many families moved into a house intended for one, living there in filth and squalor without sanitary convenience. The early tenements were mere barracks. Water supply and toilets were in the yards. Dark rooms were numerous.

The number of interior rooms in old houses, without windows to the outer air, is incredible to those who have not studied the subject. New York has over 350,000 such rooms. Boston has them, San Francisco, New Orleans—every big city. But so have many of the small ones, and they are not unknown in the open country. And then there are millions of rooms, only a little better, whose windows look out on dark, narrow courts and passageways, sometimes mere cracks between two walls.

Darkness develops rickets in children and helps the spread of tuberculosis from every open lesion case. Almost all tenement babies have rickets to a greater or lesser degree. Dark rooms, moreover, are not kept as clean as light rooms, because the dirt does not show.

This is a favorable opportunity to push H. R. 10386 for the following reasons:

First. Every dwelling built saves something like $400 which must otherwise be wasted in keeping in idleness the labor which the building of the dwelling would directly or indirectly employ.

Second. Materials are plentiful and cheap and are mainly produced at home.

Third. Building prices are favorable.

Fourth. Money is so plentiful, so idle in the banks, that hundreds of millions are available for Government use at from 1 to 3½ percent.

Fifth. The building of houses that are needed creates a valuable capital asset capable of earning a revenue for 50 or 75 years. There are few forms of wealth from which the return is more steady or more secure.

Sixth. There are not many forms of large-scale expenditures which have so little effect in disturbing the balance of trade or the rates of exchange.

Seventh. There are few channels through which purchasing power can be so widely and safely distributed, or through which a more healthy stimulus to home industry can be given; while every dollar so spent or distributed produces equivalent and permanent value.

Eighth. And, last but not least, the price of the slums represents a constant drain upon the community in terms of ill health, crime ,juvenile delinquency, and relief. Slums never yet have been a profitable investment for any city. They return little to the municipality at the tax window; they exact much of the public revenue for police and fire protection, health service, charity, and the upkeep of jails and penitentiaries.

The problem has been long neglected, but it is not insoluble.

I believe above others that there has been a divided responsibility—a responsibility divided as between the local authorities and the Government.

By such means as outlined in H. R. 10386 we concentrate that responsibility, because the Government itself accepts that responsibility for undertaking to see the thing through.

Mr. Speaker, there is an urgent need for action, and I trust my colleagues will join with me in urging the committees to report the bill. If the Members will act now, even though the way is long and the going tedious, the millions of respectable American families that now lack even a minimum of decent shelter will be given modern, healthful, comfortable, and efficient dwelling units at low rentals.

THE NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address by my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HIGGINS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address by Representative JOHN W. MCCORMACK, Democrat, of Massachusetts, over the Columbia Broadcasting System, Friday, January 17, 1936, at 4 p. m.:

The Constitution of the United States, the fundamental law of the land, guarantees to each and every one certain rights which Government itself cannot impair or destroy. It is the greatest document relating to a government ever devised in the history of mankind. In that immortal document will be found the efforts of many generations of bygone days to obtain recognition of human rights and to establish safeguards for the preservation of these rights. Under our form of government the people, the supreme or sovereign power, speaking through the Constitution, established a democratic form of government operating through the representative system and setting forth the great human rights that past generations so courageously fought to obtain.

A democracy is a government by the people as distinguished from a dictatorship, which is a government of one person invested with the absolute powers of government; or an oligarchy, a government in which the supreme power is in the hands of a few. Under all forms of government other than a democracy the people have no inherent rights; they are political slaves, having no voice in the conduct of government except what he or they in control of government permit by sufferance. What rights exist are simply at the will of the supreme power. In a democracy the opposite is true. Our rights are set forth in the Constitution, with safeguards to protect them. Legislative bodies possess no power to limit or abridge such rights except by the will of the people, as provided in the Constitution.

The value of our form of government and the necessity of detecting its enemies is best evidenced by what is happening in other countries of the world where dictatorships or class governments exist. I particularly refer to Soviet Russia, the form of government which an un-American movement seeks to establish in the United States, under which the individual possesses no natural rights and where even the great principle of freedom or religious conscience has been destroyed.

In the United States we possess by constitutional guarantee the right of freedom of speech and the press, of the right of a trial by jury, of the right of ownership of our property and which cannot be taken away from us except by due process of the law, of protection of the sanctity of the home and family life, of freedom of a religious conscience and of the free exercise thereof, and of other great human rights necessary for the "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" of a people. Under dictatorships, or class governments, we find few, if any, of these rights existing, and where they do exist, it is only by sufferance, not as a matter of right, and simply because expediency permits or calls for their existence, and then only for such period as those in control of government desire.

In addition to our inherent right of a free religious conscience, we possess another right, one of the pillar stones of a democracy, which I have already mentioned, the right of free speech and of a free press. That does not mean that one can talk or write without any limitations. That does not mean that one can slander or libel another and if sued or indicted, claim that the Constitution permits unlimited utterances or writings. Slander is license, not the exercise, not the freedom of speech. Libel is also license, not freedom of the press. To take any other position would subject a person to any kind of a false and malicious attack, the deliberate attempt to destroy character and reputation without any means of legal protection. If such a condition existed, or was permitted to exist, no person would be safe, the ultimate result would be chaos. If legal means did not exist for the protection of a person against unfair or unwarranted attacks, one would be compelled, through necessity, to devise means of protecting himself.

While we possess this great right, it does not mean that unbridled utterances cannot be legislated against, and that the well-being of the decent, law-abiding person cannot be protected against utterances, oral or in writing, of those who would exercise this great right in a malicious and destructive manner. It does not mean that one can slander and libel another and then claim that he has a right to do so because of the constitutional provision of freedom of speech or of the press.

Freedom of speech and of the press, as guaranteed by the Constitution, also does not and should not mean that any organization or movement can advocate the overthrow of our Government by violence and force. We have in the United States, as a part of a world-wide revolutionary movement, such an organization, which has as its objective the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force and violence. This movement—communism—through the use of force and violence, has as its objective the establishment of a dictatorship of the so-called proletariat, along the same lines as the Soviet regime of Russia. It is a movement alien to our institutions. It is subversive to our form of government. It is the avowed enemy of every American ideal and tradition. And yet, those who are a part of such efforts, and their allies—and there are many giving them aid and comfort who profess to be Americans—claim that they have a right under our Constitution—freedom of speech and of the press—to advocate not only the destruction of this great right and all others contained in the Constitution, but government itself.

I do not recognize the right of any movement to claim constitutional protection in their efforts to obtain such an iniquitous and destructive objective. I recognize the right of any person, organization, or movement to advocate anything that they want, or any change in our Government, provided they do so within and not outside of the laws—provided they do so in the American way, through the ballot box. Our Constitution provides for an orderly manner of bringing about changes in either government or our fundamental law. While I may not agree with proposed changes, and as a citizen may oppose them, nevertheless, acting within the law, they are proceeding in a constitutional manner, in accordance with the great principle and right to which I have referred. When any movement goes beyond the Constitution and advocates force and violence to obtain their objective, whether this movement is communism, fascism, nazi-ism, or any other name, it is beyond the pale of constitutional protection and should be legislated against.

It is the duty of government to protect itself and its people against such utterances, particularly when they are a part of a deliberate movement to employ force and violence, either presently or ultimately. The people of the United States should demand that their Senators and Representatives in the Congress pass legislation which will make such utterances, spoken or written, knowingly and willfully made, a crime. Such a bill is pending at the present time before the Congress. This bill was recommended to the Congress by the Committee on un-American Activities, of which I was chairman, as a result of our investigations of last year. This bill was reported favorably out of the House Committee on the Judiciary, and at present is on a House calendar awaiting the consideration of the House. It provides that "any person who knowingly and willfully advocates the overthrow of our Government by force and violence shall be guilty of a crime; and if guilty, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both."

Such legislation is proper and necessary. It is aimed at those who advocate overthrow of government by force and violence. It presents clearly the line of distinction between freedom of speech and of the press, and uncontrolled and destructive license. Why should we permit such conditions to exist without the enactment of legislation to meet the same? Members of such a movement are enemies of our form of government. They admitted before my committee their objectives and that they would employ any and all means, legal or illegal, to accomplish the same. It is not a question of whether this movement can be successful in this country, which it cannot; but should we permit them to continue such illegal and contemptible attempts, by force and violence, to disturb the peace of our people, and to try and impose upon us in an unconstitutional manner the government of Soviet Russia, with its destruction of human rights and liberties?

This bill will also apply to any other movement, no matter what its name may be, which attempts to overthrow government, not in the manner provided for by the Constitution, but by force and violence. Under existing law they cannot be prosecuted. Our existing Federal laws provide prosecution only when a conspiracy exists, which means that it must be proved that two or more persons conspired, and some act is performed in furtherance of the conspiracy. Because of the difficulty of proving a conspiracy, the present law is inoperative and dead.

The special committee also recommended another bill making it a crime for any person who "with the intent to incite disaffection advises, counsels, or solicits any member of the Army and Navy to disobey the law and regulations governing the Army and Navy." This bill is aimed at those who try to incite disobedience just the same as the present law making it a crime for anyone to incite desertion is aimed at those who want to destroy the effectiveness of our national defense. This bill also was reported out of committee, and is pending on the House Calendar. Both bills, in no way affecting the great principle of free speech and a free press, are aimed at the enemies of our Government. Both bills are aimed at the abuse of license. They should both receive the support of all persons who, like myself, love our institutions of Government and who are determined that proper legislation, the purpose of which is to meet the attacks of such enemies, shall be enacted into law. The argument of free speech being involved is a fallacious one, the purpose of which is to mislead and deceive. There is no involvement of free speech, no more than there would be in the constitutional right of a free religious conscience if some group claimed that they had the right, as a part of their religious ceremonies, to offer up human sacrifice or as a part of their religious beliefs to marry as often as they desired. No one with common sense would accept the argument that under the Constitution they had a right to do either of these things, and that no law could be passed against them, as otherwise it would be an attack on the constitutional right of a free religious conscience.

I want to convey a warning and, at the same time, a suggestion to you. Be careful of joining organizations with appealing sounding names and with professed idealistic objectives. Investigate them before joining. One of the methods used by the Communists, and their radical and ultraliberal allies, is to form such an organization with the objective, if sincere, that many are in sympathy with, but which in fact is either a Communist organization or controlled or influenced by them. Hundreds of thousands of fine Americans, in good faith, have joined such organizations without realization of their real purpose. The reason for this warning and suggestion is obvious.

The constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and of the press is the right of a person to advocate anything that he wants to, provided he does not slander or libel another, and that he does so within the law. It does not permit of the intentional and deliberate advocacy and attempt of the ultimate overthrow of our Government by force and violence. It is about time that this movement, whose hatred of our institutions is admitted and who are doing everything that they can to attain their objective, be made to realize that an aroused American public opinion is going to demand the passage of legislation that will make such illegal and unconstitutional attempts a crime.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks I made in the Committee of the Whole this afternoon and to insert some excerpts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

BILL TO PAY THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES (SO-CALLED BONUS)

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, today, January 27, 1936, the Senate of the United States, by a vote of 76 for to 19 against, overrode a Presidential veto of a bill providing for the payment in full now in cash of the adjusted-service certificates held by World War veterans. This has caused the bill to be the law of the land, notwithstanding a Presidential veto, the House of Representatives having overridden a Presidential veto January 24, 1936, by a vote of 325 to 61. This ends a 7-year fight that commenced May 28, 1929.

FULL FACE VALUE TO BE PAID

The bill not only pays in full the face value of the certificates but the bonds, which are to be delivered to the veterans, upon which 3-percent interest will be paid, will be encouragement to the veterans to keep their investment just as long as possible. The average age of the veteran is 43½ years. I believe that they will discreetly dispose of this asset. I believe that very little of it will be wasted. The payment of this debt will not only help the veteran but will help everyone throughout the entire country. It is a great relief to me to know that the 7-year fight has ended victoriously.

STEERING COMMITTEE

Too much cannot be said by me in appreciation of the good steering committee that has at all times assisted in effectively carrying on this fight. The steering committee is composed of the following members:

Abe Murdock, Utah, secretary; Adolph J. Sabath, Illinois; James G. Scrugham, Nevada; Arthur H. Greenwood, Indiana; William M. Colmer, Mississippi; Jennings Randolph, West Virginia; Clarence Cannon, Missouri; William P. Connery, Jr., Massachusetts; William M. Berlin, Pennsylvania; Frank Hancock, North Carolina; Jed Johnson, Oklahoma; James P. Richards, South Carolina; Gerald J. Boileau, Wisconsin; Andrew J. May, Kentucky; Fred H. CONGRESSMEN VINSON AND M'CORMACK

It has also been a pleasure to me to work with my good friends, Congressmen VINSON of Kentucky and MCCORMACK of Massachusetts in the sponsorship of this measure, which is known as the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill. Space will not permit the mentioning of all the names of the many people in Congress and out of Congress and all over this Nation who are entitled to be commended for their efforts in behalf of this legislation. The three major World War veterans' organizations, the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans, are to be commended for their effective shoulder-to-shoulder work.

BOOKLET TO GIVE CREDIT

In the near future I expect to prepare a booklet which will give the history of this proposal from the time the first bill was introduced, May 28, 1929, to date. In this booklet, the name of every person and organization will be mentioned that I know of who has made a contribution to this cause. The road has been very rough, discouragements many. It was only through perseverance, patience, and being armed with a just and honest cause that has permitted us to be successful.

SYNOPSIS OF THE BILL

It has been our contention that the veterans should be paid the amount due them as of the time they rendered the service with a reasonable rate of interest since that time; that if the certificates are dated back to the time they rendered the service and a reasonable rate of interest is allowed, that each veteran was entitled to an amount equivalent to the full face value of his certificate October 1, 1931. The bill that has become a law has vindicated our fight in that it recognizes that each veteran was entitled to the full amount October 1, 1931, notwithstanding that the certificates are payable January 1, 1945. Therefore, no interest is charged on loans after October 1, 1931.

A veteran who is entitled to $445 will receive $45 in cash, or a check from the Government, and the $400 in $50 nontransferable, nonassignable bonds, which will be interest bearing from June 15, 1936, which may be cashed at any post office or other places designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. This money which a veteran will receive will not be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process, and shall be payable only to the veteran.

Veterans who have not received adjusted-service certificates may apply for them now or at any time before January 3, 1940, and immediately exchange the certificates for bonds in compliance with this act.

No charge will be made against the veteran for any interest on loans after October 1, 1931.

FORM OF APPLICATION TO BE USED

Each veteran will be required to execute adjusted-compensation form no. 1701, published today as follows:

Caution: If a loan has been obtained from the Veterans' Administration and not repaid, the application must be forwarded to the office which made the loan. Failure to obey this instruction will cause delay in settlement. Do not write regarding application. All applications will be handled in order of receipt. If you do write for any purpose other than to notify of change of address, you will only delay action in your case. Filing application or calling in person will not expedite settlement.

Veterans' Administration
Adjusted Compensation Form 1701
January 1936

INFORMATION CONCERNING SETTLEMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATE

1. If no loan is outstanding against the adjusted-service certificate it should be forwarded with the application to the regional office or Veterans' Administration facility conducting regional-office activities nearest the applicant's home. Facilities at which regional-office activities are not conducted are not authorized to make these settlements.

2. If a loan was obtained from a bank, but has not been redeemed by the Veterans' Administration, the application will be executed and forwarded to the Veterans' Administration, Arlington Building, Washington, D. C.

3. If a veteran obtained a loan from the Veterans' Administration he was furnished a pink slip (form 1184–c). The same would be true if a loan was obtained from a bank and redeemed by the Veterans' Administration, except that the form would be numbered 1186–a. In such a case if either form is in the possession of the veteran it should be attached securely to the application when submitted.

4. The name and address to which you desire the proceeds of your certificate mailed should be printed or typed in the space provided therefor on the face of this application to avoid any mistake in name or address. The Post Office Department will not accept mail unless addressed to an individual at an established post-office address. Therefore, in giving the post office to which settlement is to be mailed, care should be exercised to give the name of place or post office correctly.

5. It is important that the information required in the application be furnished in order to insure positive identification.

6. Identification: Before settlement is made on an adjusted-service certificate the person applying therefor will be identified as the person entitled to the settlement for which an application is made. If made in the United States or possessions, certification will be accepted if made by a United States postmaster or assistant postmaster over an impression of the post-office cancelation stamp; a commissioned officer of the Regular Establishment of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps; a member of the United States Senate or the House of Representatives; an officer, over his official title, of a post, chapter, or other comparable unit of an organization recognized under Veterans' Regulation No. 10, or an officer over his official title, of the State or National body of such organization, or any person who is legally authorized to administer oaths in a State, Territory, possession, District of Columbia, or in a Federal judicial district of the United States. If the identification is made in a foreign country, it will be certified by an American consul, a recognized representative of an American Embassy or Legation, or by a person authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the place where identification is made; provided there be attached to the certificate of such latter officer a proper certification by an accredited official of the State Department of the United States that such officer was authorized to administer oaths in the place where certification was made.

7. In the rectangle set-off on the left side of the application blank the applicant will make his (her) fingerprints. The fingerprint impression of the four fingers of the right hand are to be made all at the same time after the fingers have been inked with black printers' ink, or by using a stamp pad. If possible, use printers' ink. It is necessary that the ridges in the print be clear and distinct; otherwise the application will have to be returned to you for better fingerprint impressions. In case any or all of the fingers of right hand are gone, take impression of the fingers of the left hand, stating under the fingerprints that it is the left hand instead of the right. In the case of veterans who are mentally incapacitated and application is being executed by a representative of the veteran, the veteran's fingerprints will be obtained if possible. If this cannot be done, as also in the case of an individual whose fingers are all missing, make a statement to that effect in the space provided for the fingerprints.

8. After making out your application, go back over it and check each item so as to be sure you have omitted nothing and that each item is properly filled out. It will be especially noted that the application must be signed and fingerprints made in the presence of the person certifying as to the identity of the veteran.

The above forms will be made available to all veterans. The bonds are expected to be delivered to the veterans before June 15, together with a check for the fractional part of $50.

AMOUNT VETERANS IN EACH COUNTY WILL RECEIVE

January 9, 1936, pages 209 to 214 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, there is listed the amount of money that the veterans in each county in the United States will receive by reason of the enactment of this bill. The calculations were based upon the fact that no interest would be charged veterans after October 1, 1931. Since that provision is in the law that was enacted today, the figures placed in the RECORD on January 9 are up to date.

COPY OF LAW

I am inserting herewith a copy of the law as it was enacted:

[H. R. 9870]

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 38, ch. 11), the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof). The payment in each case shall be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate, except that if, at the time of application for payment under this act, the principal and unpaid interest accrued prior to October 1, 1931, with respect to any loan upon any such certificate has not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then the Administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal and interest as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this act, (2) deduct such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest as accrued prior to October 1, 1931, from the amount of the face value of the certificate, and (3) certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as payable an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted.

SEC. 2. In the case of each loan heretofore made pursuant to law by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and/or by any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia, upon the security of an adjusted-service certificate, any interest unpaid accrued subsequent to September 30, 1931, that has been or, in consequence of existing law, would be charged against the face value of such certificate shall be canceled insofar as the veteran is concerned, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary. Any interest on any such loan payable to any such bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of any such loan which is unpaid and held by a bank or trust company at the time of filing an application under this act, the bank or trust company holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank or trust company in full satisfaction of its claim for the amount of unpaid principal and unpaid interest, except that if the bank or trust company, after such notice, fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 15 days after the mailing of the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the fifteenth day after the mailing of such notice.

SEC. 3. (a) An application under this act for payment of a certificate may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations shall be held void.

(b) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona-fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefits of this act, and is filed before payment is made to the beneficiary. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, payment under this act shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation. If the veteran dies without making a valid application under this act no payment under this act shall be made. If the veteran dies on or after the passage of this act without having filed an application under section 1, in making any settlement there shall be deducted on account of any loan made on an adjusted-service certificate only interest accruing prior to October 1, 1931.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act, has been filed and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, to receive, at his option, under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribe, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 4. The amount certified pursuant to section 1 of this act shall be paid to the veteran or his estate on or after June 15, 1936, by the Secretary of the Treasury by the issuance of bonds of the United States, registered in the name of the veteran only, in denominations of $50 having a total face value up to the highest multiple of $50 in the amount certified as due the veteran, and the difference between the amount certified as due the veteran and the face amount of the bonds so issued shall be paid to the veteran or his estate by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the fund created by section 505 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The bonds shall be dated June 15, 1936, and shall mature on June 15, 1945, but shall be redeemable at the option of the veteran or his estate at any time, at such places, including post offices, as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Such bonds shall be issued under the authority and subject to the provisions of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and shall not be transferable, assignable, subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process and shall be payable only to the veteran or, in case of death or incompetence of the veteran, to the representative of his estate. Interest on each bond issued hereunder shall accrue at the rate of 3 percent per annum from June 15, 1936, to date of maturity or payment of the principal of the bond, whichever is earlier, and will be paid with such principal: Provided further, That no interest will be paid on any bond redeemed prior to June 15, 1937. The provisions of this section shall be carried out subject to regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury to be issued from time to time to effectuate the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. The adjusted-service certificate fund is hereby made available for payments authorized by this act.

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935, no deductions on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States, except on account of any lien against the adjusted-service certificate authorized by law, shall be made from the adjusted-service credit or from any amounts due under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, or this act.

SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 10. Whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

SEC. 11. This act may be cited as the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936.

A BRIEF RÉSUMÉ OF THE NEW DEAL

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, the American electorate must make a momentous decision at the general election next November, and it is our duty as Republicans, who stand for a constitutional government, to bring forcefully to the voters of the country the seriousness of the national situation and the crisis facing us. Our own consciousness of this impending crisis makes it mandatory upon an educated citizenry to place before all of the people the issues of the coming campaign, and it will be well for us to sit down now together and reason out the problems. The coming campaign will not be one of personalities; it will be a clear-cut question of issues, the principal one being whether the American people are to rise to the heights of prosperity heretofore enjoyed under our constitutional form of government or whether they are to submit to a dictatorship under centralized government and the socialistic reforms advocated by the President since his election.

In his 1932 campaign for election President Roosevelt himself said that the measure of sincerity is in the things done and the things said. By what has been done, therefore, we accept the challenge and gage the accomplishments by his own yardstick, a standard whereby the American people can intelligently judge. Fortunately for the Republicans, if not for the country, the Democratic strength in the Congress gives the administration no alibi for its failures. The small Republican minority in Senate and House of Representatives has been unable to make its remonstrances felt, or even heard, and full responsibility, therefore, rests squarely upon the shoulders of the party in power. There can be no counter of lack of cooperation by the Congress. The broom was new and swept clean.

By his own yardstick, therefore, we can examine the President's promises, weigh them with past performances, and gage the outlook for the future. President Roosevelt was elected on a platform which pledged the American people "a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards." Yet it was the President himself who took us off the gold standard. Since that time the fear of an uncontrolled currency inflation has materially retarded the restoration of a sound condition of business.

Mr. Roosevelt, in his campaign pledge, promised a reduction in public expenditures. The Democratic Party platform called for an immediate and drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, consolidating departments and bureaus, and eliminating extravagance to accomplish a saving of not less than 25 percent in the cost of Federal Government. In this the President went further than his party platform by denouncing not only the then current level of Federal expenditures; he denounced the further borrowing of money and increasing deficits; denounced the creation of a Federal bureaucracy. This solemn covenant between the President and the American people has been completely repudiated. Examination of the way in which this promise has been kept would be enlightening to the taxpayer. The actual expenditures for 1934 and the estimates for 1935 and 1936 total $24,206,533,000; the appropriations during the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress amounted to $10,250,000,000. Instead of the promised reduction we have extravagant waste; the establishment of countless commissions and bureaus to make positions for worthy Democrats and supporters of the President, chosen by Mr. Farley—100,000 of them, exclusive of those on relief, employees on public works, and with the Civilian Conservation Corps. An increase never before paralleled—though in his campaign Mr. Roosevelt assured the American people he regarded reduction in Federal spending as one of the most important issues and one of the most direct and effective contributions that the Government could make to business.

The Democratic platform pledged, I quote the exact words, the "maintenance of the national credit by a Federal budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation on the principle of ability to pay." This plank in the platform appears to have been entirely overlooked. Without such a balanced budget we cannot hope for recovery, normal or otherwise. Yet I challenge the supporters of the administration's policies to point to one feeble effort to bring about such a balance.

Both the platform and the candidate in the 1932 contest denounced the policy of pegging the price of farm products, as practiced by the Federal Farm Board and branded as unsound the policy of restricting agricultural production to the demands of domestic markets. Yet the same party which denounced the policy as unsound lost no time in placing restrictions on the quantity of cotton raised. What happened? The cotton farmer reduced his crop, accepted his bonus, and planted his idle acres in tobacco. With the stimulated producton of tobacco, a restriction similar to that placed on cotton was imposed.

The cotton and tobacco farmers, consequently, were driven to raising peanuts which again resulted in overproduction and ultimate restriction. In natural sequence the cotton, tobacco, and peanut farmers turned to planting potatoes. Until the Supreme Court's declaration of the unconstitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act there were 14 farm commodities under direct control by the Department of Agriculture with restricted production and under a heavy tax levy which was paid by the consumer. But for the Supreme Court there would have been no end to it. It would not have stopped with the farm. If the policy of restriction had been allowed to continue, we eventually would have faced Government control of all articles which compete with farm products. Notwithstanding President Roosevelt's denunciation of any increase in taxes on food and clothing before his election, the basis of the entire Agricultural Adjustment Act was a tax levy exclusively on food and clothing—the processing tax. Unless the policy of centralized control is abandoned, it will lead inevitably to more and more Federal control. The vicious circle ever widens.

In my opinion the whole A. A. A. experiment had to go the way of the N. I. R. A. when the Supreme Court ruled, but meanwhile the American people carried the burden of the processing taxes and the farmer yielded to a dictator in the person of the Secretary of Agriculture. This policy, though it has put money in the hands of the farmer, has by no means solved his problems.

Every activity of the New Deal has been a flagrant repudiation of the pledge to remove the Government from all fields of private enterprise. The Government, as every businessman knows, has been thrust into competition with private enterprise, another serious stumbling block to a return to normalcy from this depression. Business during this period has not only had to submit to a bureaucratic control without precedent, it has had also to face active competition from its Government. The bill introduced in the last session proposing to eliminate public-utility holding companies is only the first step toward governmental ownership of all utilities. We already have the vast project in the Tennessee Valley proposing to bring cheaper light and power to the consumer at an ultimate cost to the taxpayer of approximately a billion dollars, and a probable result of wiping out the savings investment of millions of people. Mr. Norman Thomas speaks of the T. V. A. as "an excellent example of pure socialism." Whether the act creating the Tennessee Valley Authority is constitutional is now under consideration by the Supreme Court.

But what of other public utilities? Will the railroads come next? The centralized government toward which we are heading must include ownership and operation of all public utilities. Mr. Roosevelt in a message to the Congress urged that all forms of transportation be brought under the control of a Federal commission. We have an edifying example of Government control and operation of our railway system during the World War when our transportation facilities were grossly inefficient and wretchedly conducted. During the period of Government management, despite a generous increase in freight rates, the operating loss is estimated at a million dollars a day, and the total payments from the Treasury reached the staggering sum of one and three-quarter billions of dollars of the taxpayers' money. Are we to sit by and see a reenactment of this?

Let us turn for a moment from the promises of the Democratic platform upon which the people voted in 1932 and which the President, then a candidate for election, pledged himself to support. Let us examine, too, the platform of the Socialist Party, which polled less than 900,000 votes in the 1932 election. The Socialist platform advocated $5,000,000,000 for relief and a like amount for public works. These have been realized under the Roosevelt regime. The Socialist Party platform recommended the recognition of Soviet Russia. Russia has been recognized, but even those who strongly advocated this step are, I think, sorely disappointed that the anticipated volume of trade with the Soviet has not materialized.

The Socialist Party proposed to transfer principal industries, national resources, and public utilities to public ownership; we have now the Wheeler-Rayburn Act, the first step in this direction. Public employment agencies, which have become a reality, unemployment insurance, and old-age pensions as provided in the social-security law enacted at the last session of Congress; Government aid to farmers, accomplished through various legislative channels; increased income and inheritance taxes, effected by the share-the-wealth tax program; a change in the Constitution to relieve its burdensome restraint and abolition of the power of the Supreme Court, both of which have been strongly advocated by New Deal spokesmen. The Secretary of the Treasury has gone on public record as favoring ownership by the United States Treasury of the Federal Reserve banks and socialization of banking is certainly the target at which the new act is aimed. The Socialist platform also called for legislation providing the acquisition of land and equipment for the unemployed. The Agricultural Adjustment Act and the other laws relating to crop production and control substantially weakened the rights of landowners and gave the Federal Government the power to determine production quotas and fix prices.

Looking at the record of the last 3 years, we understand why the editor of the Socialist daily Forward declared President Roosevelt qualified to become a full-fledged member of the Socialist Party. We have Mr. Roosevelt's record of accomplishment, and we have his promise to support his own party platform "100 percent"; but we find him disregarding his own pledges and, instead, coercing a strongly Democratic Congress into the enactment of measures of pure socialism. He has faithfully fulfilled the promises, not of the Democratic platform, but of the Socialist Party. Is the President, a candidate for reelection, going to continue to carry water on both shoulders with the sanction of the American people? I do not think he is. If Mr. Roosevelt believed in the policies he has advocated at the time he was a candidate for office, he should have taken the American people into his confidence and told them so, and should have explained how he proposed to help their situation. He did not. Clever student of psychology that he is, he understood full well that, had he gone before the American people and pledged himself to the support of the platform of the Socialist Party, he could not have been elected.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who spoke in Committee may have permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a speech I made in St. Louis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which was delivered by me at the annual meeting of the Mississippi Valley Association in St. Louis on November 25, 1935, in regard to conservation of our natural resources.

Mr. Chairman, members of the Mississippi Valley Association, and friends, it is a privilege to meet with you in your annual meeting. I have observed the activity of your organization, and, knowing personally a large number of its officers and members, I feel that you are rendering our Nation invaluable service in regard to flood control.

The Scriptures tell us that where there is no vision, people perish. Your organization has a vision and a program for flood control. It is only in recent years that we have observed the great waste of our natural resources through water run-off or erosion of our land. The time has arrived when our Nation must adopt a policy of conservation of its land and water resources. The breaking of the prairie sod, the destruction of our forests, the draining of natural water basins, and the construction of a highway system that encouraged a rapid run-off of our rainfall has brought about a scarcity of water in some sections and a superabundance of it in others. In reality, it is a problem of droughts and a problem of floods. Among the many hopeful plans that have been advanced lately is the one offered by the Mississippi Valley Committee of the Public Works Administration. In studying this great drainage basin the committee could observe the problem of the arid sections of the Plains States, the drainage problems of the Ohio River and its tributaries, and the flood menace of the alluvial valley of the Mississippi. Their report contains the following statements:

"Planning for the use and control of water is planning for most of the basic functions of the life of the Nation. We cannot plan for water unless we also consider the relevant problems of the land. We cannot plan for water and land unless we plan for the whole people. It is of little use to control rivers unless we also master the conditions which make for the security and freedom of human life. We are but tenants and transients upon the earth. Let us hand down our heritage not only unimpaired but enriched to those who come after us."

The Mississippi Valley Committee also suggests that "Federal participation should be freely entered into when national benefits are anticipated or national ills are to be averted."

I believe the time has arrived when our Nation should begin with the development of a program for flood control. This program, which will of necessity be a long-time program, should give consideration to every phase of water run-off. The entire Plains region is in need of measures which will bring relief from the more critical conditions caused by floods and droughts. The laws of man cannot remove the causes of flood and drought, but should be directed toward the protection of the people from the destructive effects of them. Throughout the length and breadth of this region natural water storage is nonexistent. It is because of that that the streams vary so greatly in their flow.

While undoubtedly some levees and channel straightening are needed for flood protection, particularly on the lower reaches of the streams, the great need is for the conservation and storage of water.

Kansas is already engaged in an intensive water storage program, the chief purpose of which is to make water available in localities where it is sorely needed in times of drought to make water available for stockmen who, during period of drought, have had to haul water for miles or dispose of their livestock; to provide water supplies for cities whose wells or streams fail in dry periods; to create lakes for public parks and to raise the water table in many localities. About 3,000 ponds and lakes are now under construction or have been recently completed in our State.

It is my purpose to call attention to the needs of flood control in Kansas, and what I say in regard to Kansas is applicable to a large percent of the drainage area of the Mississippi River Basin. In fact, it would include all of the area of the Middle West that has an average annual rainfall of 30 inches or less. We must first have a thorough survey of the Mississippi River and its tributaries.

Despite the fact that a large portion of our State is listed as semiarid, we suffer severe flood losses practically every year in some section of our State. A typical example of this is the Kansas River. This stream system has a drainage area of 60,000 square miles, comprising the northern half of Kansas, the southern part of Nebraska, and a portion of eastern Colorado. It receives an average annual rainfall of 24 inches. The maximum recorded flow of this stream at its mouth was more than 200,000 cubic feet per second, a flood which caused the loss of 57 lives and property damage at Kansas City alone estimated at $22,000,000.

This year tributaries of the Kansas River, namely, the Republican, Solomon, Smoky Hill, and Blue Rivers suffered severe losses. The figures furnished by the United States engineers' office at Kansas City, after assembling all available information on flood volume, inform us that the flood on the Republican River was by far the greatest and most destructive flood on that stream in its history.

The United States engineers' office estimate a volume flow of 150,000 cubic feet per second near St. Francis in the northwest corner of our State, then this river flows into Nebraska and again enters Kansas in the north central part. As it crossed the Nebraska-Kansas line near Superior, Nebr., the engineers' office estimated the volume flow at 225,000 cubic feet per second. The height of volume flow was at Holbrook, Nebr., with an estimated flow of 285,000 cubic feet per second.

It is true that by the time the flood waters of the Republican River reached the Missouri River at Kansas City its volume was greatly spent and therefore the damage there was not great. Mr. George S. Knapp, of Topeka, Kans., our State water resources engineer, informs me that there is a reservoir site on the Republican River in Kansas below the Nebraska line which, had there been a dam constructed there, would have held the entire flood with 100,000 acre-feet to spare. The estimated capacity of this reservoir is 800,000 acre-feet and the estimated flood volume was about 700,000 acre-feet. I believe it is safe to assume that this reservoir can be constructed at a cost of less than $3,000,000 and that when you consider the flood protection, the supply of water for irrigation, the beneficial effects of this large body of water in a semiarid region and its value as a recreational area in this section, it would be a worth-while investment.

Col. R. C. Moore, in charge of the Missouri River division of the Corps of Engineers, informs me that surveys and preliminary reconnaissance has been made on eight reservoir sites on the Kansas River. These sites include Milford on the Republican River, Kanapolis on the Smoky Hill River, Wilson on the Saline River, Tuttle Creek on the Big Blue River, Onega on Vermillion Creek, Arrington on the Delaware River, Clinton on the Wakarusa River, and Jarbalo on Stranger Creek.

These reservoirs have a combined estimated capacity of about three and one-half million acre-feet. Further surveys are being made on these projects and every effort should be made to secure such additional funds as are needed for this work.

In southeastern Kansas the mean annual run-off is somewhat larger because of an increased rainfall within the drainage area of Osage, Neosho, and Verdigris Rivers. They are, however, subject to much greater differences between their high and low stages than the Kansas River. These three rivers during 1934 were almost dry, but during the past summer have flooded thousands of acres of land, reaching many homes and destroying crops of great value. The south-central and western portion of our State are drained by the Arkansas River, which flows across Oklahoma, emptying directly into the Mississippi River. Waters from this river add greatly to the volume of flow in the Mississippi and is at all times a flood menace. During the 1927 flood 560,000 acres of farm lands were flooded, some of it as often as five times. During this period known flood losses reached a total of $3,500,000, which figure took no account of loss of life, sickness as a result of flood, nor losses caused by suspension or interruption of business. The water leaving the State through the Arkansas and Missouri River contributed substantially to the floods during that period on the lower Mississippi.

The floods in Kansas this year took a heavy toll of human lives, they overflowed more than 1,000,000 acres of our best farm lands, and damages are estimated at approximately $11,000,000.

During the last session of Congress I enjoyed my work as a member of the Flood Control Committee, and it was a great privilege to work with the members from the alluvial basin of the Mississippi River. Theirs is a different problem than that of the tributaries, but despite this fact we were able to work together in submitting a bill to Congress known as H. R. 8455. This program is one of flood prevention rather than flood control. It calls for the construction of a large number of dams and flood-control reservoirs on tributary streams. The projects in this measure have been approved by the corps of Army engineers as the most meritorious of a great number of undertakings upon which studies and examinations have been made. These projects are of such character and scope that they will contribute to the general well-being and safety of the people in the localities where they are located and will be a part of a well-planned network of reservoirs which will greatly reduce the floods on the Mississippi River.

The construction of these and other reservoirs will withhold large bodies of water at its source. A number of these proposed reservoirs are located in Kansas, Oklahoma, Nebraska, and Colorado. The Corps of Army Engineers, through their chief, General Markham, is making further surveys on these streams with a view of locating other reservoir sites and determining their economic value and feasibility of construction. Our Government is fortunate in having placed the flood-control problem in the hands of General Markham and his efficient corps of engineers. Everyone who is familiar with their work has the greatest confidence in them.

The greatest need in Kansas at this time is the development of a comprehensive general plan of water development embracing the entire State. Without such a plan, development, whether for the use of water or control of floods, cannot proceed along those orderly and well-coordinated lines. A comprehensive plan is absolutely necessary to bring about effective control and the greatest use of this most important natural resource. The purpose of such a plan should be to lay the foundation for the systematic control and development of our streams in order that the greatest ultimate good may be obtained from them.

Despite our pond and lake program recently undertaken, study should be undertaken without delay, and followed with definite steps, to control and use these streams which in the past have left a long and tragic history of the effects of flood and drouth. Recent rains stress the fact that an abundance of these elements necessary to the life of mankind is provided us by nature, which must be conserved and often combated. We must do our utmost to make use of those extreme periods of rainfall when floods threaten us. These periods, properly controlled, will provide water for basins, lakes, and small ponds, and provide an abundance of moisture in the subsoil for the growth of crops and for the seepage to those great underground streams for our water supply.

Things God-given may be for our use or for our destruction. To gain the greatest good we must learn how to use them. We need to bend every effort toward conserving rainfall for such periods as 1932 to 1934. We must make long-time plans to help prevent such catastrophes as the loss of life during the recent flood on the Republican River. The Federal Government should construct reservoirs of a purely flood-control character to control flood waters for such as can be justified by the costs of the projects and the needs and necessities of the people.

While this paper deals largely with the water problems of Kansas, it portrays a situation which exists throughout the vast domain known as the Great Plains. On behalf of this region, which comprises the great surplus-producing States of this country, I will respectfully urge that the Mississippi Valley Association give more consideration to the conservation and storage of water on the headwater streams in connection with a broad Mississippi Valley water program.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—INAUGURATION OF THE GOVERNMENT OF THE PHILIPPINES (H. DOC. NO. 400)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, a compilation of documents relating to the inauguration of the Commonwealth of the Philippines, as provided in the Philippine Independence Act (Public, No. 127, 73d Cong.), approved March 24, 1934.

Inasmuch as it is believed that this compilation would be of great historical value and of general interest as a source of information, I concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of War that it be printed as a congressional document.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1936.

SETTLEMENT OF SPECIAL CLAIMS

The SPEAKER laid before the House a further message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I commend to the favorable consideration of the Congress the enclosed report from the Secretary of State to the end that Public Law No. 30, Seventy-fourth Congress, be amended so as to increase from $90,000 to $180,000, the amount of the appropriation authorized for the work of the commission for the settlement of the special claims comprehended within the terms of the convention between the United States of America and the United Mexican States concluded April 24, 1934.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 27, 1936.

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 3328. An act to provide an official seal for the United States Veterans' Administration, and for other purposes.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 28, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Father Edward P. McAdams, pastor of St. Joseph's Church, Second and C Streets NE., Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Heavenly Father, who in ages past guided Thy chosen people into the ways of peace and prosperity, direct us, who profess undying faith and loyalty in Thy supreme dominion, by the light of Thy counsels, that visioning the future according to Thy standards we may wisely enact legislation that will preserve us as a nation in the way of peace, and confirm unto us Thy blessings, both physical and spiritual, that the other nations of the world, beholding the manifestations of Thy divine interest in our concerns, and of our submission to Thy divine will, may be drawn into Thy service and established in Thy love. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TEXAS CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 459, to amend the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution providing for the participation of the United States in the Texas Centennial Exposition and celebrations to be held in the State of Texas during the years 1935 and 1936, and authorizing the President to invite foreign countries and nations to participate therein, and for other purposes", with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 459, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. McREYNOLDS, Mr. BLOOM, and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts.

THE LATE CARL RUTH

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, it is my sorrowful duty to announce the death of a very dear and beloved friend, Carl Ruth, who for many years has been an honored member of the great journalistic service of this Capitol. Over 30 years ago when he was a mere lad, connected with one of the Cleveland newspapers, I knew him first, and ever since then, following his career with affectionate interest, I have thought of him as one of the noblest-minded, whitest-souled types of American manhood in my acquaintance. His going is a real loss to the journalistic profession and to the good citizenship of our country. He has left the priceless heritage to his family of a spotless name, and has left an example to us all of honorable, high-minded American citizenship. With a deep sense of personal loss, I lay this simple wreath of memory and affection at his feet this morning.

NATIONAL DEFENSE REQUIRES THE REHABILITATION OF NAVAL SHIP CONSTRUCTION ON THE PACIFIC COAST

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to naval ship construction on the Pacific coast.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House of Representatives to H. R. 9652, a bill to aid the national defense by fostering shipbuilding on the Pacific coast in order to more perfectly provide the necessary shore support for the maintenance and operation of the Pacific Fleet by encouraging shipbuilding on the Pacific coast. I introduced this bill in the House of Representatives on January 3 last because shipbuilding and ship-repair facilities on the Pacific coast are far below those required for safety should any emergency arise.

Along the entire Pacific seaboard, almost 2,000 miles in length, there are at the present time only two United States navy yards, and a correspondingly few shipyards. The navy yards are as fine as any in the world, but the privately owned shipyards, except for a limited amount of small ship construction and repair, have been allowed to deteriorate so that there are not the facilities there at present to construct either a large war vessel or a large merchant vessel. This condition cannot be allowed to continue if our Navy is to be expected to give the protection to the Pacific coast which will be needed should an emergency arise.

If the United States is ever attacked by a foreign foe, it will be at some point along its thousands of miles of coastline. On the Atlantic coast there are seven first-class navy yards and many large privately owned shipyards, at least seven of which now have contracts for the construction of war vessels to bring our Navy up to treaty strength. With only two navy yards and the limited number of privately owned shipyards now on the Pacific coast, facilities for meeting our naval requirements in an emergency are totally inadequate.

Prior to the World War ship construction was a major industry on the Pacific coast. Notwithstanding the fact that there was the added cost of transporting materials entering into ships thousands of miles across the country, the need for vessels and more vessels maintained this industry. The Navy Department, recognizing the necessity for adequate shipyard facilities being available at all times on the Pacific coast, allowed a differential in favor of war vessels constructed on the Pacific. The need for ships and shipyards were primary factors and cost was secondary. With the close of the World War, however, shipbuilding on the Pacific coast ceased. Since that time not a single naval vessel has been built in privately owned shipyards on the Pacific. Of the total amount expended for new naval construction since the war in both navy yards and private shipyards, less than 8 percent has been spent on the Pacific.

Yet the need for proper shipyard facilities is probably greater on the west coast than anywhere along our entire coast line. During recent years the Navy Department has maintained our entire Navy in Pacific waters. It is recognized that the greatest danger lies in that direction. Should an emergency arise whereby major ship repairs are required in time of war, the limited facilities here will be unable to meet the emergency unless Congress now takes action that will encourage private capital to provide the necessary shipbuilding plants.

H. R. 9652 provides such encouragement. It reestablishes a policy maintained by the Navy Department prior to the World War in that it authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to allocate a percentage of new naval vessels to Pacific coast shipbuilders, providing their bids do not exceed the bids of other shipbuilders by more than 6 percent. The granting of this 6-percent differential does not, however, mean that greater profit will be made by Pacific coast shipbuilders.

Of the almost one-half billion dollars appropriated by the last session of this Congress for the construction of war vessels to bring our Navy up to treaty strength, not a single vessel would have been constructed on the Pacific coast by private shipbuilders had not the Navy Department made an agreement with the Bethlehem Steel Co. to build two destroyers at their Pacific coast plant. Only these two small vessels are being constructed there now. The truth of the matter is that they will be assembled there. For all practical purposes their construction is taking place within a few hundred miles of this Capitol Building.

Ninety-five percent of all materials entering into these two destroyers is being produced and manufactured in the eastern part of the United States. All fabrication, the construction of engines, boilers, machinery, armament, and other materials is undertaken in other sections of the country and then shipped to the Pacific coast for assembling into a vessel. The long distance these materials must be transported is the principal factor in increasing the cost of construction on the Pacific coast.

I should like to invite the attention of each Congressman to the fact that there are three definite links in the chain of our national naval defense. They are, first, our Navy; second, our merchant marine; and third, our shipbuilding facilities. All three are interdependent upon each other for national security. There must be available at all times the proper facilities to care for our naval and merchant vessels under any and all circumstances. We have recognized the importance of the first of these by last year's appropriations to bring our Navy up to treaty strength. The House of Representatives recognized the importance of the second of these by its passage of the merchant-marine bill during the last session of this Congress, and it is hoped this bill will be enacted into law during the present session. The enactment of H. R. 9652 will go far toward developing the third of these factors by encouraging shipbuilding plants to reopen and reestablish their operations.

With the major portion of the United States Navy operating in the Pacific, which has been its base for the past several years, the importance of having such facilities is increasingly apparent. In the interest of national defense we should encourage these private plants. Until they are available our Navy cannot be at its maximum efficiency. The enactment of this legislation will aid in giving the Pactfic coast the same "national security" now given only to the Atlantic coast.

NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address which I delivered on the subject of neutrality legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most important and most difficult questions before this session of Congress is that of satisfactory neutrality legislation. There are no precedents, except the bill which was passed last year and which expires on February 29, 1936. It is a momentous decision—a law more far-reaching and more profoundly affecting our economic conditions in peace and in war than any bill which has come before the Congress for many years. I hope that you will not think that that is exaggerated. For with the exception of one bill, very limited in scope, which was enacted during the Presidency of George Washington, practically no other neutrality legislation has been placed on the statute books of the United States.

At first blush it seems fairly easy to draft such legislation. We want to pass a law that will keep us out of war—out of all wars that do not directly concern us. However, upon closer examination many problems come up. What should the law provide? What will be its effect? It is difficult to answer, because it is not easy to foresee what will happen in the future.

PEOPLE WILL SUSTAIN MONROE DOCTRINE

If a European sea power should attack Mexico or a country in South America, our attitude would naturally be different from that in the case of a war between two European nations. In a war in the Far East, say between Japan on one side and England and Canada on the other, many people would want us to take a different position from that in a war between Italy and Ethiopia. However, there are some features upon which it should be fairly easy to unite.

SHOULD KEEP OUT OF FOREIGN ENTANGLEMENTS

First. I am positive that a vast majority of the people of the United States are determined to keep out of foreign entanglements. We should not enter into any war which does not directly concern us. We should stay out of all wars between European nations. I think there should be no difficulty among citizens of the United States on that point. We need only to remember the last World War when hundreds of thousands of American boys went overseas to fight on the soil of Europe. We need only to remember the last war, when 126,000 Americans were killed and 234,000 were wounded; a war which involved no gain or profit to us but which cost the Government of the United States $55,318,158,000.

ITALO-ETHIOPIAN WAR DISCUSSED

Second. There should be no difficulty for citizens of the United States to unite in a policy of the strictest neutrality on the conflict between Italy and Ethiopia. Some would urge us to side with Ethiopia because, they claim, it has been unjustly attacked by Italy.

Others want us to side with Italy because they claim that England has prevailed upon the League of Nations to declare sanctions against Italy, not because of any interest in Ethiopia, but because England is determined to continue her domination in the Mediterranean Sea and in Africa.

In spite of these opposing partisans, it is clear to me that it is the duty of the President, and of the Congress in particular, to assure strict American neutrality in that conflict. I say it is particularly the duty of Congress because Congress is the only body in the United States which can declare war upon another nation.

OPPOSED TO SANCTIONS

When I say "neutral" I mean just that. Neutrality means lack of partisanship. It means the maintenance of good relations with both Italy and Ethiopia. Neutrality does not mean sanctions, for sanctions are a form of war; and, whether economic or otherwise, sanctions, if pursued, must in the end lead to war.

EMBARGO MUNITIONS

Third. There should be no difficulty for the vast majority of the citizens of the United States to unite in favor of a law which will prohibit the export from the United States to belligerent nations of arms, munitions, and implements of war. We do not want to profit at the expense of human blood. We do not want to build an imaginary or short-lived prosperity on human slaughter. We do not want to furnish arms to continue and prolong wars.

AGAINST WAR LOANS

Fourth. There should be a unity of opinion among citizens of the United States that no nation which is at war should be permitted to float bonds and securities in the United States, or to borrow money from citizens of the United States. Surely we must have learned our lesson in that respect from the last war. Surely we have not forgotten the billions of dollars we loaned in the World War and of the default of the foreign governments, with the honorable exception of Finland.

Surely we have not forgotten that, as of November 15, 1935, there was due us from foreign governments $12,328,960,509.67.

The experience of the World War debts—the amazing spectacle of England, France, and other foreign governments defaulting on their debt payments to us—must have taught us the lesson that in war we should keep our money at home and attend to our own business.

WAR-DEBT BILL INTRODUCED

Just in passing I want to say that I have introduced in Congress a bill—H. R. 10310—for the appointment of a commission to open negotiations immediately with all debtor governments in order to secure the immediate resumption of payment on these obligations.

For be it remembered that if we could collect at least the principal amount due us on the foreign-debt claims, we could with that money feed the unemployed, pay for public works, pay the soldiers' bonus, and pay off a large amount of our governmental debt, a debt which was incurred in large part for the purpose of making these loans to the foreign governments.

Fifth. There should be no difficulty for citizens of the United States to unite upon the principle that in time of war between foreign nations, our citizens who travel on the ships of belligerent nations do so upon their own risk and without the protection of our Government.

FIVE-POINT PROGRAM SUMMARY

These five points which I have just enumerated should give little difficulty. Let me go through them again:

First. Keep out of foreign entanglements. Stay out of wars which do not directly concern us.

Second. Remain absolutely nonpartisan in the war now going on between Italy and Ethiopia.

Third. Prohibit the exporting of arms, munitions, and implements of war to belligerent nations, or to neutral nations for transshipment to belligerent nations. The prohibition of such shipments shall be absolute and not in the discretion of the President.

Fourth. Prohibit the making of loans in the United States to governments which are at war.

Fifth. Prohibit our citizens from traveling on ships of nations who are at war.

On these five points, as I have stated, there should be almost unanimity of opinion. But when a neutrality law proposes to go further, we find violently clashing opposing views. Let me cite the major points of difference which have arisen in Washington.

EMBARGO OF FOODS AND MATERIAL

First. Many people say that we should not only prohibit the export of munitions and arms but that we also prohibit the exports of other materials which are useful in the conduct of war—such as coal, steel, cotton, oil, foods, and many others.

Some of the advocates of neutrality in Washington are advocating that in time of war we should go into a storm cellar—that we close our doors to all commerce with belligerents. Opponents of such a policy say that it would mean the starvation by the United States of civilian populations; it would destroy our foreign trade, bankrupt millions of our people, and would cause tremendous unemployment.

Some advocates would go to the other extreme. They would ship everything—except perhaps arms—anywhere. That policy was followed by us in the World War, and was admittedly a failure.

MANY ADHERENTS FOR CASH-AND-CARRY POLICY

A third school—and it has many adherents—advocates that during a war between foreign nations we should, of course, prohibit the export of munitions and implements of war, but as to all other commercial articles we should adopt what might be called a cash-and-carry policy. In other words, these men say, let the nations who are at war and want to buy in the United States come and get the goods, pay for them in cash, and then take them away in their own ships or in ships of other nations.

SHIPMENTS LIMITED TO PRE-WAR STATUS

Still a fourth school—and their thought is embodied in the bill favored by the administration—would prohibit the exporting of arms and munitions but would allow exports of other materials, such as coal, steel, iron, cotton, oil, and so forth, in such amount as these materials have normally been exported from the United States to the nation which is at war.

That school of thought says that we do not desire and should not permit interference with the normal trade between the United States and another nation, whether that nation is at war or at peace. But as far as exports of such materials beyond the normal amount are concerned, they say that it cannot be determined at this time, whether such additional exports can be made without endangering the neutrality of the United States and that therefore the decision in each case—as to such additional exports—should be left to be determined by the President in his own discretion.

DISCRETIONARY WITH PRESIDENT

Such a law would leave it with the President to say whether in a given case certain materials—as distinguished from munitions—may be exported to warring nations, or to neutral nations for transshipment. This would lodge in the President a tremendous power. It would give him the power to say whether we may ship coal, cotton, steel, oil, or anything else to a nation at war. The opponents of this provision are fearful of lodging such tremendous powers in the hands of a human being. They feel that a President who has such powers will be importuned at all sides and that it will be humanly impossible for him to make a decision without having his impartiality questioned at home and by foreign nations.

NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION CERTAIN

I believe that this Congress should pass a neutrality bill to keep us out of war. I have explained to you the points upon which there is not much disagreement. I have also endeavored to explain to you the other points upon which the conflict of opinion has centered, a conflict which will break into the open when the neutrality bill comes up for discussion on the floor of the House.

As far as I personally am concerned, I am pledging to you my vote and vigorous support for a real neutrality bill. I am determined to do my part to keep us out of wars which do not concern us. I am determined to do my part to assure peace and liberty to the people of the United States, even though foreign nations may be at war.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that general debate upon the Interior Department appropriation bill will continue at least through the day and possibly longer. I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman give us some idea of about how long general debate upon this Interior appropriation bill will continue?

Mr. WOODRUM. I shall have to refer that inquiry to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

JUDICIARY COMMITTEE—PERMISSION TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF HOUSE

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I ask unanimous consent that that committee may sit during the sessions of the House during the remainder of the week.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary may sit during the sessions of the House during the remainder of this week. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10630) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes. Pending that motion, I inquire of the minority leader on the committee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON], about the condition of the time. Can we close general debate today?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I do not see how we can. We can confine it to the bill tomorrow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue throughout the day, the time to be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Kansas. I may say that the majority has used much more time than the minority, and I shall try to divide it more equally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 10630; and pending that, asks unanimous consent that general debate may continue throughout the remainder of the day, the time to be equally divided between himself and the gentleman from Kansas. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, I shall not object to a continuation of the debate; but if debate is going to be confined to the bill, it ought to be confined to the bill all along, because when these bills are brought in here invariably the first day or two the time is yielded to members of the committee. So we would have the anomalous situation of the men who are members of the committee and should know about the bill talking about something else, and men who are not members of the committee and do not know about the legislation being compelled to confine their remarks to the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I yielded to 12 Members yesterday and only 1 was a member of the committee.

Mr. RANKIN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that part of the request which confines the debate to the bill, because if it is to be confined to the bill the time should be consumed by somebody who knows something about it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There will be some member of the committee who knows about the bill who will speak on the bill.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. There was no member of the committee on this side who talked yesterday.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not going to agree to confining the debate to the bill unless we do so now.

Mr. BLANTON. There is nothing in the gentleman's request about confining the debate to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR]?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Colorado.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, H. R. 10630, the Interior Department appropriation bill, with Mr. DOUGHTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] made a rather constructive and informative speech to the committee on the subject of unemployment. It was regrettable to me that not more Members of the House were in attendance to hear that address, and it was equally regrettable that it has not appeared at length in the RECORD this morning; but I believe the gentleman from New York has served to emphasize and to focus attention upon the greatest problem that confronts the country and that has confronted the country in the way of domestic problems since the formation of the Union.

There were occasions in the course of his speech when he mentioned Republican reactionaries, but did not particularly emphasize the fact, and I am satisfied that that speech was couched in no partisan language and in no partisan manner. I want to say at the outset of my remarks on the general subject of unemployment today, that I believe we do a great deal of damage to the thinking of the country by assuming in an undiscerning, hysterical moment that anybody, no matter how much of this world's goods he may have accumulated, no matter what high station he may occupy in the industrial realms of the Nation, is insensible to the problems that aggravate the country's condition at the present time, particularly unemployment. As a matter of fact, it seems to me that the men who have climbed highest in the industrial world, the men who number their employees by the thousand and tens of thousand, have a more abiding interest in the matter of the solution of the problem of unemployment than anybody else, because only in proportion as we solve the unemployment problem of the country do we rehabilitate purchasing power and create a vast market for the diversified products that come out of industry in every one of the 48 States in the Union. So I say there is no man in this House, there is no man identified with industry anywhere, who is insensible to the sufferings, who is insensible to the distress and hardships that have sprung from the static, aggravated unemployment condition that has been with us since 1929.

Manifestly we disagree in our approach to the problem. If our premise is wrong, if our philosophical approach to the solution of this problem is wrong, the remedy will be wrong. So we can honestly and sincerely disagree in our approach to the solution of the unemployment problem, just as men disagree on all matters affecting the welfare of the Government. We in this legislative body are just like storm-tossed sailors. We all agree that we want to go to a common port, but we are not quite agreed as to what route we shall travel in order to get there. On the one side, I may say, in this approach to the unemployment problem are those, for instance, who might take the attitude of doing absolutely nothing. They are a great deal like a story I recall about a gentleman in a hospital who was visited by a doctor and supplied with a vial of medicine. It was set down on one of these white iron tables beside the hospital bed. The doctor said, "Now, you take that medicine according to directions, and I know that in a day or two you will feel better."

Two days later he stuck his head in the door and noticed a visible improvement in the condition of the patient. He looked at the bottle on the table and he said, "You have not taken any of my medicine." The patient said, "Doctor, I followed directions." Just then the doctor picked up the bottle and looked at it, and, sure enough, there was an inscription on the bottle which said, "Keep bottle tightly corked." [Laughter.]

There are a lot of people who honestly believe that the bottle of fiat legislation to cure unemployment should have been kept tightly corked; and there is some historical basis for their attitude. The first major depression in the world came 1,903 years ago. It came under rather unusual circumstances. There was a large international trading house that had its main office in the city of Tyre in Phoenicia, and had a branch office in Antioch and another branch office in Rome, doing business all through the civilized world during that time. It was obtaining heavy loans from the leading banking house of Rome, under the partnership name of Maximus & Vibo. You Latin students will remember Quintus Maximus, who was the great banker of antiquity, and his copartner, Lucius Vibo.

A combination of circumstances took place. First, one of the trusted employees of this international trading house which, by the way, did business under the name of Malchus & Co., embezzled a large amount of funds. They had to go through bankruptcy. When the bank learned of it, what did they do? They called in their loans. And, coincident with that, a number of vessels with rich cargoes went down. What happened? The banks began to call the people who had bank loans. Forthwith there was a run upon the banks, people were plunged into despair, there was an aggravated unemployment condition; and there you had the first major depression in the annals of human history. Tiberius was the Emperor of Rome, and, obviously, it was up to him to do something about it. He envisioned the situation something like this: He thought here is an international trading house dealing in two commodities—not wheat, not cotton, not tobacco, but ostrich feathers and ivory. Those were the two commodities that plunged the world into the first major depression. When Tiberius, in true statesmanlike manner, surveyed the difficulties that surrounded the Roman Empire, did he forthwith summon the Roman tribunal and attempt to cure by sumptuary legislation? No; he simply declared a moratorium; and in a little while confidence returned and the panic came to an end and the depression began to peter out. Once more the Roman Empire began its onward march in the paths of economic glory. That was the first depression. He said, "Let things alone and we will get out of it"; and they did get out of it.

There are, therefore, those who, having taken note of that and other depressions, believe in keeping the bottle covered. Then there are, however, lots of folks who will embrace any panacea or nostrum that may be devised in order to effect a quick cure of depression. This reminds me of an instance that happened in the city of Detroit when the American Legion was in national convention. I think possibly I have told this incident before, but it will bear repetition. One of the men had planned a party for a certain Tuesday night. On Tuesday morning a lot of his friends gathered around him in the lobby of the hotel and one of them said, "John Jones is not going to be at your party today." He asked, "Why?" And the other man said, "He has a case of laryngitis." Then the sponsor spoke up and said, "All right; tell him to come and bring it around, because these guys will drink anything." [Laughter.]

There you have still another sentiment, if you please. They will do anything for any man. But I submit to you members of the committee, upon whom devolves the duty of meeting the problem to adopt some constructive, affirmative, and militant remedy for unemployment, that we find a felicitous means that will ultimately bring this country out of the chaos that attends a static unemployment condition. So everything is embraced in the philosophy of our approach, and I am going to survey the thing as I see it for just a little while in the hope that I may perhaps clarify your thinking or give some stimulus to your thinking upon this major domestic problem.

If we can solve the unemployment problem and bring about a continuing kind of prosperity to agriculture, this country will get out of its difficulty. Numerically, what is the situation at the present time? If we will adopt some practical figures we can say this: There are about 15,000,000, roughly, who go into the mines, factories, and the industries of the country in order to make a living. We have, roughly, 10,000,000 people identified with the soil, making a total of those who have to labor with their hands of about 25,000,000 out of a total of 50,000,000 who are normally gainfully employed. The other 25,000,000 are identified with what I am pleased to call the service industries. They run the filling stations, they run the banks, they practice medicine, they practice law, they do all those things that render a service to the rest of the producers in the country; but obviously no person in a service industry can make any money, no filling-station operator can sell any gasoline, no proprietor of a laundry can do any business unless the 25,000,000 at the bottom have something to spend. In proportion as we bring prosperity to the substructure, the foundation of 25,000,000, that prosperity will trickle up instead of percolate down; it will trickle up again as once was the case in the history of our country.

I am therefore very definitely concerned with the 10,000,000 tillers of the soil and the 15,000,000 people who go into the mines, the factories, and industries of the country, because their problem must be solved before we find a durable kind of prosperity.

When we consider these people who are unemployed and their relation to the total number of those gainfully employed in the country there are certain basic conclusions to which we can come. The first is that all the fact-finding agencies that have given special study to the unemployment problem are pretty well agreed that right now, in this first month of the year of our Lord 1936, we have approximately 10,000,000 people out of work. I suppose at one time there were possibly twelve, thirteen, or fourteen million out of work, but at the present time the American Federation of Labor, the National Industrial Council Board, the Department of Labor, and a great many others are in substantial agreement that we have almost 10,000,000 people out of work today. What have we done for them? What have we done for those who were part of that great, sad, distressed army of unemployed since 1929? Very briefly, we appropriated $3,300,000,000 and dumped it into the Public Works Administration, ostensibly to give employment. We appropriated $4,800,000,000 to set up a new W. P. A. We allocated some $600,000,000 for the C. C. C. camps. We spent $950,000,000 on the short-lived Civil Works Administration. When all of this money has been spent we still look out into the highways and byways of the country and find that we still have 10,000,000 people out of work today.

I submit that, irrespective of what side of the aisle you may sit on, this is not a partisan question, and we must lay all consideration of partisanship to one side before this problem becomes more aggravated and gets this country to the point where it will entirely disturb its economic picture and push over its fiscal set-up. Having spent all of this money, and looking at exhibit A in the form of 10,000,000 unemployed today, what kind of an answer are we going to give to the country in this the last session of the Seventy-fourth Congress? Obviously since this problem has been with us since 1929 we are coming to the place where we must find a real rather than an artificial solution, otherwise there will be those blocs of minority groups in large centers and small in every section of the country who are going to present and press for summary measures to this Congress; they will start lobbying for their effectuation into law; there will then be heat and desperation. We as Members of the Congress can well afford to forget a lot of the problems that have beset us. We should forget our quibbling on many things that have been aired here in the people's forum and give every bit of our constructive attention to this problem of unemployment.

I think the best answer, the most summary answer, and the most conclusive answer to the question of unemployment you will find recorded in the Scriptures more than 2,000 years ago. Go back and dust off the family Bible. Examine the Gospel of St. Matthew, and there you will read the story about the vineyardist who went down to the market place one morning and he saw people out of work. He said to them, "I will hire you and put you to work in the vineyard", and he did. Then the Scripture records that he went down the sixth hour and he saw more men unemployed and he hired them also. He went down there the ninth hour and he saw more men there and those he also hired. Then at the eleventh hour the vineyardist went down to the market place once more and there were still men there idle and unemployed. He said to them, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?" One of them with less temerity than the rest spoke up and said, "Because no man hath hired us."

That is a rather summary answer to the question, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?"

We might readily raise our voices in crescendo and talk to every village, hamlet, and metropolis in America today and say to this long line of unemployed, "Why stand ye there idle?" And the swelling voice will come back and say, "Because no man hath hired us."

Now, too often we stop right there when they say, "No man hath hired us." That is the end of the chapter. That is where we close the book. But it is high time for you and me to go a little bit further than the answer recorded in the Scriptures 2,000 years ago and find out why "no man hath hired them" and why 10,000,000 people are still unemployed in America today. Sometimes we get off the track in seeking to find a solution, and permit ourselves to be blinded by surface causes. We fail to penetrate and find the real solution. More and more I see injected into this thing the talk of technological unemployment, the fact that we have devised new methods, have invented new machinery, have projected into industry all sorts of ingenious and diabolical devices which displace human hands and results in what economists are pleased to refer to as technological unemployment.

I submit to the members of this committee that before anyone impresses upon us this idea that the machine is at the base of our trouble, we ought to go back and look at the historical evidence. In this very connection I am reminded that only this last week they started a bicentennial observance of the birthday of James Watt, the man who first made a practical application of steam to the problems of industry, and out of whose ingenuity the first technological unemployment problem is alleged to have sprung.

He was that little Scotch boy who sat in his mother's kitchen and watched the kettle lid go up and down, and his childish mind was intrigued with the properties of steam. He is the one who heated water and let that white vapor be inducted into a chamber to push a piston out and let it come back into a vacuum and turn a wheel at the other end of the piston. He was the one who gave us the industrial revolution in 1788. He precipitated the machine age.

What happened when the age of machinery was here? They had to build factories in which to build machines. They had to have the money with which to build machines, and so the banking houses of England began to float bond issues that were sold not only over there but in South America and in North America as well, and by 1820 they had sold bond issues all over the known world to build machinery to displace human hands.

Then what happened? Oh, the inevitable crash came in 1820, when some 70 banks popped in 6 weeks in England, and they had a depression. Then what happened? Workingmen went through the factories of London, through the factories of Leeds and Manchester and Birmingham with sledgehammers to break the castings that made this machinery, because they saw them as being entirely inimical to human welfare. They tried to stop it by destroying the machine, but what happened? Invention went on just the same, and the ratio of the employed to the total number of people in that country and elsewhere steadily gained because of new inventions, because of the broadening of home markets. They did not find an answer in the destruction of machinery.

What happened in our own country? Why, I understand that in 1872, about the time of the Black Friday panic, this Congress, mind you, employed Dr. Carroll Wright, one of the most celebrated economists in our country, to investigate the economic conditions and the problems that prevailed at that time and to come to some settled conclusions that were to be reported back to Congress.

I suppose in due time the Archivist down here on Pennsylvania and Constitution Avenues will probably come across that celebrated document. What did Dr. Carroll Wright tell the august and enthusiastic Congress? He said, "We have reached a place now where the machine has destroyed all possibilities of expansion." Then what happened? Along came Mergenthaler to invent the linotype and the duotype to increase printing everywhere in the country and to give work to more printers than they ever thought could find work in this Nation. Then came McCormick to invent the reaper, and it took men to build them. Then followed men inventing mowers and binders and reapers and all these other productive machines, and so gradually, through technological devices, we have climbed to a higher and to a better economic state in this country because of this condition, and not in spite of it. So when we think about the machine in relation to the people out of work it looks to me like superficial reasoning. A glance at the figures will show that in 1930 a larger percentage of the whole population was employed than in 1870. Here are figures which should make us be cautious about a categorical conclusion as to technological unemployment.

Now, getting back to these 10,000,000 unemployed in the country at the present time, in spite of all the money we have appropriated, in spite of all the instrumentalities of government that we have set up to help them—and they are still here—and the bitter cries of little children going to bed supperless still ringing in our ears in every hamlet and city in the country—why is it? Do we not have the ingredients for prosperity? Have we not the ingredients with which to manufacture a condition that will absorb everybody into a gainful occupation who wants to work?

I should put as the first desideratum of unemployment the matter of money and the free flow of money. Obviously you cannot hire skilled workers and buy raw materials unless there is money. Do we have the money? Look at the report of the Comptroller of the Treasury and you will find that in America today we have almost reached the same peak, the all-time peak, we achieved on the 31st of December 1928, so far as bank deposits are concerned. We have more available money today than we have had at any other time in the history of the country except one, and that was the last day of the year 1928. The money is there and the stewards of the money, the men who operate the banks of the Nation, want to lend this money. There is no virtue in having money in the banks doing nothing.

Idle money, unproductive money, has no more value to humankind than an idle man in the full possession of his faculties. Money has value only when it is put to work, and nobody can come into the well of this House and tell me that these alleged stony, flint-hearted, grasping bankers do not want to put out the money, because I have seen them beg for loans. All they want is adequate security to satisfy the investigators and examiners who go from the Comptroller's office and from the Treasury and from these other agencies of Government, because they are in these banks constantly. Generally speaking, the money is here, and a free flow of money can be easily attained.

So consideration no. 1 is with us in solving this problem of unemployment.

The second matter is one that is constantly before us. Have we the men? Look anywhere, look in the National Capital, and you will find men idle. No Member of this House can walk down Pennsylvania Avenue at 5:30 or 6 o'clock but what he will see them congregated in the upper reaches of Pennsylvania Avenue. No man can walk down that historic Avenue but what he is touched for a hand-out to help somebody who would rather have a job than have to besmirch and lower his self-respect by asking for a hand-out.

We have the money, we have the men. And thirdly, we have the markets. They sent an agent out to Illinois representing a governmental department to make a survey, and what did they find? Among 2,200 farm families they found that about 1,800 did not have bathtubs. They found that 1,700 had no sinks in the kitchens. A thousand families lived on a farm and did not have a power washing machine. Similar facts have been disclosed in the 60 representative cities which were surveyed last year.

There is the basis of a potential market, and you can find it everywhere in this country. In every State in this Nation the markets are available.

We have the money, we have the men, and we have the markets. Then why does not the country break loose? Why is it anchored to an invisible dead man instead of forging ahead and absorbing these people into some gainful operation? What is the reason?

I will give you my reason. It is simple. We have been doing some things, to which I, too, have been a party along with a great many on this side that have been disturbing confidence of the people. Today we lack confidence. That fact should be written in flaming letters across the economic sky.

I appreciate the difficulty when we undertake to discuss so elusive and abstract a thing as confidence.

Sometimes you are impelled by doubtful methods to knock it off the economic pedestal, but you cannot do it. You cannot do it for the simple reason that all mankind is selfish, even as you and I would be, if we were among the biggest or the smallest businessmen. If we had money in the bank and we were going to invest in some kind of an enterprise, you would count all hazards, you would weigh carefully all the legislation, everything that imperiled your investment, and whether it would not be better for you to put it in tax-exempt securities rather than undertake the hazards of any private enterprise.

After all, we are motivated by selfishness—and that goes for everybody—and since we cannot unmake human nature we are going to have to take it for what it is, and somehow adapt any program we may devise to human nature as it is.

Now, what has impaired confidence? For one thing I should say reform, but too often, in discussing reform, we go to that extreme or to this extreme. Ever since this country was founded there have been reforms, and there will be reforms long after you and I are dead and gone and passed on to the dust of obscurity. But that is not the question. The question is always what kind of reform and to what degree are we going to carry our reforms. If they are going to be destructive, if they are going to be confiscatory, and if you are going to use the ax on business and lambast it over the head through some reform legislation, obviously you will destroy confidence and business will back up a little bit. I am willing to go along with almost any kind of constructive reform, but not if it has the effect of being unduly restrictive, unnecessary, and if it retards recovery.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. DIRKSEN. From reform let us go for a moment to money tinkering. I voted against the first silver proposal that came into the House and I voted against the Silver Purchase Act. I voted against the impairment of these gold clauses in contracts between the Government and between corporations and private individuals.

I voted for some of the monetary measures, and I can say this, that when we tinker with private contracts and say to a citizen, "You are not entitled to be unjustly enriched because of some manipulation in the gold supply of the country, and therefore we must pass legislation which takes away from you your right to go into court and have your rights tested", much might be said on one side and on the other; but you cannot escape the basic fact that some day the Government, in hysteria, may say to an individual of other contracts, "We are going to impair the sanctity of this contract", and certainly that is not conducive to confidence in business.

What has been the result of our money tinkering and silver policies? We thought we were going to develop a trade with China. We wanted to develop a 3-to-1 ratio between silver and gold in our money system. We got seven hundred thirty million-and-odd silver ounces of silver, and yet we are no nearer the ratio than when we started buying silver. We have achieved little; and so by reform, by monetary tinkering, and by a host of other things, including a tremendous accumulation of taxes, we have greatly frightened business. I looked up the income-tax schedule this morning. I thought if I were a businessman with a million dollars in the bank and could invest it at 4 percent in tax-exempt bonds, I would have $40,000 a year, and could then go to Miami and play golf. Then, if I were a businessman with a spirit of daring and courage and enterprise, I could put the million dollars into business, thinking it would yield a gross of 10 percent, or $100,000, yet, when the cities and the States got through with their local taxation, and when the Federal Government came along with its income taxes and sur-taxes and all the rest, then I would know that I would not have any more left than if I had just twiddled by fingers in the Miami sunshine and clipped coupons, and I would not have risked that amount of capital upon some enterprise which obviously had the inheritance of some hazards.

If that was true—if we are going to pile up restrictions and exactions; if we are going to impair confidence through money tinkering and are going too far with our reforms; if, perhaps, we are going to carry on some of these public-works programs, some of which are not justifiable—then obviously we are going to impair business confidence. I suppose every Member in this House this morning found on his desk one of these folders which I have in my hand marked "public necessity." They have a Thomas Jefferson memorial in the city of St. Louis, Mo., and now some ingenious soul wants to build a second Thomas Jefferson memorial right on the water front. In order to do it it will require the razing of 37 business blocks where 5,000 people are employed at the present time, and it is proposed to pay as much as $325,000 an acre for land for which Thomas Jefferson in 1803 paid only 3 cents an acre. Go to Forest Park in St. Louis and look at the beautiful memorial to Thomas Jefferson. They now want to build a second one, and for how much? For $30,000,000; and how? Out of the W. P. A. funds. When businessmen read about that kind of expenditure, which some day must be requited and liquidated through taxation upon the public, upon the businesses of those who give work, obviously their confidence is going to be shaken.

Before my time is up I summarize by saying that we get back to the old admonition of Matthew, when this man in the vineyard said to the vineyardist:

> The reason we stand here all the day idle is because no man hath hired us.

So we have to look to the men who do the hiring. There are only two generic employers in the United States. Private industry is one and government is the other. If our constituents, our fellow citizens are lucky enough to be elected to Congress or get jobs as mail carriers or stenographers or clerks in State legislatures, or jobs for city or county agencies, they are working for one generic employer. All the rest have to stand over on that side. All the rest must find work in or with private industry. Whether it is the humblest grocery store in the smallest town of America or a great factory in a large center, that is private employment. That is where we have to look to see that these people are taken out of unemployment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute, if he desires it, to answer a question.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's speech, which was both scholarly and entertaining. Recalling the illustration with which he began his speech, I should like to now ask the gentleman whether he is in favor, as a remedy, of keeping the bottle tightly corked, or drinking the case of laryngitis?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think there is a happy medium right between. [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. The gentleman said the bankers were willing to loan. Do they not demand their pound of flesh, like Shylock of old, before they loan?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why should we say "pound of flesh"? If the gentleman were a banker, he would do the same thing.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No; I would not. They are opposed to the Frazier-Lemke bill for the same reason.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield the gentleman from Illinois 1 additional minute.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think one of the most irreparable damages that the Congress of the United States could do and has done to the country is for men to come down here and talk about international "banksters" and money grabbers and Shylocks, when, as a matter of fact, they are as much interested in recovery as you and I. We cannot arrogate to ourselves a lone interest and lone sincerity in bringing this country out of the trough of depression. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. They did not show it prior to 1929 and they are not showing it now.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman forgets they are the stewards of other people's money.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. There was confidence in 1928, was there not? How did we get into this depression?

Mr. DIRKSEN. But that is not today. I am speaking about today.

I am not presumptuous enough to believe that I am an expert on the subject of money. In fact, I disclaim that belief. Rather, I am much like President Grant, who, not knowing much about money in 1873, had sufficient innate suspicion about the many money panaceas that were offered to cure that terrible depression that he refused to do anything about it. I cherish a similar suspicion. I have watched the parade of money legislation starting with the Thomas amendment, the removal of the country from a gold-coin basis, the devaluation of the dollar, the Silver Purchase Act, and all the rest, and when all is said and done, nobody has been able to prove that these alleged remedies did any good. They have not hastened recovery. If anything, they have acted as brakes on the wheels of the recovery car. But certain it is that fooling with money to the point that nobody quite knows what kind of a money system we have today, except to say that it is a nondescript mixture, makes men apprehensive about their dollars, their property, their material possessions, and inspires them with lack of confidence to forge ahead and break the depressant spell that still has us in its clammy grip.

Then there is the matter of the Government pay roll. The humblest citizen of the land, pondering the fact that we have hundreds of thousands of people on the Federal pay roll at a monthly cost of approximately $120,000,000, cannot help but wonder from what source they are paid. He cannot help wonder how this tremendous unproductive load can be carried year in and year out. If the most ordinary citizen is inspired to ponder that fact, what about men who invest money in plants and buildings and machinery in order to create jobs in the hope of making profit on the enterprise? Is it not natural for them to hesitate a long time before leaping into new enterprises or into an expansion of existing plant facilities? And if that be true, what hope is there that private business will be able to thin out the long unemployment lines? Can we go on forever penalizing business and passing measures which are likely to retard rather than promote business enterprise? Can we go on forever with "made work" until the pump is primed, only to find that we are running out of priming water?

One might enumerate many factors which have shattered confidence and retarded recovery, but I have gone far enough in the matter to point out a field in which we as legislators must apply careful and sustained study. This unemployment problem must be solved.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have introduced H. R. 9478, the purpose of which is to deny to all inferior Federal courts the right to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional, and also to deny to the Supreme Court the right to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional in any cases coming before the Court on appeal. I have based this bill on section 2 of article III of the Constitution, which is as follows:

> In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Should this bill become a law, the only way an act of Congress could be attacked and held unconstitutional would be by a State filing an original suit in the Supreme Court. This would mean that an act of Congress would rarely be attacked as being unconstitutional, but when it was attacked it would mean quick and direct action and save the country from economic dislocation as a result of having adjusted itself to some act of Congress and then years later having that act to reach the Supreme Court after having passed through the lower courts and being declared unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no such thing as a government of the people, by the people, and for the people where any group of men who are neither elected by nor accountable to the people have absolute veto power over legislation.

All history shows wherever power is usurped little by little the people are prone to acquiesce until it is too late.

The first time the Supreme Court assumed the authority to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional was in 1803. In this case the Court declined to issue a writ of mandamus on the ground that the act conferring jurisdiction on the Court was unconstitutional. It was in this case, in violation of the Constitution, that the camel put his nose under the tent. However, no doubt, as a result of bitter criticism and threats of impeachment, the Court did not again undertake to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional for a period of more than 50 years. Not, in fact, until 1857, when in the Dred Scott case the Supreme Court held unconstitutional the Missouri Compromise Act of 1820. And to get that decision repealed it took a terrible fratricidal war and the lives of tens of thousands of the country's best citizens. In 1870 the Supreme Court, then consisting of seven judges, by a majority of one held the Legal Tender Act unconstitutional, and to save the country from economic ruin and possibly worse the President filled two vacancies which existed on the Bench with lawyers who agreed beforehand to act with the three judges who had in their minority opinion held the act constitutional. And so in this way the previous decision was reversed. Today many millions of industrial laborers, as well as the agricultural population of the Nation, are deeply stirred and troubled as a result of the majority of the Supreme Court striking down and holding unconstitutional the Triple A Act. In this decision can be read the coming doom of other acts so essential to the welfare of our toiling millions.

DID THE CONVENTION AND THE PEOPLE IN ADOPTING THE CONSTITUTION INTEND THAT THE SUPREME COURT SHOULD NULLIFY ACTS OF CONGRESS?

So this question becomes a burning issue: Was it the intention of the Convention that promulgated the Constitution or the people when they adopted it that the judicial branch of the Government should be masters of the legislative and executive branches and that a majority of the Supreme Court should have authority by interpolation, as well as interpretation, to nullify acts of Congress whenever such acts are not in accord with their political or economic views? Was it intended that that instrument should be an occult thing with a multitude of hidden meanings? Meanings to be revealed by a majority of the Supreme Court gazing in a magic glass and discovering with the aid of hypnotic, high-pressure arguments furnished by able lawyers, the mouthpiece of entrenched wealth, some hazy excuse to dethrone representative form of government and set themselves up as a judicial oligarchy. To determine this we must look to the Convention and to the delegates and the background of the delegates that composed it. These delegates had recently been English citizens, many of them able lawyers well versed in the English Constitution, its laws, and customs. In 1787 the English Government was the most democratic of all governments. It was divided into three coordinating departments—legislative, executive, and judiciary; the legislative being by far the most important, then the executive, and last the judiciary. The Convention practically duplicated in framework or governmental machinery the English system, with a Senate and House of Representatives comparable to the House of Lords and House of Commons, and the judiciary to that of the English judiciary. The English Constitution at that time had long had embedded in it the great fundamental principles of democracy so essential to the liberties of a free people. These great democratic principles to be found in the English Magna Carta and Bill of Rights were transplanted into our Constitution with but few additions. If the liberties of our people are to be preserved, those principles are just as essential today as they were then, and will forever be. These fundamental principles were and are beacon lights to guide the Parliament in constantly changing the laws to fit changing conditions, but always within the scope of the English Constitution. The functions of the judiciary were and are to adjudicate the rights of litigants arising under the laws, but with no power to nullify them because, within the opinion of a majority of the judges, a law is not in accord with the Magna Carta or the English Bill of Rights or other provisions of the English Constitution. As a result of the English Parliament being an independent legislative branch of the Government supreme within its sphere, it is enabled to reflect promptly, within the Constitution, the will of the people into law, and thus meet every crisis and save the English people from the horrors of revolution.

Our Constitution, that these principles might endure and that the people might have the benefit of laws springing from them, made the President as well as the Members of Congress at short intervals directly answerable to the people, so that if their representatives are not true to their trust and enact laws that do violence to these constitutional provisions, they can recall them. Long experience has demonstrated that the only sure way for a people to retain their liberties is that those who make the laws can be removed through the ballot box. On the other hand, history demonstrates without exception that where the liberties of a people are entrusted to those who hold their position for life, and who are not responsible to the people, they inevitably lose their liberties.

IN LEGISLATIVE MATTERS CONGRESS WAS MEANT TO BE SUPREME

If language can make anything clear, it was the intention of the framers of our Constitution that the legislative branch of the Government should in legislative matters be supreme. It is true it gives the President the right to veto an act of Congress. But Congress, nevertheless, has the right to pass it over his veto by a two-thirds vote in each House. No authority can be found in the Constitution giving the judiciary the power or right to veto or nullify an act of Congress, either expressly or impliedly. Since this power of a limited veto was expressly given to the President, if they had intended that the judiciary was to have the far greater power to absolutely nullify the acts of Congress, would it not have been given to the judiciary in specific language, as was a limited veto given to the President in specific language? And especially since they were setting up a government imitative of their mother country, England, and the judiciary of England had no power to nullify an act of Parliament. If they had meant to differentiate in this respect from the English system, would they not have felt it imperative to do so in plain and unmistakable language? Not only does the Constitution not give the judiciary any such power, but the records of the Convention show that such a proposition was offered and voted down practically four to one. And in opposing the proposition, Dickinson, a delegate from Delaware, declared:

> Should the judiciary be given such a power, the same thing would happen in this country that happened in Aragon, where the judiciary exercised the right of nullifying the acts of the legislative body, and that as a result in time the judiciary became both the lawmakers and the law construers of Aragon.

And as a result today that once proud country is only a memory.

SPECIFIC PROVISIONS AND WELFARE CLAUSE

It is true that under our duel form of government the Congress can only legislate within the scope of powers delegated to it by the States. Our Bill of Rights, known as the first 10 amendments, which at the urgent insistence of Thomas Jefferson were submitted to the several States by the First Congress and shortly thereafter adopted, together with the original Constitution, enumerates in specific language certain things that Congress cannot do. The very preamble of the Constitution, however, declares that the purpose for which this Government was instituted is—

> To promote the general welfare of its people.

And then under section 8, article I, of the Constitution, there is delegated to Congress the power to legislate upon a number of specifically named subjects. And then in addition to these specific grants there is this general grant, which reads as follows:

> Congress shall have power to provide * * * for the general welfare of the United States.

Following this vital grant this language:

> The Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

This general grant of power, known as the welfare clause, was placed in the Constitution for the purpose of enabling Congress to enact laws from time to time to meet changing conditions which the Convention visioned must inevitably take place. But in the enactment of laws under this grant to meet changing economic and social conditions, these laws are to be so framed as not to infringe upon or violate any of the specific provisions of the Constitution.

THE CASE OF MARBURY AGAINST MADISON

The first time that the Supreme Court assumed the right to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, as heretofore stated, was in 1803, in the case of Marbury against Madison. The facts leading up to this decision are interesting. The Congress, which legislates exclusively for the District of Columbia, had passed an act authorizing the President to appoint several justices of the peace for the District. Mr. Adams was President and Mr. John Marshall was his Secretary of State, both of whom were ardent Federalists. Mr. Adams, who had been defeated for the Presidency by Thomas Jefferson, just before leaving office, appointed these justices of the peace, among whom was a man by the name of Marbury. After signing their commissions, he turned them over to his Secretary of State, John Marshall, to be recorded and delivered to the appointees. Mr. Adams, just before he went out of office, had also appointed John Marshall Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Mr. Marshall neglected to deliver these commissions to the appointees before he left the office of Secretary of State. Mr. Jefferson immediately upon taking office appointed Mr. Madison Secretary of State. Marbury, together with the other three Federalists whom Mr. Adams had appointed justices of the peace, called upon Mr. Madison for their commissions, and Mr. Madison refused to deliver to them the commissions. Thereupon they applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandamus under a law which Congress had enacted giving the Supreme Court original jurisdiction to issue such a writ. Mr. Marshall realized that should he issue this writ it would in all probability be ignored by the Secretary of State, Mr. Madison, and Thomas Jefferson, the President, who were bitter political opponents of Marshall and Adams, as well as the justices of the peace appointed by Adams. And although John Marshall as an attorney in the case of Ware against Hylton in 1796 had most ably and learnedly taken the position that the Court had no authority to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional, and in his brief using this language:

> The legislative authority of any country can only be restrained by its own municipal constitution. This is a principle that springs from the very nature of society; and the judicial authority can have no right to question the validity of a law unless such a jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution—

Yet, in spite of this previous position so correctly taken by him, in order, no doubt, to escape being embarrassed, he declared the act of Congress giving a litigant the right to apply to the Supreme Court in the first instance for a writ of mandamus to be unconstitutional.

Madison treated with contempt this attempt to mandamus him. He did not have the Attorney General or anyone else to file an answer and the hearing was purely ex parte. The Court, in order to get around issuing the writ, took the position that the act giving the Court the right to issue such a writ was unconstitutional. The Chief Justice, with his former opinion staring him in the face like Banquo's ghost, used 25 pages in trying to justify this assumption of authority in holding an act of Congress unconstitutional. This decision immediately caused a storm of protest and the Court was bitterly criticized with threats of impeachment. Marshall himself stated that if the Court held an act of Congress unconstitutional the Congress should have the right to override such decision.

CRITICISMS OF JEFFERSON ON COURT'S ASSUMING TO HOLD ACTS OF CONGRESS UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Thomas Jefferson, in commenting upon this decision, said:

> For the Court to do so would be an usurpation of power that was not given in the Constitution, and that if such authority was permitted to be assumed by that body to decide what laws are constitutional and what are not, it would cause the Supreme Court to become a despotic branch of the Government with its judges playing the part of despots.

Thomas Jefferson, in a letter dated Monticello, September 28, 1820, and written to Mr. Jarvis, who had published an article intimating his approval of the Court's assuming the authority to hold acts of Congress unconstitutional, said:

> You seem to consider the judges as the ultimate arbiters of all constitutional questions; a very dangerous doctrine, indeed, and one which would place us under the despotism of an oligarchy. Our judges are as honest as other men, and not more so. They have, with others, the same passions for party, for power, and the privilege of their corps. Their maxim is "boni judicis est ampliare jurisdictionen", and their power the more dangerous, as they are in office for life and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to the elective control. The Constitution has erected no such single tribunal, knowing that to whatever hands confided, with the corruptions of time and party, its members would become despots. It has more wisely made all the departments coequal and cosovereign within themselves. * * * The Constitution, in keeping three departments distinct and independent, restrains the authority of the judges to judiciary organs, as it does the executive and legislative to executive and legislative organs. * * * When the legislative or executive functionaries act unconstitutionally they are responsible to the people in their elective capacity. The exemption of the judges from that is quite dangerous enough. I know no safe depository of the ultimate powers of society but the people themselves; and if we think them not enlightened enough to exercise their control with a wholesome discretion, the remedy is not to take it from them but to inform their discretion by education. This is the true corrective of abuses of constitutional power. * * * My personal interest in such questions is entirely extinct, but not my wishes for the longest possible continuance of our Government in its pure principles; if the three powers maintain their mutual independence on each other, it may last long, but not so if either can assume the authorities of the other. * * *

In another letter to Monsieur A. Coray, dated October 31, 1823, Thomas Jefferson wrote:

> At the establishment of our Constitution the judiciary bodies were supposed to be the most helpless and harmless members of the Government. Experience, however, soon showed in what way they were to become the most dangerous; that the insufficiency of the means provided for their removal gave them a free hold and irresponsibility in office; that their decisions, seeming to concern individual suitors only, pass silent and unheeded by the public at large; that these decisions, nevertheless, become law by precedent, sapping little by little the foundations of the Constitution and working its change by construction before anyone has perceived that that invisible worm has been busily employed in consuming its substance. In truth, man is not made to be trusted for life if secured against all liability to account.

While Andrew Jackson, that great militant champion of the rights of the people, condemned such usurpation on the part of the Supreme Court in even stronger language.

Chief Justice Gibson, of Pennsylvania, asserted that Marshall, in the Marbury decision, had assumed the whole ground of the dispute and offered spurious reasons for a conclusion dictated by his personal and political inclinations.

THE DRED SCOTT CASE

The Supreme Court did not again undertake to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional until the elapse of 54 years, when, in the famous Dred Scott case in 1857, they held the Missouri Compromise Act of 1820 to be unconstitutional. This act was passed when such outstanding men as Webster, Clay, and Calhoun composed the Congress, and was declared by the Supreme Court to be unconstitutional after it had been on the statute books for 37 years. This was clearly a political decision and inflamed the people of the free States and resulted in bringing on the Civil War, drenching the country in blood, and driving the Nation to the brink of dissolution. When this decision was handed down Abraham Lincoln declared:

> Somebody has to reverse that decision, and we mean to reverse it. If the policy of the Government upon vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by decisions of the Supreme Court in ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own rulers, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal. * * * Why should there not be a patient confidence in the ultimate justice of the people? Is there any better or equal hope in the world?

And yet we hear much propaganda about this Court being the guardian of the liberties of the people and its saving the Union from dissolution.

LEGAL TENDER ACT

After they had declared the Missouri Compromise Act unconstitutional, which decision was finally overruled as the result of a bloody war, they did not again attempt to assert that authority until 1870, when they held the Legal Tender Act, commonly referred to as the Greenback Act, which had been passed in 1862 in the midst of a great crisis to enable the country to issue some three hundred and fifty millions of paper currency in order to carry on the Civil War and save the Union. Then years later when all business transactions and obligations were being made in the light of this so-called Legal Tender Act, in another piece of private litigation in the year 1870, they held that this act was unconstitutional. Grant had become President and realized that it would wreck the country. At that time the Court consisted of seven judges, and it was a divided decision, four of the judges holding the act unconstitutional and three holding it to be constitutional, and Grant in order to get rid of the pernicious results of such decision "stacked" the Supreme Court by filling the two vacanies and placing on the bench two lawyers who agreed beforehand that they would hold that the act was constitutional, so that when the next decision was handed down on the constitutionality of that act, it was a five to four decision holding it to be constitutional.

COMMENTS OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT, MR. PARK, LORD BIRKENHEAD, PROFESSOR HAINES, AND CHIEF JUSTICE HUGHES

President Theodore Roosevelt, in commenting upon the authority assumed by the Supreme Court to hold acts of Congress unconstitutional, said:

The highest right of a free people is the right to make their own laws, and this right does not exist if under the pretense of interpolation an outside body can nullify the laws.

Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and Theodore Roosevelt were great souls who dared champion the cause of the people. Organized greed assaulted them through every corrupted channel of propaganda. But their poisonous arrows welded as they were in the fires of cupidity and hate only brightened their armour and fell broken and harmless at their feet. [Applause.]

In 1852 Mr. Park, one of the great legal minds of England, in addressing the House of Lords, declared:

It is the province of the statesman and not the lawyer to discuss, and of the legislature to determine what is best for the public good and to provide for it by proper enactments.

While another great English jurist, Lord Birkenhead, having in mind this assumption of the Supreme Court in addressing the American Bar Association in 1923, had this to say:

Your judges are the masters of your Executive—

And he should have added—your Congress—

* * * The decision is premature whether you and those who agree with you have been right in trying to shackle the free will of a free people by judicial control, or whether we have been right in trusting the free will and a free people to work out their own salvation.

In his lecture delivered in 1927, "Judicial or Legislative Supremacy", Prof. Charles Grove Haines, of the University of California, among other things, says this:

The American people live under a supremacy of judges without any formal sanction of such a practice and with a great part of the limitations imposed on political action due to interpretations of the Constitution so as to exalt the power of the judges and to lessen the authority of the people and of their representatives. Partisan feelings and selfish interest also account for failure to admit that much the more important phases of judicial review of legislation are the result of judge-made limitations designed to give legal sanctions to the conservative and reactionary tendencies of the times.

Chief Justice Hughes, while Governor of New York and before he went on the Supreme Bench, in commenting upon the Court, asserted:

We are under a Constitution, but the Constitution is what the judges say it is.

MR. JAMES M. BECK: "THE COURT A CONTINUING CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION"

In carrying out the truth of this assertion of Chief Justice Hughes, Mr. James M. Beck, who fully approves of the Supreme Court's exercising this authority and who is a zealous Liberty Leaguer, in his dissertation on the Constitution concisely states the policy that is being carried out by the Supreme Court in these words:

Thus the Supreme Court is not only a court of justice but in a qualified sense a continuing constitutional convention. It continues the work of the Convention of 1787 by adapting through interpretation the great charter of government, and thus its duties become political, in the highest sense of the word, as well as judicial.

And so these nine eminent gentlemen, not satisfied with acting as the construers of the law, have arrogated unto themselves to carry on as a continuing constitutional convention, changing that instrument by interpolation as well as interpretation. Upon what authority, pray? They have never been selected as delegates by the people to perform such a function, nor are their political interpolations and interpretations submitted to the people for ratification.

The Federal Government is one of delegated powers. To the legislative, the Congress, is delegated the power "to enact laws for the welfare of the United States." Is there anything in the Constitution delegating to the judiciary the power to nullify the legislative acts of Congress? Not a word. Such a delegation of power to the judiciary would convert this country into a dictatorial oligarchy, condemning and abolishing our representative form of government.

From what source, then, do they claim such exalted authority? We have the answer boldly stated while the Marbury case was pending by Senator Morris, of New York, an ardent Federalist, as well as an extreme aristocrat, and who had no faith in a democracy. When bitterly criticized and challenged by Senator Breckenridge, of Kentucky, to point to any such delegated power to the Court in the Constitution, he replied:

I grant there is no such delegation of power in the Constitution, but they derive that power from authority higher than the Constitution.

In other words, he endorsed the doctrine prevalent in that day and time of the kings that their power to govern was a matter of divine right.

As a result of this dictation by nullification the legislative and executive branches have become impotent to carry out the will of the people. A political party may formulate a platform and the people may approve and elect a President and a Congress, commissioning them to translate that platform into law, but they find themselves helpless to do so because a majority of the nine gentlemen constituting a "continuing Constitutional Convention", called a Supreme Court, promptly nullifies them because such laws do not fit their political and economic views. How long will Congress submit to these nine distinguished gentlemen who sit in the marble palace across the way to usurp the prerogatives of the legislative and executive branches of the Government and thereby throttle the will of the people? Should they not change their ebony robes for those of royal ermine?

DURING THE FIRST 80 YEARS ONLY TWO ACTS HELD UNCONSTITUTIONAL

During the first 80 years under the Constitution the Supreme Court essayed to hold only two acts of Congress unconstitutional. While in recent years, as a result of the Supreme Court's ambition to garner unto itself more and more power and to enforce its political views, the mortality of congressional legislation has mounted rapidly.

TRIPLE A ACT

The Congress shall have power to * * * provide for the general welfare of the United States.

This is by far the most essential clause in the Constitution and was incorporated in it by the framers of that great instrument to enable the Congress to enact laws to fit changing conditions and by meeting every crisis promptly to save the country from revolution. If the Supreme Court and not Congress is to determine what is for the general welfare of the United States, then the Court's decision in the Triple A case, so far as Congress is concerned, has nullified this salvation clause. Agriculture, upon the prosperity of which depends the prosperity of the Nation, had collapsed, and with it the economic structure of the Nation. As a result of the Triple A agriculture was in a degree returning to prosperity, and with it the Nation. By this decision the Supreme Court sounded the death knell of recovery, and, if that decision is to stand and Congress is denied the right to determine what is for the welfare of the country, then that decision marks an era in the decline and fall of this Nation. For, if this decision is to stand, how can our country endure?

Judge Stone, in handing down the minority decision in this case, for which he and his two associates should be immortalized, flashed out a warning to the people of the country that their liberties are endangered when he stated:

The only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint.

MENTAL ATTITUDE OF JUDGES

All history demonstrates that men placed in positions of power, with no restraint upon that power through the ballot box or otherwise, will continue to usurp power at the expense of the liberties of the people. However honest and conscientious these nine men may be, generally they are men while in the practice of the law were in the employ of the supercorporations because of their great ability as lawyers, and were constantly contending for property rights as against human rights. In order that a lawyer should serve his client efficiently, it is essential that he have the viewpoint of his client and accept his viewpoint. As a rule a man's political ideas, as well as his religious, are the result of environment and the atmosphere which surrounds him. With such men anchored in office for life with unrestrained power, does anyone doubt what their majority verdict will be on any social legislation which in the slightest affects property rights?

The bill which I have introduced is founded upon the clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the unquestioned authority to except and deny to the Court in all appellate cases the right to pass upon any question of law or fact which the Congress may see fit.

While there is no authority given in the Constitution for the Supreme Court to hold an act of Congress unconstitutional, they nevertheless have assumed such right. If this bill is enacted into law, only a State could attack the constitutionality of an act of Congress by filing an original suit in the Supreme Court.

PRIVATE LITIGANTS

The acts of Congress in the interest of human rights are invariably attacked by some selfish interest ordinarily sponsored by corporate greed. These cases under the Constitution must originate in the inferior Federal court, and these Congress under the Constitution has the power to regulate.

SHAMMING UNDER STATES' RIGHTS

There will be a false cry raised that if the bill should become a law the rights of the States would be endangered. With that cry coming from the mouths of those who have filled the cemetery with the corpses of so many of the rights of the States, will it deceive anyone? From that long ago, when Satan entered the Garden of Eden, he has carried on garbed in robes of virtue. Today his emissaries, posing as Liberty Leaguers, raining crocodile tears, are filling the land with vociferous lamentations for fear the States may lose their rights. Remove the robes and you will find the membership with rare exceptions to be composed of a combination of Shylocks and Uriah Heeps.

It is monopolistic privileges and not States' rights they are wailing about. As a result of the Supreme Court in construing such clauses as "commerce among the States" and "due process of law" and giving to them meanings never intended by the Constitutional Convention the States have had their rights filched from them until they are helpless to legislate and give to their people economic and social justice; helpless to protect themselves from the piracies of Liberty Leaguers. And if Congress attempts, under the plain letter of the Constitution, to go to the relief of the people of the States by legislation under the "welfare clause" and to protect that legislation by legislation under the "jurisdiction clause", a great hue and cry is raised by these monopolistic beneficiaries, the Liberty Leaguers, that Congress is making an assault upon the rights of the States. What they mean is Congress is threatening to choke them off of their victims. This same group that is having hysterics lest Congress should do something to infringe upon the rights of the States is the very group that used the "commerce among the States" and "due process of law" clauses with the erroneous construction placed upon them by the Court to destroy the rights of the States. Take the clause "due process of law", and as used in the Constitution it is a "term of art" with a fixed meaning, just as "high crimes and misdemeanors" is a "term of art" with a fixed meaning. And to get the meaning the Convention intended it to have we must look to the law and history of England. As a result of King John's imprisoning people and executing them and taking away from them their property he was compelled in 1215 to sign the Magna Carta, which, among other things, contained this clause:

No freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseised, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any way destroyed, nor will we go upon him, nor will we send upon him, except by the legal judgment of his peers or by the law of the land.

In 1628 Sir Edwar Coke, in his Institutes, defines "by the law of the land" as being synonymous with "due process of law." By this term was meant that no freeman should have his life, liberty, or property taken without being permitted his day in court and his rights determined under the law. But in spite of the fact that he has had his day in court and his rights adjudicated under the law, "the Court across the way" says that is not "due process of law", because the law is not in accord with their economic and political views.

I am afraid of this tender solicitude now being displayed for the rights of the States. For whenever a State enacts a law to protect its people from monopolistic depredation those who are now showing such tender solicitude for the rights of the States run breathless into the Federal courts waving the national flag, and shouting that such State law violates the "due process of law" clause of the Federal Constitution. And with an unconstitutional construction of that clause by the Court, the act is declared unconstitutional. [Laughter.] On the other hand, if Congress attempts to protect the people of the States from monopolistic greed, this same group, employing the ablest of lawyers and who have the cunning to "make the worse appear the better reason", rush into the Federal courts with tears streaming down their cheeks, waving a State flag, and shouting that such law infringes upon the sacred rights of the States. [Laughter.] And straightway the court, being tenderhearted and sympathetic, with another unconstitutional construction, holds the act unconstitutional. [Applause.] And so the people find themselves helpless victims to organized monopolistic greed. And as a result of the Supreme Court's usurping power not delegated to it, and as a result being responsible for their undoing.

There can be no question that under the last sentence of the portion of the Constitution which I have quoted, Congress has the power to deny, by exception, the right to inferior Federal courts to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress, and also the Supreme Court such right in all appeal cases.

SUPREME COURT CASES CITED

The authority conferred upon Congress to except from the jurisdiction of all inferior Federal courts any question of law or fact, and from the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in appellate cases any question of law or fact is so clear that the Supreme Court has been compelled under this plain provision to accede this authority to Congress in case after case. And from some of which decisions I cite the following:

In Kline v. Burke Construction Co. (260 U. S. 226, 234), decided in 1922:

Only the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is derived directly from the Constitution. Every other court created by the General Government derives its jurisdiction wholly from the authority of Congress. That body may give, withhold, or restrict such jurisdiction at its discretion, provided it be not extended beyond the boundaries fixed by the Constitution. (Citing cases.) The Constitution simply gives to the inferior courts the capacity to take jurisdiction in the enumerated cases, but it requires an act of Congress to confer it. (Citing cases.) And the jurisdiction, having been conferred, may, at the will of Congress, be taken away in whole or in part; and if withdrawn without a saving clause, all pending cases, though cognizable when commenced, must fall. (Citing cases.) A right which thus comes into existence only by virtue of an act of Congress, and which may be withdrawn by an act of Congress after its exercise has begun, cannot well be described as a constitutional right. (See Gillis v. California, before cited; United States v. Mar Ying Yuen, W. D. Tex. 1903, 123 Fed. 159; Mississippi Power & Light Co. v. City of Jackson, S. D. Miss. 1935, 9 Fed. Supp. 564.)

Turning to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the power of Congress to make "exceptions" and "regulations", under section 2 of article III of the Constitution.

In Wiscart v. Dauchy (1796, 3 Dall., 3 U. S. 321, 327), decided in 1796, Chief Justice Ellsworth, speaking for the majority of the Court, said:

If Congress has provided no rule to regulate our proceedings, we cannot exercise an appellate jurisdiction; and if the rule is provided, we cannot depart from it. The question, therefore, on the constitutional point of an appellate jurisdiction, is simply, whether Congress has established any rule for regulating its exercise."

Referring to this generalization the Court said in Duncan v. The Francis Wright (105 U. S. 381, 385), decided in 1882:

This was the beginning of the rule, which has always been acted on since, that while the appellate power of this Court under the Constitution extends to all cases within the judicial power of the United States, actual jurisdiction under the power is confined within such limits as Congress sees fit to prescribe. The later cases are to the same effect.

In American Construction Co. v. Jacksonville, etc., Railway Co. (148 U. S. 372, 378), decided in 1893, after referring to the constitutional provisions, the Supreme Court said:

This Court, therefore, as it has always held, can exercise no appellate jurisdiction, except in the cases and in the manner and form defined and prescribed by Congress.

In St. Louis, etc., v. Taylor (210 U. S. 281, 292), decided in 1908, the Court said:

Congress has regulated and limited the appellate jurisdiction of this Court over the State courts by section 709 of the Revised Statutes, and our jurisdiction in this respect extends only to the cases there enumerated, even though a wider jurisdiction might be permitted by the constitutional grant of power. (See also Murdock v. Mayor of Memphis, 1875, 20 Wall. 87 U. S. 590; Colorado Cent. Min. Co. v. Turck, 1893, 150 U. S. 138; Laurel Oil & Gas Co. v. Morrision, 1909, 212 U. S. 291; I Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 8th ed., 1927, p. 68.)

It should also be observed, as stated in Luckenback Steamship Co. v. United States (272 U. S. 533, 536), decided in 1926:

* * * That an appellate review is not essential to due process of law, but is matter of grace.

In the leading case of Duncan against The Francis Wright, above cited, an act of Congress limiting review in admiralty cases to questions of law was upheld, although section 2 of article III provided that—

The judicial power shall extend * * * to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact.

And—

The following is from the opinion:

The language of the Constitution is that "the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." Undoubtedly if Congress should give an appeal in admiralty cases and say no more the facts, as well as the law, would be subjected to review and retrial, but the power to except from—take out of—the jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, clearly implies a power to limit the effect of an appeal to a review of the law as applicable to facts finally determined below. * * * Authority to limit the jurisdiction necessarily carries with it authority to limit the use of the jurisdiction. Not only may whole classes of cases be kept out of the jurisdiction altogether but particular classes of questions may be subjected to reexamination and review, while others are not. To our minds it is no more unconstitutional to provide that issues of fact shall not be retried in any case than that neither issues of law nor fact shall be retried in cases where the value of the matter in dispute is less than $5,000. The general power to regulate implies power to regulate in all things (cited above).

In the case of Ex parte McCardle (6 Wall. 73 U. S. 318; 7 Wall. 74 U. S. 506) the Court said:

We are not at liberty to inquire into the motives of the legislature. We can only examine into its power under the Constitution, and the power to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction of this Court is given by express words.

PROPAGANDA

Today there is much inspired propaganda emanating from selfish interest against any amendment or law that would restrict and compel the judiciary to confine and limit its activities within the scope of the powers granted to it in the Constitution. This same selfish interest would have this Court deified and made a sacrosanct body haloed with the divine right of kings. They would proscribe as public enemies those who dare question its right to usurp the powers granted in the Constitution to the legislative and executive branches of the Government. Let no man be deceived by this propaganda emanating from entrenched wealth and being proclaimed and broadcasted by their hirelings and echoed and reechoed by their unthinking dupes. The fundamentals in the Constitution are as sound today as they were when that instrument was signed in 1787, and will continue to be to democracy and to the rights of man what the Ten Commandments are to religion so long as we do not permit one department to embezzle the rights and powers given to the others.

EXECUTIVE AND LEGISLATIVE BRANCH THROTTLED BY COURT

The Supreme Court, by appropriating the welfare clause of the Constitution, has throttled the legislative and executive branches of the Government and closed the door to progress. This bill if enacted into law will restore to Congress its prerogatives under the Constitution and again guarantee to the people their liberties through the ballot box. There are those who will oppose this bill because progress means change, and stagnant minds prefer to stand still and Chineselike nod in the darkening twilight of dead centuries. There were such in our grandfather's day and on back and back to the beginning of recorded time, and there will be such in our grandchildren's day and on and on until time is no more. They are unhappy souls for whom no stars shine and to whom no rainbows beckon.

But in spite of judicial usurpation, in spite of stagnant minds and subsidized propaganda, in spite of Liberty Leagues and organized greed, the urge of economic and social justice cannot long be stayed. [Applause, some of the Members rising.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER].

Mr. HOLLISTER. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am not a great orator like the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS]. I had no intention of taking the floor today until I heard the great flood of words uttered by the gentleman from Texas on this most interesting and vital subject. It then seemed to me that perhaps oratory is not absolutely conducive to clear thinking and that it was the duty of someone to take the floor; that I owed it to the dignity of this body to say at least a few calm words in answer to the suggestion which the gentleman from Texas has just made.

The bill of the gentleman from Texas provides that by congressional enactment all rights of any of the lower Federal courts to consider constitutional questions shall be removed, and all such rights shall be removed from the Supreme Court when acting in an appellate capacity, still leaving—I do not know why—the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court to act on constitutional questions. Perhaps the gentleman from Texas thought it was impossible to remove that jurisdiction by congressional enactment.

First, as to whether or not there is a possibility of such a bill itself being valid under the Constitution, I direct the Members' attention to section 2 of article III of the Constitution which states that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution." Whether the further statement in section 2, after enumerating those specific cases where the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction, that in all other cases the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction "with such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make", gives to Congress the right to remove entirely the jurisdiction specifically given to the Supreme Court under section 2, I very much doubt.

However, in discussing that we are not really reaching the larger principle for which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] contends.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. COX. Does the bill offered by the gentleman from Texas propose an amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] wants solely by action of this Congress to restrain the Court.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman understand that it does not lie within the power of Congress to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the States?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I have always so understood until I heard the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS].

Mr. COX. Of course, inferior courts being the creatures of the Congress, the Congress has the right to fix their jurisdiction, but not so with the Supreme Court. The gentleman ought to know that no act of this Congress can reach the Supreme Court in that regard.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I had assumed that to be the case.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Can the gentleman point to any specific provision in the Constitution which gives the Supreme Court the authority to destroy acts of Congress?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; but I want to finish the question.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman will let me answer, or please take his seat. The gentleman asked me a question. I repeat that section 2 of article III states:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Judicial power but not legislative power.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the gentleman will let me finish, then he can continue in his own time.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman explain——

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do not yield to the gentleman further.

The principle for which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] argues, irrespective of the question of whether by any possibility such a law could constitutionally be enacted by the Congress, is briefly that the Constitution, as such, shall become nothing but a mere jumble of words. If the Congress may enact any measure that it desires and there be no power in the Federal courts to stay the hand of Congress in passing legislation which may encroach on our dearest rights and liberties, then, needless to say, there is nothing left of the Constitution.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a friendly question?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The Constitution provides for three departments of government, separate and distinct branches. Before the Congress could in any way change the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court it would require a change in the Constitution itself, would it not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] does not seem to think so. I would think so.

Mr. BLANTON. But does the gentleman think so?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I do.

Mr. BLANTON. And I think so. It would require an amendment of the Constitution itself.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is as I understand it.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not seen the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] offered, but I assume from what I have heard he proposes to do away with the umpire and delegate his powers to the fans.

Mr. HOLLISTER. If the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] introduced should become the law and should be upheld as sound law, then it would simply mean that the Constitution as such had ceased to exist, because there would be no limit to the exercise of legislative power and there would be no limit to the exercise of executive power in whatever arbitrary way it might be desired.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Along the line of the gentleman's argument, may I ask the gentleman what safeguard exists when the Supreme Court itself violates the Constitution, as it has by its own confession, by its frequent reversals in many times past?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Is the gentleman making a speech or asking me a question?

Mr. SISSON. I am asking if there is any safeguard against that.

Mr. HOLLISTER. There is. I say it with all assurance and with all due solemnity that it rests on the high class, character, and ability of the men who sit on the Supreme Court of the United States, and who have sat on that bench from the beginning of this country down to this time.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is there not the further safeguard that the Congress can, whenever the Supreme Court declares a law to be unconstitutional, submit to the States an amendment changing the Constitution, but changing it in the manner prescribed in the instrument itself?

Mr. HOLLISTER. There is that, of course.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Is there not the further safeguard that one branch of the Congress passes upon the question of who shall sit upon the Supreme Court, by requiring the Senate to approve their appointment? Then there is the further protection that Congress has the right to impeach men who sit on the Supreme Court?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Is it not also true that on two occasions, at least, in Chisholm against Georgia, which led to the eleventh amendment to the Constitution, and Pollock against Farmers Loan & Trust Co., which led to the sixteenth amendment to the Constitution, the Congress, in a constitutional way, by submitting it to the American people has reversed two decisions of the Supreme Court?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I just dropped in.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Is the gentleman familiar with the bill I introduced?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am very familiar with it.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. Will the gentleman admit that it is constitutional?

Mr. HOLLISTER. No; not in the slightest.

Mr. CROSS of Texas. How does the gentleman get around the cases of Klime against Burke Construction Co., Wiscart against Dauchy, and American Construction Co. against Jacksonville, the decisions in all of which cases are in line with the bill?

Mr. HOLLISTER. If some day the gentleman will get me more time, I shall be glad to discuss the matter with him. Those cases do not settle this matter.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman now yield to me?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Texas in his very impassioned address, which I think, unfortunately, turned into an attack upon the Supreme Court, in drawing an analogy between our judicial system and the English system, overlooked the very important fact that we have a dual form of government in this country; that there are 49 sovereignties here, whereas in England there is but one. Does the gentleman conceive it would have been possible to have protected our dual system of government with the Supreme Court denied the right to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Not only would it defeat entirely the dual system of government but it would defeat any kind of government similar to the one we have been led to believe our forefathers founded.

Mr. COX. With that power taken from the Court, what would hinder Congress extending the Federal power to the point of controlling every activity of life?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Nothing whatsoever.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. Carrying the gentleman's point a little further, what would there be to stop the President from usurping the powers of Congress?

Mr. HOLLISTER. In answer to that let me tell the gentleman that in the dismissal of Mr. Humphrey, of the Federal Trade Commission, that is exactly what the President tried to do. He dismissed Mr. Humphrey, who had been appointed to a quasi-judicial office for a specified term under an act the provisions of which stated the only reasons for which he could be removed. The President removed him on the ground that their minds did not go along together. The Supreme Court held unanimously on a suit by Mr. Humphrey's executor for his back salary, Mr. Humphrey having died in the meantime, that that was an improper exercise of the Executive power. If it had not been for the power of the Supreme Court, that result could not have been reached.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON and Mr. SISSON rose.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman not believe that the facility with which democratic institutions have been abolished in both Italy and Germany is due largely to the fact that there was in those countries a lack of power in the courts to protect the legislature against usurpation by the executive branch of government?

Mr. HOLLISTER. There is no doubt of that.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In other words, if the gentleman will permit, under a system such as we have here, in which the Supreme Court has the power to declare both acts of Congress and orders of the Executive unconstitutional and therefore invalid, it should be impossible to accomplish that concentration of power in the Executive which has resulted in the establishment of dictatorships in Europe.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct.

I now yield to the gentleman from New York, if he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. SISSON. I merely wanted to suggest to the gentleman—I know he is doing it inadvertently—that we should not becloud this issue, which is a fairly clear-cut issue, with the real judicial power of the Supreme Court, which no one disputes, to interpret statutes, and in the exercise of this function to find that the Executive or any other administrative officer has not carried out a statute. This is an entirely different proposition from our denial of the lawmaking power of the Court and the exercise by the Supreme Court——

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am willing to answer a question, but I do not want the gentleman to go further in my time. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further. I will answer the gentleman by saying I think he misunderstands the difference. The Humphrey case, to which I referred, was a direct case of constitutional power; it did not involve the interpretation of a statute or anything of the kind.

Mr. SISSON. Did it not arise under an act of Congress?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The Court itself said there was nothing in any statute governing the situation, but that the President had exceeded his constitutional powers in removing Mr. Humphrey.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The only authority the Congress has is that given it by the Constitution.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. If some Member here sought to propose a law that would provide that there must be six or seven members of the Court unanimous in declaring an act of Congress unconstitutional, if we could do that, then Congress could fix any limit above a majority, and could just as well say it would have to be unanimous.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is a different question, and one I prefer not to discuss at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. But that is one of the issues we hear on this floor daily.

Mr. HOLLISTER. Yes; but I want to stick to the principle I am trying to cover.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Is not the question involved in the discussion whether the Constitution of the United States or an act of Congress may be regarded as the supreme law of the land?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct; and what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] desires to do is to remove the constitutional limitations which we all recognize. He wants to take the constitutional limitations and throw them in the wastebasket and allow Congress to do whatever it wants to do.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In other words, an act of Congress would be the supreme law of the land, superior in force and effect to the Constitution itself?

Mr. HOLLISTER. Absolutely; and so would an act of the Executive, because there would be no way in which those things could be curbed. There would be no way of going into the Federal court in order to prevent one branch from usurping the powers of another branch of the Government.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. KNUTSON. I wish to make the observation that we should not be too severe with the Supreme Court, because it must be borne in mind that during the New Deal Congress has passed several recovery measures without as much as having had before it a printed copy of same. These measures have been prepared by law clerks of unknown quantity and quality down at some department.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER. I ask this question without any reflection upon Congress and without regard to whether we may agree with the decisions of the Supreme Court or not, Is not the theory of the power vested in the Supreme Court one to protect the individual against something akin to mob law?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am glad the gentleman raised that question, because there is nothing more distressing to me than to hear remarks which I have heard in the last 10 or 15 minutes. I refer to talk about the lawmaking power of the Supreme Court. That is a perfectly ridiculous statement. The Supreme Court merely stands there as the defender of our liberties against usurpation by other branches of the Government. The Supreme Court may under no circumstances do anything affirmative. There is no way in which the Supreme Court can make a law, suggest a law, or have anything to do with a law, except that when a law exceeds the constitutional powers which have been granted by the States to the Central Government it will raise a warning hand and say "No." That is as far as the Supreme Court can go. All of this talk about the lawmaking power of the Supreme Court is poppycock.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that you cannot on this floor at any time by a point of order raise a question of constitutionality?

In other words, my colleague will remember that when in the last session I made the point that a certain bill was unconstitutional, the Speaker ruled that he had no power to pass upon the question of constitutionality, that that was a question for the Court to decide. It could not even be raised on the floor of the House.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has asked me whether constitutional questions may be raised in the Congress. They can be raised only as a few of us every now and then get up and try to oppose the passage of certain measures which we know at the time are unconstitutional and which we know the Supreme Court will so declare.

Mr. BLANTON. But the point I raise is that you cannot make a point of order against a bill on the floor of the House based on constitutionality.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. COX. The adoption of the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] proposes would leave the State courts clothed with a great power?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am glad the gentleman raises that question, because that is the next point to which I am coming in my remarks.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] has apparently forgotten entirely the fact that State courts have full powers and in fact are required to give consideration under the Constitution to constitutional principles. If, following the desire of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS], we should remove the power from the Federal courts to pass on constitutional questions, we would still leave that power with the State courts. We would then have a ridiculous situation, where the same principle might be decided in many different ways in various States, depending upon the way in which the question might have been raised. We would have no way, as we have today, when State courts give conflicting rulings on questions of constitutional law, of bringing the matter before the Supreme Court of the United States so that the question may be settled once and for all, and for everybody in this country on an equal basis. We would have a situation where a plaintiff, perhaps in an endeavor to secure an unconscionable advantage, would try to get the defendant in a particular jurisdiction because the decisions of that particular State on a constitutional-law question were different from another State where he might also have pursued the defendant. It is only the power of the Supreme Court of the United States to pass on that question finally which eliminates this preposterous situation of having different courts of final jurisdiction pass on the same question in different ways.

Mr. COX. It would take from litigants the choice of resorting to either the State or Federal court. If the Cross bill were enacted into law, he would have to go into the State court, while at the present time he may go into either court?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think it would materially improve the bill sponsored by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] if a provision were inserted in that bill taking away from the Executive the power to veto acts of Congress?

Mr. HOLLISTER. That would follow. If Congress wants to be all-powerful, neither the Executive nor the Supreme Court should have the right to interfere; but I believe almost everyone feels that our system of government, with the balance of power between the legislative, the executive, and judicial, the one which the founding fathers put into operation through the Constitution is the one we want to preserve.

If we change it at all, we want to change it by the constitutional method. This Constitution of ours may be amended. If the commerce clause is the one to which you particularly object, or if one of the other clauses is the one to which you object, you have a perfect right to bring in whatever amending resolution you want, have it passed in Congress by the necessary two-thirds, and have it go to the States. You may say this is a slow process. Of course, it is a slow process, and wisely, a slow process, because those who founded this country and those who wrote our Constitution realized how dangerous it would be to have Congress, in a moment of stress, pass legislation which they might later regret and which, in the meanwhile, would be foisted on an unwilling country. By the constitutional method of amending the Constitution you may not act so quickly, and instead of this method being a menace to our liberties and a menace to the principles of government of this country, it is the greatest protection we can have.

In the name of Heaven, let us not try to circumvent the Constitution. Let us not try to bring about these things by short cuts. If there are any changes that we want to make—and there is no objection on my part or on the part of anybody here to the due and proper consideration of any constitutional amendment which any Member of this House desires to introduce—let us not attempt in any way by short cuts to circumvent the Constitution and take away the protections which it throws around our daily liberties. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY].

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, the trade negotiations between the American and Canadian Governments which were initiated in the latter part of 1934 culminated late last fall in the signature of a so-called reciprocal trade agreement or treaty, and was characterized correctly as of major importance to the producers and consumers of both countries.

In addition to the duty reductions provided for in the agreement, claimed to be advantageous, it was alleged that several important advantages for American trade had been secured. It was asserted, and the memorandum which was sent out in which the consummation of the contract was announced, contains the following statement:

> Moreover, the Canadian Government has given assurance in a note that it will sponsor legislation in Parliament to permit residents of Canada visiting the United States to bring back with them free of duty articles for their personal use, up to a value of $100, a privilege similar to that now enjoyed by Americans returning from visits to Canada or other countries.

While interested generally in the contemplated trade agreement insofar as it might affect the farmers, dairymen, and the maple-sugar producers, as well as the other citizens of Vermont, I had particularly interested myself with respect to obtaining some such action by the Canadian Government as is referred to in order that merchants living near the border might profit to the extent that visiting Canadians might purchase for their personal use articles which upon their return to Canada would be nondutiable up to the value of $100—a reciprocal privilege, since Americans returning from visits to Canada now are entitled to that freedom from duty on articles so purchased for their personal use.

In the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress I introduced a bill—H. R. 7021—which reads as follows:

> A bill to amend paragraph 1798 of the Tariff Act of 1930
> Be it enacted, etc., That the third proviso of paragraph 1798, title II, of the Tariff Act of 1930, is amended to read as follows: "Provided further, That in case of residents of the United States returning from abroad an exemption from duty may be granted for articles acquired abroad for personal or household use or as souvenirs or curios equal in value to the similar exemption granted by the country, dependency, province, or other subdivision of government, within whose jurisdiction such articles were acquired, to their own residents returning from the United States, but such exemption from duty shall not exceed $100."

Not only did I introduce this bill but undertook to, and with and by the cooperation of citizens of the United States residing near the Canadian border from Seattle, Wash., to Portland, Me., supported by chambers of commerce and other organizations of business men, called to the attention of the President and his advisers the unfairness of the situation, with the result as stated in the memorandum announcing the consummation of the treaty.

Last week I received a letter from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of St. Albans, Vt., in which the following statement, self-explanatory, is made:

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
St. Albans, Vt., January 23, 1936.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: At the direction of the board of directors of the St. Albans Chamber of Commerce I respectfully request your consideration of the recent reciprocal agreement entered into with our northern neighbor, the Dominion of Canada.

Several directors advise on good authority that the Canadian Government does not intend to have the same reciprocal arrangement in respect to their citizens as is now enforced respecting United States citizens returning from Canada; i. e., the purchase and entering duty free of $100 worth of merchandise for their personal use. Our directors inform me that the Canadian regulations require a stay or period in the United States for their citizens of 10 or 12 days before they are allowed to return with $100 worth of merchandise, souvenirs, etc., duty free.

If this is a fact, the merchants living and doing business in the border cities and towns are at a distinct disadvantage as compared with their Canadian cousins living in the Canadian border cities and towns where Americans frequently purchase merchandise.

As stated above, I was directed to bring this to your attention with the hope that the situation may be remedied.

J. B. WOOD, President.

As I contemplate the situation which obtains, I am reminded that reciprocity has been defined to be "a sharp bargain between sharp bargainers, one or the other of whom is certain to get the best of the bargain." Certainly as a reciprocal treaty it does not operate as such, inasmuch as it is not reciprocal.

If reciprocity is the grant by one nation of certain commercial privileges to another, whereby the citizens of both are placed upon an equal basis in certain branches of commerce, obviously this particular treaty lacks the essential elements to bring it within such a definition. Certainly Canada gets the best of this bargain.

Back in the days of Senators Collamer and Foote, and Representative, later Senator, Morrill, of my State, it was proposed to abrogate the then existing so-called reciprocal treaty with Canada.

Senator Sumner, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment proposing the unconditional abrogation of the treaty. He spoke in favor of his amendment. When Senator Collamer, of Vermont, rose to speak, he said:

> I acknowledge that I have some prejudice against this treaty. I am situated a little as my old neighbor, Judge Chipman, was when he was called upon to testify whether or not a certain witness was a man of truth. He said he was not. He was then asked, "Sir, are you not conscious that you labor under a prejudice against that man?" He answered, "I think it likely that I am. I have detected him stealing two or three times."

Later, when attempt was being made in the House of Representatives, the treaty having been abrogated, to continue a semblance of reciprocity by means of legislation, Mr. Morrill said of the treaty:

> It was an ill-omened one from the start.

It is interesting to note that both he and Representative Baxter were opposed to the treaty as originally ratified, and were active in their denunciation of it; and, in their attempts first to amend it, and then to bring about its abrogation, because it was not reciprocal.

I, too, find myself forced to admit my prejudice, and for obvious reasons. I, also, contend that this particular treaty is ill-omened, as was the one of which Senator Morrill spoke, one of my reasons in this case being that this treaty was entered into by the President under what I consider to be an illegal and unconstitutional delegation by Congress of the treaty-making powers reserved to Congress, which are nondelegable under the specific language of the Constitution itself.

One does not have to be an opponent of the principle of reciprocity, or against it as a general proposition, to justify his opposition to this particular treaty, from which injurious results will most certainly follow, which are following, and being felt as a result of its negotiation.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLUMLEY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. We were told the other day that the Canadian bakers are ruining the business of the American bakers for 150 miles along the Canadian border. My information also is that Canadian cream is coming in in large quantities under this new arrangement. Will the gentleman give his opinion on that?

Mr. PLUMLEY. I will if time permits.

From the farmers' viewpoint, the word "reciprocity" as used in connection with this treaty is a misnomer. This is not an idle statement. Hear what the Honorable E. H. Jones, commissioner of agriculture in the State of Vermont, has to say in that connection in a letter to me under date of January 8, 1936:

THE STATEHOUSE,
Montpelier, Vt.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN PLUMLEY: It is obvious that the so-called reciprocal trade agreement with Canada is a one-sided affair as far as the farmers of Vermont and New England are concerned and that it will result greatly to their disadvantage.

The admission of 1,500,000 gallons of 45-percent cream at the reduced tariff means nothing else than the displacement of an equal amount of domestic cream. Even though it be converted into butter, the effect will be the same. The availability of cream in the southern Quebec region and the facilities for direct rail transportation to New England cities will render these markets especially vulnerable to the ill effects of the new treaty.

Huge sums of money have been expended in the States in eradicating cattle diseases and improvement in dairy sanitation. Our markets ought not to be opened to the competition of dairy products from sources where lower sanitary standards prevail. The reduced tariff on dairy cows will also be detrimental to the interests of farmers who raise these animals for sale.

Vermont, the leading State in the production of maple sugar and sirup, will be especially penalized by the lowered duty on these products. The trend will inevitably be toward lower prices. This is a vital matter to our producers and they are much dissatisfied regarding it.

Certified seed-potato growers will also encounter the damaging effects of the trade agreement, because it will tend to destroy the premium they have hitherto received over the price of table potatoes.

Our export trade in agricultural products has been lost, resulting in the accumulation of troublesome surpluses. It is not reasonable to expect that these surpluses will be reduced nor the difficulties connected with them will be corrected by providing for an increase in agricultural imports. If trade concessions are necessary to economic readjustment, it is unfair to place them upon already overburdened agriculture.

Very truly yours,

E. H. JONES,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

What does the Grange think about it? Listen to what the National Grange says about it in its legislative program:

RECIPROCAL TRADE AGREEMENTS

The making of reciprocal trade agreements under our most-favored-nation policy, whereby we gain concessions from one country while making concessions to many, does not meet with the approval of the Grange. These trade treaties should be ratified by the United States Senate before becoming effective. If this safeguard is not provided, the Reciprocal Tariff Act of 1934 should be repealed.

What does the Vermont Grange think about it? Listen to what the Honorable Henry A. Stoddard, master of the Vermont State Grange, says to me in a letter of January 7 in answer to that very question which I asked him:

BELLOWS FALLS, VT., January 7, 1936.

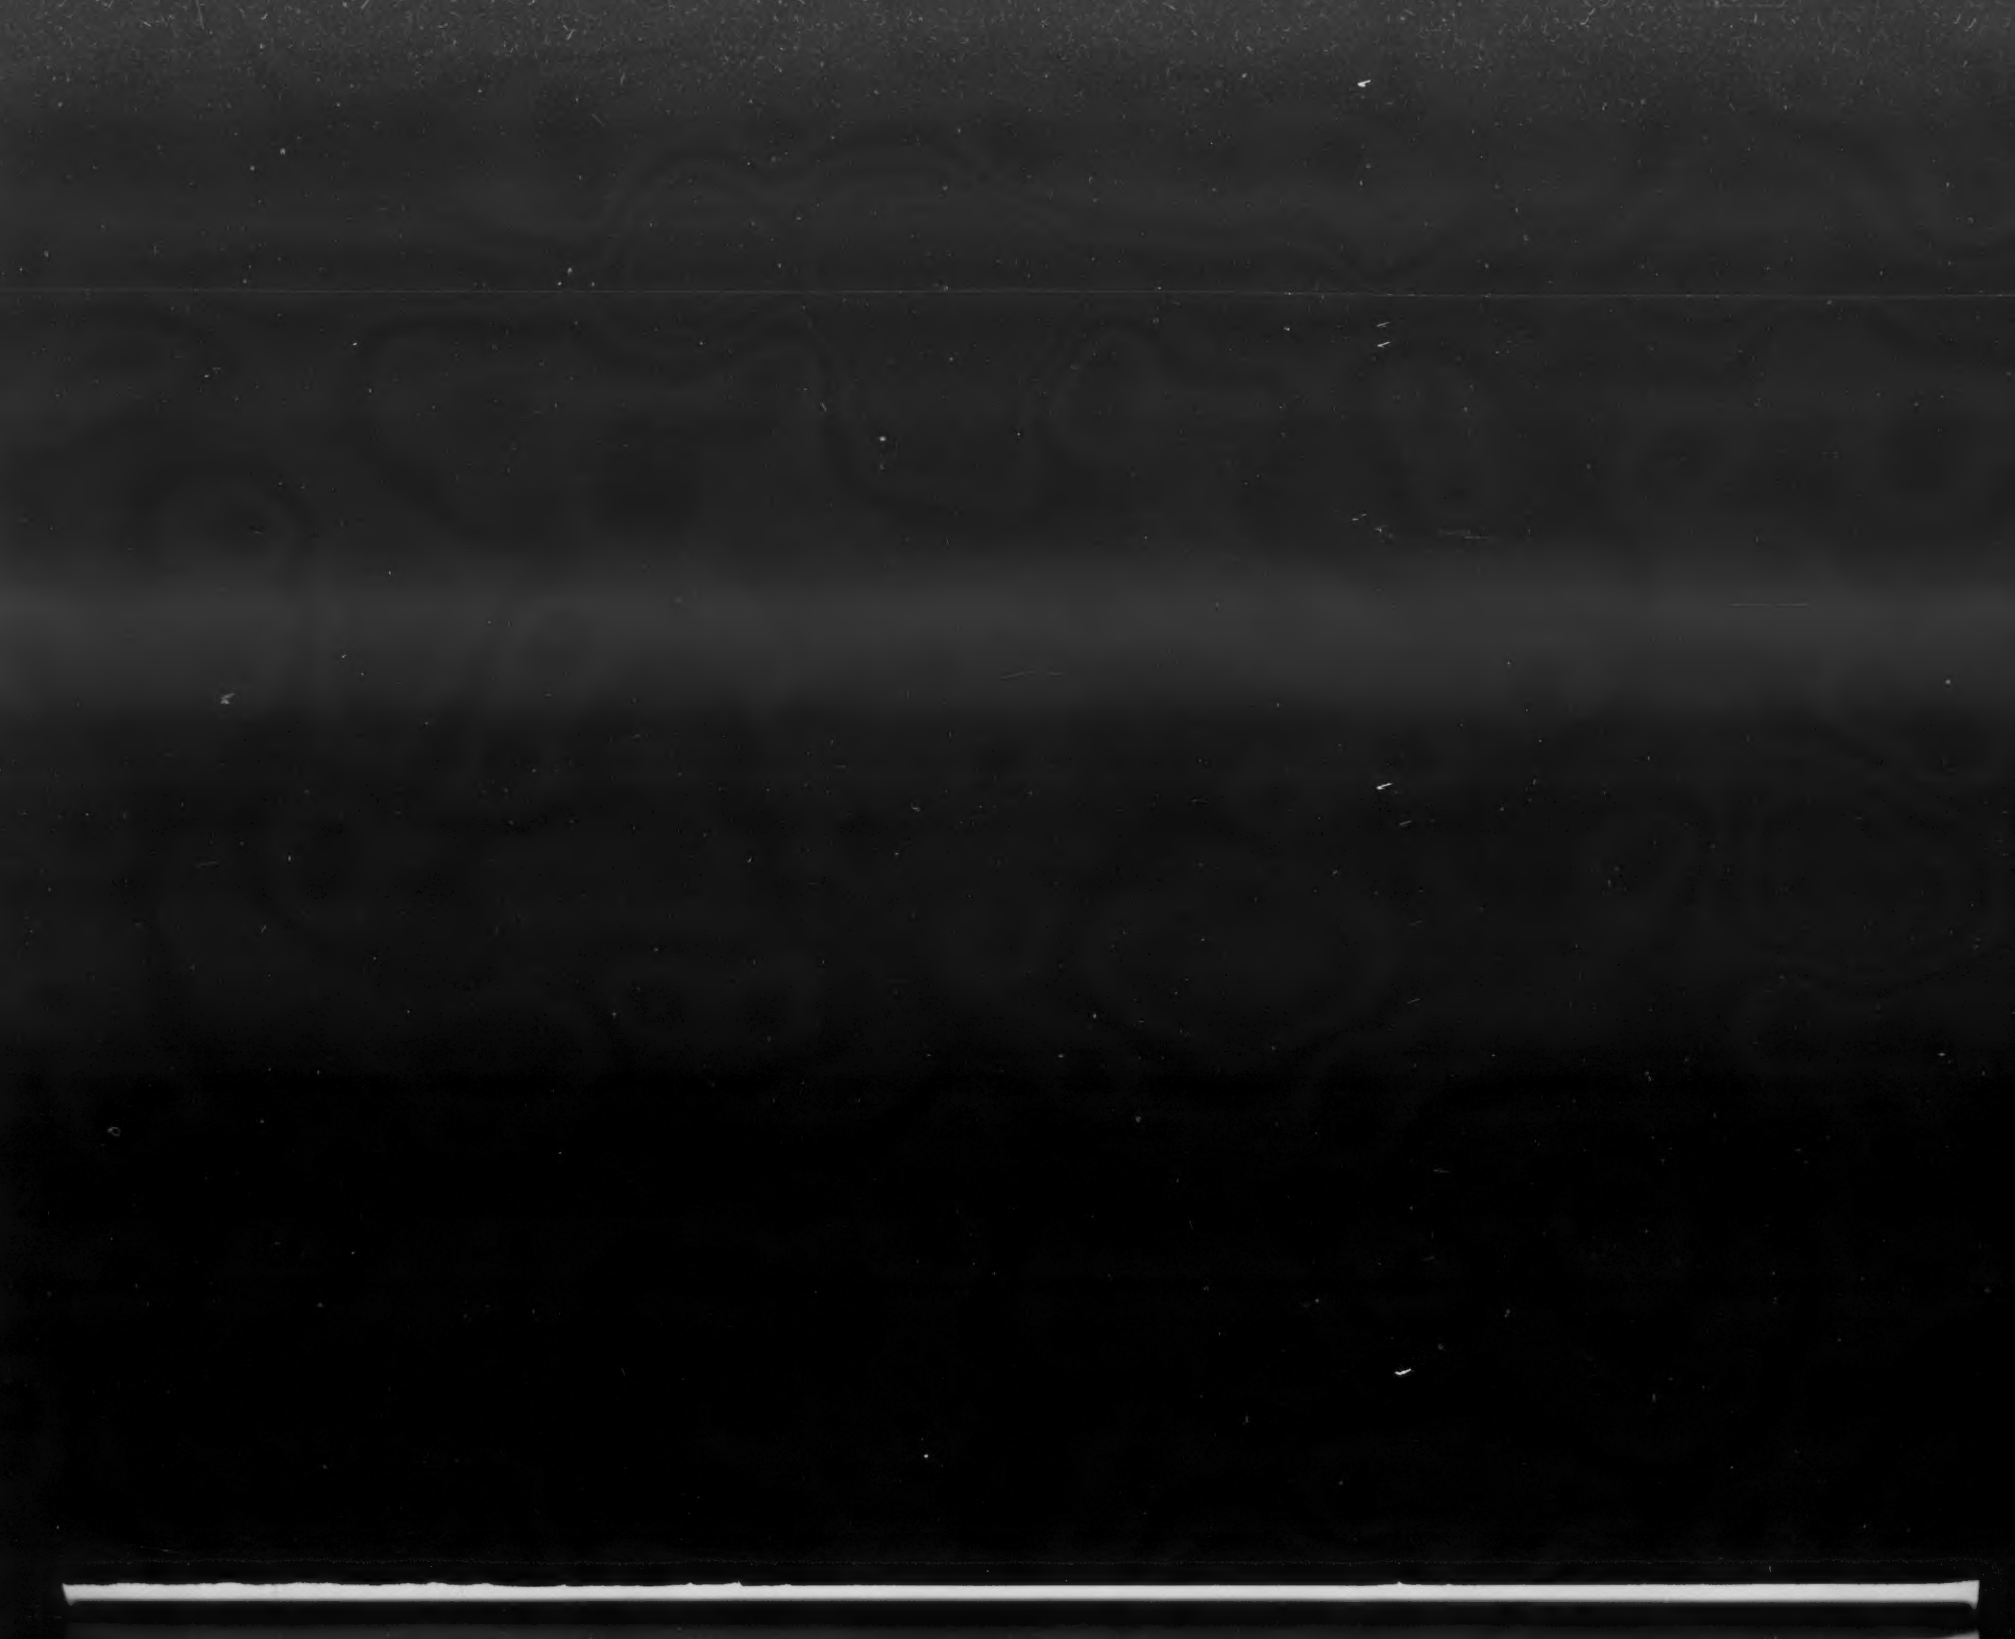
DEAR MR. PLUMLEY: In answer to your letter of January 3 I am only too glad to give you my personal opinion in regard to the reciprocal tariff treaty with Canada.

It is such a long road that prosperity must travel to reach the Vermont farmer on account of the reciprocal agreement with Canada that it seems to me it cannot be honestly classed as a benefit.

The condition of the Canadian farmer must be improved so he may be able to buy machinery, tools, and furnishings from our manufacturers which will make for an improvement in industry, resulting in better wages. Thus the laboring man may be in position to purchase more that the Vermont farmer has to sell. This is pretty far-fetched it seems to me.



There is no question as to what the importation of Canadian maple sugar will do to the price of our darker grades of sirup. Here is where the trouble has always been. As a surplus of the poorer grades always has, and always will, determine to a large extent the price of our good sirup.

The first business that the National Grange did was to pass a resolution in strong opposition to the Canadian treaty which was practically unanimous.

Speaking for the Vermont State Grange I can say that we are very much opposed to the treaty, as we believe that it will act only as a detriment to Vermont agriculture.

Very truly yours,

H. A. STODDARD,
President, Vermont State Grange.

I have just been looking at a brief filed with the United States Tariff Commission on behalf of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Vermont State Farm Bureau, Vermont Maple Products Cooperative Exchange, Inc., and Maple Producers Cooperative Association of New York, filed some time ago, in which, among other things, it is insisted:

(a) That a proper differential should be maintained between the duty on maple sirup and the duty on maple sugar, and that $0.06 per pound on maple sirup and $0.09 per pound on maple sugar constitute a proper differential. This contention was undisputed at the hearing.

(b) That conditions in the industry generally are such that the American producers require adequate protection on maple sirup and maple sugar. Among these conditions are:

(1) The accumulation of a burdensome surplus which is depressing the domestic price level and menacing the future welfare of the industry.

(2) The increasing competition in the form of importations from Canada during recent years and its injurious effects on the domestic industry.

(3) The marked decline in the number of trees tapped during recent years in the United States.

(4) The loss of natural resources and a permanent source of income to the farmers and to the community through the cutting off of sugar groves for lumbering purposes.

(5) The threatened loss of employment if the industry is not adequately protected.

(6) The adverse effect on the banking institutions and business generally in domestic maple-sugar regions of a large and accumulating surplus of maple products.

And as a conclusion it is stated that the farmers very recently contend that under the provisions of the tariff act and upon the record the Commission should find a difference in the cost of production as between the United States and Canada of 11 cents per pound on sugar and 7 cents plus per pound on sirup.

I would like further to call your attention to the statement of the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers Association, made in support of the then present tariff rate on maple sirup and maple sugar imported into the United States from Canada, which was filed with the Committee on Reciprocity Information of the United States Tariff Commission as of date July 12, 1935, prior to the signing of the trade agreement, which reads as follows:

STATEMENT OF VERMONT MAPLE SUGAR MAKERS' ASSOCIATION IN SUPPORT OF THE PRESENT TARIFF RATE ON MAPLE SIRUP AND MAPLE SUGAR IMPORTED INTO THE UNITED STATES FROM CANADA

The Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association, Inc. (hereinafter called the association), is informed that there is a proposal before the committee for reciprocity information to reduce the tariff rates on maple sugar and sirup in the forthcoming President's trade agreement with Canada.

The association, representing the maple sugar and sirup producers in Vermont, respectfully submits this statement to the committee for its consideration in connection with the forthcoming trade agreement with Canada.

The association believes that the present rates of 6 cents per pound on maple sugar and 4 cents per pound on maple sirup are justified for the following reasons:

1. Canada is the principal competing country. Practically the entire world's supply of maple sirup and sugar is produced in the United States and Canada. Table I shows that production over the past 65 years has generally declined in the United States and increased in Canada until both countries are now on a parity.

[4] The imperial gallons have been converted to United States.

2. The present tariff rates of 6 cents per pound on maple sugar and 4 cents per pound on maple sirup were fixed after careful studies were made by the United States Tariff Commission of the production costs in the United States and Canada.

The Commission made an exhaustive study of the production costs of maple products in 1925 and 1926 in the principal producing sections of the United States and Canada.

The study made by the Commission included 625 farms in the United States and 223 in Canada. The farms studied in the United States represented approximately 4 percent of the domestic production of maple sugar and sirup, while those in Canada represented approximately 1 percent of the total Canadian production of both sirup and sugar.

This study served as a basis for the Commission's recommendation of a tariff rate of 8 cents per pound on maple sugar and 5½ cents per pound on maple sirup. These rates became effective June 18, 1930.

In compliance with Senate Resolution No. 313, dated July 3, 1930, the Commission instituted an investigation, July 11, 1930, of the differences in costs of production of maple sirup and maple sugar in the United States and the principal competing country. As a result of this investigation the tariff rates were reduced from 8 cents per pound on maple sugar to 6 cents and from 5½ cents per pound on maple sirup to 4 cents. This reduction took effect February 5, 1931.

3. The association believes that the present tariff rates are inadequate to cover the difference in cost of production between the United States and Canada, the principal competing country, and that therefore, if any change is made, they should be increased.

A large part of the total cost of producing maple sugar and sirup consists of human and horse labor. During the past few years the cost of both wages and horses in Vermont has been increasing. Wages rose from 87 percent of the 1910–14 level in 1933 to 103 percent for the first 4 months of 1935. The price of horses increased from 61 percent of the 1910–14 level to 81 percent between 1932 and the first 4 months in 1935. Unless cost of these factors has risen as much or more in Canada than they have in the United States a greater disparity in cost of production between the two countries now exists than did previous to 1932. Because of this probable disparity, the association respectfully requests that, before a downward revision of tariff rates is made, the Tariff Commission make a cost study in the principal producing section of the United States and Canada.

4. The imports of maple products from Canada are an increasingly larger percentage of the United States consumption. This is an indication that the present tariff rate is not a hindrance to trade between the United States and Canada in maple products. Table II shows this trend in the period 1923–33. Variation in total production will cause variation in the trend, as it has since 1930 with an unusually low production.

5. A reduction in tariff rate would decrease the price of maple products to the American producer.

A large percentage of the maple products imported from Canada are used by United States manufacturers who buy their requirements through United States importers. These few importers will receive the most benefit from a reduction in tariff. If the tariff is lowered, it will result in an increase of imports from Canada, resulting in a lower price to the American producer.

6. A reduction in price for maple products at this time would do permanent injury to the maple industry in the United States.

When the prices for maple products are low and there is a demand for rock maple, there is a tendency to sell the sugar orchards for lumber. Especially will this be true when the prices of other farm products are low and fixed farm operating costs are relatively high. This condition prevails today.

Although the association has no figures as to the number of sugar orchards that have been cut off for lumber, it is common knowledge that a large number have been during the last 2 years, when prices were relatively low. A reduction in price of maple products at this time, when there is an increasing demand for rock-maple lumber, will undoubtedly result in many more sugar orchards being sacrificed for lumber.

Once a sugar orchard is cut off it is not replaced. The prevailing practice of pasturing sugar orchards practically eliminates natural reproduction of sugar maple. The extent of injury to the maple-sugar orchards of the State is beyond a dollars-and-cents estimate. Most of the sugar orchards are located on dairy farms, where the total income is greatly increased by the operation of the sugar orchard, and which without such income would fail to produce sufficient income to maintain the families living thereon.

7. The 1935 crop of maple products in the 10 sugar-producing States in the United States totaled 28,434,000 pounds, according to reports from the United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics. United States consumption, under present conditions, will not absorb this increased production, and any increase of imports resulting from a reduction of tariff will throw supply and demand seriously out of line. Dealers will doubtless be forced to carry over an abnormal amount of maple products which were purchased at a relatively high price. With this abnormal carry-over in the hands of dealers, a reduction in tariff rates will cause a severe financial strain, resulting in a drastic reduction in price for the 1936 crop.

There are no available figures on the supply of maple products in the hands of producers. From observations by the officers of the association, it is felt that there is a larger amount than there has been for the past 5 years in anticipation of an improved retail demand. It is felt that the retail trade will not absorb this supply, except at a drastic reduction in price, should the wholesale price be decreased as a result of a lower tariff.

In conclusion, the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association, Inc., submits the following resolution:

"Inasmuch as the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association, Inc., believes that a reduction in the present tariff rates on maple sugar and maple sirup will result in a drastic reduction in prices for these maple products to producers in Vermont as well as all maple producers in the United States, thereby causing permanent injury to the maple industry in the United States, the Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association, Inc., urges retention of the present tariff rates on maple sugar and sirup in the forthcoming trade agreement with Canada."

GEORGE B. HATHORN,
President Vermont Maple Sugar Makers' Association, Inc.

Dated at Burlington, Vt., July 8, 1935.

In connection with the foregoing I also present for your consideration a telegram which I received on the 3d day of July last from Arthur H. Packard, who is the president of the Vermont Farm Bureau for the State of Vermont:

BURLINGTON, VT., July 3, 1935.

Hon. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY:

Dependable information comes to me that a reduction on the tariff on maple sugar and sirup is contemplated at Washington. We had a heavy crop of maple sirup this year in United States and a reduction of tariff would throw a flood of Canadian sirup into United States which would depress maple markets badly and reflect a disastrous price to producers for 1936. Facts are, we have more sirup in the country today than can be marketed unless an aggressive advertising campaign is launched. If tariffs are too high, they should be reduced horizontally rather than pick out from all groups of producers and punish them singly.

A. H. PACKARD.

May I point out that the statement of the administration to the effect that "American duties have been reduced on maple sugar * * * imports of (this commodity) supplement our inadequate domestic production" paints an entirely different picture from that of the above-quoted farm leader when he emphatically states "we have more sirup in this country today than can be marketed." Notwithstanding this, however, as well as the other evidence available, the rates were subsequently reduced by over 33 percent.

Lastly, in connection with this matter, I am referring to a letter, which reads as follows:

JULY 5, 1935.

President FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have been informed that there is contemplated a reduction in the tariff on maple sugar and sirup.

Representing the people of the State of Vermont, who produce nearly one-half of the total United States production of maple sugar and its products each year, I wish emphatically to urge that no such reduction be made.

Were the tariffs to be reduced at this time, following a sugar season when there has been a heavy crop, the consequences would be that a heavy flood of Canadian sirup would be thrown on the domestic market, the markets would be badly depressed, and there would be reflected a disastrous price to producers for 1936.

The above, moreover, would be intimately felt by the majority of the farm population of Vermont, New England, New York, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, who place great reliance upon the revenue derived from the sale of these products materially to aid them to increase their cash receipts. In their interest I urge that no such contemplated downward revision in the tariff be made.

In 1929, before the upward revision of the tariff schedules became effective, the importation of maple products totaled some 13,284,355 pounds, being valued at over two and one-half millions of dollars from Canada alone; in 1933, however, with rates more favorable to local production, these figures had dropped to 2,718,953 pounds, valued at some $400,000. It appears reasonable to assume, therefore, that with a downward revision at this time the importation of this commodity will increase toward the former level at the distinct expense of the local producer. I assure you that at the present time he can ill afford to have taken from him the revenue represented by these items.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES A. PLUMLEY.

Furthermore, when it became apparent that favorable consideration was being given to the proposition to reduce the tariff on softwood and hardwood lumber, rough and dressed, exported from Canada into the United States, the Legislature of Vermont adopted a joint resolution in language as hereinafter written:

Whereas the Department of State at Washington has given notice of intent to negotiate trade agreement with Canada; and

Whereas one of the principal, possibly the principal, item of export from Canada into the United States is softwood and hardwood lumber, rough and dressed. The greater part of it comes into our northeastern territory; and

Whereas the present tariff is $3 per thousand feet revenue and $1 per thousand feet excise tax, and should this tariff through reciprocal agreement with Canada be reduced or eliminated the effect on our northeastern lumber manufacturers will be extremely serious. It will especially affect the lumber industry of the State of Vermont as well as the other New England States because the species produced in Canada and shipped into our territory are the same as we produce; and

Whereas the lumber manufacturers in the United States are obliged to operate under the lumber code, the present costs are higher than the cost of production of those Canadian species which are shipped into our markets; and

Whereas, because of this additional cost, it is absolutely necessary that a suitable duty be kept on the imported material; and

Whereas if the $3 or $4 duty should be removed it would have ill effects upon the lumber industry of the New England States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives, That the General Assembly deplore any attempt of the State Department at Washington to remove the trade barriers with Canada and to allow Canadian lumber to come into the United States free or at a reduced rate of duty; believing the same to be against the best interests of our State; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to each Member of the Vermont delegation at Washington and to the chairman of the committee for reciprocity information.

ERNEST E. MOORE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
GEORGE D. AIKEN,
President of the Senate.

Approved March 29, 1935.

CHARLES M. SMITH,
Governor.

It seems patently plain to me that the statement of the administration in its widely disseminated press release that "in making duty reductions the Government has taken the greatest care to prevent injury to any group of American farmers" is belied by the gross injury it may well inflict on the maple-sugar people of Vermont, to name but one "group of American farmers." The rate on maple sugar alone has been reduced by 33⅓ percent; that is, from 6 cents to 4 cents per pound. I see nothing other than a severe financial blow being struck by this reduction—a blow, recognized as such, and one that was sought to be averted by the farm leaders of Vermont, as is evidenced by the various inclusions that I have heretofore made, and to which further evidence is given by countless letters from individual farmers that I have in my files.

Add to this, moreover, the reduction in duty for cattle, calves, dairy cattle, cream, seed potatoes, timber and lumber, cheese, apples, hay, and live poultry, to name but a few, and it appears to me that a more effective "injury to any group of American farmers"—particularly the Vermont and Northeastern farmer—could not be devised.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that the farmers of this country have a right to rely upon statements which are made to them by a candidate for election to the Presidency of the United States. I insist that they had a right to rely upon that statement which was made by President Roosevelt when a candidate at Baltimore on October 26, I think, in 1932, when he certainly gave them to understand that he would not tolerate and would not permit any lowering of tariff duties on agricultural products. At that time and on that date he said:

> Of course, it is absurd to talk of lowering tariff duties on farm products. I declared that all prosperity in the broader sense springs from the soil. I promised to endeavor to restore the purchasing power of the farm dollar by making the tariff effective for agriculture, and raising the price of farmers' products. I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived.

The farmers of the United States took him at his word, as they had a right to do, but notwithstanding his assurances tariff duties on farm products have been lowered. They have been lowered on cream, on butter, on cheese, and on cattle. The tariff on cream has been reduced from 56.6 cents per gallon, fresh and sour, to 35 cents a gallon on not more than 1,500,000 gallons annually. This ratio of the tariff cut on cream only applied to the butter tariff of 14 cents will permit the importation of 6,000,000 pounds of butter on a 9-cent tariff basis.

The other day Mr. MARSHALL, of Ohio, called attention to the provisions of the treaty and definitely showed that the duty on veal calves had been reduced, as is apparent from the schedule, from 2½ to 1½ cents per pound for the first 51,933 live calves to be imported; that the duty on feeder cattle had been reduced from 3 cents per pound to 2 cents per pound for those weighing over 700 pounds for the first 155,799 cattle to be imported; that the duty on dairy cows has been reduced from 3 cents a pound to 1½ cents a pound for the first 20,000 imported. In other words, that the duty on approximately 225,000 head of cattle from Canada has been reduced approximately 50 percent, and that the quota allowed is practically high enough to take the largest number of cattle ordinarily brought in from Canada. He called attention to the fact that under the unconditional most-favored-nation policy and the good-neighbor theory Argentina expects that the meat from at least 500,000 head of cattle, chilled and frozen, will enter this country with a reduction of 50 percent in the tariff. In all probability 125,000,000 pounds of fresh chilled or frozen beef from Argentina will be dumped into the New York, Philadelphia, and Boston markets.

So under this co-called Canadian reciprocal treaty the American farmer is deprived of that market by reason of a reduction in tariff on agricultural products, notwithstanding the assurance of Candidate Roosevelt that such reduction would be "inconsistent with his entire farm program, and every farmer knows it and will not be deceived."

It stands to reason that under the existing treaty cream, butter, and cheese and cattle will be brought into this country and deluge the market in competition with our domestic market and to the very decided financial disadvantage of our farmers. They are the ones who must bear the burden and will suffer the loss.

At some other time I propose to make a further analysis of this Canadian agreement and to discuss somewhat more at length and in detail the unfairness and inequality and injustice which is shown and done the agricultural interests of this country by reason of its nonreciprocal terms and lack of mutual advantage insofar as agriculture and other industries are involved and concerned.

Real reciprocity with Canada undoubtedly would cement the friendly relations with the Dominion, which all good Americans are anxious to maintain, and further promote good feeling between kindred peoples. All of us, I take it, desire a more intimate and cordial relationship with our friend and neighbor at the north. True it is that we share common traditions and aspirations, but to attain such ends as we seek an agreement such as we should both enter into must be mutually advantageous to both countries, truly national in scope as applied to our own country, and of benefit to all sections. Such an agreement the present one is not. [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, under date of January 15 I made some remarks on costs of production and the effect they may have on domestic and foreign trade. We have discussed the reciprocal trade agreements and the importation of dairy products and other products, the direct cost of labor and materials, and the effect those costs may have on the ability of the grower or producer living in other lands to ship goods into this country and compete against the grower or producer in our own country.

We find in our morning papers a challenge to Members of this Congress to go out and carry on a campaign to buy American goods.

I wish to address my remarks particularly to the Japanese trade insofar as it deals with imports and exports at the present time. In 1932 Japan purchased from the United States 2,249,000 bales of cotton; in 1933, 1,814,000 bales; and in 1934, 1,737,000 bales. In the first quarter of 1935 our sales dropped to 298,890 bales.

Japan is one of the largest customers of this country so far as the purchase of raw material is concerned. Since 1931 Japan has been foremost in the market for American cotton. Japan buys the raw cotton from us, processes it, and ships back to us the finished cotton goods, thereby gaining on the manufacture of the raw cotton—and we lose. Japan's purchases of raw cotton from the United States greatly declined between the years 1932 and 1936. This because Japan has found other fields from which to purchase her raw cotton. In some parts of the world there are cotton growers who can produce cotton below the price charged for American cotton. Therefore Japan is seeking those places of production, which will be our loss.

It is reliably estimated there are 200,000,000 acres of land in Brazil suitable for the growing of cotton. We learn there are only at the present time 4,000,000 of these acres devoted to cotton; that Japan is in Brazil now financing ginning operations as well as agricultural operations to the end Japan may sooner or later be in control of the great cotton fields of that new country; also Japan is interested in improving the conditions of the 170,000 Japanese nationals who have settled in Brazil.

This cotton program of Japan in Brazil means, if carried out according to their plans, the economic and social death knell of tens of thousands of cotton farmers of the Southland. As an illustration of what it means to Texas, the greatest cotton-producing State of this Nation, look at these figures, taken from the official port statistics of cotton exports, season ended August 1 last:

	Bales
Texas exports of cotton, 1933–34	5,103,000
Texas exports of cotton, 1934–35	2,889,000
Loss in 1 year (equivalent 44 percent)	2,214,000

The Nation as a whole lost 36 percent of its foreign cotton market.

What does Japan do with the cotton which she does purchase from us? She takes it to her own mills, where it is processed under most unusual low overhead-cost conditions and with unbelievably low direct costs and export premiums. She sends the processed cotton goods back to us, closing our own textile mills, and also exports an increasing quantity to other countries, thus driving us out of those markets as well.

Mr. E. A. Neff, executive officer of a large rug-manufacturing concern in Chicago, stated under date of January 16:

The Japanese can deliver a cotton rug in Chicago for less than we can put it on our looms here. There is a very definite need for our citizens to "buy American" and for our Government to give us protection. It must be remembered that when $1,000,000 worth of rugs are imported from Japan that means at least $3,000,000 worth of rugs that are not made in this country because of the difference in cost.

The Tariff Commission in a release dated this morning, referring to imports of Japanese goods, says that—

Manufactured goods imported into the United States from Japan have, in many cases, been of low grade, even lower than any similar products made in this country. Even considering grade, however, the prices of such Japanese goods have often been extremely low.

The extremely low prices at which Japanese-made goods can be sold in other countries directly results in channels of trade being carved out through which more and more Japanese goods can flow. Japan's rapid increase in population will force down the level of wages, irrespective of the per-capita production, and as she further rationalizes her industrial activities, we can expect more and more of her goods to come into this country at lower prices.

A "Buy American" campaign will not be very effective in view of the facts of the case. Our people are under extreme economic pressure to purchase utility goods at the lowest price possible. If Japanese-manufactured goods are placed on the counters of the retail stores of this Nation and offered at a price which is lower, quality being considered, the American consumer will purchase the Japanese goods. Furthermore, if the goods come into this country, they will be purchased and consumed here. They will not be reshipped to other parts of the world.

In Japan they have something like 97,000,000 people living in a territory about as large as the State of California. Those people are increasing in population at the rate of one to one and one-half million annually. That increase in population furnishes pressure with which to hold down the wages, irrespective of the increase in per-capita production. So the gentleman from West Virginia says to us, carry on a campaign of "Buy American", and then he makes this statement:

The Nation is being flooded with foreign manufactured goods from Japan and Soviet Russia, which are of inferior grade. I am informed that some Japanese workers are paid only 2 cents a day.

He also makes the observation that he has just purchased in 30 minutes' time 15 foreign-made articles in Washington stores. He says that the dealers say that citizens do not pay attention to where the goods are made, and also makes the statement that factories in his district have been forced to close because of inroads made by foreign goods, and he pleads with the American people to buy American-made goods. If we permit the goods to come into this country, having once landed here, our people will buy them. I am referring particularly to Japanese goods, because of the low cost of wages and the low overhead, and you might say the low level of living which prevails among the people in that country.

The Tariff Commission, under date of today, has released a study on recent developments in the foreign trade with Japan. The introduction to this study reads:

On account of the important changes that have recently occurred in Japan's position in world trade and the wide-spread attention that some aspect of Japan's trade have attracted, it has been considered desirable to issue the present report.

On page 103 of the report we find this significant statement:

The first three of these tables cover 99.3 percent of the value of total imports into the United States from Japan in 1934. Table 1 gives data respecting 271 commodities representing 98.7 percent of the value of imports into the United States from Japan in 1934. The total value of these commodities from Japan in that year was $116,391,752, which was 42.6 percent of the total value of $273,011,387 for the same commodities imported from all countries. Seventy-two percent, or $83,863,209 in value, of the 271 commodities imported from Japan, were entered free of duty, and 28 percent, or $32,528,547 in value, were subject to duty.

So you see where a Member of this body pleads with each of us to go out and carry on a campaign of "buy American" and at the same time says that factories in his own district are closed because Japanese goods are coming in. And then the Tariff Commission says that 72 percent of those goods are coming in "free of duty." How can Japan produce and ship them into this country and compete with what we produce in this country under mass production? That has to do with costs.

Every tariff bill has to do with costs, and Japan can do that for many reasons. She can do it because they have export premiums made up of depreciated currencies, low wages, and many other factors, and at the same time they have a considerably less overhead in doing business than we have in this country. Every reciprocal trade treaty that we discuss here involves this question of wages and overhead and direct costs. If 271 articles, all of which range in excess of $12,000 per annum in value, are coming into this country from Japan, closing factories here, then that is something, I think, for the present administration to give serious attention to. It is my opinion that although we pass exclusion acts and say to the Japanese people, "You cannot come in and work in this country", yet if we permit these 271 articles and many others to come in free of duty and close our factories, that is equivalent to bringing the Japanese people to this country and displacing our workers. If this pencil I hold in my hand is produced in Japan and I find it on our counters, what is the difference between bringing Japanese into this country in the way of pencils or toys or other goods and bringing the actual body of a Japanese here that has blood flowing through his veins and permitting him to work in our factories? What is the difference between an actual physical Japanese here and the result of his physical energy as expended in his own country converted into labor and made into some product and shipped here? It is up to us to keep the low-cost goods out of this country and produce what we want here at home. Keep the goods out and then we will "Buy American." If they come in our people will buy them by reason of the economic pressure to which they are subjected on account of the foreign-produced goods competition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

WHO OWNS THE UNITED STATES?

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, yesterday two of my warm personal friends, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE], for whom I have a warm personal affection, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] took the floor of the House and made some statements that challenged my attention. I am not the only Member on the floor of the House who envies the rare ability of my young friend from the State of Oklahoma. More than once I watched him as he has taken the well of the House and presented with rare eloquence his ideas in an address which he was making. [Applause.]

When he adds to that eloquence that dramatic technique which he possesses, his addresses and his speeches become not only interesting but highly entertaining.

On page 1055 of the RECORD of yesterday is found the statement which he made—that 10 percent of the families owned 90 percent of the Nation's wealth, and that as a result of rugged individualism 1 percent of the families of the Nation came into possession of 59 percent of the Nation's wealth.

Such statements as these are not new. Every little while we hear statements of a similar import. The figures do not always agree, but the implication is always the same; that is, that the wealth of our country under our system of government, and particularly the "rugged individualism" referred to by the gentleman from Oklahoma, has concentrated in the hands of very few people. The figures vary. Sometimes we hear it said that 2 percent own 80 percent of the United States. Sometimes we hear it said that 5 percent own 90 percent of the country. May we reasonably ask, Are these figures correct? Has this Nation actually drifted into conditions which may exist in the Old World, in which a handful of the nobility owns nearly everything in the country?

I recognize the fact that these are days of extreme talk and rash statements not always founded on fact or reason. Just recently figures were quoted by officials high in this administration—and they were made publicly and found their way into the newspapers—which were afterward found to be incorrect and untrue. Therefore, I am not surprised that we should hear on this floor a statement which may be equally rash and not founded on fact. To my mind such figures as we heard yesterday as to who owns the United States are absurd and unreasonable.

In 1932 the estimated wealth of this Nation was $247,000,000,000 and our population approximately 125,000,000. If 2 percent owned 80 percent of the wealth, then a few more people than 2,000,000 would own $197,000,000,000, leaving only $57,000,000,000 to be owned by all the rest of the population.

If we take the figures offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, the absurdity of the statements he made will be still more glaring. But "let us look at the record", using the language of one who recently had some things to say about this administration that were rather pointed and who appealed to the real Democrats to put their own houses in order. There are over 6,000,000 farms in this country. Would anybody say that 1 percent of the families of the Nation owned 59 percent of them and that all of the rest of the 99 percent would own 41 percent of the farms? It is estimated that the land and buildings alone on these farms are worth $48,000,000,000; deducting $12,000,000,000 of mortgage debt existing against them would still leave $36,000,000,000 in farm lands.

There are also 10,000,000 nonfarm homes owned by those who occupy them, which, according to the Census Bureau's average, are valued at $4,478 each, which would account for $44,000,000,000 more, the major part of which belong not to the 1 percent of the Nation's families but to the 99 percent.

There are about 45,000,000 savings accounts in the Nation, amounting to nearly $30,000,000,000. Are we to believe that the very rich 1 percent of the families own the most of those accounts?

The very rich 1 percent of the families do not usually own the building and loan associations of the Nation, but nearly 10,000,000 other people do, and they are worth nearly $8,000,000,000, so that we have now accounted for about $118,000,000,000 of the Nation's wealth, or nearly one-half of it, of which the mythical 1 percent own a very minor part.

There are some other things that 10 percent of the families of the Nation do not own. I refer to the American Telephone & Telegraph Co. as a shining example, in which they have more than 700,000 stockholders scattered over every part of the Nation.

Listed stocks are distributed among many million people of this country, and in addition there are a half million corporations in the Nation whose stocks are not listed. Does anyone believe that the Nation's 1 percent of the families own these corporations?

There are more than 2,000,000 business concerns which belong to individuals and partnerships, mostly small owners, widely scattered throughout the country. Those people own most of the one and a half million little stores in the United States. To say exactly what they are worth would be difficult, but if they average $1,000 each, that item alone would account for $15,000,000,000 more.

Now, I rather suspect that there are millions of other Americans who now hold many billions of bonds, and certainly the National Government has placed enough billions of them on the market recently to make them available to the point of suffocation to the people of this country.

To this might be added state and local bonds of the many municipalities, as well as the $12,000,000,000 outstanding in farm mortgages and more billions on nonfarm property. Certainly these are not held by the plutocratic 1 percent of the Nation, but are held by individuals and people of moderate means, small banks, and building and loan associations.

To this array of property might be added the machinery and livestock on the farms, which amounts to $9,000,000,000. There are also 30,000,000 homes in the country, of which about 27,000,000 do not belong to that minute proportion of the population to which the gentleman from Oklahoma referred but are owned by the people.

If the furniture in the average home of America was valued at $400, it would account for $10,000,000,000 more of the Nation's wealth.

Another item that should not be overlooked is the fact that there are nearly 30,000,000 automobiles in the United States, 88 percent of which are made in my own State and many in my own district. If their average value is $400, that would account for $8,000,000,000 more.

Let us not overlook the fact that there are about 115,000,000 life-insurance policies, amounting to nearly $100,000,000,000 in life-insurance liability, widely distributed among the rank and file of the people. Their cash surrender value to the owners of those policies would account for billions more.

This ought to be enough to convince any reasonable person of the extreme and, I think, somewhat radical statements made by the gentleman yesterday when he inferred that the wealth of the country had been concentrated in the hands of the few under Republican administrations of rugged individualism.

Look at the record and hold to the facts. The only result of such wild and reckless statements that the wealth of the Nation has concentrated in the hands of a few is to set class against class and to make the people believe that while they were working, rearing their families, and minding their own business, the country was stolen from them. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, in this deluge of criticism that has come on the floor this afternoon, and during the past week, on our reciprocity policy there seems to be one common characteristic.

These speeches have been one long wail against concessions we have granted American importers, and an equally profound silence as to the concessions that the exporting farmer and manufacturer has received in exchange.

Apparently these speakers would like to convince us that the man who manufactures or cultivates solely for sale at home is an unmixed blessing, while the man who manufactures or cultivates for sale abroad is a curse to our civilization and should be utterly cast out.

Yet I presume, Mr. Chairman, that the most of us know a number of such men. In my district a large percentage of the farmers, and at least 12 percent in value of the manufacturers, sell their produce abroad. They all look normal. They pay taxes, they rear families, they consume food, wear clothes, and live in houses, and most remarkable of all, they pay wages to their laborers.

They are American citizens, and certainly under any theory of rugged individualism they ought at least not be hampered by government. Nevertheless every step that we have taken to shut out imports has infallibly made the payment to that extent for our exports impossible.

This is not at all mysterious. No sane individual will part with anything of value unless he receives some tangible thing or some service of equal value in exchange. Nations are but groups of individuals, and in matters of trade function the same way.

Anyone willing to investigate the ramifications of foreign exchange and the record of international imports and exports will find that with every nation on the globe their total exports of commodities, services, and gifts will over a period of years equal their total imports of commodities, services, and gifts. There will be short periods of credit or debit balances, but this is only a temporary affair.

Those nations, like the United States, who have prided themselves on selling more commodities than they buy have maintained this position by buying more services than they sold or by sending more gifts than they received.

Our immigrants send tremendous funds to their relatives back home. Our investments in repudiated foreign bonds have constituted unwilling but wholesale gifts on our part. Our purchase of marine transportation, the money spent by our tourists in Europe, the interest and dividends we have paid to foreign capitalists have all enabled us to sell more tangible goods than we could buy.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I will be glad to yield at the end of my remarks.

All these conditions, however, are being rapidly changed, and it is more and more imperative that we must buy tangible commodities almost dollar for dollar in exact exchange for the tangible commodities we sell.

But if this were not true, the bitterness and animosity generated throughout the world toward our people by the Tariff Act of 1929 has produced countertariff walls in every direction to accomplish the same thing.

For example, our tariff increase on French tapestry, lace, and perfume brought a rigid retaliation against our automobiles, rubber belts, and coated paper. Mr. Speaker, I ask by what divine right we, the lawmakers of this country, can say to the laborers making automobiles, rubber belts, and coated paper, "You must lose your job in order that the perfume and lace makers may keep theirs."

Talk about planned economy, you who rave against our efforts at planned economy in the interest of labor and the general welfare have been advocating the most rigid planned economy that we have ever had, and it has been going on for a long time. Except that you have always planned your economy in the interests of campaign contributors and against the cultivator or manufacturer for export.

By what inspiration may we say to the farmers growing tobacco and raising hogs, "You must accept a curtailment of your market in Norway and Sweden because the Match Trust insists on a monopoly of the match business in this country"?

My very good friend and colleague from Ohio, Mr. MARSHALL, is very much worried about some concessions we have made to the importers of Brazil nuts in a reciprocity treaty recently passed. It certainly then ought to be of interest to him to know that in the Canadian treaty the Canadian duty on pecans and walnuts in the shell was reduced 50 percent and a very substantial reduction was granted on shelled nuts. He is terribly disturbed about our putting flaxseed oil on the free list. If we would just shut out Canadian flaxseed oil, he says, we could utilize 3,000,000 acres of land growing these flaxseed. It is hardly to be expected that the Canadian producer is giving all this flaxseed oil to our manufacturers, and if not, it is being paid for by some commodity manufactured or grown in the United States. One item, for example, would be our Irish and sweet potatoes, which, under the new agreement, are to be imported into Canada free of duty. Possibly our American farmers would rather grow potatoes than they would flaxseed, and some of that 3,000,000 acres of land may be developed this way. Or the very marked concessions granted by Canada to our fruit growers might be an inducement to our farmers to use a little of this space for that purpose.

It is not necessary to go into all these tiresome details. Very briefly, this Canadian treaty grants concessions to American farmers on imports into Canada which in normal times would total $50,000,000 a year, and we grant concessions to Canadian farmers on the things that they grow most profitably, on imports into this country which in normal times would amount to about $45,000,000 a year. This looks like a good bargain for us.

This Canadian reciprocity treaty does not mean free trade by any means. I think an examination of the treaty will simply show that both the United States and Canada have gone back substantially as a first step toward sane and sensible commercial relationship to our tariff treaty of 1922, which I believe we all remember was a Republican measure, and it is certainly startling to notice how dangerous some of our Republican colleagues seem to think it is.

My friend and colleague from Ohio, for example, says:

> This program to me just does not make sense.

Well, it may help him to know that in Springfield, Ohio, the largest town in his district, there exists a paper known as the Springfield Sun. A recent editorial in that paper seems to be able to see a little sense in the program, because it says:

> Reciprocity may be described as an invention to modify the bad effects of protection without doing away with it. It was favored more or less by some members of both parties. President Taft, a Republican, almost got reciprocity through. It has now been brought about in a Democratic administration.

If the gentleman is still worried about the 3,000,000 acres of land that ought to be growing flaxseed in this country instead of in Canada, it would be well to call to his attention that under the tariff schedules of 1922 the United States trade in manufactured commodities amounted to $400,000,000. Under the maleficent influence of the last Republican tariff this trade dropped to $100,000,000. Now, if by restoring the former tariff schedule we can restore this $300,000,000 in manufactured goods, as well as restore the $35,000,000 worth of agricultural produce which we have lost in exports in the same time, the farmer might be able to use up some of those 3,000,000 acres—first, in supplying additional farm produce for the Canadian people; and, second, in supplying farm produce to the laborers who would be restored to their jobs in producing this $300,000,000 worth of manufactured goods. Anyone who is really interested in preserving the American market for the American farmer would do well to see first that the American market prospers. To preserve something that is bankrupt is hardly worth talking about.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF], who gave such an impassioned and earnest speech against this Canadian reciprocity treaty in its effect upon the dairy business, would be relieved, I am sure, to know that the quota of Canadian milk to be admitted—125,000,000 pounds—is about one-tenth of 1 percent of the quantity produced in the United States, and it is just half the quantity we imported from Canada in 1929. Now, if there is any attempt of the Canadian producers to send in enough milk really to injure Mr. SAUTHOFF's constituents, they will very shortly come under the schedule of our Smoot-Hawley tariff, which in the past 4 years has shown itself to be sufficiently high practically to kill all foreign trade, both imports and exports.

He was also very much disturbed about Cheddar cheese. The new reciprocity schedules return to the tariff of 1922, and under that schedule our average imports amounted to less than 1 percent of American production. Now, I think it hardly more than fair to say that if our tariff policy preserved to the Cheddar cheese manufacturers in this country 99 percent of the domestic market, it has done pretty well—that is, if we are willing to concede that the farmer or manufacturer who manufactures or produces our exports has any license to live in our modern world at all.

One of the recent critics of our Canadian reciprocity was terribly disturbed about the influx of cattle. The principal item in this list is feeder cattle weighing over 700 pounds. The duty under the reciprocity treaty is 33⅓ percent higher than the tariff schedule of 1922, and is limited to three-fourths of 1 percent of our annual slaughter. On cattle between 175 and 700 pounds no change has been made, so there does not seem to be much to worry about.

I know that it will be pleasant news to the gentleman from Wisconsin if he will read an editorial in the American Creamery and Poultry Produce Review for November 27, 1935, and also a release for publication:

> THE CANADIAN TRADE AGREEMENT
> The Review unhesitatingly applauds as sound policy in principle the trade agreement recently consummated between Washington and the Dominion of Canada. The concessions made will, it is true, adversely affect at least for a time, certain enterprises and industries on both sides of the border. But the advantages of cultivating larger commercial relationships with a good neighbor whose manner of living, whose trend of thought, whose ideals and ideas of government, and whose prevailing tongue are very nearly identical with our own must be apparent.

Friendship and a mutual appreciation of a common interest in peace grow with trade and with a general realization of business interdependence. We look forward to the day when the border line separating us from Our Lady of the Snows can, with mutual benefit, be made as innocent of restrictions as it is today innocent of fortifications and instruments of war.

That is the mouthpiece of the creamery and dairy interests of this country.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] got up on the floor here a moment ago and said he was in favor of reciprocity but opposed to the way we got it. We have been trying to get reciprocity in this country for the last 50 years and were never able to get any reciprocity treaties except as they are obtained at the present time. Why? Because whenever you try the other method of going through legislative halls you get the old tariff bloc, logrolling system, which gets you nowhere. If our own Congress has not defeated the measure, the legislative body of the other country has.

During the past 50 years we have negotiated treaties with Hawaii and Cuba, which is a wonderful record for that period of time. Those who object to this system are simply saying that they do not favor reciprocity, because this is the only way we will ever get it. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] stated he favors reciprocity and then criticizes everything that has been done under it. For the enlightenment of the gentleman, permit me to read an editorial taken from the Rutland (Vt.) Herald, which I happen to have before me. It reads as follows:

It probably is too early to make positive statements, but so far it certainly doesn't look as though the new United States-Canadian trade agreement would work a hardship on Vermonters. On the contrary, customs officials at Newport say that the imports during the first 19 days of the new regime have been normal, with indications that they will continue to be in spite of the letting down of trade barriers.

This information should be a comfort to the Vermont dairymen, lumbermen, sugar dealers, and others who anticipated a flood of Canadian products to compete with their own. A glance at the customs collector's report shows that so far there really is small cause for alarm.

Instead of heavy milk importations since the agreement went into effect on January 1, no milk has been received at Newport, and the deputy collector of customs at that port says dealers have informed him that they have no intention of trying to build up the Canadian business again. A duty higher than that in effect prior to the Tariff Act of 1930 and strict United States pure-food regulations are responsible for this condition.

Only a few purebred cattle have been imported for dairy and breeding purposes and lumber imports have been small, probably due to the fact that Canadian prices have soared more than the tariff has been reduced. Although it's too early to know anything about the practical application of the maple-sirup tariff, customs men feel that the 4-cent duty called for in the agreement, which is the same as it has been most of the time since 1922, will make unlikely any change in the volume of the Canadian product imported.

All in all it looks very much as though the Vermonters who yelled the loudest when the agreement was signed may have been starting at shadows. There may be some increase in lumber imports; the sugar season may bring about an influx of Canadian goods. However, it is doubtful if the quantities will be sufficient to cause any great concern among the producers in this State.

I may say in passing that this is a Republican antiadministration paper.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] cited one of the Washington papers and also called attention to the terrific situation existing at the present time so far as Japanese imports are concerned. He wants further restrictions against Japan. The situation is that due to one of those peculiar trade triangles we happen to be selling Japan $100 worth of goods for every $80 worth of goods that we buy from her, so that every 80 cents that we cut off of Japanese imports we are going to cut off $1 worth of exports from our country.

The gentleman also cited the Washington Hearst paper, which, of course, is one of the rabble-rousing institutions in this country, with reference to the question of the tariff. These papers yell about "Buy American", and all that "hurrah, hurrah, hurrah for the American flag", and that kind of cheap, circulation-inflating pseudo patriotism.

Although the Washington Post is a Republican paper in policy, here is what that paper states editorially about the Canadian reciprocity treaty:

Countries must not only buy, however, if they wish to sell but when a nation has attained creditor status, like the United States, it must be prepared to import more goods than it exports if it expects to receive interest on capital invested abroad and to be paid for its exports. Only if we are prepared to continue lending the difference between what is due and what can be paid will the day of reckoning be indefinitely postponed.

Similarly, a debtor country must be given facilities for exporting more than it imports, if it is to discharge its obligations and finance its imports without going ever more deeply into debt. Judged in the light of such incontrovertible facts, the shrinkage in our merchandise trade balance is to be expected. And it should be welcomed insofar as it reflects an approach to a need readjustment of our trading relationships to our creditor status.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. This same editorial concludes as follows:

It is probably too soon to determine the effect of the various reciprocal-trade treaties upon our foreign trade. Certainly they have stimulated exports as much as imports, and must be regarded as a factor of first importance in the struggle to restore a healthy basis for expansion.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call attention to the fact that there is a matter involved in these reciprocity treaties far more important to us and to our children than any gain in profits or trade that we may ever make, and that is that these treaties are offering an avenue far more direct than any neutrality bill we may pass to the establishment of a permanent basis of peace.

There are those in this House who think that our best method of achieving peace is to disarm, and there are those who think that our best method of achieving peace is to arm to the teeth, but the simple fact is that neither side in this interminable argument is doing anything to remove the most potent factor that is constantly plunging the world into war.

When Japan was invited to attend the recent naval conference she urgently suggested that the conference discuss, along with naval reduction and naval parity, the fundamental and important question of open access to raw-material markets.

Goebbels in Germany just a few days ago made the statement that he was in entire sympathy with the Italian desire for foreign colonies and open markets. He said that he was not willing to agree with their methods of getting them, which can only mean one thing in the light of the new fortifications of the Rhine, and that is that Germany intends to get them at a peace conference following the next European war.

Emil Ludwig, in his Interviews with Mussolini, was discussing the Kellogg Peace Pact, and Mussolini said to him that so far as world peace is concerned a revision of international tariffs was of more importance than all the peace pacts.

The raw-material markets of the world are monopolized by four or five great empires; they are fenced about by high tariff walls; other nations cannot buy these raw materials because they cannot sell in these markets; therefore their standard of living is down and factories are closed, their families are hungry. And we of the great powers say to these nations: "We will not drop bombs on your cities, we will not poison your wells, we will not turn machine guns on your young men, but we do insist on the privilege of starving you and your children." Can anyone expect the world to remain in peace under these conditions? Can anyone expect Japan, Germany, Italy, and other nations similarly situated to do anything else than bide their time to strike, and when they strike this Nation, the repository of the world's greatest supply of raw material, need not hope to escape, no matter how many idealistic and well-meant neutrality bills this Congress may pass. If we are sufficiently armed ourselves to frighten away attacks, we may be assured that some of our weaker neighbors—the Philippines or Cuba—will be the victim, and from there on is a short step. We cannot conduct a perpetual, eternal commercial war and then expect military peace.

Now I will be pleased to yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it the gentleman's thought we should bring our living levels down to those of Japan in order to retain an amicable relationship?

Mr. HARLAN. Our living levels in this country have no more to do with a tariff policy than they have to do with Einstein's theory. From the day of Alexander Hamilton's report on manufacturers 150 years ago every industry that has come to this Congress and asked for tariff preferment has come in with this plea.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. HARLAN. They come in and say to the Congress, "We want to go into business, but we cannot go into business because there is a high wage scale in this country, and we cannot compete with lower wage scales." They started this 150 years ago, and they have said it ever since for every industry that has started up and asked for a tariff. We had a high wage scale 150 years ago, and we have it now. This high wage scale applies in this country to all the building trades, to all the service industries, to all the industries that manufacture for export—in fact, to over half of our employed labor—without any relationship to the tariff. The tariff has had nothing to do with our wage scale except to reduce the relative value of the dollar that the laborer is getting. In other words, we have elevated the cost of living and cut down the relative wage.

Mr. KNUTSON. Has the gentleman read the history of the American tin-plate industry?

Mr. HARLAN. No; I do not believe I have. I will leave that to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I did not think the gentleman had.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman can cite a number of specific industries which could not exist in this country, probably, if it were not for some protection, and, of course, in those industries the wages paid are directly attributed to the tariff; but this has nothing to do with the wage scale which applies to all labor and has been relatively higher in this country from its very beginning until now.

The tariff-protected industries ask for protection each time because, they say, they cannot pay this wage scale. In other words, they say to Congress: "You must adopt a tariff sales tax on all foreign goods competing with us so that we can impose this same sales tax on our commodity and out of that sales tax pay our wages and profits."

The only difference between this tariff-imposed sales tax and the Townsend transaction tax is that the Townsend transaction tax goes first to the Government and then to the beneficiary. The tariff sales tax goes direct from the purchaser into the pockets of the manufacturer. How anyone can argue that by the juggling around of a sales tax of this character we can increase our wealth, raise our level of living, or increase the wages of the country is beyond me.

I am not a supporter of Dr. Townsend's economics; but how anyone on the high-tariff side of the argument can consistently oppose Dr. Townsend is another mystery that they alone will have to solve.

These industries, after coming here and saying that they cannot meet our American wage scale, get the tariff and then go to their laborers and to the public at large and say that the wage scale which they cannot meet in the first place is due to the tariff. Nothing but the most utter, assinine stupidity. Its one virtue is that it is very profitable stupidity to the tariff beneficiaries.

Long before Alexander Hamilton made his report on manufactures—in fact, in the Colonial days—Benjamin Franklin, in writing to a friend of his in England, commented upon the fact that we had a much higher wage scale in the Colonies than existed in England, and attributed it to the fact that the Colonies had not yet adopted those restrictions on trade which he said the princes of Europe had used to interfere with their own economy.

We owe our wage scale to the almost unlimited cheap power, natural resources, inventive genius, and soil fertility which enables us to produce tremendous profits, and out of those profits we have a higher general wage level than any place else in the world.

One very important thought, however, that I wish especially to emphasize is that we are here discussing a reciprocity treaty. I am not advocating, and I am sure the State Department is not advocating, abolishing our tariff system just because it is economically unsound. There is a great deal of difference between adopting a tariff schedule and a proper proceeding after it is here. We are definitely committed to a tariff policy. Investments have been made and our whole industrial system built on a tariff policy; we cannot escape it any more than could the man escape the bear that he had by the tail. We can, however, alleviate our difficulty and work no injury on anyone by adopting these gradual and harmless reciprocity treaties.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. In our reciprocal-trade-agreement law there is a provision to the effect that any reduction in duty we give to any one country under a trade agreement applies equally to all other countries except Germany. I wonder if the gentleman would give us his opinion—and I respect his opinion, because he knows this subject as well as anyone in the House—what the effect of quotas is in respect of these agreements. Do other countries get the same benefit as to these quotas?

Mr. HARLAN. I am not speaking for the State Department; however, I am reliably informed that where there are quotas set forth in the Canadian reciprocity treaty those quotas extend to the whole world. If Canada does not fill the quota before some other nation has, then it is just too bad for Canada, because after the quota is filled we then go back to the tariff schedules under the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill. However, these quotas on lumber, meat, and milk are so drawn as to apply practically to imports from Canada alone. The imports which we get from Mexico—and which worried the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MARSHALL] in his speech the other day—are not of the type that are referred to in the Canadian treaty; and on milk, for example, we may get a little from New Zealand or Holland, but, I understand, from practically no one else.

Mr. BOILEAU. How about cheese?

Mr. HARLAN. And very little cheese. The fact is we constantly export more cheese than we imported from Canada under the 1922 tariff. Cheese, however, is not under a quota in the Canadian treaty. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call attention to an error made by the Forestry Service as to the city of Fernandina, Fla.

Recently Mr. Julian E. Rothery, senior forester, made a preliminary report relative to Florida pulp development at Palatka, Fla. This report is in many respects a splendid document and well outlines the great possibilities for the pulpwood industry in the northern part of Florida and in the southern part of Georgia. The report has particularly to do with my congressional district in the northeastern part of Florida. Forester Rothery, however, made a grave error when he, in speaking of the town of Fernandina, Fla., used this language:

> The town shows every evidence of decay and poverty.

I take exceptions to this language. Fernandina is one of the finest small cities in Florida with a population of four or five thousand people. It has probably the best harbor on the Atlantic Ocean south of Hampton Roads. The harbor is large and gives depth of 24 or 28 feet. The shrimp and general fishing at Fernandina are among the best in the world. Amelia Beach adjacent to the city of Fernandina is wide, long, and smooth; in fact, one of the finest beaches in the world and is frequented by thousands of visitors each year. Fernandina and Nassau County also have the distinction of being almost the only city and county without a bank failure. During the recent financial crisis there was not a bank failure in Fernandina, and the First National Bank, which is one of the strongest in the United States, did not have to borrow even a dollar during the depression. Nassau County has some of the richest farming soil in Florida together with some of the best developed general farms and poultry farms. The timbered area of the county which is very extensive affords one of the best pulpwood industry opportunities in the United States. Adjacent to Fernandina and this county can be had four or five hundred thousand acres of pulpwood growth pine for pulpwood and general forestry purposes. I know of no better opportunity offered for a pulpwood mill than Fernandina, because in addition to natural timber growth and a deep harbor facility it has a splendid concrete paved road and railroad facilities.

Forester Rothery made in many respects a splendid report relative to the future of the pulpwood industry in Florida, but was in grave error when he called Fernandina a town showing evidence of decay and poverty.

We welcome and commend that portion of the forester's report which gives correct conditions as to the pulpwood possibilities in north Florida, but condemn this particular erroneous reference to the city of Fernandina, Fla.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include therein the report of Forester Rothery referred to, and also the letter from Mayor P. C. Kelly, of Fernandina, Fla., transmitting same.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

FERNANDINA, FLA., January 24, 1936.

Hon. R. A. GREEN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: The citizens of Fernandina and Nassau County have requested me to call your attention to a preliminary report (see Florida Pulpwood Development at Palatka, Fla., by Mr. Julian E. Rothery, senior forester); copy of the report is enclosed, and I trust you will give this report careful consideration.

It strikes me this report should have been named "Prospectus for Pulpwood Development at Palatka." The Forest Service released their survey no. 9 on January 30, 1935. Mr. E. L. Demmon, director, New Orleans, La., gave out the advance information in his survey unit no. 1 for 21 counties in northeast Florida and 35 counties in southeast Georgia. Fernandina is near the center of this vast timber supply, with the best harbor on the Atlantic coast. The two surveys cover more than 14,000,000 acres, with more than 75,000,000 cords of pulpwood available. No mention is made in either survey unit that the timber in the central region is full of knots, limbs, etc., and therefore not first-class pulpwood.

The uncalled-for fling this Mr. Rothery seems to delight in taking at Fernandina is unwarranted and without the boundary of facts.

We should not object to his Prospectus for Palatka if he had not mentioned Fernandina, but we do strenuously protest against the Forest Service wantonly knocking Fernandina and Nassau County and giving publicity to reckless statements that are not borne out by his own Department's report.

The gentleman's "dig", "The town shows every evidence of decay and poverty", is particularly obnoxious. Fernandina has the distinction of having one of the few banks in the United States that was so efficiently managed that it carried on without Government aid and without borrowing one dollar during the depression.

This report is calculated to do Nassau County, and particularly Fernandina, a great injustice and irreparable injury.

Mr. Rothery, senior forester, is in the enigmatic position of condemning in a measure the unit survey in northeast Florida released by Mr. E. L. Demmon, director, New Orleans, La., or at least that portion of the pulpwood in the central region and within easy reach of Fernandina.

This report bears the date of October 1935, but our attention was not called to it until the 23d day of this month.

With regards, I am,

Yours most respectfully,

P. C. KELLY, Mayor.

PRELIMINARY REPORT, FLORIDA PULP DEVELOPMENT, PALATKA, FLA.

By Julian E. Rothery, senior forester

INTRODUCTION

The following report deals briefly with some of the possibilities of a pulp development in north Florida.

Section 1 covers a brief trip by the writer to various points, in company with other forest officers from Atlanta, with particular reference to the town of Palatka, for which such a project has been discussed, and the pulpwood resources tributary to that point. It includes a recommendation for a mill-site survey to determine the relative industrial merits of this location as a necessary step for further studies.

Section 2 deals very briefly with the general economic and social conditions of the locality and the transportation facilities for assembling pulpwood. Until further industrial data are gathered it must necessarily be incomplete.

Included is an outline of pulpwood operations in the South, employment involved, and the adaptability of this type of operation to intensive management on national-forest lands.

A map shows the general geographic features of the vicinity of Palatka and the transportation systems which will permit the cheap assembly of the pine pulpwood so abundant throughout this territory.

OCTOBER 3, 1935.

SECTION I

PRELIMINARY REPORT FLORIDA PULP DEVELOPMENT

The writer left Washington on August 26, went to Atlanta, conferred with Regional Forester Kircher on the 27th, and left Atlanta with Messrs. Paxton and Ochsner, of the regional office, that night for Jacksonville, and spent until September 5 in preliminary study of the pulpwood possibilities in north Florida.

Mr. William L. Wilson, of the Works Progress Administration, 1405 Barnett Bank Building, Jacksonville, rendered every assistance and made available the services of Mr. J. E. Woodman, a consulting forester of Jacksonville. Forest Supervisor Albert accompanied the party during some of the trip.

1. Jacksonville: Jacksonville offers numerous advantages for a pulp or paper mill, and tentative sites on the river below the city have been considered. A good wood supply is tributary and the Osceola National Forest is within reasonable freight rates. The question of odor from digester gas presents a problem, and as Mr. Wilson felt the city might not particularly welcome a mill, the subject was not discussed at great length, though as a location Jacksonville has undoubted possibilities.

2. Fernandina: This town has had wide publicity as a possible mill location and considerable data have been collected in regard to it. It has the advantage of an excellent harbor, with 24 to 26 feet of water reported. A mill here would naturally draw much of its pulpwood from the adjacent section of Georgia. The nearby holdings in Florida are reported to be rather small and held at high prices. The town shows every evidence of decay and poverty and is on a single rail and motor road, which restricts the area from which wood can thus be drawn.

3. Palatka: This is a small but fairly prosperous town 50 miles south of Jacksonville on the St. Johns River. It has a large cypress mill at present operating and receiving its logs by water, a veneer mill and several wood-working plants, and formerly shipped large quantities of lumber by water. Much of the surrounding country is interspersed with good agricultural lands, producing citrus crops, potatoes, beans, etc., and would offer excellent opportunities for small subsistence homesteads, such as might be contemplated in any rural resettlement project.

The proposed Florida canal would give this town the advantage of deep water, whereas the present draft is reported to be only 12 to 14 feet. The Atlantic Coast Line Railroad runs north and south along the river, with a branch to the westward. Two branches of the Florida East Coast Railroad tap the country to the east of the St. Johns River, and a subsidiary of the Southern Railroad extends northwestward, almost touching the southwest corner of the Osceola National Forest, 75 miles distant. Hard-surface roads generally parallel the railways. The river itself can be used for barge transportation of wood, and thus the tributary country has excellent transportation facilities for the assembling of pulpwood from a wide area and in almost any required quantities.

In the limited time spent on this trip only a general picture of the pulpwood resources could be obtained. Mr. Paxton has listed various properties, many of which he was familiar with and which might come up for further consideration of a pulpwood supply in this locality. There is a very large amount of material at present available for pulpwood, particularly in worked-out turpentine trees, which can be delivered over the time which it takes to acquire and build up a producing forest—a span of probably 10 or 15 years.

We also spent a part of 2 days and drove some 80 miles through the Ocala National Forest, which had been considered in relation to various pulp-mill projects in northeast Florida. The present stand of sand pine prevalent in the central part of this forest presents numerous difficulties in pulpwood utilization. The trees are unusually limby and knotty, affecting both the quality and the cost of preparing the wood. The ground is exceptionally brushy, particularly in the younger stands, all of which will increase the cost of felling, stacking, and hauling the wood, which with the poorer quality of the wood, would mitigate against any substantial utilization of this species at present, when better quality material can be obtained cheaper in the flatwoods country.

The proposed canal skirting the northwest border of the forest will increase its accessibility, however, and the flatwood areas in the new extension of the forest in that section should be able to furnish a limited supply to a mill at Palatka.

As before mentioned, a portion of the Osceola is available to Palatka on a 75-mile rail haul, and reasonable freight rates can probably be obtained on any quantity movement. Thus, the present national forests in the territory can only be counted on for a portion of the mill supply, and additional areas must be obtained. For this, both Mr. Paxton and the writer felt that the country west of the St. Johns River offered better possibilities, all things considered, than the territory east of the river. The areas from Lake City to Starke were particularly impressive, one stand of 60 cords per acre being observed, which from Forest Service measurements has been shown to have had a periodic growth at the height of its productivity of about 4 cords per acre per annum, a most unusual condition. After leaving Starke, the productivity of the pine lands seems to diminish, and finally a large sand ridge country is encountered, which is probably an extension of the similar sandy lands characteristic of the Ocala National Forest. It carries very little pine and must be figured as practically all waste. East of this sand ridge, and extending to the agricultural lands bordering the St. Johns River, is a region of flat woods, some of it apparently of fair stocking and soil conditions but badly in need of protection. It was in this belt that Mr. Paxton, Mr. Woodman, and myself felt that an additional mill supply might be acquired, and from records from the supervisor's office, as well as the regional office, Mr. Paxton has roughly outlined some specific ownerships which might lend themselves to a project like this. However, we felt that it was hardly justifiable to make a detailed study, or even a further preliminary survey, until the mill location had been considered further and found to be suitable. The definite location of the mill site will to a considerable degree influence the choice of the forest areas tributary to it.

While Palatka apparently offers a favorable site, with better than usual transportation by rail, water, and truck, it should be reported upon by a competent paper mill engineer as to the building conditions, water supply, freights inward on fuel, and supplies, and outward on finished products. The nature of the product contemplated, the size of the mill and the annual wood requirements should be known and the site tentatively judged as competitive with other sites before large expenditures are made in forest investigations.

I suggested to Mr. Wilson that he take steps to obtain such information either from some of the manufacturers whom he has in mind, or, if they are not sufficiently interested at this stage to do this, then from some well-recognized consulting paper-mill engineer.

Such a study would bring the industrial features of the projects abreast of the general information on pulpwood resources which from present information may be taken to be reasonably satisfactory. If Palatka holds up as a competitive site and the capacity of the mill is determined, the way is paved for further investigations and a possible acquisition program.

In this respect, the proportion of the annual wood consumption to be drawn from national forest timber will require careful consideration. There are a few progressive turpentine operators who are building up their holdings for a long-time basis—such as Howell, south of the Osceola Forest—whom it might be advantageous to encourage in the production of pulpwood. In addition, there are numerous small farmers and woodlot owners who, perhaps, under State supervision, could cut conservatively and get the needed market for their wood.

If we assume that a mill is economically sound at Palatka and that the ultimate production will be 500 tons daily of pulp or board, requiring approximately 200,000 cords of wood a year, then about 400,000 acres of land will be required to supply it after a 10- or 15-year interval, during which time the forest must be protected and built up.

The proportion of this supply to be furnished by the present and proposed national forests must be determined and an acquisition program outlined to accomplish this.

For a start in this work the industrial report mentioned previously is badly needed and should be made as soon as possible.

If Mr. Wilson is unable to interest his prospects in making such a report at the present time, possibly some agency of the Government, such as the Rural Resettlement Administration, could assist. With such a report in hand and the keen interest of a manufacturer obtained, the forest investigation could go forward and the question of a Government loan tying forest operations to the beneficiary could be taken up.

After leaving Palatka we drove through the Appalachicola National Forest, and I was impressed with the general satisfactory condition of the lands. However, the Gulf coast of Florida is lacking in the railroad- and motor-transportation facilities found at Palatka, agricultural land is poorer and more limited, and the forest may not be so predominatingly pine, and apparently there were no compensating factors for these disadvantages. Also, the Southern Kraft Mill at Panama City dominates the territory to a certain extent, and it is reported that it may be enlarged and thus create a market for the wood from this forest. Of the four general sites visited, Palatka seemed to all of us to be the most attractive from the wood standpoint and the utilization of a portion of the present Ocala and Osceola supplies. If it still holds up under an industrial report, the next steps necessary to assure a satisfactory supply can be considered.

SECTION II

GENERAL ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL CONDITIONS, PALATKA, FLA.

Palatka is located on the west bank of the St. Johns River, 50 miles below Jacksonville, and connected with the east bank by a new highway bridge.

It is a rather well-kept, typical southern town of 6,500 people. The population of Putnam County, in which it is located, is 18,000, and the territory immediately surrounding Palatka is stated to have a population of about 10,000, of whom the greater part are engaged in agriculture

Probably the largest single local industry in Palatka is the Wilson Cyprus Co. mill, which has a capacity of 3,500,000 feet a month. In addition there is a large furniture factory, stave mills, veneer mills, sash and door factory, and a cypress tank factory. Palatka is the center of a considerable naval-stores industry, with one large central still located in East Palatka. These industries are stated to employ approximately 900 men, and there are numerous minor industries, such as foundries, machine shops, garages, etc., employing additional men.

The banks in Palatka are the Palatka Atlantic National Bank, with resources of $1,345,000; the Palatka Building & Loan, with $300,000; and the Palatka Federal Savings & Loan, with $60,000. The town and country are reported to be solvent and recovering somewhat from the depression.

Palatka is on the northern edge of the citrus-producing region, and the country surrounding is well interspersed with more than ordinarily prosperous farms, raising fruit and vegetables, particularly tomatoes, beans, and potatoes. The lands in Putnam, Flagler, St. Johns, Clay, and Marion Counties contain a high percentage of pine lands, with an oak-sand pine ridge lying to the west of the St. Johns River, running generally north and south from the northern end of the Ocala Forest. All of these counties are stated to have large areas of Portsmouth and Bladen fine sand loam, which is one of Florida's best general-purpose agricultural soils. They are particularly suited to raising extra-early Irish potatoes, and the Hastings Potato Growers Association, which handles the greater part of this crop, is considered to be a model cooperative enterprise. According to the last State agricultural census, January 1933, the farm lands in Putnam under agriculture are listed as 43,645 acres, and the annual value of field and truck crops is given at $723,000. Fruits and nuts are valued at $528,000; livestock on hand, $209,000.

The farmers on the better class of soils, who comprise many northerners who have prosperous and attractive-looking farms, have been able to maintain themselves fairly well during the depression, and unemployment has largely affected the industrial workers, the smaller industries and shops, and the poorer farmers. While agriculture is substantial, the forest industries have declined since the earlier days, when a large volume of lumber was produced and shipped by water to northern ports. The five surrounding counties at one time had approximately 6,000 people on relief rolls, and it is stated that many of these were formerly employed in woods operations and are now scattered over the timbered rural sections.

The proposed Florida Canal will make the town of Palatka unique in that it will bring deep-draft vessels into inland Florida, where both pine lands and exceptionally good agricultural soil are to be found in extensive areas. While this general condition will obtain at various places along the canal, pine lands are probably more broken and less productive toward the south, and at no other point along the canal, Jacksonville excepted, are the local transportation facilities as good as at Palatka. As the map indicates, the rivers, lakes, and the canal itself will all offer opportunities for barging pulpwood to a mill. Six railway routes radiate to all points and an excellent system of hard roads generally parallel these and many secondary roads, not shown on the map but suitable for trucks, tap the intervening territory.

In summary, it may be stated that while Palatka is situated in an interior location, if the canal is built, it will eventually have deep-water transportation, and now has far more than ordinary transportation facilities radiating to all sections of the surrounding territory, a forest region interspersed with areas of extra-good agricultural soils.

These features apparently would be attractive to a pulp mill, but a mill study on the location by a competent paper-mill engineer would bring out many of the other economic features in relation to the paper mill. The cost of coal, oil, or chemicals delivered to the plant, the water supply, the capacity, the nature of the product, the cost of production, markets and freight rates to them, are all perhaps more controlling than the question of wood supply. In such preliminary survey the cost of rough wood per cord of 128 cubic feet delivered at a mill in Palatka may be reasonably estimated at $5 net unloaded. Such a figure appears ample enough under today's conditions to cover any important factors or variables likely to be encountered, and still is a figure competitive with other regions.

The advantages to a southern community to be derived from the manufacture of pulp or paper are substantial.

About 1.5 cords of wood, or possibly a little less, are required for each ton of sulphate pulp manufactured from southern pine. The direct labor needed to cut and deliver a cord of pulpwood is about one man-day, including delivery and miscellaneous activity.

A well-planned pulpwood operation offers many benefits, social, economic, and from a forestry point of view. There is a vast amount of worked-out turpentine timber all through the longleaf-slash pine region of the South, with large quantities being added to it every year. At present this material is practically all going to waste, and recovery for pulpwood is an economic saving if home demand would utilize the product advantageously. In addition to such salvage cuttings, there is the possibility of thinning operations from pole stands. Very young stands up to 4 inches would not furnish suitable pulpwood, but the larger-sized trees, 5 to 6 inches and up, would do so, and a market for this product would stimulate the practice of forest thinnings for this class of material.

In this connection it might be well to review a typical pulpwood operation. The trees are felled and cut into lengths, which vary in different sections of the South from 4 to 5 feet. Except in Virginia, or locally elsewhere, the wood is delivered to the mill with the bark on and drummed at the mill, hand peeling not being common practice. Turpentine faces are rejected and the bolts or sticks are piled up in an open, crisscross crib, called a pen. The pen is 6 feet high and usually contains from 20 to 35 sticks, and 5 pens of 4-foot wood give a surprisingly close equivalent to a standard cord of 128 cubic feet. Longer sticks will, of course, yield proportionately greater volume.

In some cases when cut the wood may be yarded or concentrated by horses or mules along some hard road for rehauling by truck, but in the flatwoods in dry seasons the trucks are often driven directly through the open forest and the pens loaded for direct haul to the railroad, or barge, or to the mill itself if distances do not exceed 20 to 30 miles and roads are good.

There are usually no woods improvements or camps needed, the men living at home, going to and from their work on the trucks. Equipment is largely saws, axes, and possibly picks. Piece work is the common practice, and an able-bodied, experienced pulpwood cutter can cut and stack about one pen per hour, at the present wages, 1934, receiving from 15 to 20 cents per pen, or about the same per hour.

Because the work can be done on a unit basis, it offers great flexibility of season, day, and even hours of labor, and provides for all degrees of physical ability and skill possessed by the cutter and fits in very well with the economy of the farm where the farmer who has a little timber or lives within easy access of pulpwood operation can work at odd times. Due to this part-time employment, the total number of men engaged in some periods of the year in producing pulpwood is very large, as many will work at it only a few days a month or a season.

On account of the very simple conditions of operating, in sales of national forest timber, where intensive, closely supervised cuttings are required, it would not be difficult for the Forest Service to actually handle the cord cutting and keep close control of all elements of the work, embodying such silvicultural practices as it desires and selling the pens stacked in the forest ready for the truck at a price that could be readily and definitely established, namely, a small allowance for stumpage and expenses and approximately 1 hour's labor at specified and well-established rates.

The following is a fair but liberal estimate for producing pulpwood today under average conditions in the South. Stumpage and contracted profits are higher than those probably realized under present conditions.

Railroad

Cutting (1.5 cords per day per man)	$1.15
Hauling to railroad and loading	1.60
Freight (30 to 40 miles)	1.15
Stumpage	.75
Contractors' profit and expense	.50
	5.15

Truck wood

Cutting (1.5 cords per day per man)	$1.15
Hauling to mill (10 to 30 miles)	2.40
Stumpage	.75
Contractors' profit and expense	.50
	4.80

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSION

A pulpwood operation in the southern pines will yield approximately a day's work and possibly more in the woods for each cord of wood produced, the equivalent of a day and a half and possibly 2 days of woods work for each ton of pulp, which, with the exception of trucking, is practically all direct hand labor, unskilled, and available both to steady woodcutters who make it their business and to small farmers and landowners who work at it only during the season and hours they find convenient. The mill labor per ton of pulp produced will probably be used about the same as in cutting the pulpwood, but more for the manufacture of board, paper bags, and other more highly fabricated products.

The type of operation makes it particularly adapted to part-time and seasonal work, and the agricultural land and chances of good subsistence homesteads offer opportunities for settlement for the workers in both mill and woods. Further, more pulpwood cuttings are extremely well suited for intensive management and controlled operations on national-forest land.

JULIAN E. ROTHERY,
Senior Forester.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEFAN].

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of Members of the House today to a letter I received from Mr. Guy Cole, of the Emmet Elkhorn Valley Hay Co., Emmet, Nebr., in the county of Holt. Mr. Cole writes that 75 percent of the rye harvested in his county last year is still in farmers' hands. He is familiar with that situation, as his firm handles considerable grain, and the only rye that has been sold has been share rye belonging to nonresidents. To his knowledge, there has not been one car of rye shipped on the Chicago & North Western Railroad from Holt County, and he knows of a good many thousand bushels in farmers' hands that are for sale, the present price of which is 36 cents per bushel. This price, which has not been any higher this season, is below the cost of production. He tells me that a small portion of this will be used for hog feed, as there was very little corn raised, but, owing to the shortage of hogs, there will not be a large amount fed. Rye, you know, is not a suitable feed for any other animal; and thus the farmers in Holt County find themselves in this position—that they have rye for sale which cannot be sold. They have rye to feed to hogs, but they do not have the hogs to which to feed this rye. On the other hand, it may be that the shipments of rye coming into our country from foreign lands may have had a tendency of putting these farmers in my district at a disadvantage, because they must compete with millions of bushels of foreign rye coming into our country from foreign countries.

The thought which comes to my mind today is this: If we are to work toward a program of protecting the American market for the American farmer, how successful shall we be in that program if we are to allow millions of bushels of foreign-produced grain to come into our country at a time when our farmers have the same kind of produce for sale? The duty on rye should be increased.

The principal crops in Holt County are rye and hay, especially hay. That county and its territory has been known for many years as the world's greatest hay shipping point, and I wonder as I glance over the statement giving a comparison of the duty in effect now with those in effect last year over the products entering into the United States what is going to become of the greatest hay-shipping point in the world if the products of that American county are to be dealt off for the products of foreign lands by the reduction of tariff against competitive grains and feeds.

In the case of hay, the old rate was $5 per short ton, and under the new rate this duty has been cut to $3 per short ton, and it puts our hay producers in my district in a condition of having to compete with foreign imported hay, which is given more protection by lowering the duty $2 per ton on same.

With the permission of the House, I wish to include in these statements my answer to the letter which I received from Mr. Cole, of Emmet, Nebr.:

DEAR MR. COLE: I am interested in what you say, that 75 percent of the rye harvested in Holt County last year is still in farmers' hands. Also, I am interested in the fact that you say a good many thousand bushels in farmers' hands are for sale at 36 cents a bushel. Of course, you and I know that 36 cents a bushel is less than the cost of production, and in your territory a small portion of this rye will be used for hog feed, as there was very little corn raised, but owing to the shortage of hogs there will not be a large amount fed. So it stands to reason that rye will be a drug on the market of Holt County farmers. What to do with that rye at this time is difficult to state, in view of the fact that so much rye is coming into the United States from foreign countries.

For your information I note that you are of the belief that there is no duty whatsoever on rye and that it is being sold 15 to 20 cents lower than corn; this, however, is not a fact. There is a duty of 15 cents a bushel, 56 pounds to a bushel, on rye. The reciprocal trade agreement went into effect with Canada on January 1, 1936. But that is beside the point when I give you the following information:

In the 11 months of last year, 1935, January to November, inclusive, 9,641,335 bushels of rye was imported into the United States from foreign countries, which was valued at $4,754,346; this included the rye which came in from Canada. The amount of foreign rye coming into our country in 1934 was 7,622,032 bushels, valued at $3,544,157; and in 1933 the amount of rye coming into the United States from foreign countries was 8,005,796 bushels, valued at $3,874,062.

This perhaps will give you some idea what it means to Nebraska farmers who raise rye and suddenly find themselves confronted with a surplus of rye. To me it appears unsound, and does not make common sense to allow the importation of so many millions of bushels of foreign-produced grain into the United States when our farmers have the same kind of grain for sale and cannot sell. It does look, under these circumstances, that the American market is not being protected for the American farmer.

You may be interested to know that Canada shipped us 338,440 bushels of rye in the 11 months of 1935.

I am well aware of the fact that the two principal crops in Holt County are rye and hay, especially hay.

Now, in the case of hay, Holt County farmers are going to suffer as the result of the reciprocal trade agreement which the administration has made with Canada. The old duty on hay from Canada was $5 per short ton, and under this new treaty the new duty on hay from Canada is $3 per short ton. So you will know that as a result of this trade agreement we have given Canada $2 a ton advantage on hay. I don't know if you are interested in alfalfa seed or timothy seed, but the duty on alfalfa seed was cut from 8 cents a pound to 4 cents, while the duty on timothy seed was cut from 2 cents a pound to 1 cent a pound.

Lowering the duty on farm products from foreign countries at a time when our farmers have the same products to sell would make me believe that it would work a hardship and put our farmers at a disadvantage.

I am asked many questions on how this trade agreement with Canada was brought about. This power was given to the President by the Seventy-third Congress, which voted to the President the power to make such agreements. The power is of such blanket nature that the President can do as he wishes, without having to go before the Senate or the Congress or anyone else. He merely makes these trade agreements by a Presidential proclamation. Over in Canada the Premier of Canada, however, before being allowed to make these agreements, has to go before the Parliament of the people before being given that authority.

Naturally we must endeavor to expand our foreign market for our surplus products, but I feel that if we are to protect the home market for the American farmer we should not open the gates of our country to a flood of foreign-produced products, which, I feel, is being done at this particular time.

To make some showing against this action a group of Members of Congress, to which I belong, are now studying the reciprocal trade agreement in order that we can go before the proper authorities here and present the situation of the Nebraska farmer in its proper light. Among this group are Congressmen from Iowa, Wisconsin, South Dakota, North Dakota, Kansas, and other Middle States. Right now we are confronted with tremendous pressure on the part of the coconut-oil industry, which is endeavoring to flood our country with cheaply produced coconut oil from the Philippine Islands and other foreign lands. This industry has a powerful lobby working here in Washington, and their first move is a program to eliminate the 3-cent excise tax on coconut oil and allow large quantities of it to come into our country from the Philippine Islands free of tax.

When you take into consideration that one-half of oleomargarine is coconut oil, and that the oleomargarine industry turned out more oleomargarine last year than in many previous years, you will get some idea of what the 4,000,000 farmers who milk cows are really up against, or will be up against if their Representatives do not do something toward protecting their interests.

Already there is considerable sentiment against the lowering of the duty on beef from Canada. Cattle weighing 700 pounds or more can come into our country now for 2 cents a pound today, as compared with 3 cents a pound, which was the old rate. The duty on calves weighing 175 pounds, which was 2½ cents a pound, has been lowered to 1½ cents a pound.

From this brief explanation you can realize what a Representative in Congress who represents people who raise grain, feeds, and beef and pork is up against, endeavoring to help solve the problem of his constituents, most of whom derive a living from the farm. I hope this letter explains the various questions which have come to your mind; and should there be anything further that you wish clarified, do not hesitate to write to me.

Very truly yours,

KARL STEFAN,
Member of Congress from Nebraska.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I should indeed be an optimist if I felt that I might add anything to the discussion that has been held over a long period of years on the subject of the tariff. That subject has been a live one in the Congress of the United States since the very beginning of our congressional sessions, when we had the first tariff bill in 1789.

My introduction to tariff legislation commenced very early in the special session under Woodrow Wilson in 1919. In the second session in 1920 we had an emergency tariff bill that was drawn wholly for the benefit of agriculture.

It had a very queer history. It was vetoed by President Wilson after being passed by the House and the Senate. There were 42 Democrats who voted for that bill, including the now distinguished Vice President of the United States.

The gentleman from Texas, Mr. HUDSPETH, an outstanding protectionist and one of the best legislators from Texas, voted for that bill, as did my distinguished colleague and friend, Mr. BLANTON, of Texas. Some years ago I heard the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] make just as forceful a speech for the tariff as he made today in his demand for legislation stripping the Supreme Court of power to invalidate congressional legislation.

But alas, on the first tariff bill, when the roll was called my old friend deserted me and voted "nay."

In connection with that emergency tariff act, the now Vice President of the United States made in the Well of the House, within 6 feet where I am standing, one of the finest tariff speeches ever made beneath this dome, but, unfortunately, you cannot find it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD anywhere. It is lost. The gentleman who at that time was chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, and who has since departed to his reward, suggested that it would be a good idea not to have that speech in the RECORD, and that suggestion was evidently a mandate.

The late Congressman Wurzbach, of Texas, who had the distinction of being not only a good Congressman but the only Republican Representative from Texas, offered to deposit a check with the Speaker, or any other responsible authority, for $500 to any named charity in the city of Washington if the now Vice President would publish that speech in the RECORD which he made in favor of the tariff bill at that time. There were two items protected in that bill that no doubt intrigued the now Vice President when he was a Member of the House. One was the hair of the Angora goat and the other was onions—"nuff sed."

Referring to what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] said a few minutes ago about tariff walls built in foreign countries in retaliation: They were not responsible for the conditions which developed at that time. Let me refer to a report that was made by Dr. Julius Klein in 1932:

> There is scant evidence of any drastic embargo on American wares in foreign markets. In 19 representative countries, all over the world, comprising most of our leading customers, our share in their imports has been exactly 20 percent. Our proportion of the trade in the same markets from 1924 to 1927 averaged 20.7 percent. It certainly would require a considerable amount of deliberate distortion to conjure out of these figures any conclusion as to the alleged devastating reprisals against American wares.

Then there is another. It was an outstanding fact that the imports of our duty-free goods during that period had fallen off by a much greater percentage than our dutiable goods. That was evidence enough that the tariff rates were not the direct cause. The fact is that no country in the world had any more money to buy from us than we had to buy goods from them at that time. The depression was not in the United States alone. It had spread all over the world, and, while the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] says the Hawley-Smoot tariff did not help conditions, I say that it did. If we had not had the law at that time we would have had a greater flood of merchandise than was imposed upon us during this period. It was of such value that the majority leader, who was afterward Speaker of the House, the great Henry T. Rainey, said on this floor, "What can we do? Lower the duties in the Hawley-Smoot bill? No; because we would be immediately confronted with a flood of cheaply made foreign goods in this country", and "H. T." was about as hard-boiled a free trader in his palmy days here that we had in the country.

I want now to say a word about these reciprocal treaties: What is reciprocity from the Republican point of view? I am not so much opposed to it if it is within the limitations prescribed here. I quote Charles Emory Smith, and this quotation is from the report of the minority in 1911 when the reciprocity with Canada was under discussion:

> The principle is axiomatic. Brazil grows coffee and makes no machinery. We make machinery but grow no coffee. She needs fabrics of our factories and forges, and we need the fruits of her tropical soil. We agree to concessions for her coffee and she agrees to concessions for our machinery. That is reciprocity.

Under the system that we have now, where the Secretary of State insists that the unconditional most-favored-nation clause must function in connection with these treaties, is not trading, but is bringing about a gradual horizontal reduction in our tariff rates all through every one of the 15 schedules of the tariff law; and that is what Mr. Hull, the Secretary of State, desires. I sat opposite him for 10 years in the Committee on Ways and Means. I know his viewpoint, and I have no doubt he thinks he has been very liberal in the matter of rates in such agreements as have been entered into.

President McKinley is quoted very often in supporting argument for these reciprocity treaties. This is what President McKinley said in his 1897 inaugural address:

> The end in view always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend, rather, to increase their employment.

That is the kind of reciprocity I stand for. [Applause.] That is the kind of reciprocity I believe the Republican Party stands for.

When Canadian reciprocity was under consideration in 1911, Mr. Broussard, Democratic member of the committee at that time, signed the minority report. This is what he said:

As a Democrat I wish to add to the report—

This is the minority report—that I agree with almost everything urged except that the statement that the bill is un-Republican is not nearly so accurate as the further statement that is also un-Democratic and absolutely un-American. Our peerless leader, Mr. Clark, is in favor of reciprocity with the world. This doctrine is so antagonistical to my views of the proper interpretation of the Constitution that I must protest.

The Constitution provides that revenue bills must originate in the House, and the President shall have the right to veto. The principle of this proposition exacts that the President shall originate revenue bills and that the House shall have the power of the veto.

But under this scheme the House has no power of veto. Origination of the revenues rests entirely with the President, a power delegated to him by the Congress and redelegated by him to the Secretary of State.

This abdication of power is obnoxious to my views, is unpatriotic and illogical. I subscribe to the views of the minority and I feel I do so as a Democrat. Others may think differently, but I am still entitled to my opinion, unbound and unfettered by the action of the Democratic caucus, excused by a rule which I secured by my course in the last Congress, I feel that as a true representative of local self-government and as an advocate of states' rights, my course is orthodox. I am in favor of the minority report and sign it cheerfully with this addition, which I add.

R. F. BROUSSARD.

When the reciprocity hearings were being held in 1911 the same identical arguments were being offered that have been offered in connection with the recent Canadian agreement a quarter of a century later. The speech of former Congressman Humphrey, of Washington, is closely allied to the talks made the other day by the gentleman on this side [Mr. SAUTHOFF] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] in connection with the dairy interests of the country. Then the lumber industry was represented. From the North? No. Eighteen thousand saw and planing mills with more than 500,000 employees in the South Atlantic and Gulf States were represented, protesting against this reciprocity treaty with Canada in regard to the lumber industry. There were dozens of other industries—the dairy industry, the newsprint, and the pulp industry—represented. The hearings are most interesting.

I said a man would be optimistic that would hope to offer anything new on this tariff question. In the discussion of the bill known as the Wilson bill, passed on February 1, 1894, you will find some of the greatest speeches ever made in this Congress. There were some tremendously able men in the Congress at that time. The Committee rose. Under the rule there were 3 hours of debate after the Committee had risen. One hour and a half was assigned and the closing speech for the Republicans was made by Thomas B. Reed of Maine. The next speech was made by the Speaker of the House, Mr. Crisp, who invited Mr. Hatch, of Missouri, to the chair, and he came to the floor and made the closing argument. He was the father of my dearly beloved colleague, Charley Crisp, of Georgia. I hope he is in good health, because he was a credit, not only to the Democratic side of the House but to the whole Congress during his years of service in this House. [Applause.] Those were two masterful closing speeches. I think in that 3-hour discussion nearly everything of merit that could be considered in connection with tariff legislation was presented. The viewpoints were very similar in those days. There was very little difference between what was said then and what is said now in the discussion of this subject. Wages, labor, whether the standard of living was improving or not, as was discussed by the last speaker today.

Mr. Chairman, a constituent wrote to me the other day for a copy of the tariff bill. Of course, I had to tell him that, while I could send him a copy of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill of 1930, it was not at all complete because of rate changes in trade treaties. I have here, inserted in the RECORD the other day by Senator DICKINSON, a list of commodities in connection with which changes have been made, numbering about 600, with the new rates, and the countries to which they apply. I hope that the Congress will supply us, as these trade agreements come along, with a printed supplement about the size of the tariff bill, so that when we send them to our constituents who are interested, they may have some fairly easy way of determining what changes have been made in the present law. As it is, we have a flood of documents from the State Department through which we have to wade in order to get this information.

All we have now is this list attached as a supplement to the Hawley-Smoot bill, which bill has almost lost its identity due to consequent changes under this law. In future generations the tariff law we are working under will be known as the R. H. S. G. O'B. law; not "G. O. P.", but "G. O'B." That is working the alphabet a little overtime, but translated it reads, "Roosevelt-Hull-Sayre-Grady-O'Brien bill." That is the tariff bill that the people of this country are working under now. [Laughter.]

In reference to the O'B let me read you an excerpt from the hearings before the Committee on Finance in the United States Senate, on the reciprocal tariff bill, page 150, when this measure was being discussed.

Senator HASTINGS asked Mr. O'Brien, Chairman of the Tariff Commission, this question:

Senator HASTINGS. Well, is it or not true that the Tariff Commission exercises an independent judgment, or is it, as I think I saw where you stated before the House committee, wholly subject to and under control of the President?

Mr. O'Brien answered:

Senator, the President appoints the Tariff Commissioners. Most men in positions wish to retain them and be reappointed.

The significance of an answer of this type I call to your attention and request your careful consideration of the implication contained therein.

Now, we have the Cuban treaty, and I am going to ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that in connection with my remarks I may have printed a short statement by a very eminent economist in this country. He is one of the best known writers and economists in the United States and has made a very careful analysis of the Cuban trade treaty. I refer to Samuel Crowther, the writer. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to include this short statement and analysis in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THINGS AS THEY ARE—CUBAN TRADE TREATY SCRUTINIZED AS TO DUTY REVENUES AND MARKET PRICES

By Samuel Crowther

The application of elementary bookkeeping to the results of our trade treaty with Cuba brings out a state of facts which ought to be of especial interest at the present time while the Congress is weighing the number of tax straws it will take to break the camel's back. Our own finances are hardly in a shape to warrant considerable foreign donations.

The Cuban treaty is the especial pride of the State and Commerce Departments and has been presented to the country as a perfect example of what diplomatic acumen can do for business. It is a truly perfect example. Secretary Hull has frequently eulogized the treaty and the State Department sent out a release on how pleased is everyone doing business in Cuba. In view of the facts, the Cuban praise seems restrained.

The reason why the Cuban treaty is supposed to be a success is that in 1934 our exports to Cuba increased by 80 percent. This increase is not quite as impressive when expressed as $30,000,000. But even an increase of $20,000,000 is an achievement in these days and the State Department is entitled to all the praise it requests, if it has actually succeeded in disposing of this amount of American goods—at a profit to the Nation.

The reciprocal trade agreements act presupposes a mutuality in the pacts negotiated under it. Our diplomatic and commercial representatives in Washington were presumed to take on the character of horse traders and drive bargains in the best New England tradition. This, of course, means that they were presumed to get the long end of every deal. The act was drawn by the administration, and put through Congress at a time when the New Dealers modestly volunteered to do anything better than it had ever been done before. In that spirit they negotiated a trade agreement with Cuba—an agreement which at once demonstrated its worth by apparently effecting an 80-percent increase in our exports.

Now let us look at the other side of the ledger and discover how much the American people had to dig out of their pockets in order to make a $20,000,000 sale. Neither the State Department nor the Department of Commerce presents any figures on the cost of getting the business. They are concerned only with gross sales and not at all with the cost of making sales. Here is what the new business cost.

The President, by an order effective June 8, 1934, reduced the duty on Cuban raw sugar from 2 cents to 1.5 cents per pound. The trade agreement made a further reduction to .9 cent. In return for this concession, Cuba reduced duties on a number of American products. In 1933 we sold goods to Cuba in the amount of $25,093,000, and in 1934 we sold goods to the amount of $45,355,000, and of this we sold $17,614,000 between September, when the treaty took effect, and the end of the year. A considerable portion of the Cuban exports of sugar, that is, 1,100,000 tons of raw and about 200,000 tons of refined, was held until after the treaty went into effect and paid duty at the new rate. This involved a loss of duties as between the new and the old tariff rates amounting to $32,323,000.

When the treaty went into effect, about half a million tons were in American bonded warehouses and presumably had been bought at world prices. But another factor entered. The A. A. A. in its wisdom had fixed quotas for both domestic and foreign producers of sugar and the Cubans had cannily held off most of their exports to this country not only until after the treaty date but also until the other quotas were exhausted.

Therefore, they found themselves, not at all by accident, with a monopoly right to supply this country with sugar. Their average price to the world during the September–December 1934 period was 0.8 cent per pound f. o. b. Cuba. Their price to the United States under the monopoly given them by the A. A. A. was 1.97 cents per pound f. o. b. Cuba.

They engineered for themselves a present of 1.17 cents per pound, or more than $15,000,000. Adding this donation to the amount lost in duties makes a total of more than $47,000,000.

This is the sum that the American people paid in order to promote an additional gross export business of not over $20,000,000. The profit on the additional export business was probably not in excess of 10 percent. If, however, we assume that the profit was 25 percent, then the American people laid out $47,000,000 in order that a few exports might gain a profit of $5,000,000.

For the present year, the Cuban sugar quota is fixed at 1,658,055 tons. On this amount, at the new duties, we shall lose the sum of $40,726,000. How much more we shall pay for our sugar than the world in general pays Cuba, cannot be known until the year is over. For the first 5 months of this year, Cuban sugar for the American market averaged in cost 1.19 cents above what Cuban sugar for any other market cost.

On this basis, we shall during the present year pay about $43,000,000 more to Cuba for our sugar than we would were it not for the benefits granted by the trade agreement and the A. A. A.

Taking the loss of duties and the additional price of sugar, the new tax laid upon the American people for the privilege of doing business with Cuba in the present year therefore will amount to more than $80,000,000.

This may be Yankee horse trading. But if it is, the Yankees are speaking Spanish.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman has made reference to the true Republican idea of reciprocity, and the policy and the views of the Secretary of State, for whom we all have a high regard personally, and his desire to lower the general tariff rates, and the effect of the so-called favored-nation clause upon these peace treaties.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MAPES. I think it would be helpful if the gentleman would elaborate a little upon the effect of this so-called favored-nation clause in the reduction of all the tariff rates.

Mr. CROWTHER. I think a moment ago I said the result would be a gradual horizontal lowering of nearly all the rates as one by one trade treaties are made with these several countries. These new rates are, of course, not available to Germany under present conditions, but they are available to every other country. I am in favor of treaties with a conditional favored-nation clause.

I know that they have told me at the Department that they have been very careful in their analyses and have not included anything in any one of these trade agreements that another country brings in. While they may have given some attention to that, I have not had time to investigate. I wonder if they have given any consideration as to whether the products on which they are making a trade were produced by child labor in foreign countries. I have heard gentlemen on this side of the House talk most forcefully against child labor, as much against it as anybody in this world. Some of the loudest shouters on this side against child labor have come from States which have refused to ratify an amendment looking to the banishment of child labor. We are against it, of course. We do not want to use child labor in America. If we do away with it in this country, is there any degree of fairness in allowing foreign commodities, manufactured by peon or child labor in Japan and other countries of the world, to come into this country in competition with the products of American workmen?

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the effect of quotas on these various reciprocal programs? In other words, if we permit a certain commodity to come in from Canada, if we give them a certain quota, does this quota apply to other nations as well?

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not think so.

Mr. BOILEAU. Just merely the rate applies to the other nations?

Mr. CROWTHER. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I think I can answer the question.

Mr. CROWTHER. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman if he can answer the question.

Mr. HARLAN. The only three quotas established are those on cream, cattle, and lumber; and the quotas apply to the whole world; that is to say, if some other country beats Canada and gets the cream here first, as soon as the quota is exhausted any further imports are subject to the tariff schedule of 1929.

Mr. CROWTHER. Are we to understand, then, that if two other countries come in, the quota is three times as large as it was?

Mr. HARLAN. No; that is not the fact. There is a definite quota on milk, for example; it is one-half of the amount imported under the tariff of 1922. When this amount has been imported, whether it comes from Canada, New Zealand, the Netherlands, or some other country, the quota is closed and the tariff schedule goes into effect.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Professor Sayre, I understand, is the gentleman who is attending to the mechanics of these treaties. He has written a book entitled "America Must Act." In this book it is said that these trade treaties will have the same effect as if we entered the League of Nations, and that it will do away with war. Will the gentleman briefly address himself to this question?

Mr. CROWTHER. I could not assume that to be the fact. I do not think there is any degree of relativity between the two conditions, none whatever. I do not think anything would develop the war spirit quicker than to have the floodgates opened for foreign commodities which would but add to our industrial stagnation and continuing unemployment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman will remember it was testified before our committee that as a result of some of the trade agreements entered into a year ago we are almost on the same level as Great Britain, which is the lowest tariff country in the world.

Mr. CROWTHER. I would not say that Great Britain is a low-tariff country. Great Britain is a pretty highly protected country, one of the highest protected countries today.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say something about another trade agreement, namely, the Swiss agreement. As you look it over you will see the tremendous reductions that have been made in the tariff rates on watches and clocks, especially watches, coming into this country. If there was only a small percentage of the domestic production that came in competition, there might be some reasonable argument, but 55 percent of all the watches carried in the United States today are made in Switzerland. Why, 18 times a day on the hour all over the United States on the radio you are notified of the time and that it is "Bulova" time, an importing Swiss watch company that notifies us of the time of the day. That is Bulova time over the radio. There were at one time more than 40 different watch companies in this country with several thousand employees making the finest timepieces that were ever made. There was the Studibaker, the Rockford, the Illinois, Howard, and innumerable companies. There are just three companies left, the Elgin, the Hamilton, and the Waltham. Those are the only three companies left out of the forty-odd companies, and half the watches that Americans carry are made in Switzerland. I may be just as "damn dumb" as Henry Hopkins charges us all with being, but I cannot see how there will be any great degree of returning prosperity and employment in this country by making it easier for foreign commodities such as we make ourselves to come in from foreign countries and help to destroy our own industries and rob our workmen of their pay checks.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. A short time ago my colleague from Ohio made the statement on the floor that tariffs had nothing to do with the wage scale of American workers. The record shows that 45 percent of all china and earthenware sold in the United States for domestic consumption today is imported. How long can that last and have the American standard of wages kept where it is today?

Mr. CROWTHER. The pottery industry has been fighting for 20 years to hold 50 percent of the American trade.

I notice one of my Democratic friends on the other side of the aisle had his picture in the paper yesterday. He was advocating "Buy in the United States." I refer to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], who was shown with a great selection of Japanese goods before him. The soundest thing we can do is to develop a program of that kind in order to offset the results of these reciprocal trade agreements. I advocated just that in a speech 16 years ago on the floor of this House. We made an agreement with Canada, yet Canada is plastered from stem to stern with signs "Buy Empire products"; "Buy goods made in the Empire." If you will go to Trafalgar Square in London, you will find there a big electric sign which may be seen for 30 miles which has a device on it reading "Buy British." Those are the people that want us to consider trade treaties with them, give and yield concessions, and at the same time advocate in their own country the purchase of merchandise made by their own people.

In connection with the slogan "Buy goods made in the United States", permit me to refer to an article appearing recently in the press:

BUYING EMPLOYMENT

What everyone wants to see in this country just now is more employment.

We talk about "giving" employment. When a manufacturer takes on hands, when a farmer hires help, when a merchant employs clerks, when a householder provides a man with a job, he is said to "give" employment.

This is all to the good, and the more employment that can be "given" that way the better.

But lots of people think they can't "give" employment, because perhaps they are not in a position to hire anyone to work for them.

If they only realized it, however, they can "give" employment and the way they can do it is by "buying" employment.

Every time a person purchases an article or a service "Made in the U. S. A.", he is "buying" employment and doing his bit to keep his fellow Americans from joining the ranks of the unemployed.

He is not simply buying a hat, or a pair of shoes, or a piece of furniture or food or a railway ticket; he is helping to buy a job for someone as well.

Think of your buying in this double way and you will realize what a service you can render, even with a few cents, when you make sure that your money is being spent on "Made in the U. S. A." commodities.

You are really buying employment—the employment of fellow Americans, whose work is represented in the articles you have purchased.

Therefore, when you buy, see to it that you are buying American employment and thereby keep Americans at work and help to reduce the ranks of the unemployed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not true that most all of the raw material which we ship to Japan is there fabricated and then sent back to this country?

Mr. CROWTHER. There is no question about that, and at prices with which we cannot compete.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then the dollar that we send over there and the 80 cents that we get back enters into the picture very materially?

Mr. CROWTHER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. Chairman, there are two things which have been stopping progress in this country in the last 2 years.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, one is the doubt as to what is going to be done with reference to stabilization of the currency, whether the dollar that was devalued to 59.6 cents is going to stay there, or next year is going to be 49.6 cents. Just as long as that doubt remains in the minds of people money will lie in the banks and the balances will increase, as they are doing, from month to month. The other is the doubt and uncertainty that hangs over hundreds of manufacturers in this country while these various trade agreements are pending. The sessions with reference to these trade agreements are as near star-chamber proceedings as anything can be. Great industries are allowed to submit a brief and are allowed perhaps a 5- or 10-minute oral hearing. But that is all that you can find out about them until the agreement is signed by the Secretary of State. No one ever heard of such procedure in this country before. This doubt and uncertainty hangs over the manufacturers of this country. As a result, they buy their raw materials from hand to mouth and produce from hand to mouth. This is inimical to the future success and prosperity of our country and will not result in renewed employment or a revival of industry under those conditions.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Is the gentleman from New York in favor of the bill which I have pending before the Ways and Means Committee, that wherever the total landed cost of any article imported into the United States is less than the cost of manufacture in this country the importation of the article shall be prohibited?

Mr. CROWTHER. I certainly favor that policy.

Mr. Chairman, the statement that the present tariff is unconscionably high is without foundation or fact. The public is fed up on declarations of this character, which are issued purely as political propaganda. Two-thirds of our imports from foreign countries are admitted free of duty. One-third are on the dutiable list. In the writing of the Hawley-Smoot bill only one-third of the rates on dutiable commodities were changed, and they were not all raised by any means.

In the Republican national platform of 1908 you will find the following:

In all tariff legislation the true principle of protection is best maintained by the imposition of such duties as will equal the difference between cost of production at home and abroad, together with a reasonable profit to American industries.

This last sentence in the statement is the meat in the coconut, and just so long as we base the allocation of rates or their change by the Tariff Commission on a basis of the difference in production costs here and abroad, with no consideration of the "reasonable profit to American industries", then we are departing from our fundamental policy of a protective tariff and subscribing to the doctrine of a competitive tariff.

The newspaper and magazine criticism of the tariff consists largely of the blanket charge that it has been the chief cause of the depression. They offer no substantiating evidence, but merely point to the decrease in imports and exports. Our exports and imports have fallen in almost exact ratio with those of the other nations of the world, due to their lack of purchasing power as well as our own. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include excerpts from certain papers to which I shall refer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a great deal of talk today about subjects we talk on in the House of Representatives. I want to talk in my time on a subject we all talk about the minute we get out of here, and that is the Townsend old-age-pension bill.

I want to preface my remarks with this statement and this challenge: There is not a single Member of this House of Representatives who would vote for the Townsend bill, and I challenge any Member to go on record as favoring the passage of the Townsend bill.

Now, there is a fine distinction that some forty-odd Members of this House are drawing in their own minds when they say they are supporting the Townsend bill. I have a list here, as published in the Townsend Weekly, of Members of Congress purporting to support this measure. The question is, "Are you in favor of the plan?"

This is question no. 1, and 44 Members of the House of Representatives have answered "yes"; and not a single one of them would dare to vote for the Townsend bill if it were brought in on this floor.

The next question is, "Did you vote for the McGroarty bill?"

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the gentleman include in his remarks, in reading the result of that questionnaire, how many Members of the House replied in the negative to that first question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I shall be pleased to put in the chart as given in the paper here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We should like both the affirmative and negative vote.

Mr. FERGUSON. Certainly, as included here.

REPLIES TO QUESTIONNAIRE DELAYED FOR WEEK

Answers to the questionnaires sent by the O. A. R. P., Ltd., to Members of Congress, asking for answers as to their record and attitude toward the Townsend plan are important information for all citizens. The questions were sent solely for the purpose of obtaining this information, to which the people are entitled.

There was no desire to embarrass any Member of Congress. The Townsend headquarters believed that every Member would be glad to have his constituents and the Nation know the facts. Those who support the plan would be eager to spread the information. Those who oppose it should have the same desire to obtain this added strength, if they believe their districts are opposed and that they truly represent them.

So important does the movement consider these answers that it desires to avoid any mistakes and to give every opportunity to all Members to reply. For that reason publication is being delayed this week until a complete report can be checked and rechecked. The report published a week ago must stand until the next issue of the Weekly. In that issue the complete replies of those who have answered will be published and the failure to reply will be recorded.

The last question is, "Will you help pass a bill embodying the plan at the coming session?"

The plan, of course, refers to the Townsend plan.

Now, let us draw the distinction about what is the Townsend plan. If you can show me any literature put out by the Townsend people that does not start out with $200 a month, then I am going to change my position; but on the very same sheet that has the names of these 44 brave Members of Congress is:

The first thing in the Townsend plan, in brief, is payment each month to all men and women of 60 years of age and older of $200 a month.

This is the prime plank in every bit of the literature they put out. Now, I am not talking about what the Members of the Congress think they are supporting, I am talking about what the people that join these Townsend clubs think these Congressmen are standing for. I am talking about the people who are paying monthly dues to an organization that has received standing, that is looked on with favor because 44 Members have said they are for it. The people that join are not thinking about the McGroarty bill when they say they are for it, they are thinking about the Townsend plan as presented in this literature.

Let me read you what the heading of a petition says. This shows what the people think they are signing up for, and there is no question or doubt about what this petition says:

First, the undersigned citizens of the United States request you to introduce in the Congress of the United States at your earliest opportunity the following bills, and use your utmost effort to obtain their passage into law.

First, a bill obligating the Government of the United States to pay every citizen of said Government whose record is free of habitual criminality and who has attained the age of 60 years, a monthly pension of $200 until the end of his or her life, upon the sole condition that he or she retires from all further business or profession for gain and agrees under oath to spend the entire amount of the pension within the confines of the United States during the current month in which it is received.

Second, a bill creating a Nation-wide Federal transaction sales tax, calculated at a rate sufficiently high to produce the revenue necessary to meet the requirements of bill no. 1.

The thing is there in plain language. It is not a question of a pension that would be paid by a 2-percent transaction tax as prorated under the McGroarty bill. That is not what the signers of these petitions are talking about. They are talking about $200 a month and tax enough to pay the bill, and when these Members of the Congress answer, "Yes, we are for the Townsend bill", they are saying, "We are in favor of taxing and taxing and taxing until we raise the amount of $200 a month for every man and woman over 60 years of age", and this is why I say again there is not a Member in this House, man or woman, who would vote for that bill.

It was introduced at the last session by Congressman McGROARTY. Its number is 3977. It carries out the mandate of the Townsend clubs and it is still the bill that their organizers are sponsoring when they present to those people the idea they are going to be assured of receiving $200 a month.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would not the gentleman be willing to make one exception in his statement? Does he not think the introducer of the bill would vote for it?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; Mr. McGROARTY has informed me himself he would not support H. R. 3977 as introduced.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I will.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What proof has the gentleman that anyone on that list answered the question?

Mr. FERGUSON. I have no proof at all, but I think the membership should make it plain to the country that they do not believe in it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is my name on the list?

Mr. FERGUSON. I do not see it; yes, here it is.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to say that I was out of the country when that questionnaire came to my secretary. The gentleman knows and I know that you can go into your district and I can go into mine and find statements in the papers that are not supported by any proof whatever.

Mr. FERGUSON. I know; but Members ought to be glad to have their position made clear.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not try to deny statements in the paper, because it would take up most of my time.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. I know another Member of the House who stated that he did not answer the questionnaire, but he did write a letter in which he said he was in favor of old-age pensions, but he did not answer that questionnaire.

Mr. FERGUSON. I have no doubt that Members have been misquoted, but these people are using these congressional endorsements to further their own aims. It should be brought out before the House and should be investigated. [Applause.]

Mr. BOILEAU. I am in entire sympathy with the gentleman's views.

The time of Mr. FERGUSON having expired, he was yielded 3 minutes more.

Mr. FERGUSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not impugn the motives of the sponsors of old-age pension legislation in this House. I am in favor of old-age pensions, and I voted for the social-security bill.

I do not impugn the motives of the gentleman from California [Mr. McGROARTY] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN], but I do question whether they should stand by and see this organization use congressional names to sponsor a movement that puts out literature which I hold in my hand. For instance, this Townsend plan victory chart says:

Quota investment on monthly basis: Original investment, 10 cents; returns on investment after first few months, $199.90. Life returns on investment after first few months, $200.

Then—

Quota investment on yearly basis: Original investment, $1.20; returns on investment after first year, $2,398.80. Life return on investment after first year, $2,400.

Now, your loss while waiting for Congress to act: If over 60, $200 a month.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. Yes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Has the gentleman been able to determine by any report filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives under the Corrupt Practices Act the amount taken in by the Townsend Clubs in the United States to induce Congress to vote for that plan?

Mr. FERGUSON. No; I do not know of any such information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the gentleman think that document might well be submitted to the Securities Exchange Commission?

Mr. FERGUSON. I should like to have it done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is quite a prospectus of a financial character.

Mr. FERGUSON. To show you what this thing could develop into, of course, taking into consideration that there is no limit on the membership. They claim now to have something around 8,000,000. The big drive now in effect is the quota basis. The quota is 10 cents per person per month. That is $1.20 a year; and if they have 8,000,000, that means $9,600,000. In addition to that, they pay 25 cents a year dues, and then, if you want to belong to the legion, you pay a dollar a month, $12 a year, to carry on the work. I want to show the membership of the House how definitely this plan has been worked out, step by step. First step, how to get the $200 for the 10-cent investment. First step, a positive resolve. Second step, appointment of standing committee to help solve the problem. Third step, outright investment of 10 cents a month; investment of an additional 10 cents or more per month to aid those who cannot invest directly. Third, sell copies of Townsend Weekly; 2 cents profit on each equals 10 cents monthly quota.

If you cannot do that you are to raise the quota by picnics, entertainments, club socials, club whists, club country fairs, club country stores, club dances, club food sales and suppers, club barbecues. The important thing is to have the club quota of 10 cents per member per month paid into the coffers.

To show that this is directly a part of Dr. Townsend's organization I am going to quote from the little pamphlet he puts out entitled "This Way to Victory." I quote from that pamphlet:

We should clearly understand that we cannot enact our plan into law until we succeed in raising enough money through the club quota to finance the organization of our movement in every congressional district. There are 435 congressional districts. I feel sure that when our people fully realize the urgent necessity for every club meeting its quota there will follow an immediate and full-hearted response.

* * * * * * *

Our cause rests solely with the individual. As individuals we can now choose between defeat and victory, poverty and prosperity, economic misery and economic security. Our future happiness hinges on four words, and those four words are—meeting the club quota.

[Applause.]

I am inserting in full the Townsend literature sent to my office, part of which I quoted:

EXHIBIT A

THIS WAY TO VICTORY!

By Dr. Francis E. Townsend

For several months I have been speaking continuously in many parts of the United States and consequently have gained a first-hand knowledge of our relative national strength. In some sections of the country I learned that our plan was the vital question of the day, but in other sections I found that large segments of the population have scarcely heard of the plan. Our movement is strongest on the Pacific coast. We are also well organized in several other States. But the imporant fact should be stressed that there are scores of congressional districts still unorganized. This is alarming.

We should clearly understand that we cannot enact our plan into law until we succeed in raising enough money, through the club quota, to finance the organization of our movement in every congressional district. There are 435 congressional districts. I feel sure that when our people fully realize the urgent necessity for every club meeting its quota, there will follow an immediate and full-hearted response.

Following this response we will be financially able to fully organize every congressional district in the United States. We can then confidently look forward to enacting our plan into law. No one knows better than I how difficult it is to solve the quota problem. Thousands of our people are impoverished. Other thousands, while not impoverished, are unemployed. These facts are undeniable.

But while many of our people are poor in pocketbook they are rich in thought. I therefore refuse to believe that our people cannot, through the power of constructive thought, think of a solution and meet the quota on a 100-percent basis. I refuse to admit, no matter what obstacles loom in the way, that we will fail. We cannot and will not fail—not if we clearly understand that the club quota is the road over which we must pass from the bleak land of economic misery to the verdant land of lasting prosperity.

Apparently there is some misunderstanding about the purposes for which the club quota will be used. In some sections the feeling prevails that it will be used solely for sending organizers into unorganized congressional districts. I want to correct that impression. True, organizers are being sent into all congressional districts as rapidly as quota funds become available, but the expense involved is small in comparison to other organization expenditures.

In building our national organization we are adhering strictly to the basic principles of sound business practice. Our organization, therefore, will not in the least differ from any sound business organization. Perhaps it would clarify this statement to list a few of the major items for which expenditures must constantly be made in building and maintaining an efficient business organization within the Townsend movement. Here are a dozen or so:

Office rent.
Telephone service.
Telegraph service.
Rental of typewriters.
Stenographic hire.
Clerical hire.
Printing, mimeographing, and multigraphing.
Rental of office furniture.
Postage.
Stationery and office supplies.
Legal advice.
Traveling expense.
Auditing expense.
Radio expense.
Utility expense (light).
National headquarters, regional and area managers' supplies.
Freight and express.
Organization expense.
Taxes.
Mass meetings expense.

The above items do not, of course, give a complete picture of expenditures, but they will at least serve to indicate the major purposes for which the quota money shall be used. Whenever national headquarters opens an office it is necessary to rent or buy equipment and to employ the services of people. Office expenses cannot be avoided. They constitute a major share of all expenditures, for office work must precede all field work, and field work must have efficient office direction. If we are to build a strong national organization, we cannot avoid the cost.

A friendly critic recently said to me that if the Townsend organization succeeded in accomplishing its purpose it would be the first large social organization in history that had achieved a major national objective on so small a financial set-up. There is much truth in the remark. I know of no important social, fraternal, or other organization whose dues average as low as 10 cents a month. Do you? What is more, we propose to accomplish something of tremendous significance, but this cannot be said to be the objective of many organizations whose dues run anywhere from $5 a year and upward.

The fact that we propose building a national organization with a quota of 10 cents per member per month, or $1.20 a year, is causing astonishment everywhere. But the Townsend people themselves are not astonished. We ourselves know that thousands of people in our movement cheerfully give their time and energy without thought of compensation. Otherwise we could not possibly organize every congressional district with the ridiculously small sum of 10 cents per club member per month. Ours is mostly a labor of love. And to this labor of love we will add the club quota. Together they will bring victory.

We found some months ago that we could not enact the Townsend plan into law with a financial structure based on 25 cents membership dues. The membership dues average but 2 cents a month, but added to the quota, the monthly average eventually will be 12 cents per member per month. This 12 cents per month, added to the national legion dues, will, we sincerely believe, supply funds ample to carry on the national organization work just as rapidly as the funds reach national headquarters.

I want it clearly understood that we are making splendid progress, but I will not be satisfied until we have organized every congressional district. Nor will I be satisfied unless all congressional districts are organized in time for us to enact our plan into law at the next session of Congress. The issue of the Townsend plan will never be settled on a basis of sentiment. It will be settled solely on a basis of voting strength. If we hold the balance of power when Congress convenes in 1936 we will enact the Townsend plan into law. But if we do not hold the balance of power, we shall fail to receive a majority vote in 1936, just as we failed in the spring of 1935.

I never have and I never will sugar-coat reality, however unpleasant. Facts are facts, and we should face them squarely. The facts are, friends, that we have a long way to travel before we shall reach our goal. We may travel the distance which now lies between us and victory either very slowly or very rapidly. If all clubs meet the quota, then we will cover the distance very rapidly. But if the clubs meet the quota only in part, then we will travel the distance very slowly. But whether we travel rapidly or slowly, we will never give up. Let us each say with General Grant, "I propose to fight it out on this line if it takes all summer."

But it will not take all summer if we quickly divest our minds of all sectionalism and look upon the Townsend organization as a national movement. I have heard some people make the absurd statement that every congressional district should center its activities within its own district and forget about all other districts. People who make this statement are afflicted with sectional disease. They feel, apparently, that the welfare of the country as a whole is immaterial just so long as they themselves are making progress. This is the narrow and selfish view.

The wide and generous view is the national view. A given congressional district, which may now be strongly organized, let us say, in the State of California, should be vitally concerned about whether the congressional district in northeastern Maine, for example, is also strongly organized. Why? Because the Representative from the congressional district in northeastern Maine will by his vote decide for or against our plan. His vote will therefore affect, perhaps vitally, the people of the given congressional district in the State of California. Multiply this example by the 435 congressional districts and you will have the national viewpoint. If all congressional districts which are now well organized will from now on financially assist the congressional districts which are not organized we will make very rapid progress. This financial assistance can be given by meeting the club quota in full.

Again, I repeat, let us take the national view. By all that is sensible we should cease thinking in terms of sectionalism. Sectionalism is ruining America. Sectionalism can ruin us. This was clearly revealed when our plan was offered as a substitute for title I of the President's social security bill. Sectionalism brought defeat. The small size of the affirmative vote our plan then received proved beyond doubt that no matter how strong our sectional organization in a few congressional districts we can never achieve victory until we have a strong national organization in all congressional districts. We cannot get around this blunt fact. The only cure for the disease of sectionalism is to flood the mind with constructive thoughts about our country as a whole. In heaven's name let us first of all be Americans, and, second, Californians or Texans or Rhode Islanders.

I am doing everything in my power to contribute what I can to acquaint the American people with our plan. But at most my contribution is very slight compared with the contributions of the people themselves. I cannot of myself persuade Congress to enact the Townsend plan into law, but the people can and will succeed in accomplishing collectively what I could never accomplish as an individual. Meeting the club quota in full is the collective way of achieving ultimate victory. Collective expression is, of course, voiced by individuals. Every individual in our movement should, therefore, at every club meeting ask his fellow members this serious question: "Has our club met its quota in full?"

Our cause rests solely with the individual. As individuals we can now choose between defeat and victory, poverty and prosperity, economic misery and economic security. Our future happiness hinges on four words. Those four words are: Meeting the club quota.

THANK GOD FOR THE BALLOT!

[State headquarters, Old-Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd. The Townsend plan, a national movement to permanently cure depressions and retire the aged with honor. 133 Powell Street, San Francisco. Office of Edw. J. Margett, State and regional coordinator]

900 POWELL STREET,
San Francisco, Calif., January 20, 1936.

Hon. PHILLIP FERGUSON.

DEAR SIR: I urge you to support the Townsend permanent recovery bill. No argument can be advanced in opposition to this great idea, that will stand the light of analysis. Millions of people have their eyes on Washington, and they are demanding to be heard. And let no statesman feel that his political career will be ruined because he supports the Townsend plan. If you ask me, it will be quite the contrary.

With best wishes,
Yours sincerely,

GEORGE R. BIRD.

TOWNSEND PLAN VICTORY CHART

(Chart based on Townsend plan becoming law of the land)

THE MIRACLE OF 10 CENTS

(In action for annuitants)

Quota investment on monthly basis: Original investment 10 cents. Returns on investment (after first few months) $199.90. Life returns on investment (after first few months), $200.

Quota investment on yearly basis: Original investment, $1.20. Returns on investment (after first year), $2,398.80. Life returns on investment (after first year), $2,400.

THE MIRACLE OF 10 CENTS

(In action for nonannuitants)

A permanent well-paid job or position until 60, then $200 monthly, $2,400 yearly, for life.

The formula: Congress will vote for the Townsend plan when the Townsend Clubs control the vote in the 435 congressional districts of the 48 States.

The problem: The Townsend plan cannot be enacted into law until the Townsend people have built an invincible national organization. An invincible national organization cannot be built without adequate financial resources. Adequate financial resources will be continuously available only when every Townsend Club meets, on the average, its quota of 10 cents per member per month.

The solution:

First step: The positive resolve: We may not at the moment know how to meet the monthly quotas, but we do know that we will meet them.

Second step: Appointment of standing committee to help solve the problem.

Third step:

A. For direct investors:

1. Outright investment of 10 cents per month.
2. Investment of an additional 10 cents or more per month to aid those who cannot invest directly.
3. Sell five copies of Townsend Weekly per month—2 cents profit on each equals 10 cents monthly quota.

B. For indirect investors:

1. Club entertainments.
2. Club socials.
3. Club whists.
4. Club country fairs.
5. Club country stores.
6. Club dances.
7. Club food sales and suppers.
8. Club barbecues.
9. Club picnics.
10. Combination of above.

Your loss while waiting for Congress to act:

If under 60, a permanent, well-paid job or position.

If over 60, $200 monthly; $2,400 yearly.

NOTE.—For detailed explanation of this chart read the pages following.

"The Townsend plan will eventually be enacted into law."

"That is the way to talk, my friend. But I would like you to be more definite. When do you think Congress will enact the Townsend plan into law?"

"Why, I cannot say with any degree of accuracy."

"Then, my friend, I will tell you. I will tell you accurately. Here, take this pencil and sheet of paper. Are you ready to write? Then in bold letters write these words:

" 'The Townsend plan will be enacted into law when the Townsend people have built an invincible national organization.' "

"Is that clear, my friend?"

"Only in part. How long a time will be required to build an invincible national organization?"

"The Townsend people alone can supply the answer to that question."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean, my friend, referring again to the sentence on the paper before you, that the Townsend people can build an invincible national organization only when adequate financial resources become continuously available."

"And when will that be?"

"Adequate financial resources will be continuously available when every Townsend Club meets, on the average, its quota of 10 cents per member per month. Now, my friend, have I made myself clear?"

"Yes; quite clear. I now see that the Townsend people themselves, and not Congress, as I had supposed, shall say when America will begin enjoying the blessings of the Townsend plan."

INVINCIBLE ORGANIZATION IMPERATIVE

"I congratulate you. You see the organization picture clearly and your analysis is therefore sound. In common with all Townsend people who approach this organization problem from the right angle, you know full well that no matter how many millions demand that Congress enact the Townsend plan into law, these millions will get what they demand only after they have formed themselves into an irresistible force, an invincible national organization. Then Congress, far from continuing to oppose the will of the people, will instead plead for the privilege of giving the people what they want—the Townsend plan. That seems logical, does it not? Well, then, we are driven to the inevitable conclusion that the Townsend plan will be enacted into law almost the very day that the Townsend people have achieved an invincible national organization. This conclusion brings us face to face with the method that national headquarters has suggested for raising adequate organization funds, namely, a quota of 10 cents per member per month.

"As you know, national headquarters has formulated a national organization plan, a plan which includes the organization of every congressional district in the United States into Townsend Clubs. And there are 435 congressional districts. A few are now completely organized, perhaps a total of 60. The others are not organized at all, or at best, very poorly. Do you see where our weakness lies? Then let us take another step.

"Let us assume that a majority of the Congressmen now supposedly representing the people do not care whether the Townsend plan is ever enacted into law. And we are, you doubtless will agree, quite correct in making such an assumption. This being true, how, then, shall the Townsend people proceed? How shall they make every Congressman and every Senator eager to vote for the plan? Fortunately, we know, and we know with mathematical exactness, for, thanks to the strategy of Dr. Townsend and Mr. Clements, we were recently given an infallible formula with which to chart our future course, and Congress itself gave the Townsend people this formula.

THE MATHEMATICAL FORMULA

"You remember, of course, that when the Townsend plan was recently offered as a substitute for title I of the President's security bill the plan received but 58 votes. Now, both Dr. Townsend and Mr. Clements knew that, in offering the Townsend plan as a substitute for title I, there was not the slightest chance of the plan receiving a majority vote. All they hoped to accomplish, and what they actually did accomplish, was to demonstrate to the Townsend people that wherever they were strongly organized their Congressmen voted for the plan, and wherever they were weakly organized their Congressmen voted against the plan. This was brilliant strategy and proved indisputably that our leaders knew exactly what they were doing, for, thanks to this strategy, we now possess a mathematical formula which, when used in every congressional district in the United States, will speedily enact the Townsend plan into law. Suppose, now, you write the formula in large letters, then memorize it. Here is the formula:

"In every congressional district where the Townsend people were strongly organized, their Congressmen voted for the Townsend plan. In every congressional district where the Townsend people were weakly organized their Congressmen voted against the Townsend plan."

"Thus, you see, Congress itself, at the instance of our leaders, gave us this mathematical formula. Perhaps if we consider one or two examples, the formula will be even clearer. Let us first review the vote of the Congressmen from the State of California. You remember, do you not, that when the Townsend plan was voted on as a substitute for title I of the security bill, 16 of the 20 Congressmen from California voted for the substitution and 4 voted against it. Now, when the Townsend people in California sought an explanation for this vote, they found, without exception, that in every congressional district where Townsend Clubs were strongly organized their Congressmen voted for the Townsend plan, and that in every congressional district where Townsend Clubs were weakly organized their Congressman voted against the plan. Hence our formula.

"Now, my friends, keeping the formula in mind, let us examine the vote of the 45 Congressmen from the State of New York. How many Representatives from that great State do you suppose voted for our plan? Not one Congressman. Why? Look at the formula! At the time the vote was taken the Townsend Clubs in New York State were so weakly organized that the wishes of the Townsend people in that State could be safely ignored, and every one of their 45 Congressmen accordingly ignored them.

"Examining the vote a little further we find that the Congressmen from Pennsylvania voted 1 for and 33 against; that Arizona, with one Congressman, gave the plan his vote; Colorado, 3 for, 1 against; Idaho, with two Congressmen, gave the plan 2 votes; Michigan, 4 for, 13 against; Ohio, 2 for, 22 against; Washington, 4 for, 2 against; Wisconsin, 5 for, 5 against. But I need not continue. You doubtless saw the complete record of the vote in the Townsend Weekly for June 10, 1935, and this record shows that in every State the formula worked with mathematical precision. We should, therefore, concentrate our attention on the number of votes for, rather than against, the plan. We know with absolute certainty that if strong organization in 58 congressional districts delivered 58 votes for the plan that we are justified in reducing the formula to the following simple terms:

"Congress will vote for the Townsend plan when the Townsend Clubs control the vote in the 435 congressional districts of the 48 States."

"Thank you for your explanation. With the formula in mind, it is now quite clear why national headquarters so strongly emphasizes the great importance, yes, the imperative necessity, for all Townsend Clubs meeting their monthly quotas. It certainly is foolish for us to expect that we shall enjoy the manifold blessings of the Townsend plan unless the Townsend Clubs are successful in meeting their full quotas."

HOW PROBLEM CAN BE SOLVED

"You are quite right, my friend. Meeting the quota in full will solve the problem now confronting our people, but meeting the quota only in part will obviously solve our problem—enacting the Townsend plan into law—only in part. This will be very clear to us if, together, we view the problem through the eyes of national headquarters: There are, as we know, 435 congressional districts in the United States. A few are organized. Most are not. Now, from an exhaustive political and geographical analysis of the entire United States, national headquarters learned that the absolute minimum cost for organizing all unorganized congressional districts would average 10 cents per club member per month. It is obvious, therefore, that if the clubs meet but half their quotas, on the average, the stark conclusion must be that we Townsend people, because we shall be but half organized, can only half persuade Congress to enact the Townsend plan into law. We must be so strongly organized that, if necessary, we can, with an overwhelming majority in each House of Congress, overcome all opposition, however powerful and from whatever quarter."

"But what about the national legion dues which monthly are available for use by national headquarters and the 25 cents yearly membership dues from old and new members? Will not these two funds—the national legion dues and the membership dues—be also available for organization work?"

"Yes. National headquarters will lump these funds and the club quotas to help finance the organization of Townsend clubs in every congressional district of the United States. Thus, we are assured that when these three funds are regularly available the Townsend people will not be long in convincing Congress that the Townsend plan must be enacted into law. But if the club-quota fund and the national-legion fund are not regularly available in sufficient amounts, then the only alternative will be to depend, as heretofore, on the membership dues of 25 cents a year, or 2 cents a month; and if, with only 2 cents a month available from each club member, the Townsend people took nearly a year and a half to organize 58 congressional districts, then a little arithmetic will tell us how many years will elapse before all the congressional districts are organized.

"The crux of the whole matter is this, my friend: National headquarters has supplied the Townsend people with a national organization plan. They have informed us what this plan will cost to finance. They have assured us that the new organization plan will work, and, referring once again to the formula, we know why it will work. Whether our people accept the new organization policy rests wholly with each Townsend Club. In other words, whether the Townsend people want the Townsend plan enacted into law is a matter which they themselves must decide. If they decide they want the Townsend plan—and every club, I sincerely believe, will so decide—then the enactment of the plan into law will cost each member of each club an average of 10 cents per member per month. This, of course, does not take into account the funds which will be available from the 25 cents yearly dues of old and new members nor the $1 monthly dues of national legion members.

THE VICTORIOUS RESOLVE

"I do not think it is so much a question of the clubs not wanting to meet the quotas as it is whether they can meet them. Why, in some clubs I personally know that as little as 20 percent of the membership will be called upon to carry the full burden of the quotas.

"My friend, you are absolutely right. And that is the chief reason this problem of quotas is most serious. In fact, it is the most serious problem now confronting the Townsend people, and one which demands an immediate solution, for upon that solution depends victory for our cause. If we cannot solve the problem; if the Townsend Clubs cannot, on an average, meet their quotas, then, my friend—and I dislike very much to make this statement—we will be a long, long time enacting the Townsend plan into law. I know this thought is not pleasant to contemplate, but I can assure you that in all our loyal coworkers in this valiant fight for economic freedom we have a great host for sympathetic company.

"But cheer up, my friend. Let us look at the quota problem from the positive angle. Let us stop thinking in terms of poverty. We are continuously reminding those who think the Townsend plan is impractical that we are living in an era of abundance. This is true. Why, then, should we, among ourselves, act and talk as if we were still living in an era of scarcity?

"Let us henceforward drop from our vocabularies this glaring inconsistency. Let us herewith make the positive and uncompromising assertion that the quota problem can and will be solved. Let us take the dynamic, courageous view. Let us, you and I, now solemnly pledge ourselves that from this hour we will do everything in our power as Townsend Club members to help meet the quotas on a hundred-percent basis. This is the positive attitude. And from the soil of positive thinking will grow ultimate victory, but from the soil of negative thinking will grow ultimate defeat, for to think positively means victory, but to think negatively means defeat. Let us now, while this sublime resolution is fresh in our minds, etch deeply in our memory this victorious resolve:

"'We may not at the moment know how to meet the monthly quotas, but we do know that we will meet them.'

"Do you agree, my friend? I knew you would. And not necessarily because I voiced the resolve but, rather, because you know that once the Townsend people prepare their minds for positive, constructive thinking they will soon solve the problem of the quotas. Are you agreed?

MOVEMENT'S GREAT ASSET

"Then let us further agree that we will not permit anyone, anywhere, at any time, to discourage us. We will, let us frankly admit, be daily confronted with the fact that many clubs have on their membership rolls people who cannot meet their quotas, but this fact should inspire, not discourage, such clubs, for some of the finest, most loyal men and women in our movement were attracted into our clubs because they desperately need the Townsend plan. These people have brought to our cause a devotion almost divine. These same people, mark you, have not always been in need. Once they had jobs, homes, security, and now that, through no fault of their own, they are stripped of their possessions and earning power, we who still have some income should count it a privilege to fight with them, shoulder to shoulder, in their battle and our battle for economic security.

"I make this prophecy, my friend, that these same people who for years have suffered the horror of leering poverty and the humiliation of sneering charity will be among the people who, as time goes on, will steadfastly and loyally keep intact the powerful national organization which we certainly shall build. These same people, because they long have suffered and because they yet are suffering, are proving, and will continue to prove, a priceless asset to our movement. You and I, who through sheer accident, still hold our jobs will, with others like us, help these people meet their share of the quotas, and thus, in the name of the Master, extend to their parched lips a cup of cold water, give strength to their faltering footsteps, light to their tired eyes, courage to their troubled minds, hope to their desolate hearts. They may now need our help, but let us remember that when voting time comes we surely will need theirs.

"Will you now, my friend, go among the Townsend people with this triumphant message, with these courageous words boldly springing from your lips:

"'We will meet the club quota. At present many of us do not know how or when, but we will meet them. We will, if necessary, appoint men and women to committees, men and women not easily discouraged, who by native temperament approach problems in the positive manner, and ask them to counsel with each other until they have evolved a plan or plans for meeting the monthly quotas.'

"Will you do this, my friend, and will you do it now—today? For when the problem of monthly quotas has been solved, solved by every club, then all Townsend people can say, with uncompromising positiveness, a positiveness having its roots deeply buried in our formula, that the Townsend plan will be enacted into law.

"Again, my friend, will you do this—at once? I knew you would! I knew you would, because you love our cause. You love the Townsend plan. You love everything for which it stands. You love its principles. You love its leaders. You love those noble men and women who are so loyally and unselfishly working for the grandest cause in all human history.

THE MIRACLE OF TEN CENTS

"Just one more request, my friend. Will you, when you go among our people, make clear to everyone that the quota of 10 cents per member per month is not so much a contribution as an investment? Explain to them the Miracle of Ten Cents. Explain to them that for the 10 cents they monthly invest in the movement they will, when the Townsend plan has been enacted into law, receive as their positive reward 2,000 times 10 cents every month for as long as they shall live. This is the Miracle of Ten Cents. Explain to them also that while they are awaiting for their annuity, awaiting for the plan to be enacted into law, they are losing money at the rate of $200 per month—minus the quota investment. If another year passes before the Townsend plan is enacted into law, then every potential beneficiary of the Townsend plan will have lost, after deducting 1 year's quota, or $1.20, a total of $2,398.80. Thus it will be seen that an investment of 10 cents monthly will save money for those now eligible to an annuity at the rate of $199.90 per month, or $2,398.80 per year. The monthly quota is therefore an investment which will yield returns (deducting total quota contributions) at the rate of $200 per month for life. This is the Miracle of Ten Cents. This is the Townsend plan in action. Our formula cannot and will not fail us.

"And after you have appeared before all the people in our movement over 60, then go among those who are younger and explain to them that the formula and the Miracle of Ten Cents will bring to them in return for their investment of 10 cents every 30 days good jobs or positions until they reach 60, and then they will monthly receive 2,000 times 10 cents throughout their sunset years.

"Your hand, my friend—the hand of loyalty, the hand of faith and trust, the hand of courage. Go forth now with this message—the message of the formula, the problem, the solution, and the Miracle of Ten Cents. Take the message into every Townsend Club and to every Townsend Club member and our people will then be inspired to press bravely on. Press on until their lives shall at last be secure. Press on until their beloved Townsend plan shall have reached its goal of economic freedom triumphantly victorious."

Ernest G. Albright, State area manager, Townsend plan, 210–212 Petroleum Building, Oklahoma City.

When this petition is filled, return to national headquarters, 201 Southern Building, Washington, D. C.

Do not pay to sign this petition.

To the Honorable Phil Ferguson, Eighth District, State of Oklahoma:

The undersigned citizens of the United States request you to introduce in the Congress of the United States at your earliest opportunity the following bills and use your utmost effort to obtain their passage into law:

First: A bill obligating the Government of the United States to pay every citizen of said Government whose record is free of habitual criminality and who has attained the age of 60 years a monthly pension of $200 until the end of his or her life, upon the sole conditions that he or she retires from all further business or profession for gain and agrees, under oath, to spend the entire amount of the pension within the confines of the United States during the current month in which it is received.

Second: A bill creating a Nation-wide Federal transaction sales tax calculated at a rate sufficiently high to produce the revenue necessary to meet the requirements of bill no. 1.

It is obvious that the passage of these acts and the beginning of their operation will discharge the Nation's obligation to a class of her citizens deserving this reward for past services and at the same time place immediate buying power in the hands of the general public, thus stimulating every avenue of commerce and trade. A quick cure for this depression and a sure prevention of recurring ones.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, unemployment is the greatest problem before the American people today. Most of our other troubles would disappear if we could put to work the more than 10,000,000 people unable to get a job. There can be no prosperity to anyone in America until these people are put to work at good wages.

Unfortunately the Roosevelt tariff policies prevent a great many of our people from finding employment both on the farm and in the factory. The farmer lately is distressed through the reciprocal treaties which are opening wider the home market for the farmers of foreign countries. The factory worker for 3 years has suffered through the unwise policies which have permitted the product of the cheap labor of the Orient to be sold in increasing quantities in the United States. Men and women walk the streets begging for a job while foreign goods pour into this country like water passing through a sieve.

The latest figures of textile imports issued by the Department of Commerce tell an illuminating story as to the extent the textile worker has lost employment through its being transferred to foreign factories.

In the 11 months of 1934 there were imported into the United States 37,180,000 square yards of cotton cloth, divided into unbleached goods, 3,633,000; bleached, 17,900,000 square yards; printed, dyed, or colored, 15,647,000. In the same 11 months of 1935 we find 58,764,000 square yards, divided into unbleached goods, 3,019,000 square yards; bleached, 35,566,000 square yards; printed, dyed, or colored, 20,179,000 square yards.

The keenest competitor, of course, is Japan, the clever industrial nation of the Orient. In the first 11 months of 1934 Japan sent 5,077,000 square yards of cotton goods into the country, divided into 4,049,000 bleached goods, and 1,028,000 printed, dyed, or colored. In the entire year it sent us 7,287,000 square yards of cotton goods. Now compare the imports of 1935. The first 11 months of this year we find 28,220,000 square yards of bleached goods and 5,763,000 printed, dyed, or colored, which makes a grand total of 33,983,000 square yards against 5,077,000 in the same period of the previous year. Think of what this means; an increase of nearly 700 percent. How can there be any hope of permanent prosperity in the cotton industry with such competition constantly growing? Is there any wonder the textile worker is discouraged?

The President has had his attention forcibly called to the textile-industry plight. He appointed a special committee of Cabinet officers to study the same. All the industry has secured is so-called sympathetic consideration. The Supreme Court knocked out the processing tax while they were still deliberating. And it is even now proposed by some in the administration to enact legislation which would enable the Government to retain this money unlawfully collected.

Someone may say the administration reached an agreement with Japan concerning imports. Well, the answer is that any such agreement has not given the American textile industry what it merits.

An agreement was made concerning the Philippine Islands in which we were to share evenly the trade of that country with Japan. Nothing was done about the goods which leaked in from Japan through China. But an agreement was reached whereby the American textile industry would perhaps be allowed 50 percent instead of the 75 percent it had enjoyed before the advent of the Roosevelt administration.

Think of it. Japan and America reaching an agreement for an equal division of the trade of a country which in the past has come to the United States and which was and still is a protectorate of the United States. Can you imagine Japan reaching an agreement with the United States whereby we would enjoy half of the trade of Manchukuo, which has become a Japanese dependency? Oh, no. There would be no such triumph as that for our State Department. We make treaties when we give up and prove we are "good neighbors", although it brings starvation to some of our own people. Let us have another diplomatic triumph such as we have reached with Japan and it will not be the red flag of Moscow that will be flying over the factories of America, but it will be the red flag of the auctioneer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Has the gentleman taken the time to reduce that yardage to bales of cotton, and can the gentleman tell us how many bales of cotton these imported goods would represent?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No; I have not.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. Has the gentleman considered the fact that our cutting off of imports of coconut oil from the Philippine Islands by the tariff act cut off our exports to the islands, so that Japan was driving us out of the Philippine market, and when we got half of the trade we made a good bargain, because we could not buy anything from the Philippines, and therefore we could not sell them anything?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is not correct. The United States is one of the best customers of the Philippine Islands. The Philippines must send their goods to this market if they are to live. If there ever comes a time when the United States market is barred to the Philippine Islands, it will mean the destruction of those islands. Now it is said that our imports are only an insignificant part of the textile trade. I want to deny that. Some of these items which are being brought from Japan constitute 35 or 40 percent of all that type of goods sold in the United States. There are a hundred other industries facing this competition just as much as the textile industry, but the Roosevelt administration will not do a single thing. It is willing to give a dole to a part of our people but denies them the chance to live as an American through good wages earned in his own occupation. The administration has failed to do that which is most essential if we are to ever bring back better days. They have failed to protect the home market for the worker and the farmer alike. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. AYERS].

Mr. AYERS. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss foreign markets nor foreign goods, but I shall confine my remarks this afternoon to domestic agriculture and markets for it. I am for American products for America, and I shall never yield to a program that will "sell America short."

Mr. Chairman, I shall discuss land utilization from a national viewpoint.

The prejudice which sectionally divides American agriculture would not exist if it were generally recognized that each section is entitled to its agriculture as a balancing factor in secure living and general progress for the entire Nation. With that statement as my subject, Mr. Chairman, I propose to discuss the necessity of a national land policy. First, I invite consideration by the Members of Congress who represent the large city districts and the industrial districts; and, second, the Members representing agricultural districts which do not need irrigation. I particularly invite consideration by my colleagues from these two classes of districts for I expect to show that irrigation and reclamation is not only necessary in its own section but that it is also necessary and beneficial to the entire Nation.

There should not have been, and never should be again, sectional prejudice in the development of American agriculture. This can be accomplished by adopting a national land policy whereby each section of the country shall be entitled to develop agriculture in the manner that controlling climatic and natural conditions necessitate. In some sections drainage is necessary. In other sections irrigation is necessary. In other sections, such as the lower Mississippi Valley, flood control is the problem, and diking and leveeing is necessary to prevent flood waters from destroying some of the richest lands in all this country.

In still other sections a continuous use of artificial fertilization is necessary. Because of the necessity for these special things in particular sections, should any section say to another that its death knell should be sounded? I say no, but that is just what is going on and it will continue to go on until a national land policy is adopted.

The people as a whole and the Congress must come to realize that no agricultural section can stand entirely by itself. Each section depends upon other sections; none of them are independent within themselves and none of them are in conflict with others in production. It is necessary for each to use the products of the other, and then, in the end, it is necessary for the cities and industrial centers to use the products of all sections.

NO SECTIONAL CONFLICT IN AGRICULTURE PRODUCTION

The wheat farmers of the upland plains section are not in conflict with the farmers who operate under irrigation. High protein flour wheat is not grown under irrigation, for wheat will not develop protein content if irrigated, hence irrigation is not in conflict with wheat production. Products which thrive abundantly under irrigation do not do well on the upland plains. So these two sections are not in conflict. Neither the wheat farmer nor the irrigation farmer is in conflict with the corn-hog farmer. And none of the last three farmers are in conflict with the cotton grower or the tobacco raiser. In turn, the last two are not in conflict with each other. The dairy farmers are not in conflict with any of their agricultural brethren and neither do they interfere with the programs of others. Quite the contrary is true—they all help each other.

Then let us take up the livestock farmers and ranchers—the cattlemen and sheepmen of the West. They do not conflict with any other agricultural section. As a matter of fact, each agricultural pursuit is necessary to make others successful and all are necessary for the success of the nonagricultural people and the nonagricultural industries of the Nation.

NATIONAL LAND POLICY

All these agricultural pursuits, so far as the Government is concerned, should be coordinated under one head as a national land policy. Call it what you may—that is immaterial—but getting coordinated under one administrative head for the benefit of all is imperative. We have land-use setups under so many heads that one gets dizzy trying to follow them. First and foremost, we have the Agriculture Department proper. This is where I personally believe all land-use agencies, except that of national parks and mining, should be placed, for, primarily, the lands belong to agricultural pursuits. Then we have the General Land Office in the Interior Department. It has jurisdiction over the public domain, except that which is administered by the Forestry Bureau, under the Agriculture Department, and we have the Department of Grazing, which has recently been set up in the Interior Department.

In the General Land Office, the Forestry Bureau, and the Department of Grazing we have the Government owning and administering more than 50 percent of all the lands in the public-lands States. Continuing with public lands, we have the National Park Service and the Bureau of Mines, which are the only land-use services having any excuse for complete separate existence.

Under subheads, agencies, and bureaus, and as independent organizations, we have the Soil Conservation Service, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Resettlement Administration, which is divided into at least three sections; the Farm Credit Administration; the Federal Surplus Relief Corporation, the Emergency Conservation Corps, the Mississippi River Commission; and other flood-control set-ups. Then there are others which I do not at this instant recall. Now, Mr. Chairman, with a properly laid out, established, and coordinated national land policy, many of these agencies and subagencies, bureaus, and commissions could be eliminated—maybe that is the reason a national land policy has not heretofore been established.

At the Salt Lake meeting last fall, the National Reclamation Association went on record for a national land policy. That prompts a discussion of the place irrigation and reclamation has taken in the agriculture picture of the Nation.

In 1902, at the request of President Theodore Roosevelt, Congress passed a law recognizing the Government's responsibility as a majority landowner in the public-land States by setting up a revolving fund in aid of reclamation. The fund is derived from 52 percent of the proceeds from the sales of public lands and from oil, gas, and other leases and royalties. The balance goes into the National Treasury.

To demonstrate that this is truly a workable and successful revolving fund, I shall briefly give some facts concerning it: The total amount received by reclamation since this fund was created in 1902 is $294,729,249. These receipts came from land sales, oil and gas leases, and royalties, the sale of water and power, and other sources provided by the act, together with $25,000,000 from the United States Treasury to be repaid.

To build projects, contracts were entered into with districts and progressively modified so that today settlers pledge themselves to repay in 40 years the full amount advanced by the Government in building the projects. At the end of 1935, $277,046,024 had been spent from the reclamation fund and $71,600,000 had been repaid by the settlers. These repayments were $43,000,000 on construction charges and $28,600,000 on operation and maintenance.

From the sale of electric energy and water, $33,500,000 has come into the fund.

There are now over 42,000 farms in operation on reclamation projects, and 227 cities and towns have been built on the projects. The annual crop value is $100,000,000, and the assessed valuation that has been created totals two and one-half billion dollars. This is a business enterprise having an assessed value of two and one-half billions back of it. It owes only $15,000,000, for ten of the twenty-five million owed the Treasury has been repaid, and at the end of business yesterday it had a cash balance on hand amounting to $7,683,224.41.

Who can say that this is not a successful and solvent revolving fund depending upon its own resources?

I have heard the cry of subsidy applied to the Reclamation Service and the statement that the settlers on these projects were subsidized by the Government Treasury. That cry and those statements come from lack of knowledge.

Lack of knowledge on that subject has prompted statements on the floor of this Chamber to the extent that the Fort Peck in Montana and the Grand Coulee in Washington are projects which are being built by the Bureau of Reclamation, when, as a matter of fact, both of these projects are public-works projects. The funds for building them do not come from the reclamation fund at all. They are both national projects and neither of them is charged to any State or States. The funds for building them are from time to time allotted by the President out of P. W. A. funds.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is making a very interesting speech and I dislike to interrupt him. The gentleman just referred to the Grand Coulee proposition and the Fort Peck proposition. What does the gentleman desire? Is it reclamation or power or what?

Mr. AYERS. They are power and water conservation projects which are being built by the Public Works Administration.

Mr. CULKIN. In other words, they are not reclamation?

Mr. AYERS. They are not reclamation. Fort Peck, for instance, is the largest project of its kind that has ever been undertaken in this country. It is a project to control the flood flow of the Missouri River and to deepen the channel for transportation below the dam on down to where the river actually becomes navigable.

Mr. CULKIN. But it has some small amount of land development phases, and the total disbursement on that is about $144,000,000.

Mr. AYERS. Does the gentleman mean on the Fort Peck proposition?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes; according to the estimates of the engineers.

Mr. AYERS. I think the cost is estimated at something like $100,000,000.

Mr. CULKIN. What I particularly wished to inquire of the gentleman was whether he said the Grand Coulee project is not reclamation?

Mr. AYERS. The Grand Coulee will have reclamation by the use of surplus water after the flood control and power elements are taken care of; however, it is not primarily a reclamation project, it is a P. W. A. project and not charged to the reclamation fund which I am discussing.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, I do not understand that. In the original break-down of the P. W. A. the Grand Coulee was called "power." Of course there is no one up there to sell the power to except coyotes and jack rabbits.

Mr. AYERS. They will transmit the power by wire on to Portland, Seattle, and other coast cities.

Mr. CULKIN. But they are amply supplied with power now and they have the utilities thoroughly in hand.

I am wondering if the gentleman has inquired closely enough of anybody in any of the departments to know whether the present dam with an elevation of 177 feet means reclamation or power?

Mr. AYERS. It means power and water conservation to begin with. If there is water left over for irrigation of the vast arid areas there, then it will be applied to irrigation and reclamation. But the initial charge was, and the original appropriation was, not for reclamation and irrigation; and the Reclamation Department had nothing to do with it. But as reclamation comes into it, just to that extent will it be self-liquidating.

Mr. CULKIN. Then the gentleman disclaims that it is a part of the reclamation program?

Mr. AYERS. It is not a part of the reclamation program.

Mr. CULKIN. If the gentleman will permit a further question—I am very sorry to interrupt him, because he is making an excellent speech—does not the gentleman believe, and do not reclamationists and people familiar with the subject believe, the advent of this 1,200,000 acres into agricultural production will in fact prejudice everybody who is now on irrigated land?

Mr. AYERS. No; and I think I can show the gentleman that it will not. We do not produce anything in these irrigation and reclamation projects that competes with other agricultural States.

Mr. CULKIN. I disagree with the gentleman, but I am sure the gentleman will almost convince me.

Mr. AYERS. My good friend from New York [Mr. CULKIN] and I do not always agree on these irrigation and reclamation questions, but I respect his rights to his own opinions. I know that he is a reasonable man and open to honest and fair argument, and that is one reason I am discussing these matters today. I am trying to inform those Members of Congress not familiar with these conditions, and to help them get a better picture of irrigation and reclamation.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the gentleman, I think we do agree on all normal and needed reclamation.

Mr. AYERS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. CULKIN. I am not going to be crowded out of that position.

Mr. AYERS. I would not in the slightest degree attempt to crowd the gentleman out of that position. It is my position also. Now, Mr. Chairman, I must refuse to yield further, my time is limited, and I must hasten on.

According to the 1930 census, the people on these projects were customers to eastern manufacturers to the extent of $120,000,000 annually. This required 95,000 railroad cars for transporting from manufacturers to consumers on the projects. This in itself is at least some little help to the eastern manufacturer.

These large figures demonstrate a singularly successful enterprise, yet it is a fact that reclamation projects represent less than one-half of 1 percent of the Nation's cultivated land. In other words, of every 100 acres cultivated in this country, less than one-half of 1 acre is under reclamation. All the products of all the reclamation projects represent only three-fourths of 1 percent of the total annual value of American agricultural products. None of the irrigated products come into competition with products of other sections, nor do they, nor have they heretofore contributed to the agricultural surpluses from which we have suffered.

Let us see what is grown on the projects. The greatest area is confined to growing food for livestock. This is grown for winter use to balance summer pasture and range for the beef-cattle grower and the sheepman. It also goes to the dairy farmers of other sections where sufficient feed is not grown and also supplies livestock feed to the great livestock terminal markets of the country. This crop is not in competition with any other crop, and it has never suffered from a surplus. Sugar beets probably consume the next largest acreage under reclamation. Continental United States produces only about 27 percent of the sugar it consumes, so we can stand considerable expansion in sugar-beet production. Then, with the exception of fruits, potatoes, cantaloupes, and celery, the major portion of the reclamation produce is consumed locally. As for their fruits, potatoes, cantaloups, and celery, they are all bringing a ready premium in Eastern city markets. Of their kind they are the choice products of the Nation and compete with no other, because their like is not grown elsewhere.

If everyone will take off their glasses which have been smoked with prejudice and look fairly at reclamation, I am sure that all opposition will melt before the heat of the facts. A fair consideration of the facts reveal a magnificent accomplishment for human benefit and progress, not only in the areas embraced in the projects but to all our country.

SETTLERS AND RECLAMATION AGENCIES AGREE

A high standard of honor and responsibility has at all times been maintained in the contractual relationship between the reclamation settler and the Government. In actual emergencies, brought about by economic depressions or contingencies unforeseen and beyond control, the administrative divisions of the Government have dealt equitably and justly with the settlers. Moratoriums on construction charges and on operation and maintenance have been granted. Repudiation on the part of the settler has been at a minimum—practically nil.

Understand, Mr. Chairman, the moratorium granted to the settlers on these projects are not cancelations. They are not like the moratoriums on the debts due us by foreign countries. And understand also, Mr. Chairman, that all the security in these cases is there and getting better with each year because of additional improvements and developments. It is not like the debt owed the Government by the Dawes banks, where the security expired by a manipulated reorganization into other banks. The settlers do not do business that way—they expect to pay their debts and they leave their property intact as security therefor.

Mr. Chairman, a planned land development under a national policy is indeed important to all the Nation. Under such a policy, the proper use of all land can be encouraged and ultimately brought about by the voluntary action of those concerned.

LAND MUST BE PUT TO PROPER USE

Out in the public-lands States, millions of acres of land which was never designed by nature for any other use than pasture and grazing has been taken up by homesteaders who have energetically tried to farm it. They cannot do it. They cannot make a go of it. The land was not made for that purpose. They have tried in good faith. They have lost their investment and many years of toil. Now the error of working against nature has been recognized by them. The Government has recognized it too and has admitted its part in the error. It has started to correct it, but I am afraid that by tying too many agencies together it has made another mistake. I hope it will recognize this one before it is too late.

SUBMARGINAL LAND PURCHASES RETARDED

A program was started some year and a half ago whereby the Government was to buy these nonagricultural lands that had come into private hands under the mistaken idea that they were agricultural in nature. The program started all right and met with hearty approval by the landowners. They freely optioned their lands to the Government and made arrangements for resettlement. The options ran out, and upon governmental request were renewed, but to date very little land has been purchased—very little, indeed, according to the amount that has been optioned and designated by the Government as submarginal and not fit for successful farming. The settler is disappointed and feels that his Government has not exactly kept faith. The program has operated under two or three different names, and now it is working in a trebled or quadrupled capacity. It has the buying of the so-called submarginal lands, the rural resettlement, the rural rehabilitation, and the suburban resettlement in its hands.

The last one—the suburban resettlement—has all but wiped out the other three, and if the present program keeps up it will entirely do so in the near future.

Suburban resettlement has no business in the agriculture picture. It is a city and industrial center resettlement. It has been attached to agricultural resettlement and to the land-policy program and developed a case where the cities and industrial centers have again taken the show.

I have no complaint to find with suburban resettlement in itself. I am sure it is a magnificent thing if prosecuted properly, but it belongs to the Labor Department or the Commerce Department. Anyway, it belongs to some department other than the Agriculture Department. It has no relation to agriculture, and it does not deal with agricultural problems. Apartment houses for industrial workers, built adjacent to cities is not an agricultural problem. Yet it has been tied to the agricultural resettlement program and has retarded it to at least one-sixth of that originally intended and started. Mr. Chairman, if suburban resettlement is not divorced from rural resettlement and from submarginal-land purchasing, it is going to kill the latter two just as sure as the sun rises in the east. By killing them, the proposition of rural—agricultural—resettlement goes with them. A program has been started in the West for a general reclamation of higher class land upon which to resettle the present occupants of the submarginal lands. In many instances, options for this purpose have been taken, and they are dying with the submarginal-land options.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Has the gentleman placed in his remarks the fact that there is less than 2 percent delinquency on reclamation projects in the United States today?

Mr. AYERS. I thank the gentleman from Colorado for the contribution. The gentleman is correct. Delinquency is less than 2 percent; as a matter of fact, only slightly over 1 percent.

Mr. Chairman, you may wonder why I am tying these matters of suburban resettlement to an argument for a national land policy. That is easy. If we had a national land policy set up and operating, I feel sure that the suburban resettlement program would not be assigned to it, for they have no relation. Land resettlement belongs to agriculture, and suburban resettlement belongs to the cities and industrial centers. But assume that the ill-advised might come to pass and that by some stretch of authority or inadvertence, suburban resettlement should be assigned to the national land-policy set-up; it would not steal the whole show to the detriment of proper land utilization as it has done in the instant case. It was the last thing to be added to the present land-policy program, but in a short time it was playing first fiddle, and now it is a case of the tail wagging the dog. I say again that if these authorities are not divorced, rural resettlement—agricultural resettlement, if you please—and the submarginal land purchasing will die an untimely death.

CONSOLIDATION OF LAND-USE AGENCIES ADVISABLE

Mr. Chairman, a national land policy, consolidating the General Land Office, the Forestry Bureau, the Department of Grazing, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Biological Survey, the Soil Conservation Service, the Resettlement Administration, but eliminating therefrom the Suburban Resettlement Division, the emergency conservation work, and the flood-control set-ups, would be the greatest step forward that the Government could take toward a properly balanced land-use program.

In practically every case, one hand would wash the other. For instance, reclamation, while embracing less than one-half of 1 percent of the agricultural lands in the Nation, is spread over one-third of the territory of the United States, and its projects are usually well up on the streams. Its impounding and use of the streams reacts to the aid of flood control farther down where the Government is spending millions for that purpose. Waterfowl refuges, established and built up by the Biological Survey, would have like effect. The Biological Survey would operate more successfully if associated so that it could work more freely with the General Land Office and the Division of Grazing. The Bureau of Reclamation and the Forest Department are so closely related in their many propositions of conservation that they should be directly associated; the soil conservation dovetails into both of them, and they, all working together, would go a long way in eliminating the flood condition farther down the streams.

A national land policy would eliminate lands from agriculture that cannot be farmed at a profit, and it would encourage their use for other, but remunerative, purposes. It would work out an economic feasibility for all land use which would be freely and gladly adopted by all land users. Most of all, it would eliminate sectional prejudice which now has American agriculture fighting itself. And last but not least, it would put reclamation in its proper place as a great Nation-wide development and conservation enterprise in absolute harmony with sound business principles. [Applause.] To that end I am preparing a bill, and when it comes before this body I hope that sectional prejudice will be laid aside and that it be considered on its merits. [Applause.]

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYERS. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. Could the gentleman express in dollars what savings would be effected if these consolidations were made?

Mr. AYERS. I am very sorry, I cannot. I may say to the gentleman from Ohio that I am working on that proposition now in the departments, and it is my purpose later to introduce a bill for the purpose of consolidating these departments. Then I shall be in position to furnish the facts and figures.

Mr. FIESINGER. People understand such references better when the result is expressed in dollars and cents.

Mr. AYERS. I realize that is so as to manpower saving, but that is only a drop in the bucket as to the real saving.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on the matter of consolidation?

Mr. AYERS. If I have any time left I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, my friend on the Public Lands Committee with me. I feel that he is in sympathy with my ideas on this important subject.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not think the gentleman wants the record to close with the thought that the savings in administration will be the only saving; there is natural conservation.

Mr. AYERS. Yes; the gentleman is absolutely right. The saving to the country as a whole in the actual conservation effected by this plan would be enormous, not only so far as irrigation, reclamation, and flood control are concerned, but all the way through the entire agricultural program. The great saving is the establishment of a proper land use, through a national land policy, reaching all classes of land. [Applause.]

A national land policy would help balance each agricultural section with all other sections. It would get the land into proper use and that alone would go a long way toward balancing production and eliminating soil erosion, which would be a saving so great that it is impossible of measurement in money.

The greatest of all breeders of erosion is the plowing of land which was designed by nature to remain in sod. The dust storm that blew over the Capital here in May of 1934 carried the topsoil from millions of acres of plowed land in western States that never should have been plowed. Some of it dropped in places where it was washed away with the first rain and the balance of it went on into the Atlantic. A study of the lands affected by that dust storm estimates that 300,000,000 tons of topsoil were blown away. The study also estimates that 400,000,000 tons of soil go into the Gulf of Mexico each year through the Mississippi River. A report of this study was transmitted to the President on December 19, 1935, by the National Resources Committee, and you will find these estimates on page 2 of the report.

The report contains much other valuable information bearing on the subject of land use, but which time will not permit me to give you now. However, the report shows conclusively the advisability of a national land policy leading to a proper land use in this country. Right here let me say to my interested colleagues from Ohio [Mr. FIESINGER] and from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] that in the fields is where the great saving will be made. Permit me to say further that it is such a great saving that it is impossible to measure it in dollars and cents. The saving is so great that our success as an agricultural nation depends upon it. We will have to come to it sooner or later, and the sooner the better. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN].

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I would like to say that this has been a great day for speeches, and I should feel that I was not loyal to my State if I did not complement my distinguished colleague, Mr. AYERS, who delivered such a fine address on irrigation and reclamation, which means so much to the State of Montana. In fact, we in the West will need a lot of legislation in that direction, since the A. A. A. has been declared unconstitutional. It is not my intention, however, to speak on that particular subject at this time, but on a subject which is of paramount or greater importance in view of the Supreme Court decision with respect to the A. A. A.

As I read the decision delivered in the Hoosac Mills case, I find that there is very little remedy left for the farmers of this country. There is very little opportunity left for legislation that will solve their problems, and likewise there is a greater and a widening scope of, may I say, judicial anti-farmer legislation that will prevent enactment of real legislation for helping the farmer, the laborer, or the small businessman of this country. In fact, leaving the power in the Supreme Court to legislate rather than to render a judicial judgment prevents the passage by this Congress of any other bills than those which would come under the general administrative laws of the Federal Government. It is for the reason that the Supreme Court is pointing in the way of nullifying and negativing further acts of Congress that I take the floor this afternoon in order to explain that I have dropped into the hopper today two bills to curb the Supreme Court's power specifically; and, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert these bills at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The bills referred to are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13 of the act of Congress of August 29, 1935, entitled "An act to levy an excise tax upon carriers and an income tax upon their employees, and for other purposes", be amended to read as follows:

"Federal judges are forbidden to declare this act of Congress unconstitutional.

"No appeal shall be permitted in any case in which the constitutionality of this act is challenged, the passage by Congress of this act being deemed conclusive presumption of its constitutionality.

"Any Federal judge who declares this act unconstitutional is hereby declared to be guilty of violating the constitutional requirement of 'good behavior' upon which his tenure of office rests and shall be held by such decision ipso facto to have vacated his office and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate a successor to fill the position vacated by such judicial officer."

Be it enacted, etc., That section 12 of the act of Congress of August 29, 1935, entitled "An act to establish a retirement system for employees of carriers subject to the Interstate Commerce Act, and for other purposes", be amended to read as follows:

"Federal judges are forbidden to declare this act of Congress unconstitutional.

"No appeal shall be permitted in any case in which the constitutionality of this act is challenged, the passage by Congress of this act being deemed conclusive presumption of its constitutionality.

"Any Federal judge who declares this act unconstitutional is hereby declared to be guilty of violating the constitutional requirement of 'good behavior' upon which his tenure of office rests and shall be held by such decision ipso facto to have vacated his office and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to nominate a successor to fill the position vacated by such judicial officer."

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, these bills would prevent the Supreme Court or other Federal judges from declaring the Railroad Retirement Act, which will no doubt come before them soon, unconstitutional by merely amending sections 12 and 13, respectively, taking these acts out of the usurped jurisdiction of the Court. To those who would say, "Well, what will be done if they declare the particular act, which embodies this amendment, unconstitutional?" I say there is provision in the amendment that by so doing they automatically vacate their posts on the ground they would be guilty of "misbehavior" and the President would automatically be empowered to appoint successors to take their place on the bench. I feel that in the Hoosac Mills case they are pointing the way, in various sentences which I shall point out to the Members of Congress, to a nullification of the railroad retirement law.

For example, on page 5 they state with reference to the word "tax":

The word has never been thought to connote the expropriation of money from one group for the benefit of another.

Again:

The Government in substance and effect asks us to separate the Agricultural Adjustment Act into two statutes, the one levying an excise on processors of certain commodities, the other appropriating the public moneys independently of the first. Passing the novel suggestion that two statutes enacted as parts of a single scheme should be tested as if they were distinct and unrelated, we think the legislation now before us is not susceptible of such separation and treatment.

The tax can only be sustained by ignoring the avowed purpose and operation of the act and holding it a measure merely laying an excise upon processors to raise revenue for the support of government. Beyond cavil, the sole object of the legislation is to restore the purchasing power of agricultural products to a parity with that prevailing in an earlier day.

The grant of power to tax and spend for the general national welfare must be confined to the enumerated legislative fields committed to the Congress.

The true construction undoubtedly is that the only thing granted is the power to tax for the purpose of providing funds for payment of the Nation's debts and making provision for the general welfare.

They have further in this decision virtually said that the term "general welfare" does not mean general welfare at all; that it means something totally different. In this connection, and to those of you who stand in fear and trembling of the fact that the taking away of this power from the Supreme Court might jeopardize American liberty, I would suggest that you read this book which has just come off the press entitled "Nine Men Above the Law—Our Supreme Court", by John M. Henry, in which he points out that more liberty has been destroyed by the Supreme Court than has ever been safeguarded.

Senator Breckinridge, in the debates of 1802, said:

Who shall check the judges when they violate the Constitution?

Jefferson said:

The judiciary of the United States is the subtle corps of sappers and miners constantly working underground to undermine the foundations of our confederated fabric. * * * Impeachment is a scarecrow. The Constitution, on this hypothesis, is a mere thing of wax in the hands of the judiciary, which they may twist and shape into any form they please. Our judges are as honest as other men, and not more so. They have, with others, the same passion for party, for power, and the privilege of their corps, * * * and their power is the more dangerous, as they are in office for life, and not responsible, as the other functionaries are, to elective control.

It is safe to say they have destroyed every progressive measure that has ever been placed upon the statute books of our country for the protection and promotion of the rights of the common man. That is a broad statement, but a thorough study of the decisions with respect to human rights will bear out my statements.

In the preface, written in 1912 by Robert M. La Follette, Sr., for the book Our Judicial Oligarchy, by Gilbert Roe, he states:

Within the last 2 or 3 years the public has begun to turn a critical eye upon the work of the judges. The people in their struggle to destroy special privilege and to open the way for human rights through truly representative government found barrier after barrier placed across the way of progress by the courts. Gradually the judiciary began to loom up as the one formidable obstacle which must be overcome before anything substantial could be accomplished to free the public from the exactions of oppressive monopolies and from the domination of property interests. A new problem entered into the movement toward democracy—the problem of removing the dead hand of precedent from the judiciary and infusing into it the spirit of the times. So the people, in their need, dropped the unquestioning veneration which custom had fostered as a shield for the judges and began to examine into the tendencies and practices of the courts.

* * * The judiciary has grown to be the most powerful institution in our Government. It, more than any other, may advance or retard human progress. Evidence abounds that, as constituted today, the courts pervert justice almost as often as they administer it. Precedent and procedure have combined to make one law for the rich and another for the poor.

* * * Moreover, by usurping the power to declare laws unconstitutional and by presuming to read their own views into statutes without regard to the plain intention of the legislators, they have become in reality the supreme lawmaking and lawgiving institution of our Government. They have taken to themselves a power it was never intended they should exercise, a power greater than that entrusted to the courts of any other enlightened nation. And because this tremendous power has been so generally exercised on the side of the wealthy and powerful few the courts have become at last the strongest bulwark of special privilege. They have come to constitute what may indeed be termed "a judicial oligarchy."

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] today in one of the most brilliant addresses I have heard since the beginning of my service in this Congress stated that they have the theory of property rights as against human rights. The placing of this power in nine men above the power of removal by the people is dangerous in the extreme.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOLLISTER] in his remarks today stated that there was no authority for the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] introduced during the present session of the Congress. I went into that subject myself quite thoroughly at the last session of Congress. I am mighty pleased to see the changed sentiment in this House. I delivered a speech along the lines of the speech that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] delivered today on May 8 and again on May 15, when the Supreme Court slaughtered the N. R. A., following that action up by killing the first Railroad Retirement Act that we passed in 1934. The change in the sentiment of the membership of this House since then is remarkable.

In answer to the gentleman from Ohio, may I say that there is authority in the Constitution for what I advocate, and at this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert article III, section 2, laying particular emphasis upon the particular paragraph wherein there is set forth the phrase, "With such exceptions and under such regulations as the Congress shall make."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before-mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I will take the patron saint of those who believe that this power should be vested in the Supreme Court, namely John Marshall. John Marshall said in this connection:

Congress is empowered to make exceptions to the appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact of the Supreme Court. These exceptions certainly go as far as the legislature may think proper for the interest and liberty of the people.

On May 8 last year I introduced a bill similar in certain respects to the one that the gentleman from Texas spoke about today and which he introduced. The bill that I introduced today merely exercises the power of exception. It is stated in this particular bill, the railroad retirement bill, that we will not permit the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of that law.

Now, in arguing for this particular amendment, if I may do so at this moment, I will say that this Congress, the Senate, and the President of the United States now have twice signed retirement bills. I wish not to reflect upon the personal character or integrity of any member of the Supreme Court. However, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CROSS] well stated, you cannot change the sentiment and philosophy and background of men overnight, and I may say that I am reliably informed that there are at least——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MONAGHAN. There are on the Supreme Court at the present moment, I am reliably informed, four or five men who at one time or another, in their private practice, were engaged as counsel for railroad companies, and we are to let these nine men, five of whom engaged in the practice of representing railroad corporations before the bar of justice, say what they think is proper and constitutional with regard to the Railroad Retirement Act.

I wish I had about 10 or 20 minutes in order to go into this subject. However, I shall ask unanimous consent to cite a few paragraphs from the book Nine Men Above the Law.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. In the Hammer against Dagenhart case, the Child Labor case, there was a 5-to-4 decision; in other words, one man on the Supreme Court decided for 125,000,000 people that child labor is O. K. in the United States so far as the Federal Government is concerned.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes; and that leads to the other point that is asserted, that the rights of the people are safeguarded, supposedly, by the right of amendment, and it is great that this right does exist; but take the history of the child-labor amendment. With the Congress and various States having shown their disapproval of child labor, look at the difficulty of getting such an amendment on the statute books. I venture the assertion that even were a constitutional amendment properly drafted and submitted to the people providing the Congress with power to enact social security, farm, and labor legislation it would be almost impossible to get such a constitutional amendment enacted in this country. Why? Not because the people do not want it but because powerful corporations control the machines in the various States of the Union and would so manipulate the various legislatures and the various machines as to prevent such a statute from ever becoming a law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I have no idea that what I may say now will do any particular good or that it will have any particular effect on the Nation, but there are three more or less distinct, and yet related, subjects on which I want to offer a few thoughts. I may offend the finer sensibilities of some of the Members of the House by quoting from the autobiography of Lincon Steffens, who has been called various things in addition to Socialist and Communist, but at one point in his book he referred to what he called "thought savers." He points out as probably the outstanding example of thought savers, "competition is the life of trade." Let me illustrate. Just as soon as you start the argument that perhaps it would be better if people cooperated a little bit in the production and distribution of wealth, immediately somebody says, "Oh, yes; but you know competition is the life of trade." That clinches the argument, because everybody knows that. Most people during their school days copied it in a copy book, and that makes it absolutely so.

The same practice is used to a large extent today when somebody suggests a solution of a difficulty. It is done when the President discusses the state of the Union, and suggests that something might be done to change conditions. It happens when he varies a little bit from a platform adopted back in 1932 to meet a given condition. Somebody immediately says, "socialism." Many things, including the popular election of Senators, the establishment of an income tax, and even today the caring for unemployment in a country that has at least several million unemployed people in it have been called socialism. Just as soon as you tack the word "socialism" onto any proposal, for a lot of people, that is the final argument, and it saves them a lot of thought. They do not need to look any further for an argument against that particular proposal. If they can just make the people think "this is socialism", then it is done. This, in addition to preventing the passage of a lot of good, sound legislation, has likewise brought considerable injury and embarrassment, among other things, upon a certain group of people in this country.

Just as soon as Mr. Hearst fell out with the present administration he began to attack it as a raw deal and a socialistic experiment.

He soon transferred that criticism to schools, and said that school teachers must be muzzled in some way to prevent discussion in the classrooms of economic conditions and possible solutions. His vicious attack went so far that in the District of Columbia we have a law which says that no teacher can even tell what communism is to a classroom. The teachers must skip this subject. The law goes a little further and says that all teachers in the District of Columbia and also all clerks in the schools must fill out and sign a little form twice a month before they can get their salaries. That form says that the signer did not at any time advocate or teach Communism. Until they sign this document they cannot get their salaries. Under permission, I include one of the forms used.

If we are going to have laws to prevent the teaching of certain subjects in our schools, there is no reason why we cannot go a good deal further.

We might do something like this: I think one of the worst things that could happen to this country in 1936 would be to elect any one of the Republican candidates for President. [Laughter.] I think it would be a good thing to require the teachers to sign a form saying they had not advocated or taught the Republican platform as announced by any candidate. [Laughter.]

It might not be a bad idea to protect the youth of the country from the dissemination of propaganda of this kind.

Now for the second though related subject.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] called attention to it here yesterday. He referred to the use of machinery in creating wealth without human labor being necessary. This has brought about a condition that some economists refer to as an economy of abundance. It is going to be necessary to explain to the people—and to ourselves as well—what an economy of abundance means and just how the introduction of machinery and this abundance is progressively undermining our financial system, which is based almost entirely upon an economy of scarcity. May I refer the Members to an extension of remarks under my name in the RECORD of July 1, 1935, for a discussion of this subject? Various methods have been suggested as a means of solving that problem. We have a bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] introducing what is known as social credit in the country. Let me commend that bill to your attention. Others would say that if we establish in place of a privately owned system of banks a national system of banking and return the control of money and credit to the Federal Government, where the Constitution puts it, we could solve the difficulty in that way. Another that has received a lot of attention in the last 2 days is the one suggested by Dr. Townsend. In reference to that and to the speech made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON], a former schoolmate of mine, it makes a lot of difference how you read a thing and how it sounds. I remember about 2 years ago and I remember last year when I became for the first time an embryonic politician and declared myself for office that the American Legion presented to me certain statements and said they were going to ask me to sign a pledge that I would vote in a certain way. They were rather insistent that I vote their way. I did. Of course, when the American Legion talked like that it was patriotism, but with Dr. Townsend, when he talks like that, or when his followers talk like that, it is coercion and bringing undue influence to bear upon the Members of the House.

The Townsend plan is in effect a method of subsidizing a portion of the consuming public of the country. It is an attempt to deal with the economy of abundance. They have certain aims, to which I subscribe whole-heartedly, that they wish to achieve. Under leave granted I include them at this point. As far as Dr. Townsend is concerned, he just does not go far enough. In place of subsidizing a portion of the population—and you will come to it sooner or later—we should adopt some form of subsidizing the consumers in the same way that we subsidized the producers in the last decades.

The third thing, still related I think to the whole, that I would like to call to the attention of the few Members present is this: Some Members are given to making statements that this or that is going to happen. They say if you pass this or that law such and such will be the result. They quote former Presidents and former Secretaries of the Treasury, and they quote certain economists. Mr. Chairman, that is dangerous. I will show you why.

AIMS OF PLAN

To provide security for all persons who reach the age of 60 years to live on an American standard of living.

To remove from competitive labor a sufficient number of citizens to afford opportunity for all employables.

To provide a constant purchasing power for the products of American factories, industries, agriculture, and services.

To maintain a balance between consumption and production that will end all depressions.

To protect and preserve all rights, traditions, and customs which have been established as true Americanism.

To stimulate ambitions and offer incentives to further progress and development of higher standards of living.

To reduce crime by destroying the conditions which breed crime.

To furnish opportunity to the young for fullest use of their talents and ability.

To safeguard the American home as the unit of modern civilization.

To reduce the terrific burden of taxation caused by public and private charity, by growth of crime, by waste, by maintenance of public institutions which would be rendered unnecessary by increased demands for products and services.

To compel the constant circulation of money and obtain the certain result of better homes.

To constantly raise the standards of living to the levels possible under invention and modern methods of mass production and distribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein certain comments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Irving Fisher, one of these well-known economists, in a letter to Congressman MONAGHAN, said this about the Townsend plan:

Economically, the plan is, I think, certainly unsound. I believe that it would do the country very great harm indeed should Congress enact it.

This is the same Mr. Fisher who, on January 29, 1928, said:

Mr. Hoover is a practical economist and one to whom is due, more largely than to any other one man, improvement in our prosperity. * * * Mr. Hoover knows as few men do the terrible evils of inflation and deflation and the need of avoiding both if business and agriculture are to be stabilized.

On September 5, 1929, he said:

There may be a recession in stock prices, but not anything in the nature of a crash. Dividend returns on stocks are moving higher. This is not due to receding prices for stocks, and will not be hastened by any anticipated crash, the possibility of which I fail to see.

A few years ago people were as much afraid of common stocks as they were of a red-hot poker. In the popular mind there was a tremendous risk in common stocks. Why? Mainly because the average investor could afford to invest in only one common stock. Today he obtains wide and well-managed diversification of stock holdings by purchasing shares in good investment trusts.

Comparing the noted price of some investment trusts on September 5, 1929, and the low for 1931 shows how much trust can be put in Mr. Fisher's prophecies:

	Sept. 5, 1929 (close)	1931 (low)
American International Corporation	84	5
American, British & Continental Corporation	14½	¾
Electric Power Associates	74	5½
Goldman Sachs Trading Corporation	110	¾
General Public Service	83	2⅝
Selected Industries, Inc	25½	⅝
U. S. & Foreign Securities Corporation	64½	1⅜

To make the point a little plainer, allow me to quote another equally well-known economist, Roger W. Babson. On September 17, 1928, Mr. Babson said:

If Smith should be elected with a Democratic Congress we are almost certain to have a resulting business depression in 1929. * * * The election of Hoover and a Republican Congress should result in continued prosperity for 1929.

On August 18, 1930, he said:

Midwestern agriculture is on the upgrade, and general business in this region should show marked improvement during the final quarter of 1930.

The corner has been turned in the Middle West. Conditions are as bad out here as they will get. The farmer is flat on his back, and there is no way to look except up.

Now, let us quote the market again for that date and the low for 1931:

	Aug. 18, 1930 (close)	1931 (low)
Farm stock:
J. I. Case Co	176¼	33¼
International Harvester	75½	22⅝
Sears-Roebuck	62	30¼
Chicago grain market:
December wheat	$0.88⅛	$0.44⅝
December corn	.90¼	.32⅝
December oats	.42½	.20¼

On December 26, 1930, Mr. Babson said:

In a big way 1931 can be described as a year of opportunities. In 1929 we were living in a palace with a powder mine in the cellar. In 1931 we may feel sure that we are living in a poorhouse with a gold mine in the cellar.

And on May 9, 1931, he said:

Statistics show clearly that business reached its low point in December of last year. Since then there has been a steady but constant improvement. Everything indicates that general business has turned the corner. * * * I go further and say that 1931 should offer the greatest opportunities of any year for generations.

It is unkind to do so, but let us recall a few of the ponderous statements of the great engineer from Palo Alto. On August 11, 1928, he said:

Unemployment in the sense of distress is widely disappearing. * * * We in America today are nearer to the final triumph over poverty than ever before in the history of any land. The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. We have not yet reached the goal, but, given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last 8 years, and we shall soon, with the help of God, be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from this Nation. There is no guaranty against poverty equal to a job for every man. That is the primary purpose of the economic policies we advocate.

On July 27, 1928, he said:

The outlook of the world today is for the greatest era of commercial expansion in history. The rest of the world will become better customers.

Now, just for spite I am going to stick in a comment from the so-called great Secretary of the Treasury, Andrew Mellon. In September 1928 he said:

There is no cause for worry. The high tide of prosperity will continue.

It may be stretching the point a little, but let me offer a few quotations from that great columnist, Arthur Brisbane:

"Those that foolishly talk about a national panic will please remember that the income of this Nation is $100,000,000,000 a year"—October 30, 1929.

"To comfort yourself, if you lost, think of the people living near Mount Pelee ordered to abandon their homes"—November 9, 1929.

"Business is good; money is cheap"—November 16, 1929.

"It ought to be a good year"—November 20, 1929.

"All the really important millionaires are planning to continue prosperity"—November 26, 1929.

"Fortunately, it seems safe to say that the peak of idleness has about been reached, with better conditions coming"—January 8, 1930.

"This country hasn't lost anything, except a few billion dollars"—July 16, 1931.

"The Chase National absorbed the Equitable Trust Co., as the National City absorbed the Farmer's Loan & Trust Co. * * * You can get all the money you want, up to a hundred million or more, if you have the right collateral and enough of it"—October 3, 1931.

I cannot find a good reason for it, but I am going to quote ex-Vice President Charles Curtis. I wonder where he is. On October 5, 1928, he said:

Stick to the full dinner pail. You have been enjoying Republican prosperity. If you want to continue the prosperity of the administrations of Calvin Coolidge, vote for Hoover.

Then there was a man by the name of Dr. Julius Klein. At the risk of seeming facetious I am going to include this short excerpt from the Washington Merry-go-round:

Wonder what's become of Dr. Julius Klein. For 12 years his name was a byword with big business, appeared almost daily in the press, was featured as the author of high-powered business articles.

He was the man who built up American exports; who really ran Hoover's Commerce Department; who turned down high-bracket private salaries for the sake of spurring American trade.

Now? If you look around Washington carefully you may find Klein's shingle, carrying the modest title, "Business consultant."

Back in 1930 Dr. Klein was doing a lot of prophesying. On May 21, 1930, he said:

Business is gradually but unmistakably coming out of the depression.

There seems to be a fairly good chance that the United States will be out of the current economic depression by the end of October.—September 26, 1930.

The depression has ended. The valley usually runs across 6 or 7 months. If history repeats itself, this means that in July up we go.—June 9, 1931.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us cut out this foolishness of trying to make patriots by sumptuary legislation. Let us follow the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD] and study economics, and let us not put too much trust in the prophecies of our so-called great men and leading economists. Think it out for yourself. If you are wrong, the people will find it out.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, a great war is now in progress in Africa, and according to the reports we have of it, it bids fair to result in another world war. That war began and is being prosecuted at enormous expense for the possession of the economic resources of a comparatively unknown country. I have read with great interest the reports that have been carried in various newspapers and other documents about the resources of Ethiopia in gold and other minerals, in coal, in copper, and in oil. Most optimistic reports coming to us. Certain sources tend to magnify the resources of that country and other reports are more moderate, but even taking the most glowing of the reports as true, all of the resources of Ethiopia are not as great as the known resources of the Territory which I have the honor to represent in this House. Every once in a while I find someone who says that we would be better off, and the United States would be better off, if we would give Alaska back to Russia and throw in the Alaska Railroad and everything else connected with the Territory. There is a great reluctance on the part of some Members of Congress to vote for appropriations for the development of the really extraordinary and magnificent resources of our great Territory, because they say we do not get very much out of that in the way of taxes, but you know, of course, or most of you know, at least, that all of the Federal taxes that apply elsewhere in the United States also apply to Alaska, and the only reason that Alaska upon the books of the Government does not make a better showing with respect to the payment of Federal taxes is because most of the developed wealth of Alaska is in the hands of nonresidents.

I am not making any complaint about that. As a prospector and miner, I was very happy to get somebody in the States who had a lot of money to invest it in the prospects in which I had an interest; and my neighbors were of the same mind. We were constantly attempting to get what we called outside capital to come in and develop our resources, and it came in in large quantities, but the dividends paid on that capital now are credited not to Alaska but are credited to the States where the owners of the shares of stock reside; and they are scattered all over the United States from Washington to Florida and from California to Maine.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIMOND. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. How are those families getting along that were placed up there on the settlements?

Mr. DIMOND. They are getting along very well. Some mistakes were made in organization, as they are bound to be made in any undertaking like that, even in the fighting of battles or the building of mills; but, generally speaking, this project up to date, I think, is an outstanding success. A few people were sent to Alaska as a part of this settlement who should never have been sent there; but we cannot criticize anybody for that, because in the conduct of all business people make errors. It has been reported to me that at times Congress has made mistakes in the passage of laws. But the settlers are getting along well and they have everything in their favor.

In this connection, although I did not intend to advert to it here, I am asked frequently whether any farm products can be grown in the Matanuska Valley or elsewhere in Alaska. Remember we have 40,000,000 acres of good agricultural and grazing land in the Territory of Alaska. I should like to compare that with the area of some of the agricultural States, but I cannot stop for that now. However, the question is constantly asked as to whether in this particular region anything can be grown. The answer is written in the records of the Department of Agriculture; that almost everything can be grown that can be grown on farms in the northern part of this country. We can grow oats, barley, rye, and wheat. We cannot mature corn successfully in the greater part of Alaska. Vegetables grow in greater abundance and perhaps with finer flavor than is the case of the average of such things grown in the United States.

I want to prove that to you by just one example. Lately one of the great seed companies of the United States, which has its headquarters in Minneapolis or St. Paul, as I remember, sent out notices to the farmers of the various States offering a prize for the best potatoes grown anywhere in the United States. There were several entries from Alaska. The first prize was won by potatoes grown less than 100 miles from this Matanuska settlement, along the shores of Lake Kenai, about 18 miles north of Seward, Alaska. Those potatoes surpassed in flavor, in quality, in firmness, in keeping qualities the potatoes that were produced and entered in that contest from anywhere else in the United States. That ought to be sufficient proof to anybody that we can grow vegetables not only in abundance but of unsurpassed quality in the Territory of Alaska, particularly in this Matanuska Valley.

As I recall, in that valley the frost-to-frost season is on the average 132 days. During a large part of that time we have about 20 hours of sunlight. On an average for 2 months of the year there is about 20 hours of sunlight, and that results in very rapid growth of farm products. When you have a frost-to-frost season of 132 days with that long sunlight, surely there is no reason why grains and vegetables cannot grow on good soil—and the soil at Matanuska is of first-class quality. I know what soil is, because I was brought up on a farm and I lived on it and made my living at it as a boy and a young man for quite a number of years. There is no chance for this colony to fail unless there is a failure in the disposition or character of the people. I am told by my friends who live there that the people who have gone there generally are good, upright, industrious, and energetic people, who have simply been overwhelmed by the misfortune of this depression, and they are just waiting for such an opportunity as has been afforded by placing them upon this farm land in Alaska.

I started to say a moment ago that the wealth of Alaska is generally owned outside. For example, we have a very extensive fishing industry in Alaska, particularly in the salmon fisheries, although other fish, such as halibut, cod, and herring are taken in large quantities. I think the limit upon the halibut fish last year was 41,000,000 pounds. As to salmon, it is put up in cases of 48 pounds to the case. The average production of salmon in Alaska over quite a period of years has been about 5,000,000 cases, of 48 pounds to the case.

Mr. CONNERY. Do you get any haddock there?

Mr. DIMOND. No. There are no haddock in Alaska that I ever heard of. Of course, the inland streams and lakes of the country abound with fish. There are so many trout and grayling in the streams and lakes that most people think I exaggerate when I attempt to talk about them.

Mr. Chairman, to return once more to the subject of the ownership of the principal industries of Alaska, may I say that most of the capital used in operating the fishing industry, and a large part of the capital used in operation of the gold-mining industry was invested in those industries by people who live in the United States, not in the Territory of Alaska. That ownership of these industries has continued until the present time, and so as a necessary result the taxes of the very substantial profits made in the operation of the fishing industry and in the operation of the mines in Alaska are paid by people who live in the United States and not in Alaska. While it is impossible to get exact and reliable information with respect to such taxes, I believe it is a fair assertion to say that Alaska, as compared with the rest of the United States, is paying its own way in Federal taxes. For example, the great salmon-packing companies are largely owned by men who reside in the States of Washington, Oregon, and California; and the large mining companies, such as the Alaska-Juneau Mining Co. and the Fairbanks Exploration Co., are owned almost entirely by stockholders who live all over the United States and few of whom reside in Alaska. As a consequence the income taxes, and even other taxes, paid by these stockholders and by these corporations upon wealth derived from the operations of the fisheries of Alaska and the mines in Alaska are credited to the States in which the stockholders live or under the laws of which the corporations were organized and are existing. If all of these taxes could be credited to Alaska, where the wealth is produced, I really believe that it would be found that Alaska is contributing as much to the Federal Treasury as the Federal Treasury pays out each year for expenditure in the Territory. I have often said, and I repeat, that Alaska is in a measure the unfortunate subject of absentee landlordism—unfortunate in that many people, including Members of Congress, do not understand the value of Alaska, and further unfortunate in that the landlords are sometimes careless of what happens to the Territory.

Let me give you some figures as to the vast production of wealth in the Territory; compare that with the most brilliant estimates we have ever had as to the number of possible economic resources of that country over which it now seems we are to be plunged in another world war.

To date the fisheries products of Alaska, the principal item of which is canned salmon, has amounted in value to more than $1,000,000,000. Its mineral production has amounted to approximately $700,000,000. The furs taken in Alaska exceed in value $120,000,000. Let us state it in gross amounts of exports and imports: Official Government reports tell us that the total exports from Alaska to the United States have reached the impressive total of about $1,900,000,000—all of this since 1867, when Alaska was annexed to the United States, and most of it since 1897, when gold was discovered in the Dawson region—and that the total imports to Alaska from the United States during that same period have in value almost reached the total of $1,000,000,000. It is obvious that the contribution of Alaska to the wealth of the Territory both from exports and imports has been not only material but outstanding. I have often wondered where the States would find a customer to absorb nearly $1,000,000,000 in such a short period or where a nation could find a territory to produce wealth in such vast sums over so short a space of time. Many and many a person is now living in the United States comfortably with ample income on wealth produced in Alaska. And our resources have scarcely been touched. The wealth contained in the fisheries will, so far as we know, last interminably if proper conservation measures are taken and continued. In gold Alaska has produced to date more than $450,000,000, and many competent engineers assure me that in the next 30 years much more gold will probably be taken out of the placers and the lodes of the Territory.

The oil resources of Alaska have scarcely been prospected. On the Arctic coast not far from Point Barrow, where the late great Wiley Post and Will Rogers lost their lives in an airplane disaster, there is such a great seepage of oil that many small lakes are covered with that valuable product from a few inches to a foot in depth, and the seepage oil is being used locally as a fuel. Most of the oil lands of Alaska are reserved for future use, but in Alaska the Nation has oil resources the probable value of which is simply incalculable.

Ample coal fields exist in the Territory. It has been estimated that there is enough coal in Alaska to serve the needs of the entire Nation for at least 500 years. Surely this is a resource that is worth husbanding and worth developing.

Alaska's timber alone would in some countries be considered as worth the price of another local Ethiopian war, for we know from the reports of the Forest Service that Alaska can produce in perpetuity approximately 1,500,000 cords of pulpwood, which, in turn, will produce about 1,000,000 tons pulp per year; and it must be remembered that all of this can be had indefinitely by just cutting out the ripe timber, which otherwise will rot and fall and the value of which will be lost.

Recently I attempted to compare the income of the fisheries of Alaska with the income of the farm and dairy products of a number of the States—and I refer particularly to pages 670 and 671 of the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1935. Taking into consideration only the income from, and the value of, the fisheries of Alaska, and excluding the very large yearly income from its gold, copper, and other minerals, I find, upon comparison, the following:

The last year for which total gross-income figures of the Department of Agriculture are available is 1933. During the period from 1931 to 1934, inclusive, the value of Alaska-fisheries products averaged over $33,000,000 annually. This represents the following comparisons with agricultural production in 1933: $11,000,000 more than the gross income from the crop products of Montana and equal to the gross income from livestock and livestock products of Montana; $2,000,000 less than the gross income from crop products of Idaho and $7,000,000 more than the gross income from the livestock and livestock products of Idaho; $28,000,000 more than the gross income from crop products of New Hampshire and $10,000,000 more than the gross income from livestock and livestock products of that State; $26,000,000 more than the gross income from crop products of Vermont and $9,000,000 more than gross income from livestock and livestock products of Vermont; equal to more than one-third the gross income from the crop products of New York State and one-fifth the gross income from livestock and livestock products of the State; $18,000,000 more than the gross income from crop products of Connecticut and $9,000,000 more than livestock and livestock products of Connecticut; in value the Alaska fisheries products exceeded the combined crop products and livestock and livestock products of nine States.

The fishery products of Alaska were equal in value to the gross income from 20 percent of the entire corn crop of the United States and 12 percent of the gross income from the entire wheat crop of the United States.

They exceeded the total gross income from the oat crop of the United States.

Their value was more than twice the gross income from the rye crop.

Was eight times greater than the gross income from the entire rye crop.

Was 12 times greater than the gross income from the entire buckwheat crop of the United States.

Equal to almost one and one-half times the gross income from the rice crop.

Exceeded the gross income from the grain-sorghum crop by $28,000,000.

Was one and one-half times the gross income from the peach crop of the United States.

And was almost equal to one-half the total of the gross income from the sheep and lambs produced in the United States.

Surely by this comparison between only one industry of Alaska and the gross income from farm products and dairy and other products of a number of the States we can visualize the outstanding value of this Territory.

In fact, if it could be understood what Alaska means to the Nation at the present time, and what it will mean in the future, there would be an eagerness on the part of the Members to appropriate ample funds for the development of this vast national resource. Italy is now expending some millions of dollars to secure the economic benefits which will come from the possession or suzerainty of a country with resources not half as great as those of the Territory of Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 10630) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

NEW YORK BARGE CANAL

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10408) to authorize the Federal Government to contribute funds in the improvement of a section of the New York State Barge Canal provided the State of New York makes an appropriation of $10,000,000 for that purpose, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

WHY I FAVOR A PROGRAM OF PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by the Honorable Harold Ickes, Secretary of the Interior, last Sunday evening on Why I Favor a Public Works Program, together with the colloquy which followed between the Secretary and Senator BARKLEY.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Secretary of the Interior and Administrator of Public Works, before The Town Hall of Washington, D. C., January 26, 1936:

During the years that America was skimming the cream from off its rich natural resources it acquired a happy-go-lucky attitude toward life that has become traditional. We were taught to believe that the morrow would always take care of itself. We should trust entirely in the Lord, or what passed for the Lord in our materialistic minds. If one accumulated a greater share of wealth than a sound social system should permit anyone to have and to hold, what mattered it? It was notorious that in America it was only three generations from shirt sleeves to shirt sleeves and the poorest man under the flag might aspire in his turn to own a private yacht and send the women of his family abroad to buy a face lift of culture and a permanent wave of music and the arts. The rich man was to be looked up to and emulated; the poor man had only himself to blame.

When hard times befell we were not greatly concerned, because there were new lands just beyond to be had for the taking; fresh forests waiting for the woodsman's ax, undiscovered mines to be searched for and developed. But then came the day when it was forced upon the consciousness of even the most unregarding that our physical frontier had vanished into the western horizon; the shock of the discovery that our resources, rich and varied though they were, were not inexhaustible. Nor was this the whole of the depressing prospect. Our inventive genius outran even our incredible industrial expansion. The result was bitter competition for jobs which there were fewer than composed the army of eager claimants for those jobs. With no new lands to turn over to the fast-growing farm population, to say nothing of the technological unemployed, where was work to be found for the hands, increasing in number every year, that eagerly reached out for work?

One of the gravest and most pressing problems that we face today is that of the standing army of our unemployed. No longer may we trust to luck unless we choose recklessly to laugh in the very face of inevitable disaster. We must find some means of supplying employment for those who are able and willing to work and thus sustain our population on a basis that approximates our supposed American standard of living. We must take an inventory of our national assets and on the foundation of that inventory plan for the future development of our America so as to make the best possible use of all our resources for the greatest good of the people.

I make this suggestion with not a little misgiving, because it has not been the American way. He who ventures to suggest the advisability of planning for the future is taking his very life into his hands. It simply is not done in the best American circles. We must revere our forefathers, and they never planned. When they had devastated one forest they merely moved on to another. When they had exhausted the fertility of a farm in one section there was always another farm a little farther on to be had for the taking. As I say, they never planned; they merely exploited. Ergo, we should not plan. Moreover, certain foreign countries have taken to planning, and that makes it un-American for us to do likewise. It may be objected also that planning involves the use of our mental processes, and that implies a brain trust. We have been properly ridiculed for drafting the brains of specialists to help us solve our social and economic problems. That, too, is un-American. Brains should be used not to help government but to get what they can out of government!

However, there are certain stark facts that confront us which, whether we relish it or not, are forcing a realistic tempering of the traditional American optimism that every citizen who is willing to work can find employment at a satisfactory job that will yield him and his family a comfortable living, which implies also a standard American education for his children, some modest luxuries, and a reasonable degree of leisure.

With the depletion of our natural resources, there has gone hand in hand a sharp curtailment of opportunities for employment on the farms, in the mines, and in the factories. Year after year, due to improved processes, more produce and goods are being turned out with less human labor. The result is what has come to be known as technological unemployment. It has been estimated that in 1929, which was supposed to be the peak year of American prosperity for all time, there were in this country between two and two and a half million men ready and willing to work who could find no work to do. There seems to be no limit to the output of American inventors and technicians; and it is reasonable to suppose that, as time goes on, there will be more and more men unable to find employment for technological reasons.

What do we propose to do for these men? Without even making a struggle in their behalf, shall we endure the building up in this country of a permanent class to which we shall grudgingly dole out a bare living? Or shall we seriously address ourselves to the problem of creating worth-while employment for all the men and women of America who want to sustain themselves by their own efforts in the honorable and traditional American manner?

It may not be the only way out, but, to my mind, one of the soundest and most statesmanlike undertakings in which we could engage would be a system of useful public works, which, while taking up the slack in employment, at the same time would add to our national assets. Obviously such a program should not be undertaken unless it could be kept free of politics. The nature, the size, the extent, and the location of the projects should be determined by the best brains the country contains solely on the basis of the facts, unaffected by prejudice or uninfluenced by those who possess power.

There should be no logrolling in making up the list of projects; no trading for parochial benefits after the manner in which our tariff laws have been written. That ancient and dishonorable institution, the American pork barrel, should be rolled down the precipice of public disapproval to burst its staves beyond repair on the hard rocks of a scientific and objective determination of what undertakings should have priority for the greatest good of the country as a whole. Projects should be built by the Federal Government, either on its own account or on some fair basis of cooperation with States or local communities or other beneficiaries; but wherever Federal money is given or loaned there should be strict Federal supervision to the end that a dollar in value shall be forthcoming for every dollar spent. All projects, insofar as possible, should be self-liquidating.

Personally I favor a program of public works in a time of unemployment, because, both socially and economically, it is much to be preferred to the dole. I hope that never again will America have to resort to direct relief in order to supply its unemployed employables with food and shelter and clothing. The dole is destructive of morale. Insidiously it weakens the moral fiber, tending to develop a class whose sense of pride and personal integrity is permanently undermined. Not only is direct relief objectionable as a social measure, it is economically unsound. It does not pay for itself, to say nothing of earning a return upon the sums laid out. It merely keeps men and women and children from starving or freezing to death because we are too humane for the time being, at least, to permit that.

When America decided on direct relief she had no other choice. We knew that we were in a desperate situation economically; that undetermined millions of people were unemployed; that banks were crashing to the right of us and to the left of us, carrying down with them the savings of many a depositor who, given those savings, could have gone along for at least another lap on his own economic power, but we merely sat and talked about our wonderful American initiative and resourcefulness, hoping—oh, so desperately hoping—that the last factory would not close nor the final bank fail before a new administration had come into power which we might hold responsible in some degree at least for the catastrophe that had overwhelmed us.

When that new administration did come into power, to its credit be it said that it lost no time in going to the rescue of communities that had exhausted their resources in taking care of their unemployed. We have done our best to see to it that no one went hungry in the United States. The cries of anguish that have gone up in the land have not so much been outbursts caused by the pangs of hunger as they have been symptoms of economic sciatica which has affected the pocket nerves of the wealthier classes called upon to share their excess riches with those who in more fortunate times had by their labor and services contributed to the accumulation of those riches.

It has always seemed to me that one of the greatest failures in statesmanship in American history was that of not having ready a comprehensive and well-matured plan of useful public works and a determination to put that plan into effect as soon as we could hear the thunder of the depression upon the rocks. Senators WAGNER, LA FOLLETTE, and COSTIGAN, among others, had, I believe, been urging upon the floor of the Senate the formulation and adoption of such a program before and just after the full force of the economic hurricane struck us in the fall of 1929, but the administration in power, through ineptness or failure to grasp the real situation, proved to be unequal to the occasion.

There are sincere people who object that public works cannot stem the tide of such a depression as swept over the country in 1929. They say that England tried the plan and failed, and that we have attempted it only to discover its inadequacy. I express no opinion as to what may or may not have happened in Great Britain, because I have no first-hand knowledge of the facts, but, so far as the United States are concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that the public-works theory has not failed here. It has never really been tried. We have dabbled with public works; we have done some wishful thinking about public works, but the principle has never been given a trial on a scale commensurate with our needs and adequate to the situation. Notwithstanding, I believe that our program, tentative though it has been, has more than justified itself.

In June of 1933 the National Industrial Recovery Act appropriated $3,300,000,000 for public works. From the Emergency Appropriation Act of 1934, $396,500,000 more were made available.

In the spring of 1935 Congress drew on the Treasury for a further sum of $4,800,000,000, of which $445,047,762 went for public works. In addition to these congressional appropriations we have a revolving fund into which has gone money received from the sale through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of bonds taken by the Public Works Administration in making loans for local projects. Already we have sold about $302,638,000 worth of such bonds. This money has been available for additional loans on other local projects to create more employment.

I might interject here that we have made a profit for the Government of more than $4,750,000 on the bonds that have been sold thus far. I might say also that the investment bankers who purchased these securities through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and paid this $4,750,000 profit to the Government could have bought them at the original price paid by us if they had had a little more of that confidence in the future of America which they insist is so essential to recovery.

It would appear from the foregoing figures that P. W. A. has appropriated and allotted for investment during the past 2½ years a total sum of $4,444,000,000 in round numbers. But this is not quite the true story. While Congress appropriated or made available sums totaling this amount, the customary and usual appropiations for permanent improvements for the various departments of the Government were withheld, with the result that it was necessary to give them large allocations out of P. W. A. funds. Then, too, we were called upon to provide for the administrative expenses of many of the emergency agencies that were set up to fight the depression.

The fine C. C. C. program of the President originally was largely financed out of P. W. A. funds, and in the fall of 1933 he drew on us for $400,000,000 for the Civil Works Administration. At the outset $238,000,000 were transferred to the Navy for the shipbuilding program, on which it is engaged in order to bring our fleet up to treaty parity. All told, approximately $1,183,000,000 went to C. W. A., C. C. C., T. V. A., the Farm Credit Administration, and other recovery agencies, reducing the total sum available to P. W. A from $4,444,000,000 to about $3,261,000,000.

Nor is this all. Subsequently it became necessary to impound out of our unappropriated and unobligated balances another $310,000,000 in order to finance the Federal Emergency Relief Administration pending the passage of the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935. This left us a balance of approximately $2,951,000,000. Through the sale of borrowers' securities and the release of a small portion of impounded funds, the net result is a final sum of about $3,000,000,000 for 2½ years, or an average of $1,200,000,000 a year for the real Public Works program.

Of course, a billion dollars a year looks like a good deal of money, but when it is considered in connection with what was customarily spent on the average for new construction in the United States during the years just prior to the depression it is truly insignificant.

The total volume of construction work in normal times in the United States is not definitely known, but various experts have estimated that in the peak years of the 1920's from eleven to fifteen billions of dollars was the annual outlay. Let us be conservative and call it twelve billions. These twelve billions during the depression fell off to a sum of from three and a half to four billion dollars annually, which means a shrinkage in outlay for construction work of, let us say, $8,000,000,000 a year. Contrast this $8,000,000,000 with the average of $1,200,000,000 spent annually under the Public Works program. Or, to tell the story in gross sums, we have $30,000,000,000 spent in 2½ years prior to the depression as against about $12,000,000,000 for a like period during the depression.

Am I not right, on the basis of these figures, in suggesting that the public-works theory has never really been tried and therefore cannot have failed in the United States? Yet some people have expected this sum to pulse through the arteries of trade in the same volume and with the same reinvigorating effect as the eleven to fifteen billions of dollars whose place it has been trying so bravely to fill. It was like sending out a tugboat to capture the Atlantic Fleet. Instead of siphoning enough money into the channels of trade through the construction of substantial public works to do a recovery job, we have been using an eyedropper; and the resulting drop in the eye to the undiscriminating has seemed to be as big as a house.

I anticipate that through the minds of some of you there may be running the thought that conveniently I am ignoring the large sum of money allocated for the Works Relief program under the act of 1935. I have not overlooked this important factor. I will even admit that some of this money has gone for public works, but, generally speaking, only a small part of it has been spent for public works of the type that I have in mind. About $928,000,000 of the $4,800,000,000 appropriated in 1935 were allocated for direct relief, while more than a billion dollars of this sum have been or are being spent on projects which are fully justified, although they may not come within the classification of public works under discussion. The allocation of every cent of this money was proper and in the public interest. It represents a necessary and justified investment in character and morale.

As I have already said, if the Nation should determine upon a policy of public works in times of unemployment, it should plan ahead. Careful advance planning and the maintenance of a skeleton organization that can be expanded to meet any need will mean that if, unhappily, we are called upon to endure another depression, the idling engine can be thrown into high gear instantly. Delays that were unavoidable because of lack of preparedness when the present program was undertaken in 1933 need not impede the speedy undertaking and carrying out of Public Works program in the future. We must not repeat the experience of 1933, when without a single plan, mature or immature, and without an organization the national administration was suddenly called upon to undertake a program of public works practically overnight.

Considering the difficulties that confronted us, we are entitled to feel proud of the record that we have made. So far disbursements under the first program total approximately $1,900,000,000, and it is estimated that some 3,400,000 man-years of direct and indirect employment have been created. It is to be remembered that these figures do not include the money spent and the vast amount of work created under the programs of C. C. C., C. W. A., and T. V. A.

Practically all of the 15,000 Federal projects included in the first Public Works program have been completed. Large projects such as the Columbia River Basin development, Casper-Alcova, and Fort Peck Dam remain on the dwindling list of uncompleted undertakings. Considerably more than half of the 4,000 non-Federal projects undertaken under this same program have been completed and are in use. The $200,000,000 worth of railroad rehabilitation and equipment construction is 95 percent finished.

The remaining projects under the first program are being pushed to completion rapidly, as our new program, including 4,166 non-Federal projects and 37 additional slum-clearance and low-rent housing projects, is getting quickly under way. With respect to 4,149 of the new non-Federal projects and the 37 housing undertakings, construction contracts had been let on January 16 last or they were being advertised for bids. These call for an expenditure of approximately $849,000,000.

Although our current program is somewhat smaller than the first, it will nevertheless result in over three-quarters of a billion dollars' worth of construction.

I am confident that any fair-minded and impartial critic, after studying the record, would say that the Public Works job of this administration has not only been well and honestly done, but that, considering all the circumstances, it has been expeditiously carried out.

I say this conscious though I am of certain hypercritical editorial writers, many of whom have never built a chicken coop, who have pounded out on their typewriters sage and informed opinions of the shortcomings of the Public Works Administration. I reflect also that politicians out of office and eager to get back in have joined in a loud chorus of "red tape", without going to the trouble to discover how little they knew about what was going on. Then there have been the critical chiselers, the grafters, and the corner cutters, who resented the loss of opportunities for illicit profits that are implicit in "haste makes waste" operations.

I conceived it to be one of my principal duties as Public Works Administrator to perform the tasks assigned to me in such a manner as to convince the people of the country that government is able to build a great series of public works covering practically every county in the United States not only in a workmanlike manner but substantially free from scandal. The result has been that communities that had come to regard corruption and graft and chiseling as inseparable from public construction have learned that such work can be as honestly and economically done by the public as by any prudent businessman. If we are to adopt the principle of public works during depression periods as a fixed policy of government, it was well worth proving, as we have done, that the taxpayers' money that goes into public works can be economically and honestly spent.

One of the most significant outgrowths of our present Public Works program has been the institution by the President of what in effect is a national planning board. The name of this valuable instrumentality is the National Resources Committee. The heart and nerve center of that committee is an advisory board, of which that able, devoted, and distinguished citizen of Washington, Mr. Frederic A. Delano, is chairman. Another member is Dr. Charles E. Merriam, of the University of Chicago, and until he resigned recently, Dr. Wesley C. Mitchell, of Columbia University. Two new members are Messrs. Beardsley Rumi and Henry S. Dennison. Mr. Charles W. Eliot, 2d, has served as executive officer of this Board.

I know of no agency of government that has done more effective and outstanding work than this Advisory Board—and all without any blaring of trumpets. Under its leadership there have been set up in every State except two, as well as in Alaska, planning committees that are working in close cooperation with the National Committee. The result is that if and when there shall be occasion in the future for undertaking a public-works program at least a comprehensive and carefully considered general national plan will be ready. I go so far as to express the hope that henceforth no public work will be undertaken anywhere by the Federal Government until it has been approved by this national planning body not only as to necessity and social importance but as to priority. The days of the discredited pork barrel in the United States ought to be at an end forever.

According to the economists, the reason for, or the immediate result of, an economic depression is the stagnation of money in the circulatory system of commerce. Money is to trade and industry what blood is to the human body. An economic embolism means an immobile patient under the care of doctors and nurses. In order to cure the patient it is necessary to absorb the embolism and restore that normal and healthy circulation, without which business will continue to lie flat on its back.

Although recognizing this principle in the abstract, some timid statesmen and economists nevertheless insist that the Nation must not help to restore circulation, at least to the point of transfusing health-giving currency and credit from its own sounder body. Their reasoning seems to run along this line: Business must be stimulated; only the circulation of money can stimulate business; banks and private individuals possessing funds refuse to make use of them; the Government alone has both the money and the will to stimulate business; therefore the Government must not spend any money for this purpose, but, on the contrary, must keep at all times strictly within its budget.

One of the outstanding defenders of this illogical theory has been Mr. Lewis W. Douglas, former Director of the Budget, for whom I have a very genuine respect and personal regard. In his official capacity he did all he could to oppose the public-works program, and about a year ago, in a speech before the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce of the University of Pennsylvania, he said: "The huge obligations entered into on account of Public Works, even if no further appropriations for Public Works are made, will continue for many years to constitute tremendous drains on the Federal Treasury."

Imagine a board of directors of a great corporation declaiming against the expenditure of money for the building of a badly needed fabrication plant because the obligation, if entered into, "would constitute a tremendous drain upon the resources of its treasury." This is not merely laissez faire; it is economic sclerosis. Needed or useful capital expenditures constitute assets and not liabilities. And at what better time can capital be invested in permanent improvements than in a period of depression, when it is comparatively cheap to build and when the employment of men will contribute to economic recovery?

If an investment in a permanent improvement constitutes an economic burden, then no addition to plant equipment in private ownership would ever be justified. As a matter of fact, the pursuit of this doctrine to its logical conclusion would inhibit not only additions to the plant but the initial building of the plant itself. It would mean that a man should not deposit money in a bank because the banker might lend it to an industrialist to increase the operating capacity of his factory. The only sound course to pursue would be to tie it up in the traditional sock and hide it under the mattress.

Many billions of dollars could properly be spent in the United States on permanent improvements that would add to our assets. Such spending would not only help us over depression periods, it would do much for the health, well-being, and prosperity of the people. I am unable to believe that providing an adequate water supply for a municipality or putting in a sewerage system is a wasteful outlay of money. Money spent in such fashion as to make our people healthier and happier human beings is not only a good social investment, it is sound from a strictly financial point of view. I can think of no better outlay, for instance, than money invested in education and health. In our first program, more than 24 percent of the 4,000 non-Federal projects were educational buildings, while in our present program the percentage is in excess of 50. Had it not been for public works, school construction in this country, already far below normal requirements, would indeed be in a sorry state today. Sound and well-trained minds in sound bodies would add more to the actual prosperity of this country, measured purely in money values, than anything else I can think of at the moment.

If we admit the theory that during a time of depression it is necessary to keep money pulsing in order to bring about a return of prosperity; and if the situation is such that, as has been the case during the last few years, only public moneys, whether National, State, or local, are available to supply the circulation without which health cannot be restored to our economic system, then I submit that there is no choice except for the people en masse to do what individuals cannot or will not do. They must invest in the future of America. If America has the economic resiliency that we believe it to have, there is little risk in such adventuring, provided that we are reasonably prudent.

And if public moneys are to be put into circulation—always, of course, within the bounds of reason—I am convinced that the soundest, safest, and most beneficial manner in which this can be done is through a Nation-wide building program. There are several arguments that can be made for public works, which, as it seems to me, are conclusive for this type of project, on the assumption that the Nation should undertake at all to join issue with a depression by directly stimulating employment.

In the first place, well-planned and built and worth-while public works constitute valuable assets. Directly or indirectly, they will yield a return to the community. In a very real sense they will be self-liquidating. Even in those cases where they do not make an equivalent return in actual dollars and cents, such projects as water works, sewerage systems, schoolhouses, hospitals, and others that could be enumerated do pay out handsomely, even if indirectly through the beneficial services that they render.

Another advantage of the types of public works that are under discussion is the widespread stimulation to employment that they give. The value to the Nation of a project cannot be measured alone in terms of the actual employment at the site. The most ephemeral type of project may, while it is in progress, employ at the site a large number of men as compared with, let us say, a bridge or a schoolhouse. However, the aggregate of those employed, directly and indirectly, in building a bridge or a schoolhouse may be as large as, or larger than, the number put to work on a temporary project. It is the indirect employment which is one of the chief values of and justifications for substantial public works as compared with unsubstantial construction; and the product is a permanent addition to the real wealth of the Nation.

Take the Pennsylvania Railroad project, for instance. Here was a straight loan to the Pennsylvania Railroad of approximately $70,000,000 at 4 percent (be it noted in passing that the major portion of the securities taken by the Government for this loan was subsequently sold by us at a profit of more than $2,000,000). This project consisted of finishing the electrification of the line from New York to Washington and of certain other portions of the road; of building new electric locomotives and freight cars; of changing old locomotives from passenger to freight; and of relining the old Union Tunnel in Baltimore. The project was completed in about 22 months. The direct employment numbered 15,000 men. The indirect employment probably ran to at least 30,000 men. The total employment, both direct and indirect, was scattered among 15 States.

Steel had to be fabricated, stone had to be quarried, concrete had to be manufactured, cars had to be built, trees had to be made into lumber, copper had to be melted into transmission lines, electric locomotives had to be built, and all of these materials and the final products into which they were transformed had to be transported from points of origin to final destination.

A similar story could be told of every project of a substantial character that is built. The benefits percolate into many communities in widely separated States. We think of the great Boulder Dam as local to Nevada, yet many millions of the money that have gone into the construction of that record-breaking project have been expended in States lying east of the Mississippi River.

Another fortunate result flowing from a public-works program is the stimulation that it affords to the producers' goods industries. If, as economists seem to agree, the measure of the success in overcoming a depression is the measure of the quantity of producers' goods that are manufactured, then it stands to reason that whatever has the effect of stimulating the heavy-goods industries will, more quickly than anything else, bring us out of a depression. It is a well-known fact that the greatest stimulation that can be afforded to the heavy-goods industries results from the construction of projects calling for materials for the production of which those industries must be drawn upon or for machinery and tools required to produce those materials.

A public-works program has all of the attributes required to stimulate business and industry and thus make a frontal attack upon a depression. It also has social qualities of a high order. It puts money into circulation; it creates permanent and valuable assets in return for the money expended; it has a tonic effect upon the production of producers' goods; it gives men employment at worth-while jobs; it increases Federal revenues. In addition to providing work directly at the site, it calls back to factory and quarry and railroad still other men to produce and transport the materials that are used at the site. Its benefits are widely diffused. I submit that there is nothing else that can be undertaken by the Government that is so well calculated to put an end to a depression as is a carefully planned and executed program of public works. But enough money must be spent to give a real stimulation.

There is hardly any limit to the amount of money that can legitimately and wisely be spent on public works in this country over a series of years. I will not pause to dwell on the need in every part of the land for schools, for sewerage systems, for new or improved waterworks, for power plants, or for public construction of other sorts. But, if I may, I will refer briefly to certain types of monumental public works that can be done on a national scale.

Three magnificent superhighways could be built from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast unmarred by billboards, hot-dog stands, or indiscriminately located service stations. These longitudinal highways could be bisected by three or four similar ones running from Canada to the Mexican border or to the Gulf coast. The westernmost of these north-south highways, with the consent of and in cooperation with our neighbor Canada, could extend into Alaska. And, strange as it may seem, the best opinion is that this road would be open to travel for the greater part of the year. Similarly one or two of these highways, if Mexico and our other neighbors farther south were willing, could stretch across Mexico and the countries of Central America down to the Canal Zone.

And why not consider lighting our highways? This would permit safe hauling of heavy freight at night and provide less dangerous traffic conditions in the winter months when the days are short.

I have long desired to see the elimination of every grade crossing in the United States, excepting only those on insignificant spur and branch lines that are scarcely ever used. Here, indeed, is an enterprise to engage the interest of the richest nation in the world. In these days of heavy motor traffic on many thousands of miles of improved roads radiating into every nook and corner of the United States the question of grade crossings is one of grave public concern; all the more so since our railroads, in order to meet the competition of airplanes and motor trucks and busses, are putting on lighter and faster trains.

It stands to reason that as motor vehicular traffic increases and additional light and fast trains are put into service by the railroads our grade crossings will become sources of even greater danger than they are at present. Our casualty list grows longer every year until it has become a matter of major importance. Nor should grade-crossing elimination be restricted to junctures between highways and railroads. In many parts of the United States where vehicular traffic is unusually heavy there should be grade separation at highway crossings. Not only would there be a precious saving in human life flowing from a separation of grade crossings, there would be a notable resulting economy in dollars and cents, to say nothing of the saving in time.

There are other great projects to be undertaken. The United States, in cooperation with local authorities, could enter upon a program for the correction of stream, lake, and coastal waters pollution. What a wonderful thing it would be if once again our streams were so pure that fish could live in all of them, that our children could swim without danger of contracting loathsome diseases, and that a dependable supply of uncontaminated water for domestic uses would be available. We could renew our forests more rapidly than we have done so far. Hundreds of millions of dollars are required for erosion correction and control. What remains of the public range requires careful attention if we are to maintain flocks and herds to supply our needs. (Of course, if our natural resources had been wisely and prudently used, it would not be necessary for us now and in the future to tax ourselves until it hurts in order to repair the ravages that are the direct result of uncontrolled and ruthless exploitation of selfish and greedy men.) Large sums of money could profitably be spent on flood control and on river-and-harbor improvement. Not the "pork barrel" type of project, but improvements that are needed and which will yield returns to the country in the future, both social and economic.

In the arid West there are still waters running to waste that can be impounded and used for the irrigation of immensely rich soil that is capable of furnishing homesteads for hundreds of thousands of happy and prosperous American families. That it will be necessary, in support of a sound national economy, sooner or later to irrigate every acre of land in the United States, which, if put under water, will yield profitable crops to the farmers, is not to be doubted. The fact that it is expedient now to restrict farm production is, in my judgment, only a temporary measure forced upon us as the result of past economic imprudence. If we are going to raise our standard of living, and that is something that we must and will do if we are to realize the ideal of America, we will need more food and not less food; more clothing and not less clothing; more shelter and not less shelter. This will mean that the land will be called upon to produce whatever it is able to produce to advantage, and this in its turn will mean more irrigation projects, especially in the great West.

When we consider irrigation we naturally think also of hydroelectric power. Great national projects for the production and distribution of power are something to which the Government can turn its hand in the future for the benefit of the people. Other Boulder Dams remain to be built. The many-sided Tennessee Valley experiment can be reproduced in varying degrees and on different scales in widely separated parts of the country.

Transcending in importance even great transcontinental highways or reclamation projects, or in fact any of the types of public works already referred to, would be a program of low-cost housing undertaken in all parts of the country. I can think of nothing in the way of building that would be so fully worthwhile or which would have such a quick, regenerative effect upon stagnating business. I have been, and continue to be, more interested in low-cost housing than in any other phase of public works. It might be said that the nature and the extent of the housing that America provides for those in the lowest income groups is the real measure of our civilization. We talk about building power projects here and there as yardsticks with which to measure the reasonableness of the charges of private plants. In a true sense, the insanitary, disease-breeding, vice-ridden, and fetid slum areas that can be found in every part of the United States is a measuring rod, and a shocking one at that, of man's inhumanity to man in a supposedly civilized and humanitarian country. For my part, I would not take it amiss if, during the next depression, every cent of the large Public Works fund that we ought to appropriate should go into decent houses for those in the lowest income groups. I am confident that such an investment would prove, from every point of view, to be the soundest that as a people we have ever made.

In fact, as I have indicated, there is practically no limit to the worth-while physical improvements that can be made in this country. But I want to repeat that any program of public works should be carefully planned in advance. It should be free from politics. It should be grounded firmly upon the principle of the greatest good of the greatest number of the people. I hope that we will never go through another depression, especially such a one as that from which, as I trust, we are now emerging. But there have been depressions, many of them, in the past, and there may be others in the future to bring us to our knees for our economic sins.

My own belief is that if we return to the old happy-go-lucky system of laissez faire we may expect other depressions that will be our just due. But we may at least hope that there is wise enough statesmanship and sufficient general intelligence in this country to profit by the experience of the recent past, so that we will be prepared to meet them wisely and with courage. And, in my opinion, we will not meet them wisely unless we have fully prepared our blue prints for a comprehensive and far-flung program of useful public works. Nor will we meet them with courage unless we are prepared to spend sums of money adequate to the need. We may not always be able to prevent fires, but at least we can keep them from spreading if we have trained and experienced firemen, up-to-date equipment, and a ready and sufficient supply of water.

Senator BARKLEY. In January 1933 Al Smith suggested the creation of a public-works dictator and declared that the Constitution be put on the shelf during an emergency. Do you subscribe to any such doctrine as that?

Secretary ICKES. I will let you have the first say on that, Senator.

Senator BARKLEY. I recall that some controversy arose between the campaign manager of that same gentleman in 1928 in my State and his opponent with respect to the charge that he was advocating socialism. Do you recall any language or debate, or any statement that the candidate for President made that might have some bearing on our present situation?

Secretary ICKES. Senator, by a strange coincidence, I have what appears to be the precise language. Let us look at the record. Here is the situation, as I understand it, from the record: Mr. Hoover, in 1928—on October 22, to be exact—at Madison Square Garden (remember, Mr. Smith was a candidate for the Democratic Party for President) said:

"Because the country is faced with difficulties and doubt over certain national problems—that is, prohibition, farm relief, and electrical power—our opponents propose that we must thrust government a long way into the business which gives rise to these problems. In effect they abandon the tenets of their own party and turn to state socialism as a solution."

In other words, he was accusing Mr. Smith of turning to state socialism. Last night Mr. Smith—I listened to him with a great deal of interest as he spoke of the foul breath of communistic Russia; he was appealing to class prejudice that he had just condemned; and he also referred to the flag of the godless Union of Soviets. It would seem that Mr. Smith last night adopted by unconscious assimilation—I don't call it plagiarism—in substance the language of Herbert Hoover in 1928. But what did Al Smith say in rejoinder to Herbert Hoover in 1928, when Herbert Hoover accused him of being socialistic? He said this, 2 days later in Boston, on October 24:

"The cry of socialism has been patented by the powerful interests that desire to put a damper upon progressive legislation. * * * Is this cry of socialism anything new? Not to a man of my experience. I have heard it raised by the reactionary elements and the Republican Party in my own State for a quarter of a century."

Well—so here we are.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a resolution passed by the Massachusetts Order of Sons of Italy on the subject of American neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the Massachusetts Order of the Sons of Italy:

Whereas the United States of America have long practiced in conflicts between and among other nations a strict neutrality featured by nonaction and continued friendliness with the belligerents; and

Whereas to change the Neutrality Act as now in effect in accordance with some of the bills now pending before the Congress of the United States would tend to destroy American commerce and to impair American prestige; and

Whereas any measures officially adopted by the United States of America in the present Italo-Ethiopian conflict which, though applied to both belligerents, would affect detrimentally only Italy, would not be the conduct of a neutral nation and would not be consistent with friendliness; and

Whereas to change the practice of neutrality as heretofore conceived and followed by the United States of America during and for the purpose of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict would in fact be unneutral, unfair, and contrary to the American characteristic of square dealing, and would be an act of unfriendliness, if not of hostility, toward Italy: Be it therefore

Resolved, That it is the sense of the members and representatives from different parts of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of lodges of the Massachusetts Grand Lodge of the Order of the Sons of Italy in America and of other organizations in meeting assembled in Faneuil Hall, Boston, on this 19th day of January 1936, that the Congress of the United States should not enact any changes in the practice of American neutrality heretofore followed and now in effect; that if the Congress of the United States should, in its wisdom, make any changes in the policy of neutrality for the future, such changes be not made operative and effective during the continuance of the Italo-Ethiopian conflict; that the Congress of the United States should do nothing to restrict free commerce with Italy in anything except arms and munitions; and that the Congress of the United States should not do anything which would in form and substance be unfriendly to Italy, a traditional friend of America; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of State, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the Clerk of the Senate, and to all the Massachusetts Members of both Houses of Congress.

NEUTRALITY

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to insert therein a speech I delivered over a National Broadcasting Co. hook-up on January 12 on the subject of neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered over the radio on January 10:

In the short time that is allotted to me I can only talk of a few phases of neutrality legislation. The eyes and ears of each and every one of the 120,000,000 people in the United States are turned upon Washington today—watching and listening to what is being done to keep our country out of war.

Neutrality is the most vital problem Congress is dealing with in the session which began on the 3d of this month. The echo of the sound of the Speaker's gavel had hardly died away before new bills were dropped into the basket—bills calling for varied degress of American aloofness from foreign disputes.

The Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate and the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, of which I am a member, are holding daily hearings on these bills. In the last previous session of Congress a neutrality bill was passed. It was rushed through both Houses, designed to cover the temporary need, with the idea that permanent legislation would be enacted later. I maintain it was wrong to take action so hastily, and I so expressed myself on the floor of Congress at that time. The act approved of an embargo of arms to belligerent nations, but other aspects of neutrality should have been considered and acted upon. There was no need for haste then; war had not been declared by any nation—and it is so much easier to pass permanent neutrality legislation before a conflict starts. However, it was the will of the majority that such temporary measures be taken, and we are now faced with the task of drawing up rules which will insure our absolute isolation from the present conflict or any other which may develop as a result of it. The legislation which we are now passing is for all time, not for an emergency. That is why it is so vital, so important to be right. The people want peace; they do not want war.

My plea today is that this legislation be not passed hastily. The most exhaustive and complete heafings should be held. We must secure the views of experts in neutrality laws. We must take every precaution possible to keep this country at peace. We must make sure that this measure will keep us neutral. We have had too many examples of the confusion and suffering caused by hastily considered legislation during the last 3 years, passed at the demand of those in power because their judgment, and theirs alone, said it was right. I have the greatest respect for the Secretary of State, but the administration's policy thus far has been as shifty as a weather vane. This peace which we all want so passionately must be considered dispassionately. If any one of you who is listening sat down and went over the different bills and heard the different witnesses, you would see why a permanent neutrality bill should not be passed hurriedly. This legislation affects every person in the United States; in its solution there can be no partisanship. There should be no alinement of party for or against this or that phase of the problem—no Republican; no Democrat; no New Deal; no North, South, East, or West; no group against group. We must work together for the best protection of all. That is imperative. No one section is more interested in wanting peace than another. It is universal.

Next in importance to the need for calm, deliberate consideration is the problem of how much or how little discretion in the operation of the law should be left to the President. With the record of the past 3 years of nine major laws proven to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, it makes us hesitate to give discretionary powers. If the administration were as indiscreet in its acts of neutrality as it was in passing unconstitutional laws, Americans very easily might become involved quickly in foreign conflicts. It is all very easy to talk with lips of fire, but it is decidedly unwise to use impulsive, snap judgment when the safety of the Nation is at stake. The youth of the country, who would be drafted in the event of war, to be sent to their deaths or worse, must not be experimented with. If they are to fight, it must be because it is the will of the Nation as a whole. To speak of but one section of a bill now receiving consideration, I call attention to section 4 of the McReynolds bill, the so-called administration measure. This section deals with the embargo of war materials and authorizes the President to use his discretion in this regard. Think of the power that such a clause would place in the hands of one man. Had such a power been used in the World War by President Wilson he could have brought the war to a prompt close, had he been so disposed, by shutting off the export of war materials to the Allies, and thus presented a victory to Germany. This clause, I am told, would even enable President Roosevelt to join with the League of Nations in imposing economic sanctions against warring nations, including Italy in the present Italo-Ethiopian conflict. The responsibility for peace lies with the Congress, not the President. It alone has the power to declare war—the responsibility for keeping us out of war must not be delegated. Congress is closer to the people than is the President. Its constant contact with those at home permit it to know and sense the feeling of the man on the street, the worker at his loom—and, after all, they are the people most vitally affected.

The language of a neutrality bill must be carefully weighed to prevent another drafting of the flower of America. I cannot believe that industry as a whole, even if it thinks a few more dollars can be made by trading with belligerent nations, would want to run the risk of another war. The temporary gain would be too greatly offset by the aftermath of conflict. We must take away the temptations of war. Excess profits earned at the cost of lives and suffering of our young men must never again prevail.

Any neutrality bill passed at this time should be mandatory rather than discretionary. It is a question also of whether or not this country wants to kill its trade entirely with neutral countries, for there are provisions in some of these bills which would shut this country up in a tight box so far as trading even with neutrals is concerned, and if legislation is not carefully drawn that might happen. The need for permanent legislation is urgent. Such a law must be lasting. Grave danger lies in the changing of policy after a war has started. No two wars are alike; the last war was different from any former conflict; the next will be different again. We must remember that a neutrality law will apply to every country in the world unless we except Latin America. We are not legislating just for the Italo-Ethiopian war. We must not fail to remember that no nation is entirely right, and likewise that no nation at war is entirely wrong.

This country is composed of every nationality. Some have been here longer than others, but even in the mind of those who have recently become American citizens I am sure America comes first. If it does not, they should go back to the country of their origin. They came here because they wanted the freedom of peace that America offered—and we intend to see that that peace is preserved. Never again does this country pull the chestnuts out of the fire for some other nation. We have learned our lesson, and our own troubles are so numerous and so difficult that we have neither the time nor the inclination to meddle in the affairs of others.

The dictionary defines a neutral as "a state or nation that refrains from aiding or interfering between belligerents." At first glance it would seem a simple matter to say that we will not aid or interfere between belligerents, but the problems of trade and neutrality always go side by side. Always can be found some business firm, grasping and alert enough to take advantage of loopholes in our laws which will permit the sale of goods to a warring nation, with the resulting high profits. There are many deep and technical questions to be considered. There is the definition of what constitutes contraband, what constitutes interference—how far we want to go in withdrawing our trade with a belligerent. Momentous questions these, and upon the answers depend the security and safety of each and every one of us. There are daring provisions in some of the bills now being considered in the committees of Congress—provisions that well might involve us in conflict if they became law The proponents of these bills are sincere in their belief that they are for the good of the country, that the provisions will be a safeguard for peace. They may be, but before action is taken every word, every phrase, every idea must be weighed and studied as to its possible future effect on our national position among the nations of the world.

I cannot urge too strongly, and I plead with each one of you who is listening to help us by your acts and your speech. Keep your ears and eyes open to detect propaganda at all times. Every one of you must constitute yourself as a watchman on the lookout for those who want to embroil us in the disputes of foreign nations. We want no entangling alliances. We want to be left alone. We have our own war, but it is an economic one, and it is taking all of our effort, all of our resources to win it.

THE BRIAND-KELLOGG PACT

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a newspaper statement made by myself in relation to the Briand-Kellogg Pact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following newspaper statement made by myself December 26, 1935, in relation to the Briand-Kellogg Pact:

President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Hull have announced that the Briand-Kellogg Pact is the cornerstone of American foreign policy, and they are now using this pact to support English imperialism and to maintain English control of the Mediterranean in the present Italian controversy with Ethiopia, England, and the League of Nations.

This pact, falsely and mendaciously called a peace pact, a pact to outlaw war, is now being used to involve the United States in European quarrels and in a European war. It means war for the United States, not peace, and it should be abrogated at once. A resolution to effect that purpose will be introduced when the Congress reconvenes on January 3.

This pact was intended to destroy the neutrality of the United States, and is doing so. At the time of its adoption it was openly stated by Prime Minister Briand, of France, its cosuthor, that its purpose was to enlist the aid of the United States in enforcing the Covenant of the League of Nations. It is now being used precisely for this purpose by President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull, notwithstanding that the United States refused to join the League of Nations and to enter the League Court, because the United States was determined not to become involved in the political affairs and the wars of Europe.

Alien minds conceived this pact, and it was adopted by propaganda paid out of alien funds.

The pact, as originally proposed, renounced war as an instrument of national policy. It provided that the nations henceforth should seek the settlement of their disputes only by pacific means. However, it was made a complete nullity and absurdity before it was adopted, first by statements made by Mr. Kellogg, and then by exceptions and reservations made by other governments.

Mr. Kellogg declared that any war of self-defense would not violate the treaty. The words "self-defense" were not defined. Each nation was to be its own judge of what constituted "self-defense." No nation in modern times has waged a war that it did not claim was in self-defense. Nor is any country likely to make a war in the future without claiming that it is in self-defense.

England reserved the right to make war in unspecified areas whenever her vital interests were affected; in other words, she reserved the right to make war in any place in the world at any time.

The pact exempted any wars by the League of Nations, any wars incident to the Locarno Treaty, and any wars incident to the so-called French treaties of alliance.

Thus, the pact did not outlaw war; on the contrary, it gave the most solemn sanction of specific wars that has ever been given to the world. The naked fact is that this pact was not a "peace pact" but a "war pact." It was a most preposterous delusion and fraud. It is repugnant to common sense and indeed to sanity.

This pact, when signed, was hailed by emotionalists and sentimentalists with the positive assertion that it would abolish war and would result in disarmament. The exact contrary occurred. No sooner had the pact been signed than the nations of the world, with the United States in the lead with a great cruiser program, began to increase their armaments on an unprecedented scale, and they are now more massively armed than ever before. Hardly had the pact been signed than a war broke out between Bolivia and Paraguay, which continued for 3 years: then there began a war between Japan and China, which has not yet ended; now there is a war between Italy and Ethiopia and one immediately imminent between England and Italy and between Italy and the League of Nations. All of these warring nations except Bolivia were signers of this delusive pact which actually sanctions wars and which is entangling the United States in European conflicts.

It was this peace pact, this pact to outlaw war, upon which the maladroit and disloyal Mr. Stimson, former Secretary of State, based his unwarranted action in intervening in the dispute between Japan and China, which intervention brought the United States to the brink of war with Japan. It is this pact which today is leading the United States to intervene in the affairs of Europe and is threatening the embroilment of the United States in the impending wars there.

If the United States is to remain a neutral nation, if the United States is to preserve her honor and her independence of judgment and action in world affairs, the Briand-Kellogg Pact must be abrogated.

The American people do not favor our joining every war that breaks out in the vain hope of preserving world peace. They do not favor a pact which has already led to the alienation of two great powers, Japan and Italy, and which, if continued, can lead only to universal hatred of the United States.

Joint resolution providing for the withdrawal by the United States from the so-called Kellogg-Briand treaty, signed on August 27, 1928

Whereas the so-called Kellogg Peace Pact, also known as the Kellogg-Briand peace treaty, contrary to popular misconception, does not declare war to be illegal even as between the signatories and does not either in terms or in effect outlaw war; and

Whereas the signatories merely agree as a general proposition not to resort to war among themselves, but through interpretations and reservations, insisted upon in negotiating the pact, they, except the United States, have sanctioned war for a variety of causes; and

Whereas in entering into the treaty it was distinctly understood by all the parties that a nation may go to war when its vital interests are involved without violating its obligations under the treaty, and that it rests with the nation concerned to determine for itself, and wholly in its own discretion, what its vital interests are and when they are involved; and

Whereas by the terms of the treaty the only legal consequence of the participation by any of the parties in a war with any of the others is to terminate all obligations of any of the parties under the treaty, and there is nothing therein which would justify an international tribunal in holding that a war between any of the parties was unlawful or that either belligerent was liable under the treaty for damages for a breach of an international obligation; and

Whereas the treaty adds nothing to international law except to sanction war for a variety of causes, and, whatever may be its moral effect, its legal effect is wholly negligible; and

Whereas the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate, in a report on this treaty submitted to the Senate on January 15, 1929, stated its understanding of the treaty to be as follows:

"The committee further understands that the treaty does not provide sanctions, express or implied. Should any signatory to the treaty or any nation adhering to the treaty violate the terms of the same, there is no obligation or commitment, express or implied, upon the part of any of the other signers of the treaty to engage in punitive or coercive measures as against the nation violating the treaty. The effect of the violation of the treaty is to relieve the other signers of the treaty from any obligation under it with the nation thus violating the same.

"In other words, the treaty does not, either expressly or impliedly, contemplate the use of force or coercive measures for its enforcement as against any nation violating it. It is a voluntary pledge upon the part of each nation that it will not have recourse to war except in self-defense, and that it will not seek settlement of its international controversies except through pacific means. And if a nation sees proper to disregard the treaty and violate the same, the effect of such action is to take it from under the benefits of the treaty and to relieve the other nations from any treaty relationship with the said power.

"This treaty in no respect changes or qualifies our present position or relation to any pact or treaty existing between other nations or governments";

Whereas an American Secretary of State, in a recent administration, undertook to interpret this treaty, contrary to the above stated understanding, as imposing upon the United States, as a party to the treaty, an international obligation to confer with the other signatories in case of a war or a threat of war between any of the parties for the purpose of agreeing upon their individual and collective action with the view of enforcing peace, thereby jeopardizing American neutrality in an Asiatic conflict, and prejudicing the good relations between the United States and Japan; and

Whereas the Government of the United States rejects any interpretation of this treaty which would impose on the United States any obligation "to engage in punitive or coercive measures as against a nation violating the treaty", and desires furthermore to prevent a repetition of any further misinterpretation of this treaty by the executive branch of the Government as imposing any obligation on the United States to take any action against another party to the treaty for violating either its spirit or its terms; and

Whereas, in view of the foregoing considerations, this treaty obviously is more likely to involve the United States in regrettable international complications than to advance the cause of peace; and

Whereas this treaty gives to many well-meaning but short-sighted people in the United States a false feeling of security in the belief that it will bring about peace on earth, and encourages them to jeopardize our safety by opposing measures for adequate national defense, and at the same time encourages European politicians to believe that the United States, by virtue of this treaty, will be drawn into foreign entanglements requiring armed intervention on our part in case of another European war: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States cause an official notification on behalf of the Government of the United States to be sent to the other signatories that it withdraws its participation in the so-called Kellogg-Briand treaty and disclaims thereby any responsibility under it.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY LEGISLATION THREATENS THE COLLAPSE OF WESTERN CIVILIZATION

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remark in the RECORD and to include therein a letter by Justice Salvatore A. Cotillo, of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, on the subject of neutrality.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KENNEDY of New York. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter from Hon. Salvatore A. Cotillo, a justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York, in reference to a memorandum submitted by Judge Cotillo on the question of American neutrality legislation:

NEW YORK CITY, January 20, 1936.

Hon. MARTIN J. KENNEDY,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: My deep personal interest, as an American, in the neutrality bills before Congress for consideration compels me to write to you.

I speak as an American. I divorce myself completely and entirely from my office as a justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York. It would be presumptuous for me to appear before you in any other category.

I have prepared a memorandum brief to which I have given considerable time and attention and reflection as well.

If a reading of this brief will clarify some of the tangled issues in neutrality, I feel it will have served its purpose. I ask for it a careful perusal, as I know you doubtlessly do and must give to the writings on this important topic so vitally affecting America.

You no doubt are being flooded with booklets and memoranda relative to this topic from peace societies and others. Some of this literature, no doubt, is helpful. I refer specifically to the publications issued by the Carnegie Foundation and the international conciliation groups. I have attempted, in my limited means, an analysis of their doctrine and desire you to know that in making my statements I am impelled by no other thought other than to help keep America within the traditional channels of past neutrality.

I myself have received so much good from America that there is nothing I can do to adequately repay this country for its generosity and fair play to me who came here as an immigrant boy.

Because America's decision vitally affects the interests of other nations, it is not going to be easy, I presume, to keep within the issues and not be affected by sentiment. Therefore, I entertain the feeling that a careful reading of this accompanying brief will be of some little aid in helping you arrive at the right decision. When I say "right decision", I mean the only decision which is beneficial to America and fair to all the composite racial elements which go to make up our diversified people.

Hoping you will appreciate the thoughts that actuated me in this modest effort and that I am moved only by the desire to be of some service to my country, I beg to remain,

Cordially yours,

SALVATORE A. COTILLO,
An American Citizen.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address I made over the Columbia Broadcasting System on the 26th of this month on the Townsend bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. GASSAWAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on January 25:

Some public officials are afraid to discuss issues that might bring the wrath of the public down upon them. But I am taking the opportunity given me by the Columbia Broadcasting Co. to discuss briefly what is known as the Townsend plan. Some men are afraid to say "no" to this plan and take the consequences, or ashamed to say "yes" and apologize in private. My opposition to the plan may cost me my seat in Congress. But, regardless of its political aspects, I feel it is my sacred duty to help expose this unsound scheme. Any subject of this nature needs to be talked about.

The Townsend plan offers all persons over 60 years of age a pension of $200 a month, providing they spend it all that same month. Dr. Townsend says that about seven and a half million people want the pension. He wants $18,000,000,000 a year to pay this pension; but, if his figures are correct, it will come nearer to requiring twenty-five billion a year to pay it. Now, the Townsend plan is calculated to save all of the old people from the poorhouse, make jobs for their children, stimulate business so that the depression will end overnight, and cure all the other evils and ills of the country. Dr. Townsend proposes to do this by paying the paltry sum of $200 a month to approximately 11,000,000 people.

If we are going to consider this plan a good one, then I want you to listen to my plan, because I have a better one. My plan is as simple as the Townsend plan. Instead of giving the people who have passed 60 years of age $200 a month, I want to give them $2,000 a month. And, considering the fact that people from 50 to 60 years of age are more active than those who are past 60, I propose to give them $5,000 a month. Now, all of you know that the most active business years of any person is from 40 to 50 years of age, and I will give those persons $10,000 a month. Those of us who have lived half a century or more realize that from 20 to 40 years are the years where we have to go to parties and dances and have a hilarious time, generally speaking, and for that class of people I would suggest $20,000 a month. Now, realizing that the oncoming citizens must be prepared to take their respective places in the business, social, and political world, I would suggest a blanket sum of $50,000 for their education. And let's not stop here. A certain wonderful woman who has advocated birth control could have her plan adopted and pay $100,000 for not even being born.

Of course, you ask: "Where are you going to get the money?" The same question has been asked Dr. Townsend, and he proposes a 2-percent transaction or turn-over tax. I propose placing a tax on people for crooning over the radio, or for playing a saxophone, or for going to church or not going to church, for running for office, or for proposing plans for relief, or for naming Pullman cars—Oh, there are a thousand ways we could procure the money that would be in keeping with the plan advocated by the good doctor. Certainly you are going to say that my plan will wreck the country. If my plan will wreck the country, so will the Townsend plan, because both are based on the same theory. But if we must wreck the country by adopting some fool plan, let's do it in a big way. Adopt old GASSAWAY'S plan and while it lasts we will have one grand big spree.

And another thing, I won't charge any dues to belong to my club.

Now, seriously, my friends, I want to discuss some of the angles of the Townsend plan's madness in an effort to protect and warn millions of faithful and trusting old men and women in this Nation from being led into disillusionment and destruction. Surrounded by the deceptive web of being an old-age pension and getting its energy from religious and emotional enthusiasm not germane to the real issues, the Townsend plan has ensnared the faith and support of many of our good old people. Personally I have nothing unkind to say about Dr. Townsend. As for him and his part in this thing, I do not doubt that he sincerely feels that his plan will bring the millennium. I think that he has hypnotized himself by his own enthusiasm.

I say the Townsend plan is impossible because there is not enough money to pay $200 a month pension to our old folks. You may say that the plan does not propose such a sum. Let us read the Townsend Weekly of December 30 last, which says: "There has never been nor will be any compromise on the $200 a month pension." Yet the McGroarty bill now pending in Congress, and which has been generally recognized as the official Townsend bill, provides for approximately $40 a month. On the other hand, I have in my possession literature signed and circulated by Dr. Townsend which also makes no compromise on a smaller sum. But even the good doctor contradicts himself, because on page 1126 of the printed hearings before the House Ways and Means Committee on the Economic Security Act Dr. Townsend testified as follows:

"Nobody has been fool enough to expect that we could take 10,000,000 old folk and put them on a $200-a-month basis without putting this country into debt considerably. There never has been any idea that 10,000,000 people would be retired immediately."

Now, Dr. Townsend, you may not think there are fools who believe your statement to the committee, but letters I am receiving every day from all over the United States prove otherwise. Your organizers and collectors in the field are not telling your club members the same story you tell under oath before a congressional committee. Furthermore, let me read you a few words from your own official literature, which I have just received through the mail from your California office: "The miracle of 10 cents. An original investment of 10 cents a month by a Townsend Club member will pay a return of $199.90 a month for the first few months after the Townsend plan becomes law, and then it will pay $200 a month for life." This 4-page pamphlet contains one of the most insipid pleas for donations of money I have ever read. It even begs the old people to deny themselves the necessities of life in order to pay club dues.

I am emphasizing this money-collection angle of the Townsend plan for a very obvious reason. That money angle happens to be the reason for the Townsend plan. I charge here and now that it is nothing more or less than a racket—the most damnable racket ever perpetrated because it appeals to the despair and fear of old men and women, feeble and helpless and uninformed and unprotected. Why, the very official stationery of the Townsend movement reads: "Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd." Yes; limited. Limited to the pockets of the organizers who are reaping the harvest of these huge sums donated by gullible club members.

Another Townsend supporter, Congressman MONAGHAN, while making a speech on January 8, 1936, before Congress, was asked the following question by Congressman BLANTON, of Texas: "Then the 2-percent transaction tax would cover the purchase of every bottle of milk and every loaf of bread?" "That is correct," Mr. MONAGHAN replied. Again, in the same speech, Mr. MONAGHAN admitted the Townsend plan is unconstitutional. Mr. BLANTON asked: "Under the Constitution the Congress had no power whatever to tax all the people for the benefit of a certain class. Nowhere in the Constitution is there power given to Congress to tax all the people in order to pay a gratuity to any particular class?" "I believe the gentleman has stated the proposition correctly," Mr. MONAGHAN replied.

I would like to have had the pleasure of having Dr. Townsend answer this speech, but he has seen fit to take the advice of Horace Greely and go west. The gentleman from Oklahoma, Hon. Gomer Smith, who debated this question with Congressman CELLER in New York Thursday night, was supposed to pinch-hit for the good doctor, but he too has checked out of a palatial hotel in Washington and has taken the western trail.

You may think this is not true, but let Dr. Townsend, who was to follow me and would not divide time equally with me, explain, if he can, what is being done with the huge sums of money collected by his organizers throughout the Nation. If they have the millions of members they claim, then they have collected a tremendous amount of money. Then, what goes with the revenue from the subscriptions to the Townsend Weekly newspaper, the sale of buttons, pamphlets, and other items distributed by headquarters? Who get the dividends from this corporation known as "Old Age Revolving Pensions, Ltd."? Who are the officers and stockholders, and how are they chosen, and when?

Now, Dr. Townsend proposed a 2-percent transaction tax. Plain figures clearly show that a tax so small cannot raise enough money to pay the Townsend pensions. There is no tax the American people can pay that will get the money. And, speaking of taxes, I want to quote from a speech of Congressman MARK WILCOX, of Florida, delivered in Congress on January 20, 1936. He said: "Taxes destroy. Wealth cannot be created by taxation. The money which they propose to circulate—referring to the Townsend plan—is to be first exacted from the people of the Nation. If this money was to be raised from some outside source, it would undoubtedly make us a rich people. When a man is sick he can sometimes be saved by a blood transfusion. By giving him an additional blood supply to circulate in his veins he is given renewed strength and energy. But this blood must come from an outside source. It certainly would do him no good to pump his own blood out of one arm into the other. This would not give him any new blood, but the shock of the operation probably would kill him. And so it is with the Townsend plan."

As I close, I want to ask Dr. Townsend a few questions:

First, just how many people are actually enrolled in Townsend clubs? What is the total annual income from all sources—buttons, newspapers, pamphlets, gratuitous contributions, and otherwise? How much of this money goes for salaries? What are the salaries and commissions, or dividends, paid? Why don't you play fair with your victims and tell them where their money is going?

Why is a transaction tax any less burdensome and obnoxious than a sales tax? How much average tax would a family spending $150 a month have to pay? Is it not a fact that a 2-percent transaction or turnover tax would actually amount to 30 or 40 percent increase of any article of common purchase?

Doctor, is it not a fact that throughout the United States today you have professional organizers who are accepting money from old persons who have been led to believe your story of a Utopian era, and, Doctor, is it not a fact that at this time you are maintaining a large office force, and that you have spacious office quarters in Washington, and that about 18 months ago you started out with $7.76 given to you in California? And, Doctor, isn't it a fact that every penny of the money you promise these old people would have to be paid by a tax on the people, and tell me, do you think there is such a thing as a good tax? Will you answer these questions I have asked you?

As I close I want to say in no uncertain terms that I favor an old-age pension, one that is reasonable and possible, and within the ability of the people to pay. I was for a pension long before Dr. Townsend's plan was ever heard of. I am not unmindful of the plight of many of our people. My own dear old mother—82 years old—God bless her, I hope she is listening in. Two hundred dollars a month would give her many luxuries she does not now have. But I know the Townsend plan cannot work and that she cannot ever get any benefits from such a scheme.

She taught me that we gain only by honest toil. History teaches that the only way to create wealth is to earn it by hard work. We must forget these crackpot schemes and return to the teachings of our forefathers.

Last Sunday I visited Arlington Cemetery and stood with my head bared at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. This boy sacrificed his life in support of his Government. He was not asking his Government to take care of him, but by his supreme sacrifice we learn again this great truth, the Government cannot support the people, the people must support the Government.

INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland submitted the following conference report on the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee":

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Company of America, Incorporated, A. S. Postnikoff, trustee", having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount inserted by the Senate, insert the following: "$900,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

AMBROSE J. KENNEDY,
ROBERT RAMSPECK,
WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
Managers on the part of the House.

M. M. LOGAN,
WALLACE H. WHITE, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4178) for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon.

There was only one amendment to the bill by the Senate, as follows: On page 1, line 7, the amount of "$968,748.12" was struck out and the amount of "$658,050" was inserted in lieu thereof.

The House passed the bill for the full amount of $968,748.12, and its reduction by the Senate was apparently based upon the premise that if the shoes, 107,000 pairs of them which are the basis of the claim, had been returned to the United States from Vladivostok, Siberia, it would have cost $4.65 per pair.

Now the shoes were sold at the price of $10.80 per pair, and in hearings held before the Senate Committee on Claims, it was stated that this price included various items of transportation by rail, rail and marine insurance, customs duty, cost of handling, and other overhead expenses, amounting in all to approximately $4.65 per pair. Accordingly, assuming that the claimant intended to return the shoes to Boston, original port of shipping, and further assuming that by deducting $4.65 from the Russian sale price of $10.80 the company would have realized $6.15 per pair had the shoes been returned to this country and sold, the Senate reduced the amount carried in the bill to $658,050, or the sale proceeds of 107,000 pairs at $6.15 each.

By an examination of the original transportation documents and insurance policies it has been determined that the actual cost of returning the shoes to the United States at the time would have been but 41.56 cents per pair, and not the combined costs of $4.65 per pair, as explained above. It is manifest, therefore, that the Senate reduction was made on an erroneous proposition, and that but $44,469 would have been the correct cost of reshipment for the entire 107,000 pairs of shoes.

Since the Senate believes that the claimant would have reshipped its product to this country, and giving the Government the benefit of any doubt as to what the actual cost of reshipment would have been, the conferees have agreed upon the sum of $900,000 as a fair reimbursement to claimant company. There is attached hereto an itemized statement showing all costs per pair of shoes incurred by claimant for transportation and handling.

AMBROSE J. KENNEDY,
ROBERT RAMSPECK,
WILLIAM A. PITTENGER,
Managers on the part of the House.

CLAIM FOR RELIEF OF INTERNATIONAL MANUFACTURERS' SALES CO. OF AMERICA, INC.

These calculations are based upon original transportation documents such as bills of lading, insurance policies, etc.

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4178) entitled "An act for the relief of the International Manufacturers' Sales Co. of America, Inc., A. S. Postnikoff, trustee."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the conference report the gentleman just presented?

Mr. KENNEDY of Maryland. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, January 29, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

COMMITTEE MEETING

COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS

There will be a meeting of the Committee on the Public Lands on Wednesday, January 29, 1936, at 11 a. m., in room 328, House Office Building, for the purpose of H. R. 8137, by Hon. COMPTON I. WHITE, of Idaho, "To add public lands to the Salmon National Forest in the State of Idaho."

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 29, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we rejoice that the things which gladden, enrich, and perfect life are Thy gifts; Thou, O Lord, art the supreme Giver and the source of all our blessings. We pray that our thoughts and affections may be centered on Thee, forgetting not Thy benefits. Through Thee we have the eternal faithfulness and love which constitute the essential glory and the well-being of human life; help us to walk in Thy wisdom with grateful hearts. Forgive our faults and temper, which often lessen our influence and mar the force and beauty of the finer qualities of character. Take unto Thy care our Speaker and all other Members of the Congress; give them health and strength in the accomplishment and fulfillment of their high calling. Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing that you may abound in hope and in the power of the Holy Spirit. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, this 29th day of January 1936 is the ninety-third anniversary of the birth of our martyred President, William McKinley.

I speak of him in no partisan spirit, for he and his accomplishments belong to all people of all parties and to the ages.

In these days of hustle, bustle, and confusion, when we are so intent upon those matters which pertain to the material, we should, nevertheless, take time to pay proper respect to the memory of those with whom we have been associated, and to those men who have in days gone by contributed so much of themselves for the good of us all.

The record discloses that in these very Halls William McKinley was uncompromising on every question of principle, unswerving in party fealty, courteous to his opponents, impersonal in debate, and, as the leader of his party, one who discharged his duty with courtesy and fairness, and in so doing achieved significant and conspicuous success as a legislator.

As Governor of Ohio, he was firm and unyielding in his enforcement of the law. He made duty, honor, and integrity the criterion of his administration.

As President of the United States, he stood by the helm and piloted the ship through stormier seas than had been faced by any other President since Lincoln. No man in the White House ever has commanded in greater measure the sincere respect, good will, and genuine affection of the people, and as Chief Magistrate of the Nation the full measure of his greatness as a man stands revealed.

On the pedestal of that statue which stands before the imposing monument at Canton are inscribed these words:

WILLIAM M'KINLEY

President of the United States

A statesman singularly gifted to unite the discordant forces of government and mould the diverse purposes of men toward progressive and salutary action. A Magistrate whose poise of judgment was tested and vindicated in a succession of national emergencies—good citizen—brave soldier—wise Executive—helper and leader of men—exemplar to his people of the virtues that build and conserve the state, society, and the home.

On this, then, the anniversary of his birth, may we not well say of him, in the words of Drummond, that "he lives who dies to win a lasting name."

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, on January 21, by formal resolution, this House paid its mark of respect to the late British King by adopting a resolution of adjournment. That resolution was debatable, and on that occasion I sought to obtain recognition. I failed to obtain recognition, and voiced my protest by voting "no." Immediately thereafter, the newspapermen, sensing some value in that action, asked me my reasons. I told them that I did not believe that it was consistent with democracy to pay such a lavish tribute by adjourning out of respect to the memory to a foreign king; that I recalled it was during the reign of King George V that many of the Irish people, including my relatives and friends, were murdered when the "black and tan" invasion came to Ireland. That army was recruited from the White Chapel slum district of London and from the jails of England. That army went over to Ireland and murdered those people because they dared to express the same sentiment that Patrick Henry expressed in the Virginia House of Delegates. That they preferred death to a denial of liberty. I do not want to be charged with making a statement to the newspapers that I would not make on the floor of this House if I had the opportunity and was in order. That is why I asked for time to make this statement.

The papers carried this story, and I have been subjected to criticism because, I have been told, I was showing bad taste to rise in a democracy and register my right of protest as a Member of this House. I think it borders on a question of privilege, but I do not care to raise that question. I want the RECORD to show that I protest against the action of this House in paying a $50,000 tribute to the memory of King George of England. That is what it cost the taxpayers—the expense of running the House for 1 day.

I have nothing against King George personally. May God have mercy on his soul. But I despise the symbol which he represented, just as our forefathers despised that symbol in the days of the American Revolution. He represented the symbol of imperialism. I say, therefore, I am disgusted with the toadyism and the desire of some of our American people to again become subservient to England and bring about the dream of the late Andrew Carnegie and other West Britons—an American-British union.

Mr. Speaker, I find no fault with the President of the United States in his action. He had a perfect right, and he was on solid ground, in sending a message of condolence to the bereaved family. I have no fault to find with the Secretary of State in calling upon the British Embassy and the Dominion Ministers' offices to pay his formal and official respects; but I do say it was going a little too far to cause this House to adjourn on that occasion, precedents to the contrary notwithstanding. I have searched the record, and I do not find anywhere in the annals of the British Government that the British Parliament ever adjourned out of respect to the memory of a dead President of the United States. We are going too far, and it seems to me we are getting into the same atmosphere we got into just before the last World War. We are going to have British influence surround us in connection with the coming neutrality resolution. We are on the eve of another world war. Now, it seems, we are getting ready once again to pull England's chestnuts out of the fire. I pray to God we may not repeat the terrible blunder we made in 1917.

Mr. Speaker, I was in Europe after the "black and tan" invasion and I saw the wounds it left on Ireland. I saw the fresh graves and the property that was destroyed. I went over to England and visited the House of Parliament. I talked to British officials. I discussed the fact that this country saved Britain at the time of the last war. I was met with the contemptible answer, "You came in too late. You just came in to save your own face and your own hide." Ask any Yankee boy who was over there in the Army and who made contact with the British Tommy. He will tell you the same sentiments were expressed to him. We gave them the money and we gave them the men. All we received was scorn and condemnation. I make no apology for my action on the floor of the House in voting "no." I am sorry I was not recognized at the time. I have no feeling against the Speaker of the House. With his name, his background, and his reputation, I am sure he is a good American.

Mr. Speaker, nothing is more nauseating to me, an American-born citizen and a Member of the Congress of the United States, than to witness the supine debasement of patriotism on the part of many officials in this country, and especially in the Nation's Capital. The atmosphere of official Washington, generally charged with the aroma of pro-British influence, suddenly became surcharged with the passing of King George V. One would have thought from the lavish external manifestation of lamentation and grief that we were still a part of the British Empire.

The subsidized press of the Nation, many of them former recipients of the financial bounty of one late Lord Northcliff, who propagandized this Nation into the last World War by publicising the false charges of cruel atrocities inflicted upon the women and children of Belgium by the German soldiers, spread themselves and devoted space to the passing of the King comparable only to the Lindbergh tragedy.

No event in the life of the late "democratic King" was overlooked. The same newspapers will continue to engage our sympathy and respect from now until the coronation of the new ruler, Edward VIII, by feeding us the maudlin, sentimental stories of his life from the cradle to the Crown. You have to hand the palm to the British as being past masters of clever propaganda.

We have entered into an official period of mourning for the King of England. The House of Representatives of the United States adjourned. In his honor a congressional reception scheduled for January 23 and all official receptions have been postponed. This establishes a precedent which may be followed with the passing of a Hitler, a Mussolini, or any other king or potentate, and commits us to a "Hands across the sea" policy, heretofore repugnant to the free institutions of the United States.

Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, may I suggest with all due respect that Washington's Farewell Address be not only read to the Members of the House on his birthday, February 22, but at the conclusion of the rendition of divine invocation each day by the Chaplain that the masterpiece of the Father of this Republic be intoned, especially that portion of it that warns us "to avoid entangling alliances with foreign powers."

The most dangerous influence in the United States today comes through agencies sustained by the Carnegie Foundation. Especially do I refer to the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, which is the spearhead of internationalism in America. Add to that the English Speaking Union and the Sulgrave Institution. They lose no opportunity to acquaint us with the superior complex of the British as a governing class.

It was the dream of the late Andrew Carnegie, and so expressed in his Triumphant Democracy, published in 1893, to bring about a British-American union. On pages 548–549 of the book referred to Mr. Carnegie says:

> Time may dispel many pleasing illusions and destroy many noble dreams, but it shall never shake my belief that the wound caused by the wholly unlooked-for and undesired separation of the mother from her child is not to bleed forever.
> Let men say what they will; therefore, I say that as surely as the sun in the heavens once shone upon Britain and America united, so surely is it one morning to rise, shine upon, and greet again the reunited state, the "British-American Union."

This excerpt so incensed the American public by its boldness and its evidence of unpatriotism that it was deliberately deleted from the subsequent editions of Triumphant Democracy published. Since that date, however, the sentiment expressed in the former edition is carried into the edition published in 1933, and is indicated in this language on page 407:

> That the bonds between my dear native land and my beloved adopted land may be strengthened and drawn more tightly together. For sure am I, who am in part the child of both, and whose love for the one and the other is as the love of man for mother and wife, sure am I that the better these grand divisions of the British race know each other the stronger will grow the attachment between them, and just as sure am I that in their genuine affection and indissoluble alliance lie the best hopes for the elevation of the human race. God grant, therefore, that the future of my native and adopted lands may fulfill the hope of the stanchest, ablest, and most powerful friend of this land and the Great Commoner of his own, that "although they may be two nations, they may be but one people."

Mr. Speaker, I believe it would be fitting and proper for the Congress of the United States, heretofore bent upon disclosing subversive propaganda destructive to the best interests of this Republic, to investigate the activities of these specific agencies to which I referred.

If an American citizen dares to publicly express his resentment against the influence of the British Crown in this country, especially if that citizen happens to be of Irish extraction, he is immediately characterized as a cheap politician and a "twister of the lion's tail."

My first allegiance is to this my native land. I have and always will be a sympathizer of those subject people who are still denied the liberty that we enjoy. Thanks to the sacrifice of a Washington, a Barry, a Moylan, and a host of others who were not afraid to risk their lives to bring this Republic into being. Before I ever held public office, from a thousand platforms I condemned the dissemination of British propaganda in this country. I publicly opposed our entry into the last World War, knowing full well that we would emerge from that conflict with terrific loss of life and money, and that England, as of old, would emerge with thousands of miles of more territory added to her far-flung dominion and millions of human beings over which she would hold subjection.

Mr. Speaker, "Forewarned is forearmed." The recent information coming from the Nye Munitions Investigation Committee that a former war President of the United States knew of the existence of secret treaties before he entered the council at Versailles, that records were falsified before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, is a startling disclosure.

We have been in the past and will unless we assert our rights again become the cat's-paw of clever British diplomacy. The influence of Great Britain brought about the cancelation of several billion dollars of war debts. Its influence, combined with the influence of the international bankers, brought about in 1931 a moratorium on the debt due from our allies of the last war, beneficial chiefly to the British Government.

There is now and there has been ever since the termination of hostilities in the last World War an agitation in favor of complete cancelation of the war debts. How far we will go in sustaining this position no man can tell. Suffice to say that if we continue our efforts to become a member of the League of Nations and the World Court, we will be involved in the internal affairs of Europe, and the cancelation of war debts is assured.

May I suggest now that we have given official exhibition of our grief in the passing of the late British King that we endorse the old British custom by giving public utterance, "That the king is dead; long live the king"; that we send a delegation representing the American Congress to attend the coronation ceremonies in honor of His Highness King Edward VIII, and that we express by resolution our regrets that common sense and forbearance did not inspire our Revolutionary fathers to avoid disaster and dissolution from the mother country instead of the physical force that they resorted to at Bunker Hill and Valley Forge.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I was not only somewhat astounded but chagrined to read in the morning paper the following headline:

> Marine Band "plays" vengeful New Deal tune; walks out behind Navy on women patriots.

As I understand it, this women's patriotic organization that is meeting in this city at the present time represents some 500,000 of the leading patriotic women of America; women from all parts of the country, from all walks of life, and from all political parties, who are primarily interested in maintaining national defense and the continuation of present day American institutions.

The Marine Band, which we are all proud to call one of the premier musical organizations of this country, is supported by the taxpayers' money, and belongs to the people. It is for all the people of the United States, and I never supposed before that they, in any way, represented any special political party or stood for any special political interests. Politics are not a part of the daily routine of the Naval Establishment. The only reason yet assigned for their leaving this organization last night is the fact that these women had the temerity to listen to an outstanding constitutional address by one of the leading students of the Constitution and one of the leading Democrats of the country, a man who had been closely allied with and held a high post in the Wilson administration, and as far as I know, has always maintained his Democratic regularity. Of course, in this speech he did criticize the New Deal, and a man could hardly discuss the Constitution at the present without doing that, but has the time come in this country when free American citizens cannot criticize the acts of the administration? As far as I know, never has anything of this character happened before.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. And it certainly was most astonishing to hear that such a thing as this could happen in Washington, the seat of the Nation's Government.

Is this, as a matter of fact, a forerunner of what Mr. Farley said would be the bitterest and the dirtiest campaign in American history? It certainly looks like something along that line, and I am wondering if the time has come here in America when free speech, free press, and free assemblage of law-abiding citizens are going to be oppressed. To me it smacks of something that is un-American; and while this is a mere incident at this time, remember that the whole procedure is abhorrent to the American people and is not in accord with the American system and American ideals.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman will recall that free assemblage of American citizens down here on Pennsylvania Avenue of some veterans when Mr. Hoover brought out the artillery to drive them out of town.

Mr. SNELL. I do not yield further. That was an entirely different situation, as the gentleman knows; and the President did not call out the troops until the District officials said they could not cope with the situation. President Hoover did exactly as Woodrow Wilson did during his administration, when he called out cavalry to put down certain race riots in this city; and if he wants to debate that proposition, I am willing to discuss it with him. This was a meeting of patriotic women representing every grade of society from every part of the United States—a free, orderly assemblage—and are you going to stack your administration up against this kind of meeting? Are you going to use the force and power of the administration to prevent meetings of citizens for fear they will in some way criticize official acts of the administration?

The President has said many times he is willing to be criticized. But it looks to me as if he is getting very thin-skinned all of a sudden and cannot take it, and is going to use all the force and power at his command to prevent it.

Who issued the order for the Marine Band to walk out? What was back of it? Tell us the whole story.

Is this the beginning of autocratic rule in America?

The American people are entitled to know why the Marine Band cannot play before a patriotic society of American women in the city of Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we have some 30 applications for speeches in general debate on this side of the House, and the minority has about as many. This general debate has gone on now for 2 entire days and we will probably have to run all day today. There will be another appropriation bill before the House next week and general debate on that. I want to finish consideration of this bill this week, and I hope we may commence reading the bill tomorrow. I will object to any further requests.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado has the right to object at any time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I shall not object to this request.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me to propound a question to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. WHITE. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Are we going to have general debate all day today?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I think so; and I want to close general debate today. As I have said, we have a large number of applications to make speeches, and I do feel there ought to be a limit to these unanimous-consent requests. I shall not object to this request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, our Government, our people, and the Reclamation Service have lost a great educator and a great leader.

Dr. Elwood Mead, Commissioner of Reclamation, who died Sunday, was an eminent engineer, whose record in the field of reclamation has received world-wide recognition through his preeminent qualifications, his understanding of the problems of irrigation, and the effective results of his work in the hydraulic and reclamation field. Starting in his chosen vocation in his native State of Indiana after leaving school in the early eighties, he made river surveys for the Federal Government. On the completion of this work, he entered the educational field as a teacher of mathematics and rapidly rose in his profession, gaining recognition as an authority on reclamation and irrigation. After 4 years of educational work, Dr. Mead was called to serve Wyoming as Territorial engineer and was its first State engineer after its admission to the Union, where his experience and knowledge of irrigation was invaluable in incorporating into the constitution of the State a new system of laws governing the use of water, which has been adopted by many other States and some foreign countries.

After a successful administration as Chief of the Irrigation and Drainage Section of the Department of Agriculture, Dr. Mead was placed at the head of the Rivers and Water Supply Commission of the State of Victoria, in Australia. The system of water conservation and reclamation districts constructed under his 8 years of administration in Victoria has been a model for irrigation projects throughout the British Empire.

Returning to his homeland to take up the work of education in the University of California, he was appointed Commissioner of Reclamation by President Coolidge in 1924.

The 11 years that Dr. Mead has directed the activities of the Bureau have been the greatest in the history of reclamation. Twenty-two dams have been completed, and twice the world record for high dams has been broken—the Owyhee Dam in Oregon and later the Boulder Dam in Nevada. Twenty projects are now under construction—one, the Grand Coulee Dam across the Columbia River, is the largest in the world.

Dr. Mead died as he might have wished—in the service of his country and in charge of one of its greatest construction activities. It would be difficult to estimate the value of the service Dr. Mead has rendered the people of the United States by turning desert lands into producing fields, thus promoting the general welfare by adding to the productivity and business activity of the Nation. Reclamation has given this Nation some of the most substantial and prosperous communities to be found anywhere.

To appreciate the magnitude of the work that has been done under Dr. Mead's direction and its vast importance and immense value to all of us, one must go through the orange groves and vineyards of California; the winter gardens of the Imperial Valley; the cotton fields of Arizona; the beautiful fruit lands and alfalfa fields of Idaho; the blooming orchards in the Wenatchee Valley in Washington, the home of the delicious apple; and the potato fields and melon patches of Colorado; the celery gardens of Utah. When we visit the beautiful scenes of the irrigated and reclaimed areas nestling in the shadow of our western mountains, with cities and towns of modern construction, surrounded by the pretty homes of a prosperous and contented people, we are thankful to our Government for the services of good Dr. Mead, whose devotion to the ideals of reclamation and whose labor has made the desert bear so fruitfully.

Let the massive structures of the great irrigation dams of the West stand as his monument.

INCREASE OF IMPORTS

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein official figures on foreign trade.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under date of January 22, 1936, the Department of Commerce released for publication certain figures bearing upon the foreign trade of the United States in the calendar year 1935.

Although the administration professes to be engaged in a program of expanding our exports and finding a market for our products in foreign lands, the trade figures reveal that we have been giving up considerably more in the American market than we have gained in foreign markets. Here are the official figures:

Our exports in 1935 were valued at $2,282,000,000, an increase of $149,000,000 over 1934, or approximately 7 percent.

Our imports in 1935 were valued at $2,047,000,000, an increase of $393,000,000 over last year, or approximately 24 percent.

Translated into terms that everyone can understand, this means that for every additional dollar's worth of business gained in foreign markets we have given up $2.64 in our home market.

The result of the administration's tariff-reduction policy has been to reduce our favorable balance of trade to the lowest point in 25 years. As additional trade agreements are negotiated and our rich domestic market is thrown open still further to foreign competition, we may expect our present favorable balance of trade to change to an unfavorable balance.

In order that the Congress and the country may be informed as to the nature of the increased imports from abroad, I submit the following table showing those items which were imported in substantially increased quantities in 1935 over 1934. The figures given were obtained from the Monthly Summary of Foreign Commerce, published by the Department of Commerce, and cover the 11-month period ending November 30 of each year. Statistics on individual items for the full year are not yet available.

Comparison of statistics of imports for consumption into the United States during January to November 1935 with January to November 1934 of commodities which showed a substantial increase in imports

IMMIGRATION

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address by my colleague, Hon. JOE STARNES, to the Eleventh Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense at the Mayflower Hotel on January 28, 1936.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. JOE STARNES, Member of Congress, to the Eleventh Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense at the Mayflower Hotel on January 28, 1936:

For more than a century this country had no definite immigration policy nor effective immigration laws. After the War between the States the tide of immigration to our shores became so great that it soon created a serious national problem. Indeed, in that period of time embraced in the decade 1901–10, the tide was so strong we had approximately a million foreign-born immigrants entering our country each year. This large influx of foreign born had the effect of lowering wages, lengthening the hours of labor, and definitely reducing the American standard of living in every respect. More serious than the effect on our economic life was the effect upon our American institutions and our form of government. The people became aroused and Congress ordered an investigation. A congressional committee studied this problem for several years. Members of the committee visited practically every country in Europe studying at first hand the social, economic, and political conditions under which these immigrants lived. This committee made a very exhaustive and informative report of its activities. As a result of the studies and of the recommendations of this committee, the Immigration Act of 1917 was placed upon our statutes. This was the first definite and effective immigration program and policy in the history of our country. The author of this act was a splendid American and a distinguished Alabaman, Hon. John L. Burnett, who for more than 20 years represented the district which I now have the honor to serve. This Immigration Act of 1917 became our first basic immigration act and policy. The broad outlines of this policy were: (1) The exclusion or limitation of certain classes or types of immigrants; (2) deportation of aliens found guilty of certain offenses involving moral turpitude and of subversive activities and doctrines which seek to overthrow our Government by force and violence; (3) absolute debarment from certain geographic areas in Asiatic countries.

The 1917 act was amended in 1924 and the amendatory act provided for the present policy of restricting immigration by establishing numerical quotas for each country except in the Western Hemisphere, and for an absolute bar to all aliens who are ineligible for citizenship.

Even with these two excellent acts establishing for the first time a definite American immigration policy we find that during the past 10 years 3,687,547 aliens have entered the United States, of whom 2,010,896 were now immigrants. The 1930 census disclosed that we had 14,204,149 foreign born in the United States, of whom 6,284,613 were aliens. In other words, more than six and a quarter millions of these foreign-born had never taken any steps toward becoming citizens of the United States. The foreign-stock population of this country in 1930 was 40,286,278, more than one-third of our total population. This was the largest number in the history of the Nation.

It is estimated that our country has been supporting at least 3,000,000 foreign nationals on relief at a cost of approximately $400,000,000, and this at a time when millions of our native-born and naturalized American are dependent upon relief. At least one out of every eight on relief is an alien. It is further estimated that we have had some 2,000,000 aliens gainfully employed earning approximately $2,000,000,000 annually and sending millions of dollars to other countries to support families and unemployed when we have more than 10,000,000 American citizens unemployed.

In the light of the foregoing it is amazing to note that the so-called Kerr bill, H. R. 8163, was introduced at the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. This bill embodies the basic defects found in H. R. 6795 and both are merely new versions of H. R. 9725, which was defeated by an overwhelming vote of more than 2 to 1 in the second session of the Seventy-third Congress. The basic defects referred to are the abandonment of congressional control over the deportation of undesirable aliens; conferring practically unlimited discretionary powers upon an "interdepartmental committee"; legalizing illegal entrants; and breaking down our present numerical quota restrictions.

This bill has been heralded and publicized as a bill to deport criminal aliens and as a restrictive measure. In fact, it would repeal or nullify practically every existing mandatory deportation provision of our immigration acts by substituting therefor discretionary deportation. The admitted chief purpose of this bill is to permit to remain in the United States aliens illegally and unlawfully here or aliens who have breached a condition precedent and promise prior to temporary admission. The so-called hardship cases which this bill proposes to care for would condone violation of the law and reward a violator of the law by conferring upon him the right of American citizenship. It has been called a bill of major and minor discretions. Your attention is invited to the fact that each and every discretion or provision in this bill is favorable to the alien and the foreign-born. This bill boldly and audaciously raises the issue of whether one is for or against America and Americans and law-abiding and law-enforcing aliens legally and lawfully in our country.

Americans, native-born or naturalized, are entitled to first consideration, and first things should come first. I am unalterably opposed to a bill which would place discretionary powers in the hands of an executive or administrator who has knowingly and willfully violated his oath of office by failing and refusing to carry out the mandate of the law which he has sworn to uphold, administer, and defend. And who characterizes the laws he is sworn to administer as "inhuman, cruel, barbarous", and "unworthy of our civilization." We want law enforcement, not administrative nullification.

This bill must be defeated if it ever comes before the House for final action. It is necessary that the searchlight of publicity and truth be turned upon this proposed measure in order that our people may know the facts and not be misled by the propaganda of its proponents. This bill would decrease deportations and increase immigration and would substitute indefinite personal administration and personal government for traditional definite administration by written law, definite practices, and fixed precedents.

What America needs and what America must have is further restrictions and limitations upon existing quotas; the establishment of definite numerical quotas for the countries in the Western Hemisphere; a strengthening of our present deportation laws which would make mandatory the deportation of any alien who is guilty of one or more crimes involving moral turpitude or who has become a habitual criminal; and finally an alien registration law which will require the fingerprinting and proper identification and keeping a permanent record of every alien who enters this country.

We should reduce existing quotas by one-half in order to give time for naturalization and assimilation of our huge foreign-born and foreign-stock population. Establishment of definite numerical quotas from Western Hemisphere countries is essential in order to reduce and control quotas.

We must send from our shores every habitual alien criminal, every alien addict or peddler of narcotics, or aliens who have committed a crime involving moral turpitude. Every alien entering this country should be required to establish positive means of identification. This can be done by registration, fingerprinting, and keeping a permanent record of all entrants. We require fingerprints and positive methods of identification of some of our officials. No alien can complain of a genuine registration law, because it will protect aliens who come under existing quotas or who are legal entrants. Only the alien Communist, the alien criminal element, and the alien unlawfully here will object to an alien registration act.

It is essential that no foreign-born national shall remain in this country who cannot become a citizen, nor should we permit immigration of nonassimilable racial or political groups. America is no longer a wilderness to explore and conquer. It is no longer a country without an established form of government and institutions for the promotion of human welfare.

A sound national defense provides for domestic tranquillity and a guaranty against insurrection. The only permanent guaranty is the maintenance of our social, religious, and economic standards and our Americal ideals of government.

We must protect the American workingman against unfair foreign competition. It is as essential to enact and enforce laws which will protect the wage scale and living conditions of the American workingman against unfair foreign competition as it is to maintain laws which will protect our industrial and manufacturing establishments from unfair foreign competition. We must maintain and improve our present living conditions, but more important than the social and economic phases of our national life is the absolute necessity of protecting with treasure and blood our public school system, freedom of speech and press, freedom of conscience and the preservation of our democratic form of government.

Finally, we must have an immigration policy which shall be the product of American minds and American hearts. A policy which shall be determined by Americans for Americans, a policy which will place the welfare of America before the welfare of the alien. And, what is of supreme importance, this policy must be administered and enforced by Americans who respect the law, and who will at all times enforce the law for the benefit of America.

CONTROL OF CROPS BY STATE COMPACTS

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article by John W. Hester on the control of crops by State compacts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by John W. Hester, which was published in the Star-News, of Wilmington, N. C., on January 26:

[From the Wilmington (N. C.) Star-News of Jan. 26, 1936]

STATE COMPACTS

To the EDITOR OF THE STAR-NEWS:

All able lawyers know, and the candid ones, if asked, assert that the objectives of agricultural production control may be obtained only by the exercise of the police powers of the States, or by an amendment to the Constitution giving the Federal Government such power. The administration's proposal to reach the objectives of the invalidated A. A. A. by amendments to the soil-erosion statute may serve to bridge this campaign and hold the farmer vote, but it is as vulnerable as was the original A. A. A. and will meet a similar fate when it reaches the Court, which could hardly be done before the next election. But the agricultural problem must be treated by a long-time, permanent program. An amendment to the Constitution giving the Federal Government police power is well nigh impossible, as 13 States may block such a movement. So that leaves only the police power of the States to rely upon.

Now, I have stated that the tobacco situation may be worked out by the use of the compact provision of the Constitution whereby the States in which tobacco is grown may adopt identical laws respecting the control of its production. This compact provision of the Constitution is now being used to considerable extent. The Port Authority of New York, whereby the rights of New York and New Jersey to the port facilities of that great harbor are governed; the fishing rights of Washington and Oregon in the Columbia River; the water rights of the Colorado River resulting from the Boulder Dam, in which seven States are interested; and the production of oil under the quota system among the oil-producing States are examples of what is now being accomplished under the State compact provision of the Constitution.

But the usefulness and effectiveness of this provision may be increased. And so far as I know I am the first to advance the idea that the States may designate the Federal Government or any Federal department the enforcement agency, thereby assuring uniformity of enforcement of the compact provisions. The Congress passed an act forbidding the shipment in interstate commerce of oil in excess of the quotas provided under the State compacts in an effort to make effective the quota system. But think of what might have been the effect if the Federal Government had been empowered to enforce such quota enactments. Its effectiveness would have been well-nigh complete.

As to what may be done in this connection, the court has had the following to say, which supports my contention that the Federal Government may be made the enforcement agency of such compact regulatory State laws:

That States may enter into agreements and compacts is "a doctrine universally recognized in the law and practice of nations. It is a right equally belonging to the States of the Union, unless it has been surrendered under the Constitution of the United States. So far from there being any pretense of such a general surrender of the right, that it is expressly recognized by the Constitution and guarded in its exercise by a single limitation requiring the consent of Congress. The Constitution declares 'no State shall, without the consent of Congress, enter into any agreement or compact with another State', thus plainly admitting that with such consent it might be done; and in the present instance that consent has been given. The compact, then, has full validity, and the terms and conditions of it must be equally obligatory upon the citizens of both States" (Poole v. Fleeger, 11 Pet. 209).

"If Congress consented, then the States were in this respect restored to their original inherent sovereignty, being the sole limitation imposed by the Constitution, when given, left the States as they were before, as held by the Court in Poole v. Fleeger (11 Pet. 209)" (Rhode Island v. Massachusetts, 12 Pet. at p. 724).

"The terms 'agreement' or 'compact' taken by themselves are sufficiently comprehensive to embrace all forms of stipulations, written or verbal, and relating to all kinds of subjects" (State of Virginia v. State of Tennessee, 148 U. S. at p. 518).

Frankly, I can't escape the conclusion that a complete sovereignty may select its own agencies and instrumentalities to execute its agreements or enforce its laws. With congressional approval, the States are "restored to their original, inherent sovereignty", which means complete sovereignty. I assume that Congress would assent to the use of the Department of Agriculture as the enforcement agency, leaving merely the general mechanics of the plan to be worked out.

JOHN W. HESTER.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a brief letter received from the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, in my remarks on the independent offices appropriation bill on January 16, in endorsing a thoroughgoing investigation of the entire field of work of the Federal Communications Commission, I included a letter addressed to the Chairman of that Commission dated January 4 and the reply of the Chairman dated January 13, 1935. A statement made in the paragraph numbered 1 in the letter of the Chairman was challenged on the floor by my colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]. The statement challenged proved to be erroneous, as appears from the following letter subsequently received from the Chairman of the Commission:

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

Hon. RICHARD B. WIGGLESWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: With further reference to my letter of January 7, 1936, replying to your letter of January 4, 1936, I would like to say that there are three, instead of five, clear-channel, high-power radio stations, independent of and not affiliated with any of the three major networks, as I previously informed you.

Ordinarily licensees are required to make application for renewal of license every 6 months, and to state therein whether or not they have chain affiliations. Where, however, applications for renewal of station licenses are set for hearing, no additional application for renewal is required until the Commission disposes of the application pending.

The last renewal applications of stations WWL and KWKH—two of the five stations included in my previous letter—were set for hearing. These applications show said stations to be independent of and not affiliated with any network. The fact that stations WWL and KWKH acquired chain affiliations after their renewal applications were set for hearing accounts for this information not being reflected in the existing records of the Commission.

I have taken occasion to check with the chains for the purpose of verifying our records in this matter.

Assuring you that it is the Commission's desire to furnish you with accurate information at all times, I am,

Very sincerely yours,

ANNING S. PRALL, Chairman.

CONSERVING OUR WILDLIFE RESOURCES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a brief address by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] on January 24 on the conservation of wildlife.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by Representative A. WILLIS ROBERTSON on January 24, 1936, over the National Broadcasting System:

The call of President Roosevelt for a North American wildlife conference to meet in Washington on February 3 has focused the attention of all sportsmen and conservationists of the North American Continent upon the important subject of conserving our wildlife resources. The conservation of our forests, the purification of our streams and coastal waters, the restoration of our once-abundant supply of native fauna is, of necessity, an integral part of a general program to improve the living conditions of the average man in the United States.

While Federal, State, and private agencies have been engaged for many years in the cause of conservation, those best informed on the subject feel that the forces of destruction have been stronger than those of construction—or in other words, that we have been waging a losing battle. Millions of acres of timberland have been destroyed annually by fire—in 1 year of the drought, for instance, the destruction equaled an area 10 miles wide and as long as from Detroit to New York. Millions of acres of fertile soil have been washed into the rivers and thence into the sea. Some years ago a Member of the House from Massachusetts twitted the late Champ Clark about the superior wealth of Massachusetts. Mr. Clark replied that each year more fertile soil from Missouri washed into the Mississippi River than there was in the entire State of Massachusetts. Many a truth is spoken in jest. All of the fertile topsoil of 50,000,000 acres has been washed into our streams, and enough of the topsoil of an additional 50,000,000 acres has been lost through erosion to make them unprofitable for agriculture. Approximately 85 percent of our inland streams have become polluted, doing incalculable damage to aquatic life and recreational uses. It costs millions each year to purify polluted water sufficiently to make it safe to drink. Added to these destructive forces was the destruction occasioned by a tremendous increase in hunting and fishing. In recent years we have been sending some 6,000,000 to 7,000,000 hunters into the field each season, equipped with modern arms and ammunition and means of rapid transportation. There are no longer any inaccessible regions.

It is no wonder, therefore, that the chairman of the President's Special Committee on Wildlife, Hon. Thomas H. Beck, of New York, stated in his report to the President that we had been making a disordered progress toward an undefined goal; or that another great conservationist, ex-Senator Harry B. Hawes, should question in his interesting book, Fish and Game, Now or Never, whether or not we had made any progress at all.

With a view to bringing about an ordered progress toward a well-defined goal, Senator F. C. Walcott, of Connecticut, sponsored the creation of a special Senate committee to consider the conservation of our wildlife resources. That committee was created in the Senate on April 17, 1930. The present members of that committee are PITTMAN, of Nevada; MCNARY, of Oregon; NORBECK, of South Dakota; CLARK, of Missouri; BAILEY, of North Carolina; BYRD, of Virginia; and WHITE, of Maine. A similar committee was created in the House on January 29, 1934. The present members of the House committee in addition to myself are JONES, of Texas; BLAND, of Virginia; MCREYNOLDS, of Tennessee; WARREN, of North Carolina; BUCK, of California; BERLIN, of Pennsylvania; PARSONS, of Illinois;

HILDEBRANDT, of South Dakota; RICHARDS, of South Carolina; CARTER, of California; MILLARD, of New York: BOLTON, of Ohio; ANDRESEN, of Minnesota; and ALLEN, of Illinois. Every major region of the United States has representation on these two committees. During the spring and summer of 1934 the House committee conducted hearings touching on the conservation activities of all Federal agencies. These hearings were printed and have been given a wide distribution throughout the country. In January 1935 the House committee submitted a report summarizing its investigations and recommending a program of action.

Those of us interested in, and to some extent responsible for, what the Federal Government does to advance the cause of conservation have been gratified at the progress made by Federal agencies during the past 2 years. Time will not permit me to mention in detail the rapid advances made by the regular Federal agencies, namely, the Biological Survey, the Bureau of Fisheries, the Forest Service, and the National Park Service. Their activities are covered by their annual reports. The report of the Beck committee and the report of the special House committee called attention to the fact that the Federal Reclamation Service in its drainage and irrigation projects was working at cross purposes with the Biological Survey—one draining and the other endeavoring to preserve water areas for the breeding of migratory waterfowl. About 100,000,000 acres of breeding areas have been drained by public and private agencies. On December 19, 1935, a memorandum of agreement was entered into between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture respecting the administration of reclamation projects which are also wildlife reservations and refuges. From now on the activities of these important agencies will be coordinated and due regard will be had for the needs of wildlife in all future reclamation projects.

The activities of several of the new agencies are not generally known, and their accomplishments should interest every conservationist in the country. One of the most popular actions of President Roosevelt was the establishment of the C. C. C. camps. Those camps have given clean and wholesome employment to approximately 1,500,000 men. The men so employed have been helped in health and morale, and their dependents have been helped by monthly remittances which they could accept without the loss of self-respect. These C. C. C. boys have devoted 1,223,000 man-days to fire-presuppression work and 2,244,000 man-days in fighting forest fires. They have constructed 2,428 lookout towers, opened 44,040 miles of firebreaks, and have planted 405,402,500 forest trees over denuded areas. They have constructed 62,593 miles of new service roads and truck trails and 30,121 miles of new telephone lines through the national forests and national parks. Aside from their fire-fighting activities, the assessed value of the C. C. C. work completed as of September 30 last was $579,000,000.

When the emergency conservation work was started emphasis was placed upon forestry. At the instance of the House Special Committee on Wildlife Conservation, ably aided and abetted by that great conservation leader, Jay N. Darling, of Iowa, then Chief of the Biological Survey, the emergency conservation work included in its program modern fish and game management. In its silviculture work food-bearing trees and plants were spared. Check dams to the number of 1,635,000 were built to control soil erosion and improve cover conditions. Lake and stream improvement, construction of ponds for fish and birds, and the restocking of streams with fish were included in the fish-protection program of the C. C. C. One hundred and sixteen thousand acres of lakes and ponds have been improved for fishing, more than 33,000 miles of streams have been improved by shelters, deflectors, log dams, etc., and 3,335 ponds have been built. The C. C. C. boys have distributed 42,374,000 fry and fingerlings to ponds and streams. Twenty-six of the C. C. C. camps have been located on migratory-bird refuges administered by the Biological Survey.

Man has but three primary needs—food, shelter, and clothing. Those are the primary needs of wild life. Nature undisturbed by man will provide for Nature's children their essential needs. Through cutting and plowing, forest fires, overgrazing, erosion, and stream pollution, man destroyed much of the food and shelter for wildlife that has been provided by nature. The C. C. C. boys have been endeavoring to repair some of that damage.

In that undertaking, they have been ably assisted by the Soil Conservation Service, which in 1935 was made a permanent Bureau of the Department of Agriculture. This Service is now engaged in 140 separate projects in 41 different States, affecting a total of 50,000,000 acres. Five hundred and one C. C. C. camps and more than 27,000 relief workers supply the labor. Among the farmers with whom I have made personal contact, no activity of the Federal Government has been given a more favorable reception. In my opinion, the C. C. C. camps to work in our forest areas and to carry on this soil conservation program on private farms should and will become a permanent undertaking of the Government. Every farmer who signs a cooperative agreement with the Soil Conservation Service for the checking of erosion on his land agrees with the Government to avoid farming operations as far as practicable that would be detrimental to desirable forms of wildlife; to improve conditions for wildlife as a whole with due regard for its several values, biological and social, and to produce an annual replacement increment of game, fur bearers, and game fish, as a means of providing supplemental compensation to the farmer for land retired from cultivation through the operation of the soil-conservation program.

The Soil Conservation Service, therefore, will render to the farmer a threefold benefit—first, it will protect his land from further erosion; second, it will restore land heretofore eroded; and, third, it will produce for the farmer a new source of income from the crop of wildlife to be produced on the eroded land while it is being restored for agricultural purposes. When the farmer enters into a cooperative agreement of this kind, he will, in the words of the late Billy Sunday, be casting his bread upon the waters to be returned covered with butter and jam.

While in many respects we are the richest and most-favored nation in the world, the depression of the past 5 years has taught us that even we are not immune from hard times and actual suffering. I recently had the privilege of visiting some sections of China. Economic conditions in China are deplorable beyond words. The average annual income is less than $9. The once rich timber resources of the nation are gone. Unchecked soil erosion through the ages has so depleted the ability of China to produce that one-half of the people of China go to bed hungry each night. The longest navigable river in China is the Yangtze. For years this river, which is navigable for about 1,500 miles, has brought to the sea the yellow topsoil of north China. This sea is appropriately called the Yellow Sea. For some 300 miles beyond the mouth of the Yangtze it is as turbid with the yellow soil of China as the Mississippi at its worst. Japan has been more provident in her conservation program. The steep land, and most land in Japan is steep, is carefully terraced and protected against erosion. The limited timber resources of Japan have been carefully guarded. A Japanese cannot cut a tree on his own land without a Government permit, and before he can secure that permit he must plant three young trees and have them live. If we are to preserve the American standard of living and our position as the most-favored nation in the world we must properly conserve our natural resources.

It was, therefore, with that purpose in mind, as I indicated at the outset, that President Roosevelt recently issued his call for a North American wildlife conference to be held in Washington from February 3 to 7, inclusive. It will be the most important conference of the kind ever held in the United States. Already some 1,500 of the leading men of the Nation and from Canada and Mexico have indicated their intention to attend. The total enrollment of delegates will probably exceed 2,500. The conference has three major objectives:

(a) The organization of a permanent general federation of all agencies, societies, individuals, and clubs interested in the restoration and conservation of wildlife resources, with the avowed purpose of securing adequate recognition of the needs of wildlife resources.

(b) The development of a North American program for the advancement of wildlife restoration and conservation.

(c) The presentation of such facts, discoveries, and information pertinent to wildlife as may contribute to the solution of our mutual problems.

The delegates to this conference will have an opportunity to serve their day and generation well. In developing a coordinated and comprehensive conservation program they can contribute not only to the material prosperity of the Nation but likewise to our opportunities for peace and happiness. Every man wants to be happy. The pursuit of happiness is named by Jefferson as one of three inalienable rights. In the boom days many sought happiness in the amassing of wealth and the possession of material things. Life was pitched at a high tempo. When the depression cut our national income we were not equipped to find peace and happiness in simple things. Some ended their unhappiness by committing suicide. Far more died of heart failure brought on by worry and nerve strain. They were out of touch with the calm and orderly processes of nature. They did not know that "for our gayer hours she has a voice of gladness and eloquence of beauty and she glides into our darker musings with a mild and healing sympathy that steals away their sharpness, ere we are aware."

Overwrought nerves are not conducive to clear thinking and sound judgment. There are many problems today that parallel those of a hundred years ago. The country then was recovering from the depression brought on by the Napoleonic wars. Adams sponsored a public-works program to stimulate recovery. This was opposed by Andrew Jackson, who advocated lower taxation and the payment of the public debt. Hayne advocated tariff reduction to help southern agriculture, and Webster advocated protection for northern industry. The men of that period took time to think their problems through. When the strain would get too heavy for Mr. Webster he went trout fishing. I never go from the House side of the Capitol to the other without pausing for a moment of inspiration before the striking statue of Webster. His old fishing guide tells us that once in the middle of a fine trout stream Webster suddenly stopped and advancing his right foot exclaimed: "Venerable men, you have come down to us from a former generation." That was the keynote of his Bunker Hill speech. And the old guide added: "Mr. Webster used to do some mighty tall talking to them fish."

And when we adults go to the out-of-doors to find the clearer thinking of peace and calmness, let us take our sons with us. It is a reproach to our social system that 75 percent of the inmates of our penitentiaries are under 24 years of age. Judge Claude Grayson, of Alabama, says: "Teach the boy to hunt and fish and he will be on the jury and not before it."

We have the natural resources if we will conserve and properly use them. One day last spring I sat at luncheon beside Prof. Julian Huxley, grandson of the great scientist, and now curator of the London Zoological Garden, who told me that the natural resources of the United States and the opportunities of the general public to enjoy them were quite astounding. He then proceeded to tell me of his interest in a bill that had been pending before the British Parliament for some years, known as "the right of mountain view." That is a measure being sponsored primarily by the working people of the industrial city of Manchester to permit them to visit a mountain range about 25 miles away and enjoy the scenery. They don't ask the right to hunt, to fish, to break shrubs, and to pull up flowers by the roots but merely to walk in the mountains to fill their lungs with pure ozone, to get away from the noise and dust of a city, and enjoy the peace and quiet of a mountain top, all of which is now denied them by British trespass laws.

And as Professor Huxley was telling me of that condition in England, I thought of our twenty-odd great national parks, all open to the public, of our 165,000,000 acres of national forests where the public cannot only enjoy the right of mountain view but the right of hunting and fishing on a parity with any king or noble; and I also thought of the 170,000,000 additional acres of the public domain likewise open to the public without restrictions and on which the public can even graze great herds.

Let us revise our conception of the more abundant life. It is not determined by stock-exchange quotations or commodity indexes, but rather by our opportunities for the pursuit of happiness. Those opportunities lie at hand if we will only embrace them.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 10630) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes, and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be concluded today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. DOUGHTON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read the title.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], regarding recent occurrences at the Eleventh Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense now being held at the Mayflower Hotel, I wish to present the Members of the House with some of the true facts regarding the incident which has led up to the occurrence to which the gentleman from New York has objected.

This convention is composed of delegates from various patriotic organizations in the United States. Women came here as delegates from various patriotic organizations to attend the meeting for national defense.

Upon the opening night, last Monday, while the national commander of the American Legion, Ray Murphy, was addressing these members on the subject of national defense, a subject which was absolutely germane to the purposes of the convention, what was the astonishment of the entire audience to hear the chairman of that convention break into the midst of the address of Commander Murphy, and what was his astonishment and embarrassment at her abrupt closing of his speech in order that they might give the radio to be used for a political speech by Bainbridge Colby, the like of which I have never before listened to.

The matter of national defense of this Nation is something which we hold and hope we will always hold to be absolutely nonpartisan. If we are to have a national defense, it must be based upon the basic principles of national defense, and the first and foremost of those principles is that the Commander in Chief shall receive, at least while acting in that capacity, all of the respect due him. Under our present system of national defense the President of the United States, who happens at this time to be Franklin D. Roosevelt, is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and certainly no man or no woman would pretend to concede that it is at all proper to inject into a national defense conference such a controversial address as was made by the Honorable Bainbridge Colby, which consisted of excoriation and abuse of the Commander in Chief.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. LUCAS. Does the gentleman know that the bylaws of these various patriotic societies specifically state that they are nonpolitical?

Mr. FADDIS. Exactly; and they should have been enforced.

Mr. LUCAS. And does the gentleman further know that Mr. Colby agreed in advance before he made this speech that it would not be a political speech?

Mr. FADDIS. I do not know that, but after listening to Mr. Colby that night I would not doubt that he would give his word to anything of that kind in order to get the opportunity to deliver such an address.

Mr. LUCAS. And does the gentleman further know that scores of both Democrats and Republicans walked out of that meeting because he was making a political speech, in violation of his word and in violation of the rules and bylaws of the society?

Mr. FADDIS. I do know that scores of them walked out, because I was present myself at the meeting.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. RICH. I understand that Mr. Colby is a Democrat.

Mr. FADDIS. I have never so understood. By birth, breeding, and education, and every other consideration, Mr. Colby is a member of the Liberty League and inherited that position. He is not a man who had to be moved uptown and educated in order to be allowed to associate with the Du Ponts, attend their parties, and address them at their dinners.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FADDIS. No.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, constant repetition of a thing does not prove it. I never knew any activity that Bainbridge Colby ever engaged in in any regular, real Democratic movement in the United States. The only claim to being a Democrat that he has is that he served under a Democratic President, but no one ever saw him active in any Democratic organization or any Democratic council.

Mr. FADDIS. I believe the gentleman is right, and I would like to further state that having been intensely interested in the matter of national defense for a great many years, I have never known of any of his activities in connection with national defense and I wonder just how and why he was included among the list of speakers at this convention.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN. Perhaps the gentleman does not realize that a year ago last fall Mr. Bainbridge Colby came into the State of Maine and campaigned against us Democrats there with just about such political speeches as he made the other night.

Mr. FADDIS. Well, he was campaigning against every Democrat in Congress down here the other night at this function. That was his reason for being there.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In asking this question I am not endeavoring to throw in a discordant note, but coming down to a common-sense view of the incident, let us assume, from the standpoint of the gentleman who now has the floor and from the standpoint of others, that Mr. Colby made an offensive political address. Even so, does the gentleman believe that those good women should have been humiliated by a public rebuke of that kind?

Mr. FADDIS. They certainly should have been, because it was entirely in discord—since the gentleman mentions notes—with any of the purposes of the convention. Those ladies had asked people there to listen to a man get up on the platform and revile and abuse the President of the United States or Members of Congress. Some of them, at least, must have been in on the secret of the reason for his appearance. That is proven by the length to which the chairman went to break in on the commander's speech to get Mr. Colby on the air. They had assembled there to take into consideration some of the problems in connection with the defense of this Nation. They had not assembled there for political purposes and the rules and bylaws of their convention forbid anything of that kind being injected into it. Not only do the rules and bylaws of their convention forbid anything of that kind but the rules of good usage and gentlemanly conduct all over the world forbid such a thing.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. Yes.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. After Mr. Colby started to make his political speech, did the ladies attempt to stop it?

Mr. FADDIS. No. That is a course of action which I am sorry to say was not carried out. They accorded him a great deal more courtesy than he accorded them.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If they were a nonpartisan organization they should not have permitted a speech of that kind.

Mr. FADDIS. That is true; and if it had been an organization of men, no doubt someone would have raised the point of order against the speech.

Mr. CULKIN. And will the eloquent gentleman please distinguish between the President of the United States spending 4 weeks on the $4,000,000 palatial yacht of Vincent Astor and Al Smith spending an hour in addressing the Liberty League, including the Du Ponts? Will the gentleman distinguish between the two?

Mr. FADDIS. I thank the gentleman for referring to me as eloquent.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman is eloquent.

Mr. FADDIS. But I think the question the gentleman is asking is not germane to the discussion and is not relevant. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, whatever may or may not be the result of this occurrence, I would just like to call attention to the fact that there is an entirely different gathering in Washington today—a gathering of men who were not invited to the Du Pont's party; a gathering of men who would not have been even allowed to peek in the door at the floor show after the dinner was over. This is a gathering of men who have received more favorable consideration from the program to which the Bourbons of the United States object than they ever received before from any preceding administration. I refer to the United Mine Workers of America. They have gone on record as endorsing the New Deal. They are men who are receiving the benefit of just exactly what Hon. Bainbridge Colby is objecting to, and they appreciate it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] has expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, there are times when the tongue cannot speak the language of the heart, and that is the fix I am in today when I rise to pay my feeble but sincere tribute to a comrade of the fourth estate whom we laid to rest at Arlington Cemetery today. My faltering tongue cannot begin to describe the grief that presses and strains this day against the hearts of all who were privileged to know Carl D. Ruth, late correspondent of the Toledo Blade and other newspapers, whose earthly career ended with shocking suddenness last Saturday.

He was a prince among men. As fellow newspaper correspondents we had offices together for years, our association terminating when I entered Congress, and as I think of him from this intimate retrospect, he exemplified to my mind all that is meant by the meaningful term "good citizen." In his newspaper work he was the soul of rectitude and honor. As a fellow being he was indescribably kind and sympathetic and true.

When I was president of the National Press Club I appointed him chairman of our fellowship committee, and he held that position so long it seemed to become his vested interest in our splendid institution of newspapermen. That is the committee that alleviates distress among our fellows, extends the balm of consolation to the grief-stricken, and in various other ways, to meet varying situations, applies the helping hand. In that position Carl Ruth served so devotedly, with such unremitting zeal, and with such effectiveness that he enshrined himself in the innermost affections of the members of our club and their families. It was just the role he wanted and he filled it to perfection. More capable, perhaps, than any of us to shine in positions of high distinction, it was characteristic of him that he shunned the limelight and sought the humbler field of service, where heart meets heart in sympathy and helpfulness. He was always happiest when following in the footsteps of that greater Man—the Man of Nazareth—who said:

> For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger and ye took me in;
> Naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick and ye visited me; I was in prison and ye came unto me.
> Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my brethren, ye have done it unto me.

News of the death of Carl Ruth, who was not thought to be seriously ill, shot like a thunderbolt through the hearts of thousands like myself whom he had befriended and it has left us staggering under an oppressive sense of loss. He was an ornament to his profession and a credit to American citizenship, but, more than that, he was a lover of his fellow man.

The affection of his many friends was reflected by the great profusion of floral offerings that filled the Church of the Covenant at his funeral today, but if every person, living and dead, for whom Carl Ruth did some good deed could have given the visual expression of sorrow in the manner that best interprets the feelings of the heart, no building in Washington would have held the flowers.

We will never know or understand why he was snatched away from us almost in the twinkling of an eye, but we thank God, who does all things well, that he was permitted to live among us even for so long a time, for it has been so good to know and love him. Snow blanketed the earth when we buried him today in the beautiful city of the dead across the Potomac, and perchance many other snows will come and go before we join our friend in the bourne from which no traveler returns, but we shall not forget him, and we can only say with aching hearts:

"Good-bye, old friend! We will be looking for you when we cross the borders of the blessed summer land. Until then, good-bye, and God bless and keep you!"

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I just want to thank the gentleman for his thoughtfulness in paying this beautiful tribute to a wonderful man.

Mr. LUDLOW. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD].

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee so far this morning has been rather tempestuous, except for the beautiful tribute by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

I arise today to attempt a task that at once fills me with peculiar gratification, and I must admit a little trepidation, too, for it involves a criticism on myself and my countrymen. A sin of omission in our due and proper regard for a great man and a great institution. That institution, thanks to its scholarly traditions, has in this tense moment in the history of our Nation once again proved itself the shield and buckler against the forces which, knowingly or unknowingly, have threatened to destroy the pattern, if not the very fabric, of our democratic Republic.

Needless to say, the institution to which I refer is the Supreme Court; the man, John Jay. John Jay, whose name is written close beside that of John Adams and Benjamin Franklin in tortuous history of that epochal assemblage that was the Congress of 1775. A name, I cannot fail to add, while it is honored by all the Nation, very near and very dear to the citizens of my State of New York and the district which I represent and which was his home, Westchester County.

I want to relate a little incident, while though it is a rather pitiful commentary on America's forgetfulness, is not without its touch of humor.

With other admiring visitors recently I walked through that impressive edifice of our high tribunal, wondering at the dignity and beauty which symbolizes the great Court which it houses. As we passed from one vista of beauty to another, the attendant, describing that magnificent frieze in the Court chamber, pointed to the stately figure of John Marshall. "There", he said, with a glib assurance that startled me, "is the first Chief Justice of the United States, John Marshall."

The young man politely doubted my challenge of his statement regarding the first Chief Justiceship, and, since one of the Justices of the present Court was passing, stopped him for confirmation. When he learned that I was right—that John Jay was the first Chief Justice—the young man was not at all embarrassed, and, in fact, informed me that he would continue to stick to his story that John Marshall was the first, because, he said, with a grin, "no one will know the difference."

In defense of this young man I think I should say that the mistake he made is not an unusual one, for many people believe John Marshall to have been the first Chief Justice.

The anecdote is significant, but of greater significance is this: Nowhere in that building is there a suitable memorial to Chief Justice John Jay; and I know you will agree that therein lies a sin of omission which should and must be corrected. I, therefore, have introduced today a bill authorizing the establishment of such a memorial.

We all know and appreciate the valuable services rendered by John Marshall, whose memorable opinions on constitutional questions lent stability to our Government; but in our respect and admiration for this great jurist we should not forget the man who went before him and laid the basis for the constitutional doctrines which Marshall so ably developed.

There is perhaps a reason for the failure to provide a fitting memorial to John Jay in the new building in that he is better known because of his services in other fields of public service, notably as the first Secretary of Foreign Affairs, and to an even greater extent because of his part in the negotiation of the first two treaties with Great Britain, the first of which terminated the Revolutionary War and the second restored commercial intercourse with that country.

As the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, however, John Jay laid the foundation for the national solidarity which was later assured by the decisions of John Marshall. Every boy who attends law school is familiar with the leading case of Chisholm against Georgia, in which for the first time the Supreme Court of the United States declared the supremacy of the Federal Government within its constitutional field, and the Hayburn case is almost equally well known as the first declaration of the Supreme Court's entire independence from both legislative and executive control or interference.

John Jay did not remain a sufficient length of time on the Supreme Court of the United States, however, to leave the same imprint in our legal precedents as was left by his illustrious successor, John Marshall. Jay organized the Court in February 1790, and to all intents and purposes left the Chief Justiceship in 1794 when called upon by President Washington to assume the important duty of negotiating a commercial treaty with Great Britain, although he did not actually resign as Chief Justice until 1795. In accepting the commission of President Washington to represent the United States in the negotiation of a commercial treaty with Great Britain, Jay took upon himself a task which he was well aware might seriously undermine his political popularity. When told of the likelihood of his selection for this post and when it was pointed out to him that the acceptance of this task would probably render him "unpopular and odious", he said:

> The good of my country, I believe, demands the sacrifice, and I am ready to make it.

His own fears and the fears of his friends were not ill founded, and his connection with that treaty, although it is now historically conceded to have been a most statesmanlike accomplishment, brought him severe criticism and vituperation. Jay took these attacks with calmness. "Calumny," he said, "is seldom durable. It will in time yield to truth." History proves that he was right in this prophecy, but the part he played in the negotiation of the treaty nevertheless cost him a chance for the Presidency of the United States.

Jay was, it is true, elected Governor of New York in 1795, but he had the good fortune in this instance to be nominated and elected before the full details of the British treaty were published. The governorship was the termination of his political career, in spite of the splendid services rendered during his 4 years as chief magistrate of the Empire State.

I shall not encumber this speech with many details of Jay's life and accomplishments, which are legion in many and varied fields of public service; but I should not close without some mention of the part he played in the events which led up to the Revolutionary War and in the great struggle for national independence. He served as a member of the New York committee on safety, was one of the principal authors of the New York State Constitution, served as a member of the Continental Congress, and in 1779 was president of that body. He was joined with Benjamin Franklin and John Adams to negotiate the peace treaty with Great Britain which officially brought the Revolutionary War to a successful conclusion in 1783.

Immediately after the signing of the peace treaty with Great Britain, Jay returned to the United States and was selected as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in which post he served from 1784 to 1789. In addition to being the first Chief Justice of the United States, he also had the honor of being the first Secretary of State, because he continued to perform the duties of that office, then known as Secretary for Foreign Affairs, after Washington became President under the Constitution. He acted in that capacity until the return of Thomas Jefferson from France and his own appointment as the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

With Madison and Hamilton he did much, through his contributions to the Federalist papers, to bring about the adoption of the Constitution, and for these services alone deserves the undying appreciation of the American people.

I hope that when the bill which I have introduced today comes up for action in the House you will give it your approval, that a wrong may be righted, that a great man be honored, whom in thus honoring we honor ourselves and the Nation as well. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MILLARD] has expired.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say to the membership at this time that I assume all the Members try to represent the constituency which sent them here. If in my opinion the Members are reactionaries, it is only because of the complexion of the constituency that put them in the Congress. I have no fault to find with the Members personally, but I am sure what I have to say on this occasion will be about as welcome to both sides of this aisle as a weasel in a rabbit's nest.

CLASS AGAINST CLASS

One of the main points of criticism which is now being hurled at the Roosevelt administration is that it has raised bitter feelings between classes. One cannot get the full meaning of this without stopping to catalog those who make the charge. To what class do they belong? For years and years we have heard the same philosophy announced.

Do not raise class against class. This cry has always been raised by the upper class—the money class. It has never been raised by the common people.

As soon as the common people show a disposition to curb the power of the money barons, the cry immediately goes up that we are pitting class against class. The barons would have all of us sit with folded arms and with a forced photographer's smile, while the mortgagee and the creditor suck out our lifeblood through interest and foreclosures. If perchance we move around slightly to avoid the pain, or to prevent the baron from completing his nefarious job, we are condemned because we "raise class against class." No; that argument is threadbare, and the power it once had is rather harmless today.

If Roosevelt deserves severe criticism it is criticism for not doing enough to stop the mad desire of the money class for more interest, more foreclosures, more money, more dollars, with a high premium attached, more homeless people. Roosevelt has, in this respect, paid too much attention to the money barons, and not enough attention to the protection of homes that have been built during the last 75 years by a patriotic people.

THE FORCES OF REACTION

Unless the reactionary Republicans will keep out of making any overt attempt to direct the future of the Republican Party, and refrain from naming the candidate for the Presidency, the result of the next Presidential election will be another disastrous defeat for the Republicans. The mass of the Republican voters have no faith in the Mills, the Mitchells, the Mellons. When these elements directed the affairs of the party, and turned a deaf ear to all that was progressive, under the leadership of their errand boy Hoover, not only did the party meet with almost complete annihilation but the country itself was not 60 days away from an open revolution when the Republican defeat was registered. That is a matter of history now.

Now that the Democratic Party, through the leadership of Roosevelt, seems hell-bent on having its own way, regardless of the preelection agreement made with the people, the Republicans have come out of their hole and are looking around to see if there is not a chance for them to seize the reigns of government. They have this desire, of course, and in that they have a considerable body of voters ready to help them in the undertaking. As the chance for a victory looks brighter, the more reactionary the leaders of the Republican movement become. They are carried away with the illusion that anyone they pick can win. In Congress right now we hear speakers who have remained as silent as the Sphinx of Egypt for the past year rising in their places and speaking out in the defense of the international banker and special privilege. One member of the Republican Party made an effort to establish that the wealth of the Nation is not concentrated in the hands of the few but is apparently equally distributed among the common people of the country justly and evenly. He points to the value of farms, but fails to state that 2,000,000 of the owners in 1920 have been driven out of their homes; he fails to state that another 2,000,000 farm homes with 10,000,000 inhabitants are on the way to the auction block this very moment; he fails to tell us that the Republican Party under the present leadership is as immovable as the Democratic Party in their determined effort to deny the American farmers a just refinance system.

No; those Republicans who seek now to nose their way back into the good graces of the Republican voters do not realize that reaction has been repudiated by the people. No reactionary of either party has any chance whatever of ever again commanding the support of the rank and file of the American voters. These reactionary Republicans, if they know anything at all, and are interested in seeing the Republican Party returned to power, should be seen from now on and not heard. Their counsel has been disregarded; their advice and leadership very nearly led us into destruction. Their philosophy has been repudiated, and before the voters will return to that leadership they will support the present administration, even though they know it is the result, in operation at least, of the hairbrained theories of professors with no practical knowledge or desire to meet the actual facts as they are.

In explanation of the statement I made that the wealth of this country is not equally distributed, at this point I desire to insert some tables to convince some of the Members of this Congress that the wealth of this Nation is not distributed equally among the common people of this country. I live in a State where there are 400,000 people living on farms, and I know the consequences of what I say in this Congress, but I will announce right now that if those 400,000 people living on farms in my State would pay what they owe on their land and their property, there would not be 10 percent of them who would own a dime. We do not have that wealth. Now let us find out where it is.

That is all I care to say about politics. I think the people of the country are more interested just now in what this Congress is going to do for their relief.

As we look around us today, the condition of the mass of the people is reflected in the following facts:

Twenty million on relief.

Twenty million on semi-Government and private relief.

Ten million people out of a job who can work and want to work.

Eight million aged people without property protection for old age.

Public and private debt of $275,000,000,000.

Value of all property in the United States, at actual value, on forced sale of over one hundred and sixty billion.

Outstanding Government debt of thirty-five billion represented by interest-bearing, tax-free bonds with an annual interest charge of over $1,000,000,000.

Thirty-four cents of every dollar spent in business going down the interest rat hole.

Two million farm homes with first mortgages so large that the Federal Land Bank System of the country has quit business and the farmer is left helpless.

The constitutional provision for the control of money abrogated and suspended by mere custom and the control of our cash and credit delivered over to the private banking interests of the country.

Ten billion dollars loaned to foreign countries during the World War, collected from the sale of Liberty bonds, all of which debt is due and payable, but which will not be paid and which we cannot collect if we wanted to.

The people of this country want, first of all, to see relief brought forward from these intolerable conditions—they want that more than they want our views on who is or is not right on the tariff question. They want these matters adjusted more than they want to know whether Al Smith should or should not have made his speech against the present administration.

What can we do in this Congress? There have been some very adverse decisions made by the Supreme Court in the past, but none of them have had as bad an influence on the loss of confidence in the Government by the people as what this House is now doing and has always done. Representative government has failed. We are responsible for it, Democrats and Republicans alike. From this responsibility will come the greatest issue before the American people. I refer to the rules of this House, which prevent the Members from voting on any matter unless the administration desires to permit a vote. Today the Democrats are directly responsible, for more than two-thirds of the time this rule has been in vogue in this body the Republicans have been responsible. Today every Member who refuses to take an active part in breaking up this gag rule is responsible.

Nothing will be done in this Congress, and every Member here knows it now, unless that thing done is presented by the administration and approved by the leaders. This gag rule will be maintained, and as long as it is maintained the American people are denied the privilege of having their measures debated in their own Congress. What could be worse to flaunt in the face of the people of this great country at a time when confidence in it by the people is more important than all other issues at stake? The Supreme Court does not interfere with our deliberations. Has the executive branch of the Government any right under the Constitution to do it? Are the Members of this House free Members? Are you shackled to something invisible which we cannot see? I refer this responsibility to both sides, as I cannot, knowing the attitude of Republican Members on the gag rule and their refusal to break it, see any difference between the two parties; and I am confident that the mass of the voters in this country hold a similar view.

We are permitting injustices to pile up beyond comprehension merely because representative government has failed in this body. "The Hall of Congress, where the voice of all the people can be heard"—what a mockery! We have failed; we will continue to fail in bringing straight thinking out of chaos just as long as we will not permit representative government to function. Which party will break the shackles that hold the people out of their own Congress? Will either of the present parties take the side of the people? Will another party have to be built and entrusted with power before this simple right of the people can be restored? That party which will stand up and be counted, that party which will break down this one-man control of Congress will be the party to which I shall be willing to give whatever of influence and ability I possess. There is no issue now before the American people—there will be none in years to come—of more importance to liberty than the breaking of the gag rule in the greatest deliberative body in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, in compliance with the permission received to extend my remarks made on the floor of the House, relating to the concentration of wealth in the hands of a relatively few people, I submit herewith certain data. While the tables which I submit do not embrace all I should like to know about the subject, yet, a general picture can be formed, based upon a sound foundation.

From the facts appearing, the conclusion is inevitable that the wealth of this Nation is not equally distributed, or fairly so, as some claim; but, on the contrary, that wealth is most unevenly and unfairly distributed, and I might also add that it is unjustly distributed. By this I mean that under any system of government it is unjust for a relatively few people to possess property vastly beyond their needs while the great mass of the citizens making up that government are living in destitution and want. As to the causes that have brought about this unequal distribution, I will not discuss here. My purpose is to supply facts, in connection with my speech, indicating that as a matter of fact the wealth of this country has been allowed to be concentrated in the hands of the few while the great mass of the American people have nothing.

The only Government attempt to get at the facts of the concentration of wealth was the report made by the Federal Trade Commission in 1926 in response to a resolution of the United States Senate, being Senate Resolution 451 of the Sixty-seventh Congress:

1922: Total wealth of the United States	$353,000,000,000
1922: Total national income	62,000,000,000
1922: Total wealth is made up of—
Real estate	230,000,000,000
Tangible personal property	123,000,000,000
1922: Total wealth of the United States	353,000,000,000

Of the real estate $42,000,000,000 was tax-exempt real estate, belonging to the United States Government, State, and local units of government.

Strictly land value	$122,000,000,000
Real-estate improvements	108,000,000,000
Total real estate	230,000,000,000

The total wealth in 1922 was distributed in the following enterprises: 18 percent agriculture wealth, 14 percent manufacturing and mining, 13 percent railroads and public utilities, 12 percent Federal, State, and local government, and 33 percent retail trade and unascertained business.

Between the years 1912 and 1922 the total wealth of the Nation increased—considering the drop in the purchasing power of a dollar—something approximating 20 percent.

Cross-section pictures of the concentration of wealth:

Out of some 43,000 estates probated in 24 counties of 13 States it was found that—

Thirteen percent owned 90 percent of the wealth of the estates probated.

The average estate was found to be $3,800. On this basis 91 percent left estates less than the average; 9 percent left estates of more than the average.

One percent of the descendants owned 59 percent of the wealth.

CORPORATION CONTROL

For the period from 1912 to 1923, six companies controlled one-third of the water power, eight companies controlled three-fourths of the anthracite coal reserves, two companies controlled well over half of the iron ore reserves, four companies controlled nearly one-half of the copper reserves. Eighty thousand two hundred and thirty-four manufacturing corporations owned in wealth, $33,700,000,000; 23,472 transportation and public utilities owned $27,300,000,000.

SOURCE OF INCOME IN 1923

Manufacturing, $24,100,000,000 or 34 percent; agriculture, $9,400,000,000 or 13.5 percent; mercantile trade, $8,600,000,000 or one-eighth of the total; personal service, $6,300,000,000 or 9 percent; professions, $5,200,000,000 or 7.5 percent; steam railroads, $4,600,000,000 or 6.7 percent; mining, $3,400,000,000 or 9 percent; construction, $1,750,000,000 or 2.5 percent; commercial banking, $1,400,000,000 or 2 percent; miscellaneous, $5,200,000,000 or 7 percent; total, $69,900,000,000.

DIVISION OF CAPITAL AND LABOR, 1923

Labor, 55 percent, or $38,200,000,000; profits, rent, and interest, 45 percent, or $29,130,000,000.

From 1918 to 1923 about the same ratio obtained.

War years—labor received 47 percent—capital, 53 percent.

Out of 43,512 estates examined in various sections of the United States in town, city, and country:

Estates of $50,000 or more constituted 78 percent of total wealth.

Estates under $5,000 constituted 5 percent of total wealth.

The greater concentration of wealth is in cities. Eight-tenths of 1 percent of the city estates represented 42.5 percent of the total value of all estates; 80 percent of all estates were under $500; 1.1 percent of all estates were over $50,000; 5,963 estates represented in value $1,540,259,000; 43 estates represented in value, $104,469,722,000.

Since exact figures are not available for definite proof of the concentration of wealth today, yet some data are available, and also some undeniable facts.

On Government relief, 1935, 23,000,000. This class had nothing or they would have received no relief. On private relief, and occasional work, 20,000,000; those living on past accumulation and from mortgaging clear property, 19,000,000. Total, 62,000,000.

First. The first and second class had nothing. The third class today, deducting mortgagors, have no property.

Second. The farming population have a large representation in all three classifications—especially in class 3.

The total wealth of the Nation today is much less than in 1923; in 1923 it was $353,000,000,000; today it is approximately $200,000,000,000; loss, $153,000,000,000.

This loss fell the hardest on the farmers, as the following table shows:

Farm values

1919	$79,000,000,000
1920	66,316,000,000
1929	58,000,000,000
1930	47,880,000,000
1932	37,027,000,000
1933	30,151,000,000
1934	31,655,000,000

It will be seen that the loss in land values to farmers was $48,000,000,000, or approximately 32 percent of the total loss in the national wealth.

While land values shrunk in farm lands $48,000,000,000, the farm total debt increased, as shown by the following table:

	Debt on lands	Other debts
1920	$7,857,700,000	$3,100,000,000
1925	9,360,620,000	4,305,000,000
1928	9,500,000,000	4,600,000,000
1932	8,500,000,000	3,910,000,000
1933	(?)	3,500,000,000
1934	8,200,000,000	4,100,000,000

From 1920 to 1928 the amount of interest demanded of farmers increased.

Interest:
1920	$250,000,000
1925	568,000,000
1928	900,000,000

To further prove how hard the West North Central States have been affected by the general slump, I submit tables showing that these States in this group, including North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Nebraska, and Kansas, carried the burden of the farm debt.

	Percent
New England	1.57
Middle Atlantic	5.18
East North Central	20.46
West North Central	39.01
South Atlantic	5.51
West South Central	9.75
Mountain	5.91
Pacific	8.62

Every supporter of the theory that there is no concentration of wealth invariably shows what great wealth there is stowed away in farms. These tables should convince every theorist that if there is a just distribution of wealth in this country that it cannot be found among the farmers.

Corporation income-tax returns from 1924 to 1928 show:

First. Those reporting incomes of $100,000 to $1,000,000: 7,945 in 1924, 9,747 in 1928.

Second. Those reporting incomes of $1,000,000 to $5,000,000: 739 in 1924, 1,029 in 1928.

Third. Those reporting incomes of $5,000,000 and over; 162 in 1924, 229 in 1928.

Ten percent of the people of the United States own 90 percent of the Nation's wealth. (Magazine of Wall Street, Jan. 6, 1934.)

Only 6 percent of the people of the United States paid income taxes for 1933. (Internal revenue reports.)

If only 6 percent of the population in 1933 paid incomes, what can be said of the other 94 percent, or about 119,000,000 people? They had no incomes of a sufficient amount to warrant taking—the 7,600,000 had the incomes. Does this show the equal distribution of wealth that we hear so much about?

It is altogether possible that the large owners of wealth are now getting what the farmer got in the period from 1920 to the present day. Inevitably their fortunes must fall, but however that may be, the fact that a few did, through special privilege and the control of national resources, concentrate the wealth in a few hands, was the direct cause of our economic break-down.

The unequal distribution of wealth is still the curse of this country. All admit we have a land of plenty. We have to prevent farmers from producing too much food, and yet we have one-half of 127,000,000 people in distress, and no amount of figuring can ever explain to these distressed millions that there is an equal distribution of wealth in the United States.

Former Governor Pinchot of Pennsylvania is a rich man, and here is what he said in regard to the unequal distribution of wealth in 1931:

> The force behind the stubborn opposition to Federal relief for fear lest the taxation to provide that relief be levied on concentration of wealth—fear lest the policy of years, the policy of shielding the big fortunes at the expense of the little ones, should at long last be tossed into the discard.
> This business has gone far enough. We must, as a Nation, give help to those of our fellows who are broken in health and spirit because they cannot find food to eat or clothes to wear or work to do. This help must come—not mainly from the man of small means, as local relief would have it come, for that will tend only to increase and prolong our distress. It must come mainly from the rich, from those who can so easily carry the burden, from those whose taxes can in no way weaken what consuming power is left us.
> In the name of those who are overburdened now, I demand that the tax rates on the upper bracket incomes be increased. In their name I demand that the graduation of the inheritance tax be steepened. And in their name I demand that the exemptions and the lower bracket tax rates be left untouched. To meddle with them is to trifle with disaster and to invite the depression to stay.
> I pay an income tax in the brackets myself. In time, a goodly share of my estate will go to the Government.
> But I am willing that the Government shall take more of my income, rather than that millions should suffer from want and hunger. I would be glad to see more of my estate appropriated in taxes if it be used to help set this Nation on its economic feet. I believe in levying taxes according to ability to pay.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the Townsend plan proposes that every citizen over 60 years of age be paid a monthly pension sufficient to make his total income $200 a month, or $2,400 a year. Both husbands and wives are eligible.

The pension is to be paid on condition that the beneficiaries refrain from all gainful employment and spend the money within 30 days.

The funds to pay these amounts are to be raised by an inheritance tax, a gift tax, an income tax, and a transaction tax. It is also provided, in substance, that if these taxes are insufficient, funds may be taken from the Treasury, "subject to reimbursement." A "transaction tax" is the principal reliance for raising the necessary funds.

The plan has two radically different purposes.

One purpose is to take care of the needy aged. The other is to give the aged money regardless of their need and in excess of their need, to force its expenditure and thus, in the words of Dr. Townsend, "keep a constant demand for production and consumption." Let us illustrate. Here is an aged couple. They have a modest home, free of debt, but little income. Let us say they need $50 a month. Instead of giving them $50 a month the Townsend plan would give them $400 a month.

The $50 is given the old couple because they need it; the $350 is given them beyond their needs, on condition they will spend it promptly in order to promote prosperity.

CARE OF NEEDY

These two purposes are as different as day and night. One purpose is humane and commendable, the other is, in my judgment, improvident, wasteful, morally and economically indefensible.

There is no better way to spend our money than to help the needy. To help them according to their need and our ability to provide such help is a duty and a just assumption of our responsibilities. We should be happy that we are able to provide for such need. We have no poorer way to spend money than to take from those who need it and give to those in more favorable conditions; to take it from the industrious and the frugal to maintain others in luxury or idleness.

NUMBER OF ELIGIBLES

Under the census of 1880 we had only 50,000,000 people. Out of that number 50 years later, in 1930, we had 10,385,000 over 60 years of age.

The number of persons over 60 years is increasing at the rate of about 200,000 a year. That means that the average cost of carrying the Townsend plan would increase about $480,000,000 a year for 50 years to come.

We now have over 11,000,000 past 60 years. Fifty years from now we will have more than 25,000,000 over 60 years of age.

THE COST

About 10,000,000 would probably qualify as eligible pensioners. The annual cost would be $24,000,000,000, outside of the vast expense of administration. This would be equivalent to a per-capita tax of $190 per year for each man, woman, and child in the United States.

The present per-capita tax for all purposes—district, municipal, county, State, and Federal—is estimated at $122. If we add $190 to $122, it would make an average annual per-capita tax of $312 for every man, woman, and child in the United States.

It would increase the present total tax of our people over 150 percent.

The amount of dollar bills required to pay this tax each year if placed end to end would make a solid line 2,250,000 miles long, or 90 circles around the earth, forming a world highway 18 feet wide. It would pave a boulevard 144 feet wide 3,000 miles from San Francisco to the Atlantic.

Every dollar of that vast sum would represent the surrender of some taxpayer's labor or property to provide it.

Invested capital in the United States produces a net average income of less than 4 percent annually. To support the Townsend plan by invested capital would require $600,000,000,000. The total wealth of the United States, income and nonincome property, is now only about $300,000,000,000. The net income from all invested capital in the United States is insufficient to pay the Townsend plan pension.

The average expectancy of life at 60 years is about 15 years. Under this plan an average of $36,000 would be paid a pensioner after he ceases to engage in any gainful employment.

The average annual per-capita income of the American people for the 20 years, 1910–29, is estimated at $511.25. The earnings of an average person for the first 60 years of his life would be $30,675. The amount paid him under the Townsend plan during his idleness would be $36,000, or $5,325 more than the total earnings of his life for 60 years. Fifteen years of idleness would bring a greater reward than 60 years of industry.

Townsend pensioners, if formed in one great parade moving at the rate of 10,000 an hour, would require 40 days and nights to pass a given point. The Government would have to hand out checks for $200 each at the rate of over 13,000 an hour 24 hours a day for 30 days in order to pay the pensioners within the month when due.

The income of the average citizen, 1910–29, was $42.60 a month. The Townsend plan would pay a pension of $200 a month, or more than four times the average income of our people.

In 1934 the national income of the United States was about $50,000,000,000. The $24,000,000,000 required to pay the Townsend pensioners would be 48 percent of that total national income. If the plan had been in operation in 1934, 8 percent of our people, the pensioners, would have received 48 percent of our national income. Ninety-two percent of our people would have received the other 52 percent of the income.

In 1935 the total farm income of the United States was only $8,000,000,000. The amount required to be paid to the beneficiaries of the Townsend plan would be $24,000,000,000, or three times the total value of all the farm products of the United States.

Travel through the Pacific States, through the South, through the Central West, and you will see these products of our farms in amazing quantities. They represent the annual earnings of 30,000,000 of our farm population, yet all those millions earned last year would not pay one-third of that proposed for the beneficiaries of the Townsend plan. Can any person conceive that such a burden can be assumed without placing an unbearable load on the people of our country?

These facts show the impracticability and impossible burden of the Townsend plan. It is a vision, not a plan.

FORCED EXPENDITURES

The Townsend advocates urge that the pension must be $200 a month, and be spent within 30 days, in order to force the circulation of money in a sufficient volume; that if we do this, we will restore and maintain permanent prosperity for everybody.

In other words, we are asked to pay these vast sums to the aged people, not because they need it but because it is a necessary means to force the circulation of money.

We have a growing concern about the number of Government employees. Theodore Roosevelt once said, in substance, that every useless Government employee is an uninvited guest at the breakfast table of every family in America, sharing with the family and decreasing what it has to enjoy. But it is said that under this plan the money is all to be spent, pass into circulation, and bring prosperity. All the money now gathered by government through taxation soon passes into the channels of private industry, the employment of labor, and the purchase of materials.

Suppose that instead of pensioning 10,000,000 people the Government employ that many in nonproductive services noncompetitive with private industry. That would be a fairly comparable proposal to the Townsend plan. We would seek prosperity through greater taxation in the hope that the circulation of the tax money would bring us prosperity. No one would have confidence in such a plan.

Prudence in the expenditure of this money is not within the theory of the plan.

Let us see what is the opinion of Dr. Townsend as to the necessity of prudently spending money. When before the Ways and Means Committee he was interrogated by Mr. HILL, a member of the committee, as follows:

Mr. HILL. He could not go out and squander it in order to get rid of it, so that he may be eligible to receive $200 the next month?

Dr. TOWNSEND. We do not care what he does with it. That is immaterial. Let him have carte blanche. Let him buy whisky with it if he wants to kill himself off as quickly as he chooses. That is immaterial. It is commerce—business—that we want in the country. We are not going to regulate people's morals in the least when we give them money to spend.

Mr. HILL. Suppose a husband and wife qualify to receive this pension. They would be receiving $400 per month. Let us say they have a family of grown-up children. Would it be permissible for those children to live with them and be supported from the provisions supplied with this pension money in the home?

Dr. TOWNSEND. Why not? Why not let elders buy commodities and give to their children if they like? That is immaterial.

IMPROVIDENT SPENDING

Let us look at some examples of how the earnings of the taxpayers under the Townsend plan are to be spent.

Much of the money would be spent for purposes never thought of as being in their reach by those who paid the taxes.

John Jones is a prosperous man. He has a fine home free of debt, a good auto, and all the other reasonable comforts of life, including $30,000, bringing him $1,500 a year interest. Under the Townsend plan we would give him and his wife $3,300. To get the money to pay that $3,300 we tax the poorest workingman, everything his children wear; the farmer, already crushed under a farm debt; not one man, woman, or child in the land escapes the tax burden.

John Smith and wife are over 60 years of age. They have a good home, no children, and he has a $2,000 job. He gives up his job. The rest of the people of the country, out of their earnings, no difference how badly needed, pay him and his wife $4,800 a year.

John Doe has had good health all his life, but he was lazy and shiftless. When he was making money he saved nothing. When 60 years of age, the people who have worked and saved are to pay him $200 a month.

A husband has a salary of $12,000 a year, or $1,000 a month. His wife has no salary. The people would be taxed to pay that wife $2,400 a year. Who can justify such an expenditure?

Bill Smith is an unmarried man over 60 years of age, in good health, and is amply able to take care of himself. He is to be given $2,400 a year. The widow who lives next door in a rented house with three minor children dependent on her is to be paid nothing. Everything that she and her children eat or wear will be taxed to help support Bill Smith.

There are 43,000,000 school children under 18 years of age, all of whose parents would be subjected to a multiple tax on everything they use, eat, or wear to pay pensions.

In all, there are about 70,000,000 people in the United States who are wholly or partially dependent on others for support. All these people would be taxed to pay $200 pensions to millions of people who need no pensions, or who need far less than $200 a month.

Examples can be multiplied indefinitely, under which the Townsend plan would authorize the payment of money with appalling indifference to its prudent expenditure and disregard of any consideration for those whose labor produces the funds.

"HUMILIATING" TO SHOW NEED OF PENSION

The legitimate basis of an old-age pension is the need of the aged.

We are told that a fixed amount of pension should be paid alike to all over 60 regardless of their need; that the applicant should be paid his pension without being humiliated to show a need. The taxpayer is not relieved from paying the tax by showing he needs the money. Is it fair to him that his earnings should be taken and paid others whether they need it or not?

A person who receives his living from others has developed a supersensitive sense of humiliation if he wants to be supported without even being required to show that he needs help.

It should be humiliating to receive the money on any other basis than one's need. If misfortune comes to me, and I find it necessary to go to you for help, the only way I can justify asking you for money for my support would be that I need it. Without the need I would be humiliated and unwarranted in asking your help.

When we receive our living through an age pension from the Government we are placing our burden on the shoulders of other people. The only justification that we can have for placing that burden on them is our need.

ENFORCED IDLENESS

The Townsend plan tries to enforce idleness after 60 years by refusing a pension to those who pursue any gainful employment. The man who tries to support himself in whole or in part by gainful employment is denied a pension. The theory seems to be that the rest of us want the entire job of supporting those over 60, and if they insist on trying to take care of themselves we will do nothing for them.

A plan that denies an individual a useful and gainful employment tends to impoverish, rather than prosper, the Nation. Enforced idleness is not a legitimate goal of existence. On the contrary, the normal and happy man is the one usefully employed while properly able to work. Usefulness, rather than idleness, should be the motive of life, even in the crowning years of age.

We have heard much about the improvidence of plowing under a portion of growing crops to prevent a glut in the market of the farmer. That method was resorted to as a temporary emergency in aid of distressed agriculture. No one should suggest that as a permanent policy.

The Townsend plan would establish a permanent policy of preventing many men of good health, experience, and ability from engaging in useful employment, contributing to the productive wealth of the country, and thus adding to the sum total of what the American people can enjoy. In the language of the day, this is a proposal to plow under human usefulness.

Under the pressure of the depression we have 10,000,000 unemployed. This is an abnormal condition awaiting better times for correction. The unemployed are economically nonproductive and burdensome. If unemployment is what we need to make prosperity, we should have it already.

Under the Townsend plan millions would be needlessly taken from gainful productive pursuits and placed permanently among the unemployed, nonproductive population.

It is more profitable to society to pay a man to work than to pay him not to work.

FEDERAL PENSION CONTRIBUTION

The Federal Government recently provided for matching State pensions for the aged up to $15 per month. That is, the Federal Government will give not exceeding $15 per month for the care of those over 65 years of age where the State provides a similar or greater amount. The Federal plan contemplates the money shall be given only to those in need and to the extent of their need.

The $15 a month provided for by the Federal Government is not offered on the theory that the Federal Government is assuming the duty of providing a living for the aged, but rather as a contribution to encourage the State to perform its proper function in caring for its needy aged.

Under the plan of the Federal Government and the States as now practiced, it is the duty of the children to take care of the parents, if able to do so. Under the Townsend plan, the children would be entirely relieved of the obligation to take care of their own parents. Under the plan of the Federal Government, the pension is confined to the need of the individual. Under the Townsend plan, the pension is given regardless of that need.

The primary duty to care for the aged rests with the States.

The States should contribute to any just old-age pension plan. For 145 years the States and their local subdivisions alone provided for the needy aged. Even now only 22 States have State-wide pension systems. The Federal Government has stepped into this situation to encourage the States to do their full duty to the aged. After the State has matched the Federal contribution, it should provide as much more as it finds necessary for the pensioner.

If the State fully matches the Federal contribution, and no more, the pensioner will receive $360 a year; a husband and wife $720. This total would equal the income on $14,400 at 5 percent.

This Federal contribution is being called a "pauper pension." Now, when, for the first time after 146 years, the Federal Government is starting in to help on old-age pensions, before the first payment is due, a cry of complaint is heard about the insufficiency of the amount.

We should at least give the States a little time to catch up on their duties to the aged. Time may justify a higher contribution. Let us not start a political auction at this time, with candidates trying to outbid each other in spending other people's money as the easiest route to political success.

The idea commonly seems to prevail that money from the Federal Government does not cost the people of the States anything. Until John Citizen wakes up to the fact that the only source of revenue of the Federal Government is the people of the States, we are in a poor position to legislate discreetly on pensions.

LET EARNERS SPEND

The old-fashioned idea was that the man who earns or saves money should have a right to spend it. Under the Townsend plan we take money from the man who earned it and give it to others to spend to create prosperity.

It is a proposal that one shall sow, another reap; one earn, another spend.

Will the pensioners spend it more usefully than those who earned it?

Those who earn money spend it to pay their current living expenses. If anything is left beyond that, they invest in productive enterprises where the money pays for the employment of labor and the production of useful articles to supply the needs of our people. I know of no purpose for which money can be spent by pensioners that will be of greater advantage to labor and to the ccuntry than those purposes to which its owner applies it. Every intelligent person either spends or invests his money. That is the only way it can be useful to him or anybody else.

The man who earns his money by the sweat of his brow, who denies himself comforts and luxuries of life to save and invest to provide for himself and his children should have first claim on spending it.

I would willingly tax him to pay his part for the relief of the needy.

I will not help to take his earnings to give to others in better circumstances or beyond their needs.

If the Nation should adopt the novel policy of forcing the expenditure of money for the sake of spending, then to whom should we turn to do that spending? One plan would be to force the man who earned it to do his own spending and let him get the benefit of it. The Townsend plan turns to those over 60 years of age and excludes all others as beneficiaries.

In my judgment, if we should adopt such a policy of forcing the expenditure of money through others than those who earned it, we should place the money in the hands of those who most need it, regardless of their age. People are not all in need of money because they are aged. Many of our people fortunately go into old age well provided. They are no more entitled to receive money for the sake of spending than persons in any other age of life. If your money is to be allotted to be spent, let it serve the double purpose of spending and care for our needy, regardless of age.

Give it to the blind, the cripples, the widowed mother and her small children, to neglected children. The most productive investment in human beings is in our boys and girls and our young men and women.

With so many in need, why place one dollar in the hands of those not in need? In giving to those who really need we could exhaust the spending power of the Nation. Make the spending campaign one of undivided mercy and helpfulness; take from no unfortunate to give to those in happier or more comfortable conditions.

PROPAGANDA METHODS

The adoption of the Townsend plan would be a momentous change in our Government. It would make more people dependent upon other people than any other single act of mankind. Yet the means of carrying this incomparable burden are referred to only in the most nonchalant and carefree way. We have only the talk of the slick salesman. In your interest and out of his love for you he comes to tell you how easily and how quickly you can get rich. With assurance he describes to you the convenience and blessings of a good income, a life of ease, and the prestige of comfort; how foolish to grind along, making a living in the commonplace drudgery way. He convinces you. The first little formality to be attended to is to raise the money. You mortgage your home. It is really no mortgage; you are just loaning your credit until the fourfold income blots out your debts.

The gray dawn comes, the sheriff is at your door. You walk out of your home and turn back at the gate to see the last beam fade out of your rainbow.

Let us not conduct the business of this Nation in any such fashion.

The Townsend Booklet No. 2 states that the funds for these pensioners can be secured and "place no great burden on anybody." It is said the plan does not impose "any obligation upon our Government except only to furnish the mechanism for operating the plan." All the Government has to do is to tax the people $24,000,000,000, pay the staggering expense of administration, and turn the money over to the pensioners.

It is further stated "it does not cause any public debt." The plan would create the greatest debt burden ever assumed by any nation in the history of the world, and yet we are assured that that is not the creation of any public debt. Are such statements candid, fair, or enlightening? Do they help to a proper understanding of a plan so glibly presented?

INVEST IN PROSPERITY

In effect the American people are urged to invest in a scheme to produce wealth. The first feature of the plan calls for more taxes.

To a prudent man or woman there are two primary considerations in making an investment. First, you want security; you do not want to lose your money; you want it to come back to you; you want to be quite sure of that.

In the second place, you want a fair return on your investment; you do not want to part with your earnings for nothing, to give or throw them away.

This plan proposes that you invest your money in increased taxation, 150 percent greater than the country now pays. It proposes that you invest in idleness; that this money be paid to people on their promise not to work or help bear the burden of their own support.

The assurance that your investment is secure and profitable is based on the belief that the people who will spend your earnings will spend them more to your advantage than if you spent them yourself.

I ask you, as a prudent man or woman who knows how you earn your money and how you save it, do you want to invest it in that sort of an enterprise?

Irresponsible people who neither save nor plan for the future, who are indifferent to the country's welfare, and who measure the country's policies even by the hope that they may prosper by taking the earnings of others, may be willing to invest in the plan; but I submit those who act for the benefit of themselves and their children over the long future, who have a just regard for the rights of others, cannot afford to invest in this illusive hope.

THE TRANSACTION TAX

The transaction tax is advanced as the means by which these magic sums of money are to be accumulated with "no great burden on anybody."

Debts are debts; taxes are taxes. They must be paid out of the earnings and savings of the industrious and the prudent.

The taxes to be collected under the Townsend plan are just as burdensome as taxes for other purposes. If the people of the country pay $24,000,000,000 more taxes, they have that much less to spend for other purposes.

The transaction tax is a sales tax, a consumers' tax, a multiple sales tax, a pyramiding tax. It is heartless and cruel in its operation. Childhood, youth, labor, poverty, sickness, and misfortune do not escape it. It is carried as a charge to the consumer. The 50,000,000 men and women who work for wages and salaries, and their dependents, the farmers, and middle-class people, must bear its burdens.

Substantially all invested capital in the United States is engaged in producing, manufacturing, and distributing the necessities and comforts of life for the great masses of our people. Every tax imposed upon productive industry, or business transactions, adds to the cost of producing and distributing these goods, and must be paid by the consumer.

The farmers, the laboring men, and the children would be three particular sufferers from the Townsend plan. The farmer would be a chief victim because he buys and sells so much that would be taxed out of proportion to his net income. The direct and indirect transaction taxes would operate against him virtually as a property tax instead of a tax against current income; the laboring man because he would suffer a rise in his buying prices much greater than in wages; he would have less buying power because of the greater buying power transferred from him by the tax to the pensioned class. In other words, we would place on him the support of others outside his family.

The children would be the chief sufferers of all. In 1930 we had 43,000,000 children in the United States under 18 years of age. Their young and middle-aged parents, mostly not financially entrenched, carrying the burden of food, clothing, shelter, medicine, and little indulgences for a family of several would feel the pinch, the restricted earning power under the Townsend plan. The earning power of these parents for their own children would be greatly diminished by the burden of carrying the pensioners. It would be cruel and unconscionable through a multiple transaction tax to take or diminish the food, clothing, shelter, and comforts of the 43,000,000 children of America. It would mean a harder lot for the average child, a decrease of his opportunity in life.

It is these children's homes the transaction tax would hit the hardest. The last place I want to send the tax collector for unnecessary and burdensome taxes is to the homes of the young men and women of America who are carrying the blessed burden of bringing up the future citizen of this Republic.

MORTGAGE ON CHILD

Let us take the case of the average child who is born into an American home. This average child will live to be about 57 years of age. During those 57 years he would be subjected to a tax of $10,830 to support the Townsend plan. The charge against him for taxes would equal an interest charge of 4 percent on a mortgage for $4,750 for the whole of his life. Will the young mothers of America be happy to bring their children into the world to bear this life load of debt? Will aged persons seek to place this burden on their grandchildren who will bear their names long after the moss has crept up over the inscriptions on their tombstones?

The father provides for his own family according to his varying income. Sometimes he spends more, sometimes less, just as he is able. Not so will be his obligation to help support the pensioners. They, through taxes, are to have $200 a month net income, through sunshine and storm, through abundance and drought. The father may reduce spending for his own, but not for the pensioners.

TAX A FIXED CHARGE

If you will study the Townsend plan, you will find that one certain thing about it is the tax. It provides for a universal tax, a tax to raise a greater sum than was ever before collected in the same length of time in this world. The alleged benefits of the plan are conjectural, speculative, and debatable, but the burden of the tax is definite, certain, inescapable.

When I read the Townsend literature I am not surprised to find in what glowing terms the spending benefits of the plan are described and how meagerly and evasively we are told how the money is to be earned and paid.

In connection with this tax it must be remembered that all taxes are a part of the living expenses of the American people.

One of the greatest causes of the continuance of this depression is the vast load of taxes and interest charges on our debts that now hang around the necks of the American people like millstones. These are fixed charges that must be paid before we can apply our earnings to our other needs. The Townsend plan would simply accentuate and increase the evils from which we are already suffering. Instead of being a constructive remedy to provide for increased consumption and the natural creation of wealth, it provides only for increased taxation, increased debts, taking from those already overburdened, and the creation of a special group to enjoy the fruits of their labors.

We may be justified in great expenditures in applying the money for the immediate need of the country and for labor employment. But a long-time policy affecting generations yet unborn should not be adopted, adjusted to the abnormal conditions of the hour instead of the decades to come.

The workingman is being told that it would cost him only 2 percent of what he spends to support the plan. How idle is such information! The real burden of the tax would be passed to him in the form of higher prices, which would in effect reduce his wages. The people of fixed or limited incomes, like men on wages and salaries, clerks, teachers, and farmers, would suffer a decrease in their purchasing power. Our war veterans would have the value, the purchasing power of their pensions, reduced. The annuities provided for widows and children would be likewise reduced in purchasing power. The attempt to serve humanity would begin by forcing a reduction in the value of many of the provisions already made to take care of the aged and dependents.

TAX THE RICH

No such burdensome tax has ever heretofore been proposed for the poor and middle classes of our country. Yet everywhere the plan is presented on the theory that its burden to the average man is inconsequential. Members for the Townsend Clubs are solicited to be tax spenders, not tax payers. Some rich man somewhere is supposed to pay the tax bill.

How does the Townsend plan tax the rich? It does not propose to take his property from him like Huey Long did. It proposes to tax the business transactions in which the rich man engages.

The concentrated wealth of this country is invested in a few main lines of human endeavor. It is employed in production of clothing, food, fuel, shelter, transportation, machinery, and chemicals. Any tax added to wealth so invested becomes a part of the cost of producing the articles in which the money is invested. The rich man, the same as any other producer, adds the tax to the cost of production, adds his profit to the investment, and passes it on to the consumer. If you want to give people correct information, do not tell them that a transaction tax is not a burden on the consumer.

And who are the consumers? The consumers are principally the 50,000,000 men and women who toil and their dependents. They represent the poor and the great middle classes of this Republic and few beyond these classes. The great burden of the Townsend plan would fall on the common people of our country. The great business concerns would add their costs, taxes, and profits. A plan that would not permit them to charge such a tax as costs would make it impossible for them to continue to do business. Every businessman, from the little fellow in the hole in the wall to the greatest corporation in the country, would follow that course.

A rich consumer will pay on the part he and his family consume. That will be more than the average man pays. The rich man may live on 20 percent of his income; the poor man lives on 95 percent of his income. There are so few rich and so many in poor or moderate circumstances that the great burden of the load will fall on the people of modest income.

What the rich man pays as a tax on his business transactions, on his industrial enterprises, will be passed on to the consumers as a part of the cost of production and distribution.

EFFECT ON CALIFORNIA

California has a 3 percent consumers' sales tax. This year it will produce about $66,000,000. We have one-twentieth of the population and wealth of the United States. We pay a little more than the average cost per capita of Federal taxes. In other words, every expenditure of the Federal Government costs our people a little more than it does the average population of the United States. If we could carry the Townsend plan under State law, it would cost no more than under the Federal law.

The cost to California of carrying the Townsend plan would be about $1,150,000,000 per year at the present time, with the amount increasing indefinitely.

To meet this expense by the transaction tax, which is only a multiple sales tax, we would have to collect 17 times the taxes we collected last year by our sales tax. Any man who can persuade our people to believe that their welfare is to be served by the imposition of any such tax will have to rely upon hypnotism rather than facts or common sense.

The people, ourselves and our neighbors, who pay our sales taxes, must pay the transaction tax. They would not only pay it as specific sums for taxes, but to a much larger extent in the indirect form of higher living costs. Every purchase would include the payment of not only the immediate transaction tax but every prior tax to which the article purchased had been subjected. The sober judgment of our people should convince them that so great a tax is neither possible nor desirable.

UNCLE SAM, TAX COLLECTOR

Heretofore the little fellow, the wage earner, the farmer, and the salaried man have had little direct familiarity with Federal taxes. The Federal Government has confined itself for revenue principally to customs taxes, income taxes, and limited excise taxes. The adoption of the Townsend plan would change all this. The poorest man in the land would become a Federal taxpayer. In effect, Uncle Sam's tax collector would sit at every farmer's gate collecting a toll out of all he sells and buys. He would sit at the door of every home, however humble. He would be at every counter, at every dinner table, at every business transaction. He would be there to enforce the decree of the Townsend plan to make the Federal Government a greater tax collector than all other tax collectors combined, to collect 150 percent more taxes than the total now paid by the American people.

TAXPAYERS AND TAX SPENDERS

The Townsend plan divides our people into two groups—10,000,000 pensioners, nonproducers and tax spenders; 115,000,000 others, producers and taxpayers. The taxpayers support the tax spenders. The tax spenders do not support the taxpayers. The buying power of the aged is increased, but only to the extent that the buying power of the taxpayers is decreased. We must first take from the taxpayers before we can give to the tax spenders. The taxpayers support the pensioners; the pensioners do not support the taxpayers.

Money is a measure of value. It is also a medium of exchange. We receive money for our labor and materials. We exchange the money for other labor and materials. The exchange of money is a means of transferring our labor and our materials with others. When we give the aged our money, they keep not our money but our labor and our materials. When the taxpayers get back their money through purchases by the aged they may have as much money, but no more, than before. They are out their labor and materials thus transferred to the aged. We can never prosper by giving people money with which to buy our wares. We do not increase our spending power by giving away our money and getting it back by selling our goods for it.

Some years ago I met a man who had 10 grown children. His family had more property than average Americans. Suppose the 10 children contributed $400 a month to their two parents. Would the family increase its wealth or have any more purchasing power? Certainly not.

Our Nation is a group of families. No difference how large the group, the process and result is the same. There is no increase of purchasing power by transferring the money from one group to another.

It is true that persons over 60 years of age would, individually, have more money to spend. Other individuals would doubtless receive more than the plan would cost them. It would cost somebody else more than they received.

Give the aged $24,000,000,000 of our money and we are no richer than before. They have $24,000,000,000 more and we $24,000,000,000 less. They come back and spend the money to secure our labor and our property. When the "revolving" is complete the 115,000,000 have the same amount of money as when the "revolving" began, but they are short $24,000,000,000 worth of services and property.

ADMINISTRATION

The proper administration of the plan would require a Government check-up every month to learn whether or not each beneficiary has spent the money given him, and the amount of the individual income, if any, which should be deducted from his $200 pension. As there are over 10,000,000 eligibles scattered to the remotest sections of the country, it would require an army of employees to supervise its administration.

If it took 10 minutes to check the application and pay the claim of each pensioner, the time consumed by Government or bank employees on each monthly settlement would be over 200,000 days. No mortal man can know the thousands of years of labor it would take to earn the money to make even one monthly payment.

The number of business transactions that occur in this country are innumerable. If two farmers in Iowa trade a calf for a pig, both must be checked up and the tax paid. So all over the country. If the whole United States Army was assigned to the job, it would be unequal to the task. There might be 10,000,000 pensioners, but there would be over 75,000,000 people engaged in transactions calling for a tax, a check-up, and collection.

A TEST OF POPULAR GOVERNMENT

The Townsend movement is a mass attack against the earnings and savings of the industrious and the thrifty. It proposes to take earnings from all and award them to the industrious and the slothful, the deserving and undeserving alike. It offers, not something but much, for nothing. It encourages idleness, discourages industry and frugality. It makes a vicious appeal to the electorate to use their political power to vote themselves a competence at the expense of their fellowmen, even at the expense of those already in poverty and distress. It appeals to the selfish, the avaricious, the shiftless, who are willing to ride and live off the fruits of others.

The power of our people in Government includes the power to destroy the value of private ownership and to deny just rewards to thrift, frugality, and industry.

Our economic system rests on security in the ownership and enjoyment of property. We are dependent on men who have accumulated property for the employment of labor. The propertyless are not employers of labor.

If our people establish a practice of using their political power to vote themselves pensions, regardless of their needs, then we are cultivating an appetite that is insatiable. The demand will grow and grow. Already it is suggested that the pensionable age be reduced to 55 years, and also that several other million beneficiaries be brought within the plan. If 10,000,000 people can live off of others in idleness, why not the rest of us?

The logical sequence of such a practice would be to take away the reward of private ownership and the incentive of the individual, the moral deterioration of our workers, the elimination of the private employer, and the gradual mergence of our economic system into a socialistic state, with the Government as the employer. Then industry will be under a political and incompetent control, with decreased production and increased cost. The share-the-wealth plan will fade into a share-the-poverty plan. Shall preying upon the thrifty become a practice and a policy of our people?

Our faith in popular government assumes a wisdom and virtue on the part of the people that will forbid them from using their political power to take over the earnings and property of their neighbors.

Soon our land will ring with the appeal, "Vote for us and we will give you $200 a month"—of other people's money.

Can our Government stand this test?

The American people are the descendants of pioneers. On the whole they have been a hard-working, self-reliant class. In the language of another, I do not expect to see this people sink down "to the level of a pension-collecting, rocking-chair-sitting, money-squandering outfit."

The adoption of the Townsend plan would make more people dependent upon other people than any other single act of mankind. The far-reaching and ramifying effects of such a change upon our political, economic, and social structure can be measured with no degree of accuracy. I have not attempted to discuss several of its ill consequences. If the Nation hastens into this magnificent folly, it will probably long repent in sackcloth and ashes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] is one of the most distinguished and beloved Members of this House, and a most valuable legislator to the country. He has been chairman of the Democratic caucus of this House; he is one of our leaders here; yet Dr. Townsend and the hired help of the Townsend movement say, forsooth, because he will not support this monstrosity they are going to remove him from office! They cannot do it. His constituents would not allow it. It would be a calamity to the Government if this should occur. [Applause.]

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORITZ].

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman who preceded me, whenever somebody speaks on a popular subject, a grand big hand is given to him when the majority agrees with him. If, however, more Congressmen would get home oftener and see what conditions people at home have to live under they probably would change their minds. Why, Mr. Chairman, there are but a few professional men in a city right now who can make a living. People are not back to prosperity by any means. They have a little temporary relief given to them by the W. P. A.; but, as for any semblance of prosperity, it is not there. Congressmen are paid $10,000 a year; they are allowed a couple of clerks, and almost every one of them to a man has a son or a daughter on the pay roll; and they fold their arms and say: "Why fool with this Townsend plan or any other plan? We are sitting pretty."

Mr. Chairman, let me cite the instance of a dentist from whom I recently got a letter. He said that of 15 extractions he performed but one person was able to pay 50 cents. He wrote me another letter saying he is $900 in arrears of rent, and does not know how he can keep up.

Mr. Chairman, I do not find fault with anybody who differs with me, but I do not think any other person should find fault with those who differ with them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I do not say the Townsend plan is 100 percent perfect. Is any other plan perfect? Right after the war there was a sales tax that taxed you out of house and home and it was a hardship on the poor man. The proceeds of the sales tax went to the Government of the United States, and what they did with it nobody knows; they probably bought some trucks and left them out in the rain to deteriorate. The point is, however, that the Government got those proceeds. But this sales tax, if you please, is a refund to the people who give a portion of their money to a fund from which they can expect some benefit. It is like contributing to an annuity fund. Those contributing know they will be the recipients of the benefits of these funds. It is quite a different story from having to pay a sales tax and never seeing the money again.

You have not answered this problem at all, my friends. You may talk about abolishing the Townsend plan, but you cannot get away from it. Only those people, if you please, belittle something new when they themselves are "sitting pretty."

Members of Congress, as a general rule, like to hear other Members narrate personal experiences, even though they do not agree with them. I have just a few ideas in mind and I wish to express them. Pittsburgh is going Democratic again, because Pittsburgh is an industrial and mining section, and they know they cannot depend upon nor get anything from the reactionary Republicans. In 1924 when Senator La Follette came to Pittsburgh the revolt began, and from that date the people of Pittsburgh have stood for that which is liberal. They realize that it is the reactionary Republicans who own the monopolistic corporations in Pittsburgh. Pittsburgh and western Pennsylvania will go Democratic again because President Roosevelt has shown that he is liberal-minded.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORITZ. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact one of the reasons why the gentleman approves the Townsend plan is because he believes it is going to bring back prosperity and, if enacted into law, welfare agencies and poorhouses, as well as the slum districts, will be eradicated from the United States?

Mr. MORITZ. The gentleman has stated the proposition correctly. We are having a meeting of the steering committee with reference to the McGroarty bill this evening. Never has it been stated that $200 was to be given to every person over 60 years of age.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. May I say to the gentleman there has been a misunderstanding of my position with reference to the Townsend plan. I am in favor of an adequate pension, but I am not in favor of putting a sales tax on the common people and on the poor people. However, I am in favor of an adequate pension. [Applause.]

Mr. MORITZ. The gentleman may make a speech on his own time.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I just made it. Thanks.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, as I stated before, the taxing of poor people, of course, is a hardship; but if the poor people get something out of it that is better than they fared heretofore where a sales tax was in force and they got nothing out of it, as happened right after the war.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak also on the subject of money. May 18, 1920, to my mind, ought to be put down as a big black-letter day, because it was on that date that the Federal Reserve System contracted the currency, and from that date the depression started.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the time is fast approaching when great numbers of our citizens are commencing to ask embarrassing questions of Members of this Congress.

The same questions would have embarrassed Members of 73 Congresses which have preceded this.

The Constitution of the United States is being rediscovered. The recent decisions of the Supreme Court have been widely proclaimed. Congress is on the spot and the Court is on the spot.

Men are asking us, "What of the powers of Congress?" Why is it that the first enumerated power, the power to tax, is upset by the Supreme Court which interprets the use of that power as illegal and unconstitutional when the tax is levied on one portion of our people and disbursed to another portion?

They criticize from all sides our use of the second power of Congress, the power to borrow money. Frankly, I admit I cannot answer their questions. I cannot find the answer to such simple questions as these: Why is it that this Government has to establish an R. F. C. to bail the defunct banks out of trouble and loan them one-third of their entire capital stock to keep them operating, and insure their deposits to keep the faith of the public in them, and forgive them the duty of paying interest on time deposits, and then after all these things loan them the currency of the United States against their assets? Why then does this Government have to borrow money from the banks to pay the bonus or any other extraordinary expenditure?

Why is it, they ask me, does this Government issue interest-bearing bonds, oversubscribed by the banks, in amounts of billions of dollars, when the Treasury statements of the Comptroller show that all the banks in the Nation have only about $700,000,000 in their vaults; that the day after they subscribe to Government bonds they still have the same amount in their vaults?

Why is it that the Supreme Court kicks out all our legislation under the commerce clause of the Constitution and upholds our legislation under the fifth power of Congress, the money power, as in the case of gold revaluation?

I am asked if Congress has the power to "coin and regulate the value of money", why we do not use that power and issue the currency of the United States, leaving credit to the banks instead of doing as we do now, when we permit the private bankers to issue the currency? I am wondering whether we are not running in reverse all the time. I am again asked questions by the people that I cannot answer. Why did Jackson veto the charter of the Second Bank of the United States, which was privately owned, because he believed it unconstitutional, while Democrats who praise the name of Jackson defend the privately owned Federal Reserve System, which must be just as unconstitutional.

Why do we who follow our great President in his destiny and praise his inaugural address in which he promised "to drive the money changers from the temple", and now in the Banking Act of 1935 vote to give all the profits of the Federal Reserve System over to the bankers, when the fact is that from 1913 to 1935, after a 6-percent dividend was declared, the profits were always split 50-50 between the Government and the bankers?

Why is it that in all this banking legislation and in all this bond racket there is no objection of our actions from the other side of the House?

Why is it that the administration is so frequently charged with invading the field of private business, is not urged to invade the field of public business, the money and the banking field?

Since Saturday last I am asked why Governor Smith, in his attack on President Roosevelt, kept away from the money question, the bond question, and the banking question. Why did not Al mention that the only power of Congress we Democrats used that did stick before the Supreme Court was the money power; and as he spoke in the Mayflower under the auspices of the American Liberty League, I am wondering why he did not criticize the Banking Act of 1935, the interest-bearing bonds, the debt of thirty-odd billion, and the burden the taxpayers are bearing because of interest on money borrowed by this Government, the only power in the land that has the power to coin it.

I am honestly wondering, Mr. Chairman, if it would not be the best thing for the people if the Democrats fixed the responsibility for the depression directly on the Republicans, under whose administration and from 1929 to 1933 six and one-half billions of dollars in fiction credit money was permitted to be withdrawn from circulation by the private banking system of this country.

But I am in difficulty, for I fear the Republicans might reply that we Democrats tried to borrow our way back to prosperity by issuing interest-bearing bonds and thereby imposed a double burden on a tax-ridden people.

Finally, the question I am never able to answer any constituents is this, Why does Congress not take over the whole Federal Reserve System, lock, stock, and barrel, paying its private owners in full what they paid for their stock with 6 percent from its date of purchase, less any dividends that may have been paid, and with that System as an agency of Congress, build a central bank, a monetary authority, a fiscal agency of the United States, that will keep the supply of credit and currency adequate and safe; that will control inflation and deflation; that will raise price levels and destroy the greatest enemy of the Nation—the Federal Reserve System, with its private control of money? [Applause.]

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat intrigued, if that is the correct word, by the discussion that has gone on here with reference to the address of former Governor Smith before the Liberty League the other evening. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who addressed the House this morning, and the gentleman from Minnesota, who addressed the House yesterday, stated that the Democratic Party created a precedent when they walked out on Al Smith in 1928. The reasons, of course, that they walked out at that time are never discussed in polite society.

What especially stimulates me in connection with that situation is the fact that Governor Smith is arrayed in bitter, unkindly terms for having attended a gathering and addressing certain malefactors of great wealth, the men who are contributors to the Liberty League fund. I sought and endeavored a moment ago to gain from the eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania—I still call him that, although he disclaims the honor—a difference between the practice of the distinguished occupant of the White House spending weeks at a time on the palatial yacht of Vincent Astor and the fact that Governor Smith—a distinguished and ripened publicist, with his life full of undoubted achievements for mankind—appears before these industrialists and gives his views on the state of the Nation. I confess that I am unable to understand the outcry that has gone out with reference to this matter. It seems to me it is definitely and basically a demagogic attempt to becloud the issues and throw sand in the eyes of the people.

I do not envy nor do I deny to the distinguished President of the United States, whose burdens are heavy, the right to seek his recreation wherever he may; but I call attention to the fact that these Liberty Leaguers, who are in fact real industrialists, employ thousands of men and make localities blossom like the rose. Why are they put in the category of abandoned men and lepers from the economic standpoint and, at the same time, Vincent Astor is by inference dignified and exalted by the attendance of the President of the United States on his $3,000,000 yacht?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. No; I cannot yield to the gentleman now.

Nor were those visits to the yacht without fruit. I call attention to the Members of the House to the fact that out of this association ripened and blossomed the magazine Today. When Professor Moley crossed swords with the distinguished Secretary of State and was thrown into the discard, then indeed, if you please, Vincent Astor, the friend and familiar of the President, took the other friend and familiar of the President to his bosom and started this magazine. May I suggest to the gentlemen on the other side who are attributing unworthy motives to this great American publicist, Al Smith, who is great in achievement, great in point of character, and from my viewpoint possesses sound political philosophy, that the President's own party is not free from the alleged stain of associating with these malefactors of great wealth.

For example, Jim Farley, the field marshal of the Democratic Party, is not loath to accept a substantial contribution from the Morgan firm—the hated Morgan firm—which has been brought to its knees and an attempt made to show that this firm was in fact an outfit that was promoting war. They contribute to the Democratic campaign fund. The Fisher Body outfit, with its history of labor-struggle difficulties, and the Chrysler firm, with a similar history, are substantial contributors to the Democratic campaign fund. Last, but not least, Mr. Chairman, is that distinguished purist, that great publicist, Henry L. Doherty, who sold the American people a billion dollars' worth of stock which on the findings of the Federal Trade Commission is now worth $30,000,000. He is likewise the friend and familiar of the President. Father Coughlin, a publicist of some renown, says that both parties are tarred with the same stick. He is a neutral diagnostician, and when he states they are both tarred with the same stick it is worth considering.

I mention these facts, in passing, for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that while Al Smith made this address there he spent but 1 hour in that company; but the distinguished President of the United States, in the palatial atmosphere of the Nourmahal, costing from three to four million dollars, spends weeks at a time hiving with other gentlemen who have not amassed but only inherited vast wealth.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Not now.

So these contacts, if you please, are mutual. Both parties have them; both parties have their financial fringes as they have their lunatic fringes. So do not let us hear any more of this claptrap and demagogic outcry against the propriety of Al Smith addressing a meeting of industrialists who have on their pay rolls at a real living wage thousands of contented Americans.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. CULKIN. I am going to yield first to my distinguished friend from Washington, but I am not going to listen to a speech.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Referring to the gentleman's last statement, what is the lunatic fringe and what is not the lunatic fringe to which the gentleman refers—the ones who accept these funds the gentleman talks about or those who do not accept them?

Mr. CULKIN. I may say——

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Well, answer the question.

Mr. CULKIN. Who has the floor, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. ZIONCHECK. All right.

Mr. CULKIN. I have tried to be courteous to the gentleman, but now he is bulldozing me. [Laughter and applause.] Both parties are guilty of the same crime, if it is a crime.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. But how about the lunatic fringe? Will the gentleman answer that?

Mr. CULKIN. No; that is all. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I was rather interested while I was listening to my friend's remarks to know whether the gentleman supported Governor Smith in 1928.

Mr. CULKIN. No; I am frank to say I did not, but I have never ceased to admire Governor Smith as an executive. We have had a long line of distinguished Republican Governors in New York State, but no Republican Governor in New York State gave better service to the people than Al Smith—and I am stating the facts when I tell the gentleman that. May I say there were some other Governors of New York State who went into higher spheres and higher atmospheres, but none of these gentlemen were so distinguished as Mr. Smith in the office of Governor.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he supported the President last week in his veto.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, I do not want to inject into the speech of the gentleman from New York an answer to that question, because it is beneath the dignity of any gentleman to try to break into another gentleman's speech by asking such a ridiculous question, which is a million light-years away from what the gentleman from New York is discussing.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield? My question to you, if you support the President, is as sensible as your asking the gentleman from New York if he supported Smith.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman, as usual, errs.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. CULKIN. No.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. I will answer the other question that the gentleman asked.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this matter of great wealth, may I say for the purposes of the campaign the pot should not call the kettle black? I do not believe the field marshal of the Democratic Party, the Postmaster General, would be apt to regard as tainted money, money from any source; and I do note that, due to his industry and vigor in that connection, he has at least been able to get just as much money for the coffers of the Democratic Party as the Republican group has for the coffers of the Republican Party.

I think this covers my discussion of the situation, and I am deeply grateful to the House for its attention.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. CULKIN. No; I am not going to yield again to the gentleman.

It is a far cry from a discussion of partisan ethics to a discussion of the necessity for a balanced Budget in America. I confess that when I first came to the House and when a discussion of the necessity for a balanced Budget came up, I had some doubt about the force of it.

The former Director of the Budget, Lewis Douglas, who to my mind is one of our great Americans, was a Member of this House. He dignified this House by his splendid ability and the charm of his personality. The President exalted him to the position of Director of the Budget, and subsequently he saw fit to resign.

I am not going to discuss the implication of that, but I do wish to discuss in that connection a statement he made not long since that out of an unbalanced Budget would come inflation, national disorder, internal strife, and finally the destruction of the Republic.

Personally, I was somewhat shocked by the suggestion. I thought that perhaps in the pique, or in the abruptness of his parting with the President, perhaps he had overstated the case.

But last night I was reading a biography of the younger Pitt, the great Earl of Chatham, and in that biography the writer quotes Pitt as saying that the French Revolution was caused by the fact that France had failed to balance her budget.

You are familiar with the cataclysm of the French Revolution. The writer makes the statement that the reason why France got into that debacle of blood was because she failed to balance her budget.

Upon reading that authority I became convinced that out of inflation resulting from an unbalanced budget would come suffering to all the people, with a possibility of resulting disaster.

And so today I speak definitely for a balancing of the Budget and for a speedy attempt to put the financial house of America in order.

It is my definite notion that if this Congress fails to accomplish that, that hard and fast upon that procedure, hard and fast upon the public learning—and coming to know that the House of Representatives, the representatives of the people, will yield to this group and that group and thus fail to balance the Budget—will come a fascism, and popular government will cease to be in America. [Applause.]

But I particularly resent the slanders, if you please, upon this House and upon the past Congresses. It is claimed by various economic misfits and marplots—the Ickes and Tugwells—whom the distinguished occupant of the White House has put into high place, that past Congresses were given to the pork barrel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the House to the fact that the House of Representatives in the past has been more economical of the people's money than the type of spenders that have been developed during the present administration. When I speak of honest Harold Ickes, I speak of the man in the White House. The President is responsible for him. Honest Harold has spent and authorized to be spent more money in 1 year than the Congress did in 100 years for the purpose of rivers and harbors. I call the attention of the House today to the fact that this willful spending will destroy America and, more serious than that, will destroy popular government, because that is the guaranty of personal liberty in the United States. These bureaucrats have spent and engaged to spend on reclamation in this administration over $1,000,000,000. I do not agree with all of the pipe dreams of Secretary Wallace, but I think he is a sincere and honest man. While he and Mr. Chester Davis have been endeavoring to bring agriculture within the range of reasonable production, so as to get a fair price for agricultural products, another department of the Government, over in the Department of the Interior, peopled by pseudo empire builders, has been bringing into production an additional 3,000,000 acres of land, at an ultimate cost of over a billion dollars. Under the acreage-retirement program of the Government we retired some 35,000,000 acres from production at a cost of something like $2,000,000,000.

While the Department of Agriculture was doing this, and bent on that program, over in the Department of the Interior a group of willful men were preparing to bring into production 3,000,000 acres of land. I understand, of course, that the gentlemen from the West will say that I am from New York and that I am illiberal and that I do not understand. That is the usual line of talk. I am not going to be brushed aside by any such ancient and bewhiskered generality as that. I am going to tell my good friends from the Western States, and I am very fond of every one of them, that I am distinctly for the development and for rational irrigation of every part of the West which the consuming public may need or demand. [Applause.] I am for them and they know that, and applaud it, perhaps satirically, but that is the fact. I am in their corner whenever any project involves public need in the West. If they will come to me when their case is sound, I will fight for them until hell freezes over. But I am against the unnecessary, flagrant waste of public moneys for this purpose. That is what I quarrel with. It has been the fashion here to place responsibility for this thing upon the shoulders of Honest Harold. I am going to state the facts today because the national issue is coming closer—I am going to depart from the usual courtesy that hangs around discussion of the Presidential attitude—I am going to put the President into the picture, because the issue of this wild spending is definitely in the President's corner, and on his place in the coming campaign. Up in the Northwest we have this Grand Coulee proposition. The engineers estimate the Grand Coulee would cost $714,000,000, amortized at 4 percent.

They changed that plan, and now the plan is, or was, to erect a dam 500 feet high, with a crest a mile long, and throw it across one of the valleys up there. The original breakdown on the P. W. A. called it power. Then they went to reclamation, and now they are back to power again. They now say that it is definitely power. I will tell you that, thus far, it is neither power or reclamation but just unbridled spending. I want to give you this one phase of that proposition. An authoritative writer in the Nation magazine, one James Rorty, was sent up there by his publication to look over the situation. He examined the records in the various county offices about the situation of the Grand Coulee development, and he found that out of 1,200,000 acres involved, 700,000 acres of the choicest land were held by the banks, trust companies, and by the utilities. The President now has allotted $63,000,000 to this, and the House, may I say, is definitely particeps criminis. The House last year put its John Hancock on that proposition. What have we got? When they have spent the $63,000,000 all they will have is a dam 177 feet high, with a 5,000-foot crest. This means, as Governor Pierce will tell you, absolutely nothing. It does not mean irrigation and it does not mean power. It is just a brutal spending of the people's money. Do you know what is back of that? Do you know what the dreams of the Northwest are? I have been in that Northwest and I know that country. I love its people; they are the salt of the earth.

I want to be fair to them. What they intend to do under the leadership of a promotional group is to move the inhabitants of Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa over into the Grand Coulee area, which God never intended should be used for anything.

Under this urge of the reclamation groups to make two blades of grass grow where none grew before, they decided to put this vast area into irrigation, in defiance of God's mandate and the needs of the Nation. Then, finding that the farmers of the country were in arms against that, they shifted their policy, and now, again, they call it power. But I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that up in the Grand Coulee country there is no one to sell power to except the coyotes and jack rabbits, and there never will be. America's population trends are falling, and the proposition of America's future increase in population is mooted. Please consider that out of 900,000,000 arable acres in America today we only have 250,000,000 in cultivation. The point I am speaking about now is that all this personnel, all this ability to create additional surplus crops, should not be in the Department of the Interior. It should be in the Department of Agriculture.

I had hoped that a distinguished and able Member on the other side, whose name I will not mention, would introduce a bill to put those activities in the Department of Agriculture, so that agriculture could hold the barometer on production, but he has not done it so far. I am going to do it, if need be, although I am more for the cause than I am for any personal glory in connection with it. Next year, when we elect a Republican House and a Republican President [applause], we are going to pass that bill. But in view of the fact that you distinguished gentlemen are going to be here until next year, I am asking you to do it now and get the benefit of it yourselves. I am going to leave the course open to you for a time.

There is another reclamation proposition that I wish to discuss. It is Caspar Alcova, Wyo., which was condemned by God for the purposes of man when he made the world. The hand of the potter shook when the Caspar Alcova area came into being, and in some mysterious way Nature, left to its own functions, because Nature is not always God—shot that area through with selenium, making it impossible to produce other than poisoned crops. The Caspar Alcova project, to which I have called the attention of the House and which I believe is proceeding illegally today in the State of Wyoming, should be stopped definitely, because the United States, out of its Treasury, is spending some $27,000,000 for that hopeless proposition. Incidentally, may I say that it is doing violence to the rights of Colorado in connection with the use of certain waters.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Was that Caspar Alcova proposal approved by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. CULKIN. I do not believe it ever was.

Mr. RICH. It never has been.

Mr. CULKIN. No. I think that was taken out of the curative bill that was introduced here last year. I notice in the hearings reference to the Gila project, Arizona. That was put to work to the tune of some $22,000,000, and then the soil group of the Department of Agriculture came to life, and feeling a new sense of their duty to the public, served notice upon the Reclamation Bureau that the soil in the Gila region was impossible of irrigation. Then, and then only, was it stopped.

These facts emphasize the necessity of the action for which I plead. It is immaterial to me whether the action comes from this or the other side of the House.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield to my colleague, Governor PIERCE.

Mr. PIERCE. Is it not true that now the Department of Agriculture has to make a report as to the advisability of agricultural products growing under these irrigation projects?

Mr. CULKIN. That may be so.

Mr. PIERCE. That is true today.

Mr. CULKIN. But I have found they have been singularly unwilling to cross the trail of the empire builders in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. PIERCE. Early there was no attempt to find out whether the land would grow agricultural products or not.

Mr. CULKIN. In conclusion, I just want to call attention to another phase of this spending. At Bonneville, Oreg., on the lower Columbia, is a power and navigation development. I have never quarreled with that proposition. It had the vigorous support of General Martin, our peppery former Regular Army colleague, who was a Member of this House. It had the support of the brilliant and able gentleman from Oregon, Mr. MOTT. It seemed to me to be definitely a wholesome proposition. It has no reclamation in it, but it does have navigation and power. But the weird thing about it is that upon the creation of this power, which after all comes out of the capital of the people of the United States and its taxpaying powers, the Bonneville group intend to move industries from the East and from the Middle West to that location.

In other words, after having taken the money which was created and earned and paid in the form of taxes to the Treasury by these big Eastern and Midwestern States, they then intend to commit the crime of civic grand larceny by moving our industries bodily out to this power site. May I say that the same proposition lies back of the Grand Coulee as it is now. On the face of it, however, it just means $67,000,000 worth of dam. For reclamation purposes it will cost $400,000,000 to complete.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CULKIN. There is one phase of the picture on the Columbia River to which I should like to call attention. I am afraid I have trespassed too much on your time already. I do want to call attention, however, to the destruction of the salmon fisheries in the Columbia River. That is a matter of vital concern not only to the Northwest but to the country at large. At the Bonneville Dam fish ladders and elevators are being constructed.

Sometime ago I called attention to the fact that the belief of conservationists was that the $10,000,000 annual pack of the salmon industry in that country was doomed. I called attention to the fact that the elevators that were constructed at the foot of Bonneville Dam were all very fine for the adult, sophisticated salmon who would come up, ring the bell with their tails, and then go up over the falls in the elevator, but the younger, unsophisticated, uneducated salmon, the fry passing on to the sea would be caught in the swift turbines and killed. This got into the press of the Northwest, and I think I got more abuse than I ever did before, and in my day I have had my full share of it. However, I received a letter from a good woman up there in the Columbia River country, Home Valley, Wash., which I think is interesting enough for the House to hear:

DEAR SIR: You are the first man up there where all the mess is dished out who has dared to openly defend our west coast's third largest industry, commercial fishing. We commercial fishermen and wives sit with bated breath worrying and wondering how we can make our livelihood after all this dam business is finished.

It is a safe bet that your guess is as good as these so-called fish experts. And our guess is the same as yours, that building these huge power projects kills a $10,000,000 industry, and 28,000 or more people will be on the unemployed list.

Then she goes on to state this, which is a classic:

We know fish swim in schools, but we also know that college professors cannot teach these schools of fish. Nature is a funny thing, and, as I understand, a lake will be formed above these dams; scavenger fish live in lakes and eat salmon fry. Besides baby fish go down stream with a swift current, spring freshets, so how will they be guided into a lake to the sea?

Taxpayers' money build dams at 50 cents per hour. And a large industry may be killed which furnishes a livelihood for 28,000 people. Aside from the fact that commercial fishing is the means of our making a good livelihood we produce the same as the farmers. Our produce is as full of all the vitamins as the farm produce.

So we hatch millions of salmon for each salmon we catch, and we feel it is time someone is giving us some protection and help. So we wish to thank you for giving us your aid.

Taking care of the salmon that spawn in the headwaters of the Columbia River is a big guess. So far these Royal Columbia silver salmon that run in the river from February to the last of May may have never been hatched up in a man-built hatchery. They eat their fill of sardines and fatten up at the mouth of the Columbia River and head to British Columbia, the headwaters of the river, to spawn. Steelhead, white-meated tube, or chum salmon, blue jack, a poor grade of pink salmon, have been hatched; but the Royal Chinook salmon, what will become of it when the dam business is all over? I have been on the river all my life, and my husband has fished 23 years and my father 50 years. Tell me, is our livelihood being thrown away to fatten the Mellon babies?

Honest Harold Ickes treated this matter with a good deal of humor. He thought it was all awfully funny.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. He thought it was a wonderful thing to build that dam at Bonneville. In this book, Back to Work—on page 117 of this book, a book written by his ghost writer, because he could not write a book—I am convinced of that from my own diagnosis of his mental status—is stated:

An interesting feature of this dam will be the construction of giant fishways for which the sum of $3,200,000 has been provided as an aid to the salmon to scale the 54-foot dam when they feel the urge to go to the upper stretches of the river on their honeymoons.

[Laughter.]

He is the gentleman to whom the President has turned over the power that belongs to this Congress.

What I speak for, Mr. Chairman, is economy and the elimination of the political spending which is bleeding the Nation white. I speak against any development which will prejudice agriculture, and particularly prejudice the men in agriculture who are now on the land in these Western States. I warn you on the other side of the aisle and you gentleman from that particular section against the people's wrath when it appears that you are permitting the Interior Department to develop these huge areas while they themselves have no present market for their products. I think the reasoning of this—the iron logic of it—will strike into your constituents' souls and that on election day they will speak in thunder tones against your return to this House. I thank you for your very patient hearing. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein some official figures from the Department of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that not infrequently when a Member takes the floor to present facts relating to some phase of our economic life, he is suspected of partisan motives. This often results in scant heed being paid to the facts revealed. Great as partisan prejudice may be against the policy of a protective tariff, it would seem that the realities, so abundantly fortified by experience and by facts, should be sufficient to overcome such prejudice.

I am sure that the thoughtful Members on this floor would not seriously contend that it would be beneficial to American labor at this time to have unrestricted immigration, especially with the Orient. Do you believe that it would be detrimental or advantageous to American labor to permit the working people of the Orient to enter the United States without restraint to bid against workers for jobs? There are few Members on this floor, if any, I venture to say, who would support such a proposal. The recent action taken by the Congress—1934—restricting Filipino immigration, even fixing the quota as low as 50, is evidence that you sense the danger to labor and to agriculture from immigration.

But while you object to unrestricted immigration of cheap oriental labor, yet many Members are indifferent to the importation of products that displace our labor in the factory and the field.

I maintain that to let in the foreign goods is more injurious to the Nation as a whole than to let in the foreign laborers themselves. I am opposed to the admission of either. To let in the foreign workers instead of their products would at least give to our Nation the spending power of the pay roll, which in turn would create, as a result of such expenditure, a series of home markets.

It is an indisputable fact that the wage scale and the standard of living in the United States are higher than they are in other countries, especially higher than they are in Asia and the tropical countries. Can it be successfully controverted that when our domestic market is opened to the unrestricted competition of the world, such as I have described, that our factory hands and our farmers who are employed are either displaced or forced to produce at a lower cost? The open-market principle leads inevitably to this result: A diminishing standard of living until it reaches that of the worst-paid laborers that exist on the face of the globe. I cannot state the matter more clearly nor more succinctly than to use the words of Andrew Jackson in support of a tariff. He said:

It is time we should become a little more Americanized, and instead of feeding the paupers of Europe, feed our own, or else in a short time, by continuing our present policy, we shall all be paupers ourselves.

[Applause.]

Let me remind my colleagues that your constituents, who toil in the fields where soybeans or cottonseed are produced, know only too well that they have a rival in countries where the standards of living of western civilization are unknown. To compare the standards of living of the people you have the honor to represent with the standards of living of those who live in the tropical and oriental countries, who are invited to compete with your constituents, and then to assert that the free and unrestricted flow of these foreign products into our home market does not injure the American farmer is a position not supported by the facts.

We do not want to put our farmers who raise soybeans or who raise cottonseed in competition with oriental labor. Neither do we want our farmers who are engaged in dairy production to be required to compete with imported edible oils and fats produced by cheap tropical labor. We do not want foreign fats and oils to displace our domestic dairy products in the American market. [Applause.]

It is estimated that if the American farmers were given the opportunity to produce the fats and oils now being imported from foreign countries they could put 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 acres now displaced by foreign imports under cultivation.

The American dairy farmer, the soybean producer, the cotton farmer have a common interest in protecting the domestic market from the importation of fats and oils. The volume of these competing products, now entering our ports in ever-increasing quantities, is destroying a market which our farmers cannot afford to surrender. The home market, the best cash market in the world, is their last line of defense. The danger to our home market from the importation of fats and oils is fully revealed and painfully demonstrated by the following official figures:

Fats and oils imports for consumption

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. ZIONCHECK].

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] left the inference that if we did not balance the Budget we would have a revolution in this country. He used as his authority the younger Pitt and Lord Chatham in some ancient book about the French Revolution. I should like to call his attention to the fact that those people knew nothing about balancing the budget back in those times. Did not even hear of a budget. If there was any budget to balance, it was the budget of their stomachs. When those hungry, starving people asked for bread, the rulers asked, "Why not give them cake?" and threw rocks at them instead. Rocks being heavier than bread overbalanced the budget—they were not satisfied—revolution came about as the culminating effect. I am just interpreting history for the benefit of the gentleman from New York.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to talk politics today. I am going to try to give you valuable and important information relative to the investigations that have been going on since July 1934 by a select committee of the House.

Twice before I have called the attention of the House to the abuses that existed in the default of bonds and securities, and in our preliminary report the committee gave the House and the country a great deal of valuable information. I stated then, and I repeat now, that your committee investigating these so-called bondholders' "protective" committees, which I designate as "grafting" rather than "protective" committees, showed that these committees have under their control some $20,000,000,000 worth of bonds that are owned and have been paid for by nearly 5,000,000 of our most deserving citizens in the United States. With the 1929 debacle thousands of these issues defaulted, and the houses of issue, investment bankers, mortgage companies, and title and guaranty companies, in conjunction with and under the guidance of outstanding law firms in the United States, obtained control and management of these properties and devised a scheme to bring this about by the formation of so-called protective committees.

The old railroad scheme in reorganizations or bankruptcies was followed. Protective committees were formed, composed of officials of the firm, their clerks, high-powered salesmen, and agents. The names of prominent citizens were added for window dressing, for the sole purpose of enabling them to more easily obtain the deposit of as many outstanding bonds as possible. The tremendous fees charged and obtained are turned over to the house of issue, trust companies, mortgage companies, and banks.

After the formation of these committees in the manner I have just indicated, voluminous deposit agreements would be prepared in highly complicated legal verbiage, by the signing of which the bondholder forfeited all his rights and the protective committee gained full and complete power to do as it pleased with the property. They send out communications inviting the bondholders to deposit their bonds with these committees, assuring them that they themselves, and by themselves, could not protect their interests, but that the committee which had been formed would safeguard their rights and interests.

I may say that I learned this morning during a hearing of the committee here in Washington that there are some very clever lawyers in Philadelphia. They are not slow up there. It is practically impossible for the layman to understand these agreements, and when the widows, orphans, executors, administrators, and organizations that have invested in the bonds send them in, they unknowingly part with all their rights and interest. Thus the bondholders' committees obtain absolute control to do as they please.

Mr. Chairman, there are about 3,000 of these committees, some of them controlling over 400 pieces of property to the value of many hundred millions of dollars.

A large number of law firms have been engaged in organizing protective committees in order to represent them, and banks have done likewise. There are, however, a handful of outstanding and Nation-wide committees, controlling at least eight to nine billion dollars worth of bonds in default.

OVER $600,000,000 IN FEES AND EXPENSES

Prominent among these are the Roosevelt committee, the Straus committees, the Pounds committee, and others sponsored and dominated by the Detroit Trust Co., Manufacturers Trust Co., the Chicago Title & Trust Co., Halsey, Stuart & Co., the Central Trust Co. of Chicago, the Girard Trust Co., Hayden Stone & Co., Spencer Trask & Co., E. H. Rollins & Co., the American Bond & Mortgage Co., the Prudence Co., and many others. I might point out that the Chicago Title & Trust Co. is the most domineering of all, acting as trustee, receiver, depository, or manager in thousands of properties, and the fees obtained and charges levied against these properties will amount to many millions of dollars. In the near future I will submit a report outlining in detail the activities of the various committees, the fees they have received, and the millions of dollars in fees and expenses which they will receive when the final reorganizations or sales of properties have been effected.

If we may assume that the committees will be liberal to the extent of reducing their usual charge of 5 percent to 3 percent, based on the nearly $20,000,000,000 worth of bonds now outstanding, in excess of $600,000,000, will accrue to these committees in fees and expenses, and remember also that these committees, acting presumably in a protective capacity, are gaining control of thousands of the finest buildings in the United States, as well as theaters, hotels, manufacturing, industrial, and utility companies.

Mr. Chairman, I charge without fear of successful contradiction that these committees are controlled and dominated by trust companies, banks, and other financial institutions, and that this has developed into the greatest racket of all times.

There is a combination acquiring apartment buildings, some of them worth as much as $10,000,000; another acquiring hotels, another theaters, and others various large industrials throughout the United States. Due to the advantages of section 77B of the National Bankruptcy Act, they are not only permitted to remain in control as a committee but to continue such control for 10 or 15 years, through the medium of voting trusts created with the sanction and approval of the courts.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I interpret the remarks which the gentleman has just made to mean that certain special interests are trying to get control of the big apartment houses, other special interests are trying to get control of hotels, and other special interests theaters, and so on?

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman in the course of his remarks put in the RECORD who those special interests are so that the country may know?

Mr. SABATH. Yes. The select committee is today conducting hearings in Washington. Hearings were held in Chicago, New York, Detroit, Boston, Washington, St. Louis, Milwaukee, San Francisco, and Los Angeles, which substantiate what I say about these special combinations. Through the press and by other means we have brought before the public a true picture of willfully deliberate and dishonest mismanagement of properties by these protective committees. We have shown where false reports and statements given to the bondholders forced them to dispose of their bonds for a few cents on the dollar.

In the examination of witnesses at a hearing of our committee this morning, in the matter of the Roosevelt Hotel of Philadelphia, it was developed that the valuation placed on this property was $940,000, and that a sale has just been approved for the sum of $120,000. To whom was it sold? Why, to the five vice presidents of a certain bank, the Girard Trust Co., which advanced $70,000 to the committee in order to pay taxes, expenses, fees, and charges against the property. In this particular case the bondholders received three-fourths of a cent on a dollar for their gold bonds. The committee which controlled this property, as well as a number of others, and approved the sale had previously paid to an opposing committee which blocked its acquiring the deposit of bonds and full control the sum of $70,000, representing fees and expenses of this opposing committee.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I think every Member of the House is interested in the work of the committee, which is headed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. I am wondering if the gentleman's committee will be able to recommend concrete legislation that will afford relief to these millions of bondholders. The difficulty seems to be that these bonds are distributed all over the country in such small amounts that the individual bondholder himself does not feel justified in going to the expense of retaining lawyers to look after his own individual interest so that he may be protected. What relief does the gentleman's committee suggest in that regard?

Mr. SABATH. We prepared and introduced a bill in the last session of Congress. We appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee, but unfortunately our bill did not receive favorable consideration. In the hope of obtaining action on this bill we revised it and put it in as an amendment to title VIII of the National Bankruptcy Act, affecting sections 74 and 77B, which provides for the appointment of a conservator, leaving it to the President to select or designate the bureau or department which is to act as conservator. In this way we hope to eliminate the excessive charges, vicious practices, and untold crimes which are being committed against some 5,000,000 bondholders in this country.

Our committee investigation discloses that since September 1934, after the passage of section 77B, there were filed up to January 1, 1935, 287 cases, and up to January 1, 1936, there were filed a total of approximately 2,767 cases, of which only 293 were disposed of; the total involved is upward of $10,000,000,000.

We have worked for 17 months and we have Philadelphia and New York committees before our committee now, and I am now away from these hearings to give a partial report of our activities.

This bill was reintroduced yesterday. I believe it is a good bill and I appeal to the Members who are now present to cooperate with our small select committee and to help us obtain favorable consideration of this measure. I shall put in the RECORD a short résumé of what this bill seeks to do.

The bill provides that a Federal agency be established to act as a conservator in all 74 and 77B proceedings in bankruptcy.

The conservator shall act as sole receiver, custodian, or trustee, with compensation limited to actual expenses. Attorneys of conservator may act as its counsel when acting as trustee, receiver, or custodian. This procedure will materially minimize the costs of reorganization, as well as enable the conservator to have full knowledge and control over the entire proceedings and estate.

The conservator may by rules regulate the protective committee and its personnel—it may prescribe the provisions and limitations of deposit agreements—and the solicitation of proxies, assents, deposits, consents, and so forth.

The conservator may itself propose a plan of reorganization or proposal for a composition or extension, and must approve all plans or proposals by others, before it is submitted to the court, as well as approve all fees, expenses, and compensation in all such reorganizations.

The court, or upon suggestion of conservator, may refer any issues, either specially or generally, to a special master. The salaries of masters are limited to no more than $7,500 per annum—present fee system abolished.

Provisions for a fine of no more than $5,000 and imprisonment for no more than 5 years is made for the willful violation of any provisions of this act.

This bill includes any reorganization, composition, or extension which involves liabilities in the amount of $50,000 or over, evidenced by at least 10 credit instruments owned by at least 10 persons.

In addition to present powers the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans to finance such reorganizations, compositions, or extensions if approved by the conservator.

Loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to mortgage companies and other financial institutions are conditioned upon the agreement that none of the funds so loaned will be used in such reorganization, composition, or extension unless approved by the conservator.

Referees are placed upon a salary basis to be fixed by the respective district judges instead of on the old fee system. All fees in excess of salary revert to the Treasury of the United States.

Originally, Mr. Chairman, some of the judges looked with displeasure upon our work, thinking we were interfering with the rights and prerogatives of the judiciary, but I am, indeed, pleased to say today that, with the exception of very few, the judges are now approving our work, and are cooperating and assisting us. These tireless working judges have the sincere appreciation and respect of our committee, and are worthy of the blessings of the distressed bondholders.

We have called upon many of the judges with the view of safeguarding the rights of these bondholders. We have appeared in court and opposed fraudulent sales and fraudulent reorganizations, day in and day out, and we have saved thousands of these buildings and properties for the bondholders. I may say that since this committee started its investigation the value of these defaulted bonds has increased from 50 percent up to 1,500 percent in many cases. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. In many cases, Mr. Chairman, bonds were selling for 3 cents or 5 cents on the dollar, but are now selling for 50, 60, and 75 cents, and some as high as 95 cents on the dollar.

Oh, I wish to God we could reach all of these committees and get at them. We have recommended prosecutions, and the members of some of these committees have already been indicted, and there are yet hundreds that should be indicted. If we can bring this about, we are going to try to do so.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will yield for just a moment, I may say I have not had a chance to read his bill, but I feel generally like saying more power to him and his committee.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Under the terms of the bill referred to, who fixes the salaries that the receivers are to get?

Mr. SABATH. The conservator will act as a trustee or a receiver, and will only be permitted to charge the actual cost.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. The salary is fixed by the bill itself?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; and the masters and the trustees will receive $7,500 a year instead of asking for $100,000 for 6 months, or 9 months' work, as was done in the Paramount case in the city of New York.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Then, as I understand the gentleman, the judge will have no discretion in respect of fixing the salary?

Mr. SABATH. In allowing fees, no. The conservator will only be permitted to make such charges as are actual costs, and we will eliminate the practice whereby some judges allow influential houses of issue and law firms to dictate who the receivers shall be and how much fees they shall receive.

I think this is legislation that is absolutely needed and required.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's point of view.

Mr. SABATH. Because, if something is not done, God only knows what will happen in the future, because people are beginning to lose confidence in our courts and our legal procedure.

I may give just one illustration. Four weeks ago we were in Boston, and by chance we penetrated the case of the Fisk Tire Co., where there was $45,000,000 of stock and $20,000,000 of bonds. There were reverses, and in 1931 they went into receivership. Inventories taken of this great institution showed that it was worth only about forty-odd-million dollars. The protective committee for these bondholders and stockholders approved a sale of this $40,000,000 worth of assets, which were all of the assets of the Fisk Tire Co. for $3,000,000, which included $600,000 in cash on hand. The bondholders got 3 cents on the dollar and the stockholders got 1 cent on the dollar. Within 18 months the inside group that bought this outfit for $2,400,000 made over $2,000,000 net profit in the business. They charged against the bondholders lawyers' fees of over $600,000.

The bondholders and stockholders were wiped out and the new bondholders who bought the bonds for 3 cents and the stock for 1 cent on the dollar became the owners of this property. We have hundreds of such abuses, with similar conditions prevalent all over the United States which we are trying to eliminate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman state in that connection whether or not there was a recapitalization of that company by those who purchased it for about $3,000,000; and if so, for what amount it was recapitalized?

Mr. SABATH. Within a period of 4 weeks they reorganized the properties for which they paid $3,000,000, with $600,000 cash on hand, which would make a net of $2,400,000, and recapitalized it for $13,000,000, and within 18 months they made a clear profit of over $2,000,000.

Oh, I must not forget this: The chairman of that committee is none other than the vice president of the National Economy League. Now, if he ever practiced economy, I have not seen it. I am also told that he coined the phrase "raw deal." Well, if he did, by the eternal heavens, he had something to go by, for he knows what a raw deal is. [Laughter and applause.] That certainly was a "raw deal" where the bondholders got three-quarters of a cent for every dollar and received a certificate of the cremation of their bonds. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. In the face of the disclosure which the gentleman has made, I hope his bill goes further than the mere limitation of the salary of the receivers.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, it goes further than that.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I think many Members of the House would like to know the scope of that gentleman's measure.

Mr. SABATH. It goes as far as the Constitution will permit without interfering with the rights and privileges of the courts.

Before I conclude I want to say this: We have evidence wherein at least a thousand pieces of property—prime buildings, hotels, theaters, and so forth—have been sold for 4 or 5 cents on the dollar; properties that never should have been foreclosed; that never should have gone into the hands of receivers; and that never should have been taken over by these grasping, thieving, protective committees.

Many Members have asked me to acquaint them with the results of our investigation of Washington properties. In the Wardman Park reorganization of this city we found a voting trust estate would terminate on November 1, 1935, but just prior to that date proxies were dispatched to the holders of the original bonds with the request that the voting trust be continued for another 3 years.

The trust agreement was so worded that unless a majority decided against the continuance it would automatically be extended for another 3 years, with the continuing management of properties valued at approximately $30,000,000 and the continuance of the fees and expenses of this trusteeship.

In the Mayflower Hotel reorganization the hotel is controlled by three voting trusteeships and is under the management of the American Security & Trust Co., who receive 1½ percent of the hotel receipts as their fee. Fees totaling approximately $700,000 for attorneys and others were pending before the court, but we have recently been informed by the court auditor that he has recommended that these fees be reduced to around $125,000 and the complete exclusion of any fees and expenses to the three committees, which is a reduction of around 80 percent.

The Shoreham Hotel property is similar in a way to these other Washington properties. There were three receivers, and when it was reorganized there were still three voting trustees. The three receivers collected $100,000 and the bondholders' committee $100,000 in fees. The owner of the hotel, who was permitted to acquire all of the equity for only $61,000, has only to use the income of the hotel to reduce the bonds or until it can be refinanced a few years later and he will then have this valuable property for the small sum of $61,000 and at the same time drawing a $10,000 salary per year in addition to his other business.

Our committee has made recommendations in many instances for criminal prosecution and has supplied the Bureau of Internal Revenue with information on which thousands of dollars have been recovered or are in the process of recovery. Three claims come to my mind now, one for $80,000, one for $62,000, and one for $40,000. These are sums which will be recovered 10 times over by the Government solely through the results of our investigations.

In a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was the statement:

> I wish to take this opportunity to express to you my appreciation of the spirit of cooperation displayed by the committee and members of its staff in making available to the Bureau information pertaining to the question of income-tax liability, not only in the case of this particular individual but also in numerous other instances of which you are undoubtedly aware.

Our committee has stopped many of the crooked and dishonest reorganizations in the courts by supplying the courts with information that reports submitted to them were fraudulent and that evidence was withheld. Unfortunately, while Congress has passed 77B and added a great deal of work to the courts, we have not provided to assist them in investigating the resultant collusive reorganization suits that have been filed, and the judges have been forced to rely upon the recommendations of these protective committees and their lawyers.

We are endeavoring to safeguard the awards made to minors for permanent injuries which send them through life cripples in one form or another; to the end that the rainy days prepared for by the aged; for the protection due youngsters provided for them by their fathers and mothers; the investments for the benefit of the incompetent; for the investments made by fraternal organizations and labor unions which were intended to provide a margin of safety for their pension funds and charitable work; for the orphanages and institutions for the indigent. We further seek to protect the disabled veterans who invested their savings and compensation, to the end that the men who provided during their lifetime for their wives and children and who bought these securities as authorized legal investments be protected. [Applause.]

I would be remiss if, in concluding, I did not extend to the members of this small committee my sincere thanks and appreciation for the great aid and assistance they have given me. I also particularly want to thank my colleague, Mr. WILCOX, of Florida, for his splendid cooperation in handling the municipal-bond investigation in his own and other southern States; and to express my appreciation of the work of volunteer attorneys in the various committee offices, who have served without compensation. These attorneys are not members of the bar associations which have refused to cooperate with this committee. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, for ability to make incorrect, inept, inaccurate, and thoroughly wrong statements I should award the gold medal to the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace. [Applause.]

Last year he insulted New England by telling what weaklings have grown up in that region, the loss of pep and the backbone of its early ancestors, and suggesting that we move out of New England and let other folks come in. Nobody has moved on the advice of the Secretary of Agriculture.

I understand that night before last this same distinguished Secretary of Agriculture delivered a radio address, and I quote the language which he used in reference to a recent Supreme Court decision. He used these words:

> The greatest legalized steal in American history.

Mr. Chairman, any official who will make a statement of that nature about the Supreme Court ought to be impeached, or certainly haled before the Supreme Court for contempt. If he has not the decency and sense to apologize, he ought to be the one to "take a walk" rather than some other folks whose names I have heard mentioned here recently. Walking would not be quick enough to get him out of office. He ought to go on a sprint, just as fast as the President could retire him.

The Supreme Court decision to which he referred was brought upon the administration by their ill-conceived legislation. He, more than any one man probably, is responsible for the foolish, ill-advised, unconstitutional legislation that brings down the hatred and digust of Mr. Wallace on the Supreme Court. Here is what is said about it in a leading editorial today:

> To call such a tax refund a steal comes with peculiarly poor grace from an administration which has perpetrated the greatest steal in the history of the country, the appropriation of $2,000,000,000 of gold in the Federal Reserve banks and the forcible seizure of all privately held gold; but there is nothing to be gained by this sort of retort. Mr. Wallace, by his intemperate and misleading utterance, has still further inflamed ill will. This helps no one, least of all the Roosevelt administration.

I, for one, hold no brief in behalf of the present administration, far from it; but if the head of the Nation will accept the advice of a modest, retiring Republican, I suggest that the President of the United States begin cleaning out his Cabinet, from the Secretary of Agriculture up or down. I cannot conceive of anyone in official life, particularly a member of the President's Cabinet, having the nerve, the gall, and the ignorance to say that the Supreme Court brought about the greatest "legalized steal in American history."

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL].

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Chairman, this is neither the time nor the place to reply to the annual tirade made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] against reclamation in general and the Coulee Dam in particular. When that matter comes up we will be there to defend it, and, in the words of Shakespeare:

> Lay on, Macduff;
> And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

Just briefly he made one false statement among the many misstatements. He said that the American people and the easterners were going to pay for this dam; and I am here to tell him that if he will read something about the Coulee Dam he will know that it is going to pay for itself in 30 or 40 years, and the people of the East are not going to be taxed one cent.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I will not yield. Read the record and the gentleman will know something about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington refuses to yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to me.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I refuse to yield. I will meet the gentleman when the matter comes up.

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman should be courteous or I shall ask that the words be taken down.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Well, take them down if there is anything to take down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York demand that the words of the gentleman from Washington be taken down? Will the gentleman indicate the words he refers to?

Mr. CULKIN. I might compromise, Mr. Chairman, by asking the gentleman again if he will yield.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I have only 20 minutes' time. The time will come when we will meet on this floor with reference to that question, and then I shall yield.

Mr. CULKIN. Does the gentleman mean that he will yield now?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. No; I will yield then, when the matter comes up.

Mr. CULKIN. Well, please be as fair as possible.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. The gentleman from New York is something like the people who talk about the Constitution and the Supreme Court, but who have never read anything about it and know nothing about it.

Mr. Chairman, a year ago a so-called "grass roots" convention was held in the Midwest. It was heralded far and wide as a "save-the-Constitution convention." An old friend of mine with whom I grew up on an Illinois farm, who still farms and has been a lifelong Republican wrote me:

> You remember, Knute, the weed known as quackgrass, which, unless relentlessly fought, would spread all over our farms and choke out all nourishing crops. Well, those assembled at the recent convention were quackgrass-root Republicans. Real Lincoln Republicans—and my father was a Lincoln Civil War veteran—were not present at that convention.

Today the quackgrass-root Democrats, masquerading under the name of Jeffersonian Democrats, are gathering under the leadership of that political shyster, Eugene Talmadge, at Macon, Ga., to again save the Constitution. It is proper, therefore, that we consider the Constitution and our threefold Federal Government.

I am supremely pleased today because one of my cherished ideals is nearing realization. I have since early manhood championed the proposition that the Federal courts should be restricted to the functions expressly stated in the Constitution. It is no new idea with me. I hold here in my hand a Walla Walla daily paper of August 24, 1924, in which my views, expressed at that time as a candidate for Congress, cover somewhat the same ground as those so admirably expressed yesterday by our able colleague from Texas [Mr. CROSS]. I want to say right here to the gentleman from the solid South, like Abou Ben Adhem, may his tribe increase in his sunny clime. And it is heartening to find advocates of this American constitutional doctrine also in the somewhat conservative East: Congressman LEWIS, the little giant from Maryland; Congressman SISSON, the unafraid from New York; and others who are not to be cowed by the phrase "tearing up the Constitution." We are all as loyal to our oath as those who merely give lip service. It is not my purpose to cover the ground so ably handled by my colleague from Texas [Mr. CROSS]. Read his speech carefully and be convinced. Briefly he showed that our system of government was framed upon that of our mother country, England, and that there no courts have power to declare acts of Parliament unconstitutional. Indeed, the last one that attempted it was led by Chief Justice Tresillian, who was beheaded for his impudence and his colleagues exiled to France. Has England suffered because of keeping its courts within bounds? No other important civilized country permits its courts to usurp legislative functions. But it is argued that we have a written Constitution and that the powers of the Federal Government are limited to those expressly enumerated. Exactly so. And when they say that Congress cannot delegate its authority and that the Executive has limited authority, I would inquire if the judiciary is not also of the three coordinate, independent branches of the Federal Government, and where in that whole magnificant document is the express—the expressed, mind you—power given to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional? For 15 years I taught history, civics, and political science in the public schools of the State of Washington. At the beginning of each school year I made a standing offer of $5 to each and every student who could find such expressed authority. They read it diligently—which was a desired result—but never a one came to claim the $5. I now make the same offer to each and every Member of Congress, with the added incentive of increasing the amount to $100.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I want to ask where you are going to get the money? [Laughter.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. When the Republicans get into power probably I will get the money. [Laughter.]

In the language of the Scriptures, "Go thou and do likewise." Read your Constitution and know it. Moreover, as has been often stated, and you can consult the diary of James Madison for proof, some delegates of the Constitutional Convention of 1787 attempted four times to insert a judicial veto in the Constitution and as many times it was defeated by the decisive vote of 8 to 3, there being only 11 Colonies represented and each Colony voting as a unit.

There are three distinct, coordinate branches of our Federal Government, each in its particular sphere separate and independent of the others, except for the expressed authority vested in the Executive to veto laws of Congress, which in turn may be overriden by a two-thirds vote by each body. The Congress is to legislate—read the article and section; it is clear and definite. The Executive is to administer and enforce the laws properly enacted. The judicial is to interpret the law and try cases under the law. This in no wise gives it authority to tear up the law and throw it in the waste-paper basket. I have often been charged with attempting to destroy the Federal courts. Nothing is further from the truth. I simply insist on limiting them to the functions expressed in the Constitution. In an overwhelming majority of the cases coming before the courts they merely try the cases on their merits, see if the law applies. If it does not, the suits are dismissed; if it does, judgment is rendered accordingly. There is an overabundance of duties for the Federal courts under the laws without usurping the functions of Congress by judicial legislation.

In this matter I want it distinctly understood that I have a high regard for the members of the Court, just as high, but no higher, than for the members of the other two coordinate branches of the Government. I have heard the members of the Supreme Court referred to as "the nine old men." This is regrettable. Old age should be the crowning glory to men and women. And I am here to say that one of the oldest members of the Supreme Court, Justice Brandeis, is, to my mind, the grandest man in America. Nor is it jealousy. Of course, we can worry along in this famous old Capitol, used for a century or more by our forbears, and the President can enjoy the distinction of living in the White House, so filled with memories of our departed Executives, while the nine men, comprising the third branch of our Government, hold court in that magnificent $10,000,000 marble palace yonder across the park. But that is no cause for envy. However, I have often wondered as I daily pass the Supreme Court Building, why these signs are found on the walks surrounding this block: "No roller skating allowed." Can it be that the members of this Court, which held the child-labor law unconstitutional and thereby doomed thousands of little boys and girls, whose God-given inheritance is air and sunshine and education, to the drudgery of factories and mines, that the meditation of this Court must not be disturbed by the patter of little feet?

No; I for one am not jealous of their sumptuary surroundings, even though they rival those of the Pharoahs of Egypt. But I am, as an elected representative of the people in this House of Congress, jealous of my constitutional prerogative of enacting legislation. I have heard it stated on the floor of this House time and again that we have surrendered our prerogatives to the Executive, that we are rubber stamps. This may be, although for my part I think the record will show that I have at all times voted according to my own convictions and opposed both the Executive and the leadership of this House. But at any time the Congress can retrieve its prerogative from the Executive, and no doubt will do so when the emergency has come to an end. But there is far less cause for ridicule by the press and otherwise for the temporary delegation of this authority by Congress to the Executive than its century-old supine subservience to the complete usurpation of the judiciary. This has been denounced by such outstanding liberals as Jefferson, Jackson, and Lincoln.

I often wonder less at the contempt and ridicule heaped upon Congress than I wonder at the lack of self-respect and despicable cringing on the part of Congress in the presence of the Federal courts. Are they not the creations of Congress? Do not all the lower courts not only receive their power from Congress but also their very existence? And yet some unknown, unheard-of judge off in some remote part of our country—yea, even a justice of the peace—may declare a law of Congress unconstitutional. The creation greater than its creator! And does not the Constitution give Congress the authority to change the Supreme Court and enlarge its membership? Is it not within our constitutional power to limit its jurisdiction to the four specific classes expressly mentioned in the Constitution? Why sit we here idle when we can pass at this session the Cross bill, which would prohibit lower courts from passing on Federal legislation and limit the Supreme Court to original jurisdiction in the cases mentioned in the Constitution?

Are we not responsible to the people every 2 years, the President every 4 years, and the Senators every 6 years, while the members of the Federal courts are responsible to no one for life? Are there not just as great and sincere students of the Constitution among the 300 lawyers in the House and Senate as among the members of the Federal courts? Is not the President bound to select as his Attorney General the outstanding lawyer of the Nation? When these two branches have conscientiously and honestly passed on the constitutionality of a law, why is it necessary to leave it to those on the bench just as human, just as fallible as we? Fallible, did I say? When was Justice Shiras fallible; when he first declared the income tax constitutional or a few days later when he declared it unconstitutional? When was William Howard Taft fallible; when he as President vetoed a bill which later was passed over his veto or later as Chief Justice, when he declared that same law constitutional? When was Justice Sutherland fallible; when he as United States Senator introduced a railroad pension bill or later, as Justice, declared one unconstitutional? Did his elevation to the Bench make him a better lawyer?

It is often contended that the rights of the people are safe only in the hands of the courts. Read the preamble:

> We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

That was the purpose in forming our Government and writing the Constitution. Then read the first 10 amendments—the Bill of Rights. Those sturdy patriots—who did not attend the Constitutional Convention—Samuel Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and Patrick Henry, opposed the adoption of the Constitution until this Bill of Rights was included. The preamble and the Bill of Rights are the alpha and omega of the Constitution. The final arbiters are the voters, the American people. The Congress and the President are responsible to them; the courts are responsible only to themselves. Have they abused their usurped authority? Consider the Dred Scott decision which plunged our Nation into a holocaust which was as unnecessary as it was fraught with bitterness, hatred, and long dissension. Consider the income-tax decision, which permitted wealth to escape for 20 years its just share of the burden of taxation. Consider the child-labor decision, which doomed little children to perpetual slavery in the mines and factories. Consider the thousands of injunctions which have ham-strung labor and chained it in many cases like a galley slave. And has the Court been as harsh with its members? It exempted the salaries of judges from an income tax, while the rest of us in the Federal employ—very justly—pay our income tax. It protects its members in the matter of a $12,000 per year pension after retirement, while it holds unconstitutional the pension to worn-out railway labor. Only very few of the Federal judges out of the total number voluntarily paid to the United States Treasury the 15-percent deduction under the Economy Act, while all the rest of us, including the poor Federal employee at $1,200 per year or more, was forced to pay in his share.

I hold but one brief against the Federal courts. They have usurped the functions of Congress and the Executive. Limit them by enactment of the Cross bill to the functions intended by the founding fathers and expressed in our written Constitution. Then let us take the battle to the final arbiter—the sovereign people of the United States. I for one will trust them. "Seek ye the truth and the truth shall make you free." And this truth about the history of the Constitution and its making and the function of the three coordinate branches of the Federal Government will be placed before the people of this Nation in the coming campaign.

May I say here the A. A. A. was held unconstitutional by six of the members of the Supreme Court, but I am here to tell you today, sincerely and frankly, that the A. A. A. is constitutional. [Applause.] I stand with all Members on your side and all Members on my side who voted for that and believed it was constitutional. I stand with the President of the United States, who, with the opinion of his Attorney General, signed that bill. I stand by the three outstanding members of the Supreme Court who say that it is constitutional.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. I yield.

Mr. FULMER. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement, inasmuch as I am the one who introduced the A. A. A. bill. Certainly I would not have introduced it if I had not myself thought it was constitutional. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTE HILL. We all thought so.

Save the Constitution? The only way to do that is to save the farmers of this country from bankruptcy, give the unemployed work to do, give to youth the inheritance of an American to health and education, and to old age the decency and comfort it richly deserves. Unless this is done we will have neither country nor flag nor Constitution. The Constitution is not as sacred as human rights. Even the Master replied to his persecutors when they chided Him for permitting His disciples to pluck grain on the Sabbath, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." And I would paraphrase this by saying: "The Constitution was made for Americans, and not Americans for the Constitution."

Is any political party the repository of the Constitution of the United States? Is the Liberty League the only organization capable of understanding this instrument and its attorneys the only ones able to direct the activities of Congress, the legislative branch of the Federal Government? If so, then God have mercy on the common people of this country, who have been exploited for decades by this type of special interests. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, the failure of the present administration to live up to its campaign pledges with respect to a reduction of the cost of government by 25 percent continually plagues the Democratic Members of the House. I come to the floor today out of a sense of sympathy for them. I really am concerned about them. Because of the futility of the excuses that have been offered for the failure of the present administration to meet that campaign promise, it really does arouse sympathy in me for the Members on the Democratic side. I have listened to the efforts you have put forth trying to explain away that 25-percent promise. I have listened during the week to the denunciations that were made on the floor of the House of that fearless former Governor of New York, who was willing in a public address to remind the present administration of some of its campaign promises. I noticed how some of the Members on the Democratic side of the House squirmed and how they wriggled while a part of that denunciation was being made. I say I come today really prompted by a heart generous and gracious to you. I bring you my condolences and sympathies. The observations I am going to make are prompted in no sense by either a spirit of partisanship or a spirit of criticism. They are made out of that spirit of good will and affection that always should prevail among colleagues in a group such as this.

I think it was most unfortunate that the gentleman who immediately preceded me, in his enthusiasm for the defense of a reclamation project, failed to be courteous enough to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN] to permit the gentleman from New York to interrogate him with respect to the statements that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL] made in answer to the statements made by the gentleman from New York on reclamations. In spite of our partisanship, in spite of our enthusiasm, in spite of our interest for a particular project, we should never lose sight of that spirit of good will that should prevail among a group such as ours.

So I come to you men on the Democratic side today, sympathetically; you men who have been trying to excuse and explain and condone the colossal failure to even approximate the promises of a reduction of 25 percent in the cost of Government. I really bring you an offer and contribution of helpfulness. That contribution of helpfulness has to do with this reclamation business.

I want to direct the attention of the membership today to the report on this present Interior Department appropriation bill. I want to direct attention particularly to that portion of the appropriation which has to do with reclamation appropriations. In all kindliness I ask you the question whether you feel you are directing your efforts in the proper direction, so far as that 25-percent promise goes, by increasing this reclamation appropriation by $2,196,500 over what was provided for the present fiscal year? Of course, I recognize my limitations. Probably I am not approaching this 25-percent reduction properly. Probably you feel that that 25 percent, instead of being a minus, was intended to be a plus or a multiplication; but, at all events, increasing by $2,196,500 one single item in this appropriation measure does not in any way contribute to the possibility of an approximation of that old campaign promise.

Let me read you the reason that is given for this increase of $2,000,000:

This increase over the current appropriation is due to the need for additional funds for operation and maintenance charges on new land being brought under cultivation.

Again I am thinking of that campaign promise of 25-percent reduction, and I am wondering whether that new cultivation program and this increase in appropriation for reclamation bears any stamp at all of real consistency. If we have too much under cultivation, so that the Secretary of Agriculture feels it is necessary to plow under and destroy, then why should we be spending $2,000,000 for increasing the program of reclamation in the West? However, you on the Democratic side should direct your attention, as you honestly and sincerely and faithfully try to live up to this campaign promise of 25-percent reduction, to the fact that $75,000 of this program is for the establishment of an operation and maintenance administration. What do we mean by that?

We mean by that more jobs. We mean by that taking care of more of the faithful. We mean by that that this already stupendous horde of faithful Democratic appointees is to be further increased. Surely you realize that this will not help you to live up to this promise, but it will make it more difficult for you to approximate this 25-percent reduction.

I shall be glad to yield and I shall be courteous enough to yield to the distinguished gentleman from Washington if he feels that any of the statements I make with respect to reclamation are either unfounded or unjustified. But I want to direct your attention to pages 197 and 198 of the hearings, where there is set forth a table which came as a result of the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH]. He requested information as to the sums going into reclamation projects from emergency and relief funds. This table on pages 197 and 198 shows that almost $350,000,000 of reclamation projects have already been provided for under emergency and relief measures that have never been approved by the Congress of the United States. I want you to look at a few of them. These are provided for under the carte blanche authority for spending money given by this Democratic House facing, as it did, this promise of a 25-percent reduction in maintenance charges. I say these are provided as a result of that carte blanche authority to spend money.

Here is one item, $170,000,000 to go to a reclamation project in California. I think California is a fine State, and I in no sense criticize California, but $170,000,000 without one word appearing in any hearing before any appropriation subcommittee to justify this expenditure is a dangerous practice if you are to make good your promise.

I come down to another item, and again I feel I must suggest and invite any interrogation that the gentleman from Washington may care to direct to me—I find that there is an item of $63,000,000 for a certain project in the State of Washington with no justification for it before any House committee, no justification before any appropriation subcommittee, never passed on by the Congress. In fact, it has been said in times past—and I am glad the distinguished gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is here—it has been admitted in times past that many of these projects had heretofore not only failed to receive the approbation of the committee but that they had been frowned upon and criticized.

I turn to another item and find $20,500,000 provided for a reclamation project in the State of Arizona with no justification for the expenditure, no explanation to this Congress as to why this project should be inaugurated. Is there any wonder that I am concerned about your campaign promise to reduce expenditures 25 percent?

Is there any wonder my heart is touched with a sense of sympathy for you?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. It is not, however, only the original appropriation of $350,000,000 that comes up to plague you. Have you ever realized that every one of these projects requires a future maintenance charge? But now I am going to be selfish. I am thinking of our campaign promises that we are going to make, and I do not want the coming Republican administration plagued with the same kind of nightmare that you fellows have been plagued with. We want to make good on our promises of economy. That is the difference. I realize that this investment means that we are to have the burden on our shoulders of maintaining these projects.

Again may I direct the attention of the House to the fact that this committee report excuses this terrific increase on the basis that the Government has invested $250,000,000 in the construction of reclamation projects, and that projects are now under construction which will cost a like amount. They are going to cost more than that. They are to cost $350,000,000 instead of $250,000,000, and every $1,000,000 that you invest in reclamation projects means maintenance charges for the years to come. So I say to you men I throw off now the role of sympathy, I am no longer offering you my condolences; rather, I am concerned about the fact that when the Republican administration comes in we are going to have on our shoulders the job of carting along this great colossal proposition that you men have put on us, and I do not want the load to be any heavier.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I always yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am thinking, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DITTER. This is for a question, not for a speech; my time is limited.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I am not going to make a speech. I was thinking, Mr. Chairman, that if the gentleman's heart continues to bleed so profusely as it has been for the last 15 minutes, he will be dead before the next campaign.

Mr. DITTER. Answering the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, may I say that that hope which springs eternal in the human breast will undoubtedly provide for this bleeding heart of mine, resuscitate it sufficiently, I know, so that I can effectively combat any of my Democratic friends in my own district.

But again to direct my attention to you Members on the Democratic side, we are not anxious to have about our neck these ever-increasing capital investments that you Democrats are loading on the Federal Government. So I am really selfish when I am presently urging upon you that you desist from this program of spending, that instead you get to work to set your house in order; set it in order not only for the sake of the American people and taxpayers but also for the sake of your own good reputations, so that you will not have to squirm so much, so that you will not be wriggling around so much, so that you will not have to be going into all the crevices, the crannies, the nooks, and the corners to find excuses; so that you will not be gathering together all the volumes on condonation in trying to explain away your failure to live up to that now famous campaign promise to reduce the costs of government by 25 percent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a few words on farm relief. On the 6th of this month the farmer was thrown for a loss by the decision of the Supreme Court. When prosperity comes to this Nation it will come through the door of farm relief. The door of production control has been closed in the face of the farmers with a slam of finality that cannot be mistaken. But there is yet a door for farm relief that stands wide open.

I speak of monetary relief that will restore the farmer's buying power. The dollar today is worth $1.25. Why is the dollar still out of line? Because there are not enough dollars. Then we should issue more dollars and thereby bring the dollar back to the 1926 level of 100 cents.

Therefore I call attention once more to the bill which I have introduced—H. R. 10594—directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the veterans baby bonds in new money. I wish to serve notice that I intend to follow the petition route in order to get action on this bill just as soon as the necessary 30 days have passed.

Unless Congress decides to pay these baby bonds in new money sooner or later we will be asked to pass a tax law to raise that money, as Alexander Hamilton said, "from the backs and bellies of the people." Not only a tax to raise the $2,200,000,000 but a tax to pay the interest on bonds that will be refunded and refunded until ultimately we will pay more in interest to the coupon clippers than to the veterans themselves.

Not only that, but when $2,200,000,000 are invested in bonds, it means that amount of wealth has been removed from the reach of taxes, either as to principal or income.

To those Members of the House who revolt at the idea of issuing more interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds, and shrink from the idea of laying a further burden upon the taxpayers, here is a chance to go on a rampage against the bond racket, oppose further taxation, and aid the farmer all in one move.

By issuing more money we can bring the dollar back to a 100-cent level. When we do that we add 25 cents to the purchasing power of every bushel of wheat. We add $15 to the purchasing power of every bale of cotton. We increase by 20 percent the purchasing power of all farm commodities.

The farmers were kicked in the teeth in 1929 when the purchasing power of farm commodities was decreased five times. The efforts of the Government to aid agriculture have done much to restore this purchasing power, but it is still 20 percent below the base year of 1926.

No one can correctly say that it is inflationary to restore the dollar to its normal value of 100 cents. Nor do the arguments of "unsound money" have much force, because, after paying these baby bonds in new money, we would still have almost $4,000,000,000 more in gold and silver in the Treasury than we would have currency in circulation.

Now, gentlemen, here is an opportunity to give the farmers relief, and relief to the farmers means relief to the wage earners; it means relief to the storekeepers; and it means relief to the factory owner. Farm prosperity is the basis of all prosperity.

Furthermore, this method of farm relief is constitutional. The language of the Constitution on this point is not merely permissive but it is mandatory. The Constitution says:

> Congress shall coin money and regulate the value thereof.

The money changers have hollered for the Constitution. Now let us give it to them. [Applause.]

Let Congress follow this mandate and pay those baby bonds in new money. That will save the Government more than a billion dollars in interest. It will give the farmers 20 percent more money for their products and thus continue the upswing of prosperity.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

WHERE ARE YOU GOING TO GET THE MONEY?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I turn once more to the address of the President of the United States delivered on that memorable night of January 3, 1936, when all the Members of Congress waited from 2 o'clock until 9 at night to hear the belated address which was to be delivered at the opening of Congress—and Congress convened at 12 o'clock noon. The time of meeting at 12 noon was known to all Members of Congress and the President of the United States for at least a year previous to that time. Yet 435 Members of the House and 96 Senators waited from 2 to 9 p. m. to gratify his request.

From this address I quote:

> Now, after 34 months of work, we contemplate a fairly rounded whole. We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington. To be sure, in so doing, we have invited battle. We have earned the hatred of entrenched greed. The very nature of the problem that we faced made it necessary to drive some people from power and strictly to regulate others. I made that plain when I took the oath of office in March 1933. I spoke of the practices of the unscrupulous money changers who stood indicted in the court of public opinion. I spoke of the rulers of the exchanges of mankind's goods, who failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence. I said that they had admitted their failure and had abdicated.

I wonder if the President meant, when he said, "We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington", that Congress had abdicated and turned all the power over to him and now the money changer is in the White House. No man in the history of the world has ever had so much money at his command as President Roosevelt. With his aides, Secretary Ickes, Secretary Wallace, Harry Hopkins, and Professor Tugwell, what do you think of the job they are doing in squandering this money over the United States, helping to create as per the statement I hold in my hand of January 17, 1936, of the United States Treasury—a deficit of over thirty and one-half billion dollars and with the two billions we charged off when we devalued the gold dollar making over thirty-two and one-half billion dollars in the red, a debt for the young manhood that is coming on in this country to assume. It will be up to them to pay this debt which is being created today. Will they be able to do it? Where will they get the money?

The President also stated in that memorable address that if we had any suggestions to offer for the good of the country—

> Let them propose to this Congress the complete repeal of these measures. * * * In other words, let action be positive and not negative. The way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yeas and nays.

I want to suggest to the Members of Congress once more that we should repeal the laws giving authority to the President of the United States when we permitted him to establish the alphabetical organizations which are now operating at great expense, and you will find in the next few years to the great detriment of this country of ours, such as the C A B—C C C—C S B—C W A—D L B—E C—E H F A—F A C A—F C A—F C T—F D I C—F E R A—F E S B—F H L B—F T C—I A B—J E B—L A B—N C B—N E C—N L B—P A B—P I A—P S A C—P W A—S A B—T V A—U S E S. The Supreme Court is doing its duty, but legal procedure is too slow. We need legislative action.

I propose that we have a new deck. Many of the cards of the old deck are gone. Those that were sound are leaving this administration as fast as they can get out, and we now have a deck that is worn out and not very good. So this Nation needs a full new deck that we may have a deal that is sound, because you cannot play the game with lost cards, and when the cards are bad the only thing to do is to exchange them for new ones. The President that is in the White House certainly has a different idea of the finances of this country than what is revealed by the Treasury Department report as revealed by his Secretary of the Treasury.

When the President said in his address on January 3—

> We are justified in our present confidence. Restoration of national income, which shows continuing gains for the third successive year, supports the normal and logical policies under which agriculture and industry are returning to full activity. Under these policies we approach a balance of the National Budget.

Attention is called to the statement of the Treasury Department as of January 17, 1936, showing that the deficit for the year beginning July 1, 1935, to the 17th of January 1936 was $1,823,589,175.41, and the deficit for the corresponding period of 1935 was $1,427,501,713.72, or a difference of $396,087,461.69 further in the red in our Government operations than we were at the same time a year ago, showing we are going faster and faster away from a balanced Budget rather than toward it. Why would the President make a false statement? He certainly knew better. He should have been in touch with the Treasury Department.

With the passing of the bonus bill and the increasing of the amount in the independent offices appropriation bill, how can he say we are approaching a balanced Budget? Statements mean little when facts do not bear out the contention.

Let us get down to facts. Let us balance the National Budget, or the insinuation that we will not need additional taxes is only a myth. We must have more taxes or less expenditures. I believe we will be compelled to have both.

Are we as Members of Congress going to assume our responsibilities or are we going to permit ourselves to be misinformed? I quote a plank in the Democratic platform:

> We favor maintenance of national credit by a Federal Budget annually balanced on the basis of accurate executive estimates within revenues, raised by a system of taxation levied on the principle of ability to pay.

Are you on the majority side doing your duty toward balancing the Budget?

The Republican platform calls for the State and the Nation to balance its Budget and to curtail expenses. Now, when the two great national platforms make these declarations, are you as Members of this Congress and members of your party which held these platforms up to the people of this country going to disregard your oath and obligation? You were elected on these platforms and you should fulfill your obligation to the American citizens who elected you. This is to Democrats and Republicans alike.

Now, we consider the appropriations to the Interior Department and we increase this Department's askings for 1937 over 1936, $4,179,754.05. We will also have spent for the Interior Department from the $4,880,000,000 fund of a year ago additional great sums of money. This happened last year and it will happen again. This Congress, controlled by the so-called Democratic Party with a Socialist leader, is not approaching a balanced Budget. Nor is the Democratic Party trying to balance the Budget, and I have not any idea that this majority party intends to do so. Again I ask the Democratic Party to carry out your platform to the American people.

Where will you get the money? [Applause.]

Mr. LUNDEEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The Republicans started the alphabetical departments with the R. F. C., and they financed the trusts, banks, and so forth, with the R. F. C. Is that not the daddy to all these alphabets?

Mr. RICH. The Republicans started the R. F. C., and it looks to me now as if the R. F. C. is going to lend money to the industries and to the people of this country which will be paid back. The trouble with these other organizations is that they are all spending money and going forward in the red. If the gentleman will take the statement which comes to his desk every day he will know that we are getting further and further in the red, and the American people, the taxpayers back in his district and in mine, the poor people, are the ones who are going to pay the bill. You gentlemen on that side are not going to protect the people; on the contrary, you are spending and squandering money faster and faster every hour and every day.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, in my capacity as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, I introduced today a resolution of inquiry calling upon the Secretary of the Navy to inform the House forthwith by whose direction, order, or command, and upon what or whose authority the United States Marine Band canceled its engagement to render a musical program at the meeting of the Women's Patriotic Conference on National Defense held at the Mayflower Hotel in this city last night, and to furnish the House with a copy of such direction, order, or command.

Mr. Chairman, this is a privileged resolution under the rules of the House, and I call upon the Committee on Naval Affairs promptly to report it back to the House, so that the desired information may soon be forthcoming and the country be apprised as to who is responsible for this gratuitous and humiliating insult to the 500 or more representatives of the splendid patriotic American women numbering hundreds of thousands comprising many organizations in every State in the Union.

The Committee on Naval Affairs, whose jurisdiction embraces legislation on subjects pertaining to the Navy and the Marine Corps, should be, and is therefore, justly and properly concerned regarding those branches of our national defense and keenly alive to their activities, civic as well as military, and jealous to preserve their good name and fine reputation in the opinion of the American people. There should be no delay in fixing the responsibility in issuing the order for the unprecedented action of the Marine Band, whose members are gentlemen, as well as skilled musicians, and of whom the country is proud. While the stain of such an outrageous un-American procedure cannot be wiped out by the information desired, at least it will serve to exonerate the members of the band for acting under orders from higher up and will place the blame where it belongs.

In the name of the patriotic, liberty-loving American women whose peaceful assembly in the interest of national defense was so rudely disturbed and interrupted, I demand prompt and favorable action on my resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, in an effort to calm the troubled waters that have upset the Congress for the last 3 days and to smooth the ruffled feelings of my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], I am going to change the subject of discussion, and strange as it may seem, I am not going to talk on the Townsend plan or the walk-out of Al Smith, or the speech of Senator BORAH, or the speech of Governor Talmadge, or the expected speech of Governor Landon.

KANSAS

Mr. Chairman, January 29 being the seventy-fifth anniversary of the great State of Kansas, I think a few appropriate remarks are in order.

For nearly four centuries Kansas has been the land of opportunity. Some States boast of their historical heritage, others take pride in their romantic background, a number possess either mineral resources or agricultural wealth, and a few point to their healthful climate. But no State combines all of these things as does Kansas. For here in Kansas we have rich history, the lingering romance of pioneer adventure, vast mineral and agricultural assets, a developing industry, and glorious sunshine so perfectly blended as to produce living conditions offering a maximum of health, creature comfort, happiness, and economic security.

The traditions of Kansas reach back to the days of Montezuma and the Spanish conquistadors. From that time down through the years of the pioneer settlements, the old trails, the territorial conflict, the war days, the cattle towns, and the county-seat wars, the finger of history has crisscrossed Kansas and left us a rich heritage from the past. Some 60 years before Pocahontas saved John Smith's life, and for an even longer period before the Mayflower sighted Plymouth Rock, the white man had visited Kansas. Here it was that the Civil War really started and here it was that the doom of slavery was sounded in the United States.

Nearly 400 years ago Coronado came to Kansas seeking the mythical cities of Cibola, with its streets presumably paved with gold. In his search for gold, the mineral, he was disappointed. But if he had but known, there was gold all around him—gold in the underground recesses of Kansas soil, gold in the cultivation of the rich acres which overlie Kansas everywhere. Today Kansas is fourteenth in industry, it is eighth in mineral production, and it is one of the great agricultural empires of the Nation.

And yet, with all of our resources, with all of our historic background, no other State in the Union is the victim of so many misconceptions and so many mistaken notions as Kansas. As a people, we are pictured as peculiar; as a State, the popular idea prevails that we are the haven of jackrabbits, grasshoppers, and savage Indians. If we were to believe the impressions others have formed of us, Kansas is noted principally for its cyclones and tornadoes, for its dust storms and droughts, for its monotonous prairies and parched farms.

The truth is that, according to insurance actuarial records, Kansas is the healthiest State in the Union and is a leader in its percentage of literacy. There are less than 2,000 Indians in the State, and the majority of them are as well educated and civilized as their white brethren. Kansas has no more cyclones or tornadoes than Missouri, Illinois, or any of the other States of the Central West; the center of the dust disturbance was not in Kansas but in neighboring States; and, far from being an endless sweep of prairie, Kansas offers some of the most beautiful scenery to be found anywhere in the country. The scenery of Kansas is not artificial; it is not narrow, tawdry, or cheap. The beauty of Kansas is majestic in its scope, sweeping in its allure, with high horizons, and an unending and changing succession of picturesque landscape.

Few people think of Kansas as an industrial State. Yet it is first in the Nation in flour milling, fourth in meat packing, tenth in the production of cement, with gypsum mills, furniture factories, foundries, and other plants of growing significance in the industrial pattern of the Nation. Wichita was once known, only a few years ago, as the "air capital of the Nation." Then there was a recession in the industry in this State. But now, once again, Wichita is challenging for that distinction. Its aircraft factories are humming with activity, busy with orders, which will keep them operating at full capacity for many weeks to come, and with the prospect that Kansas may soon attain the position of being the premier State in the Nation in the manufacture of aircraft.

Kansas is not particularly noted for its mineral resources; but it produces eight times as much mineral wealth as Alaska and surpasses such well-known mining States as Colorado, Montana, Utah, and Arizona. The total value of the minerals thus far brought forth from the underground recesses of Kansas exceeds two and one-half billion dollars, and much of the State's mineral possibilities remain unexplored.

Centuries ago a great salt sea covered most of the western half of the State. When it receded it left huge deposits of salt throughout that area, some of them more than 400 feet in thickness. Today Kansas is third in salt production in the Nation, and there is enough salt underlying the State to supply the United States for the next 250,000 years.

Kansas never had a volcano in its entire history, but it is first in the output of volcanic ash. At some period in the dim, distant past volcanoes were active to the west of the State; they are believed by geologists to have belonged to the Capulin group in New Mexico. The fine dust erupted from these volcanoes was carried by the prevailing winds into Kansas and deposited here in such volume as to make this State the leader in the Nation in the production of this important abrasive material.

This year, according to Progress in Kansas, the official magazine of the Kansas Chamber of Commerce, Kansas is destined to set a new all-time high record for the production of oil, thereby duplicating its performance of a year ago. Back in 1918, when the Butler County fields were at their flush heights and the famous El Dorado field was producing nearly 10 percent of the Nation's output, Kansas produced 45,500,000 barrels of oil. That remained as the year of peak oil production in the State until 1934, when it was surpassed by 250,000 barrels. But in 1935 Kansas produced more than 50,000,000 barrels, to establish another new peak record.

Today Kansas is fourth in the Nation in oil production, and oil is found in 43 counties in the State. The Kansas oil field is rapidly spreading out over the western section of the State, and geologists say that the petroleum possibilities of that section have "barely been scratched." Every county in that part of the State is a potential oil producer, it is claimed, and this is supported by the fact that hardly a day passes without a new producer being uncovered in hitherto virgin territory.

Down in southwestern Kansas lies the Hugoton gas field, one of the greatest natural-gas reservoirs in the Nation. The development of this vast field has barely begun, but careful research has revealed that it has a sufficient reserve to take care of the gas needs of Kansas for the next 200 years, and, with the Panhandle field of Texas, could supply the gas requirements of the entire Nation for the next 26 years. Think of the possibilities that the development of the Hugoton field holds for Kansas—a State already ninth in its natural-gas output! Moreover, consider, if you will, the industrial opportunities presented by this enormous gas reservoir, with its billions of cubic feet of gas waiting to be harnessed for industrial purposes.

For years Kansas has been one of the leading zinc- and lead-producing States in the Union. It is rich in gypsum deposits, in coal, and in limestone. Southeast Kansas contains a greater variety of mineral resources than any other equal area in the Nation, being favored by eight—coal, clay, shale, limestone, gas, zinc, lead, and oil—and in this region there is the largest concentration of excavating machinery in the world.

Today the mineral resources of Kansas approach agriculture in importance as a source of wealth and with much of the possibilities still unexplored; they are destined to become an increasingly influential factor in the economic pattern of the State.

Kansas is rightfully entitled to its reputation as one of the great agricultural States of the Nation, but those who are unfamiliar with its farm output largely regard it as a one-crop State. It is true that Kansas raises a lot of wheat. It has well been called the "bread basket of the world", and the claim that "Kansas grows the best wheat in the world" is not without justification. Normally one-fifth of all the hard winter wheat grown in the United States is produced in Kansas, and 39 States have a smaller acreage in all kinds of crops than Kansas has in wheat alone. For a like area Kansas is the largest producer of hard winter wheat in the world.

But what most people overlook is that Kansas, which is fourth in the Nation in agriculture, has a well-balanced farm output, with 47.1 percent of the farm income coming from crops and 52.9 percent from livestock products.

Kansas ranks eighth in the production of corn and grows corn in all of its 105 counties. Recently J. C. Mohler, secretary of agriculture, in refuting the impression that Kansas is a one-crop State, said this:

> In the 54 years, from 1859 to 1913, Kansas never harvested a crop of wheat that produced as much as 100,000,000 bushels. Yet in 37 of those 54 years the State raised a corn crop that measured above 100,000,000 bushels.

Secretary Mohler went on to point out that in the last 20 years Kansas has produced 11 crops of corn that measured above 100,000,000 bushels and 13 crops of wheat that went over that mark.

Kansas ranks first in number of eggs shipped to the large markets, and dairy products bring to Kansas dairymen and farmers an income in excess of $20,000,000 annually. The State holds almost a complete monopoly on the growing of apple seedlings, producing more than 90 percent of the Nation's output. It is first in the production of alfalfa seed, third in production of flaxseed, second in grain sorghums, and fourth in yield per acre of sweetpotatoes.

Kansas has more land in farms than any other State except Texas, which is three times larger, and has the largest wheat-storage capacity in the Nation.

Kansas is third in the production of beef cattle for slaughter and is one of the leaders in the production of purebred livestock.

Reflecting the agricultural stability of the State, Kansas is the only State in the Corn Belt where farm real estate has not declined in value since 1925; it is first in the amount of farm acreage operated by owners and leads all States in having the smallest per-capita mortgage foreclosures. It has more farm-owned autos than 45 other States, more tractors than 46 others, and more farm homes equipped with gas and electricity than 39 others.

I could occupy another hour with an endless array of statistics emphasizing the varied sources from which Kansas draws its wealth, and recalling facts which even those of us who live there are prone to overlook. I have not even touched upon the cultural background of the State which has produced some of the greatest artists, writers, and musicians in the Nation. I have not mentioned a State press which is nationally famous for its virility and is unequaled anywhere in its devotion to the popular welfare. Nor have I called attention to a system of education which has contributed so immeasurably to the economic and social progress of the State.

These are the things which make Kansas great. In a comparatively few years they have been wrought out of a raw frontier, out of the blood and sweat and toil of rugged pioneers who were undaunted, unafraid, and stubbornly persistent. They brought civilization to a land of savagery. In the face of indescribable hardships and danger they made what had been called "the great American desert" bloom with golden crops and pulsating industries. They brought to a barren land willing hands, sturdy hearts, and determined faith, and with little else laid the foundations upon which a great State has been reared.

These pioneers have left us both a heritage and a challenge, a heritage based upon their courage, patience, faith, and loyalty, and a challenge for us to exercise those same superlative attributes in meeting the problems that confront us and in building to still greater heights the structure they passed into our hands.

The foundation has been laid. We have the resources; we have the natural wealth; we have a virile and intelligent citizenship. But above all we need to recognize that life today is not only complex but interdependent. We are, to an immeasurable extent, bound up in a common destiny. A few years ago a great man said:

> Cooperation is no longer a sentiment; it is an economic necessity.

Those words come to us today with compelling force. The destiny of Kansas, the fate of the Nation are inextricably involved in the extent to which we realize that we must labor together in a solution of our common problems, in our recognition of our common purpose in life, and in our acceptance of the fact that progress and the welfare of the human family depend upon a conscious and intelligent association of effort.

Great problems are pressing upon us for solution. They will not be solved on the basis of prejudice or narrowness, nor through selfishness or arrogance. Neither will they be solved if we lose sight of the fact that change is inevitable; that it is the basis of all progress; and if we are unwilling to accept that philosophy, then we must be prepared to accept that stodginess and stagnation which leads to decay and eventual disintegration.

Kansas is a great State today. It will be much greater when we appraise our assets with an eye to future possibilities, and then set our hands to the task of converting these possibilities into actualities through an exercise of that vision, faith, courage, and determination which so distinguished our forefathers and which stands before us as a living challenge today. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP].

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Chairman, I believe all of us as Congressmen are very zealous of the honor and the privilege that has been extended to us by our constituents in our home communities in making us their representatives in the Nation's Congress. I believe we are very zealous of this position and anxious to protect the dignity of this high office as well as the dignity of the House of Representatives.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems rather strange to me that we are in this Congress lending so much time and consideration, thereby lending dignity to a man who might be a very good man but entirely unworthy of all this consideration of this House—a man who after all is a very ordinary citizen, regardless of his apparent exalted opinion of himself as manifested in his statement that only the President of the United States will be recognized as worthy of a reply to his remarks. So, since this House has so extremely dignified his person, magnified his words, and amplified this dinner, I am referring to Alfred E. Smith and the American Liberty League last Saturday night, a few more remarks in closing this episode can do no harm, referring as I do only to the closing remarks he made in his address last Saturday night. Mr. Smith asks, Shall the Capital be in Washington or Moscow? when he should know the question definitely is, Shall the Capital be in Wall Street, New York, or shall it be in Washington? Shall it be the clear, fresh air of free America or the foul breath of communism, he asks; when we, the citizens of America, know the battle is on, and the question is, Shall it be the clear, pure air of freedom and liberty, which the Constitution guarantees, or the foul, putrid air of capitalistic tyranny?

Then he asks what flag, the Stars and Stripes or the red flag of Soviet Russia, when we, who have been in the battle lines for years fighting for and following this flag—our flag of freedom—in the cause of the toiling masses, know the only question is, Shall it be the old flag, the flag of the Stars and Stripes of America, or the plutocratic, monopolistic, capitalistic flag of Wall Street? And he grieves over the Constitution. Let me tell you, Al, our Constitution is much safer in the hands of the toiling masses, the great producers of all wealth, than in the hands of your apostles, who have been violating the Constitution of the United States for over a hundred years, in that during all this time they have been robbing the people of their constitutional right to coin and control their own money, the measuring stick that measures all value according to its own abundance, that measures the very sweat of the brow of humanity, that measures the very life of the laboring man who sells his life to his employer in little pieces, by the day, the week, or the year.

The crowd for whom you acted as spokesman Saturday night, in their unconstitutional capacity, hold and control this measure of value by their absolute control of the volume of money in circulation. In this, their unconstitutional capacity, they have caused more tears, sorrow, and suffering; more suicides, murders, and war; and have done more to tear down the great institution of civilization than any other class of people, including Communists and anarchists. Through human greed, selfishness, and avariciousness there is no other class of citizens who have done more to retard civilization than those represented by the crowd who dined with you at the reenacted feast of Belshazzar at the Mayflower Hotel last Saturday night, January 18. This crime was committed by violating the Constitution of the United States, by usurping the control of our money supply, the lifeblood of trade and industry, the wheels of commerce. It comes from a mighty poor source, then, when your crowd plead the protection of the Constitution; when you said the great commoner, William Jennings Bryan, walked out on the Democratic Party, you were wrong again. It was your bunch that walked out on W. J. Bryan, when the air of purity invaded the halls of the Democratic convention and your bunch choked and ran to seek the air of selfish interests and greed to which you were accustomed; yes, you knew then, and you know now, that is where you belong. I am reminded of a certain passage of Scripture that reads:

The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib.

It would not hurt to take a little inventory of the guests who attended this Belshazzar feast at the Mayflower last Saturday; first, there were the Du Ponts, 25 of them I believe, who are members of this family corporation, associated together with other munitions manufacturers, who in the last war reaped a profit of no less than $25,000 for each one of our boys their murderous implements of war have sent into eternity, merged together with the Remington Arms and the Bethlehem Steel, by exchange of stocks and gentlemen's agreement—misnamed gentlemen's agreements—and associations, again merged together with the ring of munitions manufacturers that circle the globe, whose business it is to prolong war and disturb peace, associated with the English Vickers Armstrongs, Ltd., that most gigantic chain of munitions manufacturers on which the sun never sets, associating with Germany's Krupp Co., manufacturers of heavy artillery, and to cap the climax, connected and associated by intermingling of stocks, directorships, and gentlemen's agreements with Schneider-Creusot munitions plants, bigger than all the others combined. This bunch of munitions manufacturers apparently care nothing for the life of your son and mine.

They can hear only the clinking of the coin in their golden coffers; that drowns the prayers and pleadings of suffering humanity. These munitions manufacturers that during the war interchanged raw materials and shipped freely to each other, friend or foe; for instance, Germany shipped magnetos and gasoline engines and numerous other war materials freely to France and England through Sweden, Denmark, Norway, Switzerland, Spain, and Holland so that the Allies could kill more German boys; and England, France, and other allied nations shipped just as freely to Germany glycerine for explosives, nickel, copper, oil, and rubber so Germany could kill more of our boys, as well as the youth of England, France, and other allied nations. Yes; this group was represented at Al's feast of Belshazzar last Saturday night. And the representatives of the House of Morgan were there—I speak of these as a symbol of predatory wealth and human greed—yes, the House of Morgan.

Do you remember in history how the House of Morgan bought up half of the Nation's gold in the Civil War and shipped it across to their branch bank in England to cripple the finances of the Union, to make gold scarce and increase the purchasing power and depreciate our Nation's paper money in terms of gold, thus robbing the soldier who was receiving only $13 a month by depreciating the value or the purchasing power of his money?

You remember in history the House of Morgan during the Civil War had bought the defective rifles that had been discarded by the Nation because they were unsafe for the soldiers, one of the reports on these defective rifles reading that they were as dangerous to the one firing that rifle as to the one he was shooting at; how the House of Morgan bought these discarded rifles from a speculator for $2.50 apiece and sold them back to General Fremont, of the Union Army, in another division, for $22.50. Do you remember how Morgan was convicted for this crime and later on whitewashed and released? Oh, yes; Al had all of these representatives there at his billion-dollar dinner. And the Power Trusts were there. I know this bunch—I have learned to know them as the enemies of Nebraska and the enemies of our Nation. They have just filed other injunctions against us in the State of Nebraska in their effort to prevent us from using the water power of our rivers for the development of cheap electricity, stating in their request for an injunction, preventing us from doing further work, that they would not be able to compete with us in our cooperative efforts. The Power Trusts have been hindering our great efforts in the developments of our rivers for the past 21 years, thereby compelling us to allow our great fertile land to dry up and be depleted of its fertility with an ocean of water under it and around it waiting only to be pumped to the surface by cheap electric power which they will not furnish, nor will they allow us to provide for ourselves.

One of the companies filing this injunction against us in Nebraska is the Nebraska Power Co. I have just looked up a bit of their history. This company, owned body, soul, and breeches by the American Power & Light Co., which in turn is controlled by the Electric Bond & Share Co. of New York, might appear to the casual observer as a Nebraska Corporation, which, of course, is not true. This company is incorporated in Maine and has its headquarters in New York. This company was born out of a merger of the Omaha Electrict Light & Power Co. of Omaha and the Citizens Gas & Electric Co. of Council Bluffs, Iowa. These two companies closed their books and sold out to the Nebraska Power Co. on May 31, 1917, with a fixed capital of $6,432,000. The next morning the books were opened in the name of the Nebraska Power Co. The books now showed a fixed capital of $13,500,000, a transfer of water into gold of over $7,000,000, a pretty good profit for one night, which watered stock was sold to the widows and orphans of Nebraska and Iowa. They did not have as high a regard, apparently, for the poor widows and orphans then as they did last summer here in Washington when they cried huge crocodile tears and shouted that we were robbing the poor widows and orphans when we were passing legislation prohibiting and preventing them from selling watered stock and concealing their dirty, crooked dealings by creation of holding companies, created for no other purpose but to draw more huge salaries and concealing the profits of their subsidiaries and robbing the investors of their profits.

Oh, yes; these constituted some of the company at Al's billion-dollar blow-out last Saturday night. I know these men; I know this bunch. I spent my life fighting trusts, and I recognize this bunch of pirates. At the age of 30 they robbed me and left me penniless in the creamery business because I would not agree to reduce the price of butterfat 4 cents a pound to the farmers. Twenty-five years later, when I had to fight them again through every court in the land for 5½ years, I fought this bunch of grafters and crooks through every court in the land, up to the Supreme Court of the United States, where I received a unanimous decision, followed shortly thereafter by a satisfactory compromise settlement. Well, that is enough for Al and his reenactment of this billion-dollar feast of Belshazzar. In the night, as they reveled and drank from their golden goblets, perhaps they also read the handwriting on the wall, as did Belshazzar and his lords, when they read the fiery words, in their oriental language, "Mene mene tekel upharsin", meaning "Thou art weighed in the balance and found wanting."

But, Democratic friends and fellow Congressmen, there is one thing that we cannot laugh off, and that is the accusation that he made that we as Democrats had not fulfilled our pledges to our people as embodied in the Democratic platform. This accusation ought to wake up every red-blooded Democrat to either fight or make good. I have always believed there is no lasting advantage or gain in evading the truth or in misrepresentation. I believe my people and your people are entitled to know the truth—know exactly where we stand on all political questions relative to our Government. To me a political platform is a sacred code of promises we made to our constituents in exchange for their vote of confidence in us, and to break this code of promises is treason against our people. To me the Democratic platform is a holy writ. It is the ark of the covenant. It is the magna carta to the toiling masses, the great producers of all wealth, whom we represent. Just listen to the prelude to the Democratic platform of 1932:

We believe that a party platform is a covenant with the people, to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power, and that the people are entitled to know in plain words the terms of the contract to which they are asked to subscribe. We hereby declare this to be the platform of the Democratic Party; the Democratic Party solemnly promises by appropriate action to put into effect the principles and policies and reforms herein advocated.

It was just a mighty small comfort to me when on the floor of the House, following Al's tirade against the Democratic Party and what he termed their "broken promises", that our principal defense that we heard mentioned on the floor of this House was that Al was also a piker—that he had not always been reliable, and that he had not followed his promises, and that the Republican Party under Hoover had violated all their party platforms and principles. To me this was mighty discouraging as, in my judgment, three wrongs cannot possibly make a right. But, as Al said, and as our good speaker and colleague, Mr. WOODRUM, of Virginia, said, the following morning—and as I now also want to repeat, I want to let you in on something confidentially. I have been worrying, as I know you have, about this accusation—this split in the Democratic Party and the possible Republican victory in the next election. I have in the past heard so much on this floor about communism and socialism and radicalism, and I have become somewhat alarmed. But I have discovered something that is a great consolation. I know a cure-all. I know a safeguard. I know how to choke Al to death politically; how to stop the Republican Party politically; how to stop this terrible communism, radicalism, and socialism; and I am going to let you in on this secret; and that is, let all of us Democrats get busy and fulfill the pledges of the Democratic platform and we will choke the wind out of our opposition. We have it all over Al; his chances are gone.

We have an advantage over the Republican Party; the door is closed to them; they had their inning for 12 years, and during this time our great Nation fell from the highest level of prosperity to the lowest level of want and poverty while they held the reins of our Government. But we Democrats are still at bat and we still have the opportunity of redeeming our party by fulfilling our pledges to the people as contained in the Democratic Party platform. How glorious the situation if we will only act now. I would rather stay in Washington all summer and come home with my platform pledges fulfilled than to come home with excuses for my failure to carry out my promises to the people. I would rather come home late, holding aloft in my hand the Democratic platform, waving it to my constituents, and saying, "Here; here is the holy covenant fulfilled, every pledge, every word; I have done my part"; rather that a thousand times than to come home to attend to a reelection to which I claim we are not entitled unless we carry out our part of our contract; the planks of the Democratic platform, this holy covenant with the people. What kind of plea can we make, coming home with an unfinished program from a Congress that is two-thirds Democratic and a Democratic President? Oh, if we only had more Republicans in Congress we could come home singing the old tune, "The Republicans would not let us", and if it were not for the Democratic platform we might go home and say we did not think about it, or if it was because we did not have the knowledge that no less than 582,000 farmers are now losing their farms in foreclosure, we might plead we did not know it was necessary. We might plead that we did not have the time if it was not for the fact that we are just mighty well paid for our time and effort as Congressmen, and there is no reason why we could not remain all summer in order to fulfill our pledge and bring relief to our people. But there is no excuse and we know it.

So let me again suggest that we start in the fulfillment of our pledges of the Democratic platform with the Frazier-Lemke bill, providing for refinancing of farm mortgages at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent payment on principal each year. Did you ever notice that we have a Frazier-Lemke plank in the Democratic platform? Listen; let me read it to you, right out of the platform, word for word. It seems to me that whoever wrote this plank in the Democratic platform must have had the Frazier-Lemke bill close at hand and copied the essence of this most important bill, for every provision of this bill is contained in this paragraph of the Democratic platform:

We favor the restoration of agriculture, the Nation's basic industry; better financing of farm mortgages, through recognized farm-bank agencies, at low rates of interest, on an amortization plan, giving preference to credit for the redemption of lands and homes sold under foreclosure.

This is the Frazier-Lemke bill in every principle and effect. How easy it would be to enact this plank into law in the shape of the Frazier-Lemke bill, this plank written into our sacred pledge, in the Democratic platform, by a Democratic committee, and O. K.'d by a Democratic convention, to be enacted into law by a Democratic Congress—yes; 3 to 1 Democratic—to be approved and signed by a Democratic President who had promised to sign it. Born and nurtured in Democratic environment, everything Democratic except, as it thus far appears, the intention.

This bill was introduced in regular order; it went through fire in the Agricultural Committee of the House where banking interests, interest takers, and coupon clippers appeared against the bill, but after 2 months it finally passed this committee with a majority of 18 to 5, and a subcommittee was appointed by the Agricultural Committee of the House, to ask the Rules Committee for a hearing and a vote on the floor of the House of Representatives, which thus far has been denied. Thirty-two States have passed resolutions in their legislatures asking Congress to pass this righteous bill. It passed the Senate Agricultural Committee unanimously, without a dissenting vote, but the arbitrary Rules Committee of the House has denied us the right to have the bill heard on the floor of the people's Congress, and, strange as it may seem, the Rules Committee of the House is composed of 12 Members of Congress who are Democrats; I say with much forethought and due consideration that no communism of Russia, no tyranny of Hitler, no abuse of power by Mussolini can be more autocratic than is the despotic Rules Committee of the House, and I say without fear of contradiction that no true Democrat at heart will stand for this abuse of power, depriving our citizens from being heard on the floor of the people's Congress in a righteous cause. Why does this Rules Committee of the House sit silently by and listen to this condemnation on the floor of this Congress? Why not defend your action in this case? I do not like the word "challenge"; it sounds boastful and bragging, so let me rather invite you to reply. I want to say this in the most beautiful words of the English language, and yet so "damned" emphatic that no one will doubt exactly what I mean. I dare you to get up on this floor and defend your action in this case. When I reread the last speech I made on this floor condemning the Rules Committee I rather relented, thinking I had been too severe on this committee, and had expected to be censured by some one of the Members; I had expected to apologize, and yet demand an explanation; but not a single one of this tyrannical committee has dared to reply.

In conclusion let me emphasize the two outstanding principles of the Frazier-Lemke bill. This bill simply provides that the management of the Federal land banks must be returned to the farmers, as was the original intention, as the farmers now own the majority of stock of the Federal land banks. In my bank, the Federal Land Bank of Omaha, Nebr., the farmers own over 75 percent of all the stock, and yet have no voice in the management, only to the extent that they can select, through their associations, one member of a board of seven, and now the right to select in their local association a secretary and their county president is being taken away from them also. The management of this bank has been taken over by graduates of agricultural colleges, men who call themselves professors, or who have a diploma from a school, setting aside men with years of experience and giving room to young men of theory without practice. Is there another corporation in the Nation that would deny stockholders a right to a voice in the management? And let me repeat that this usurpation of power has been taken over arbitrarily, contrary to the original act as passed by Congress in 1916. The second demand of the Frazier-Lemke bill is this: Since Uncle Sam is supplying the 12 Federal Reserve banks of the United States with money at 30 cents a thousand dollars, based on second-class security, as I consider it, and which it is, when compared with the security of a man's home and farm, why should not the 12 Federal land banks have the same privilege?

The farmers never have asked as much in favors as other classes of citizens do. They are willing to pay Uncle Sam 50 times more interest than the Federal Reserve banks pay, and they are willing to pay $15 per thousand, or 1½-percent interest, which is 50 times more than the bankers pay. Is there anyone who will dare to say that these demands are unfair or unreasonable? Then why is it that we cannot get this bill on the floor of this House? It is because, my friends, the Democratic Congress is not democratic but autocratic and bureaucratic and does not respond to the will of the people. The Frazier-Lemke bill puts the Democratic Party on trial; it must choose between an autocratic Rules Committee that does not recognize its obligation to the only high tribunal which is the will of the people but bows to an autocratic power that is depriving the people from being heard on the floor of their Congress in a righteous cause. It is not a question of whether the Frazier-Lemke bill is right or wrong; it is only the question, Shall we, the people, have a right to be heard on the floor of Congress after our bill has passed favorably through committees to determine its merits? Shall it be democracy or autocracy? Shall it be freedom of expression on the floor of Congress or the stifling hand of cloakroom tactics, smothering the will of the people? [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, whether it is with malice aforethought or simply an oversight, in looking down the society column of the local papers I notice that none of my people were invited to the Liberty League meeting. Knowing that the farmers' wives will be greatly disappointed, and in order to ameliorate to some little extent their disappointment, I clipped from the society columns a review of the gorgeous gowns and dazzling jewels of their sisters who propose to tell them how to vote in November.

I know that they approve of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation passed under Herbert Hoover, because it did not meet with any condemnation whatever, even though it might have an $80,000,000 loss in one spot to a favored son of the party, like Charles G. Dawes. That, too, is not to be considered, of course, where you are now making grants to towns and corporations with ability to pay for waterworks, sewer systems, and school buildings. So, as they believe that banks, insurance companies, and trust companies, and railroads are constitutional by reason of the Hoover Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, but believe that corn, hogs, and tobacco are unconstitutional, we want to get that class line well in mind. Along that line, especially along the line of the gowns and jewels, in order to send it to the farmers' wives in my county, I ask unanimous consent to place it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN LIBERTY LEAGUE

Politics make strange bedfellows. This was illustrated at the meeting and broadcasting program of the American Liberty League Saturday night at the Mayflower Hotel in Washington.

There was Judge Charles I. Dawson, of Kentucky, renegade Democrat, who got to be a Republican when he got wealthy, as most weak Democrats do. It would be interesting, indeed, to show the number of corporations represented by the members assembled and the boards of directors on which they served.

It is evident that all those in attendance were bent on one thing, and that is to try to defeat Roosevelt and restore the dethroned kings of finance to power. In other words, you people have had the Government down at Washington for 3 years. The high-up and mighty, the select, elite, and favored group so long, would like to take the Government back to Wall Street.

It was regrettable to see former Democrats and some who would have you believe they are still Democrats alined in this strange company.

A Washington paper gives you A. A. A. boys a glimpse of the crowd as we quote a few paragraphs:

"There were expensively gowned women whose names grace the social register. The smartest gowns this city has seen for many an occasion shimmered and glittered. Mrs. Jouett Shouse, wife of the president of the league, was at a table playing host to Alice Longworth and her cousin. Mrs. James Warburg, of New York, was also at the Shouse table. Mme. Cantacuzene, an old-line Republican, was another guest.

"Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, Republican, of Massachusetts, was in a brown and silver gown, with a gardenia on her shoulder. Matching modernistic bracelets on either wrist of a long sleeve, tied about the neck; backless black gown gave éclat to the costume of Mrs. Barrett Wendel, of Chicago."

And so on, etc., for two columns, exhausting the dictionary for choice of words to describe the grandeur, jewels, gowns, and brilliancy of the occasion, went the description.

It represented entrenched wealth, the god of greed, the "public be damned" sort of atmosphere. These people came in all the splendor and brilliant array to inform the world that Mr. Roosevelt is making a mistake in his efforts to provide a means of livelihood for the farmer, the laborer, and the other 90 percent of America.

At one table sat Mr. and Mrs. Irénée du Pont, at another Pierre du Pont, the munition kings of the world, whose business prospers most when the world is at war. Perhaps the neutrality program of Roosevelt and Congress and the prevention of shipment of war materials to countries at war was not popular with the Du Ponts.

With kings of big finance seated here and there, who had furnished campaign contributions with checks of six figures for years to elect Presidents of their own picking, they made a class all to themselves, gathered in a common interest and for a common purpose to defeat Roosevelt.

And there as elsewhere among the class assembled was a lamentation of the tendency to array class against class. We ask if those assembled belong to your class? If they as a class have a program all their own, why do they lament about the people who are not of that class thinking and acting for their own interest?

We read of meetings over the United States a day or two before the Liberty League meeting. These meetings were at courthouses or warehouses. These people assembled wore overalls and their hands had the marks of labor. Their wives and daughters at home were not so bedecked and bejeweled as those at the Liberty League meeting. How can you keep class against class out of the 1936 campaign?

The Liberty League is greatly perturbed for fear the farmer will lose some of the liberty and freedom he possessed from 1928 to 1932. He had a very wide scope of liberty from which to choose at that time. It consisted of three options:

1. Become a homeless bankrupt.
2. Starve to death and go naked.
3. Suicide.

Some took one route and some another; for being in free America we had the right to choose either one. How we pine and sorrow for those good old days from 1928 to 1932, which most of the present members of the Liberty League tried to have repeated with the same man.

But the intimation from all Liberty League members is that the fool people didn't appreciate the desire of the crowd now comprising most of the league and sort of set up housekeeping in their own interest. No allowance ever seems to be given for the unusual condition, the dire distress, and national emergency existing at the time the present administration assumed responsibility. In time of war all conservation of resources, attention to employment of people, and even to food distribution is the usual program.

Our situation was as great an emergency as in time of war. Desperate situations require different treatment from those of ordinary times.

It was said at the meeting, "What would Thomas Jefferson think, if he could come back and find his party today?"—or words to that effect. We wondered, too, what Tom would have said if he could have walked in on that meeting at the Mayflower Hotel. There were a majority in the crowd followers of the doctrine of Alexander Hamilton, Tom's antagonist in the Convention framing the Constitution. Hamilton wanted the Federal Government to have all the power and the States none. He even opposed the people voting for President, but wanted a group of selected delegates to meet in convention at Washington and choose a President.

When Jefferson saw this crowd and thought of his government doctrine that all men are created free and equal and should have equal opportunities in life, we doubt most seriously if he would have thought that crowd was one organized for the benefit of the common man. The party of Hamilton has now turned a somersault and is yelling States' rights. What would Hamilton say of his party to hear them talking about States' rights? Alec and Tom would have had to have gone off and talked it over awhile before either of them could have addressed the meeting. Tom would have said: "I can't get my bearings with Charlie Dawson and JOHN ROBSION, of Kentucky, cheering Al Smith at a political meeting." Alec would have said: "I'll be dogged if I can either, with an ex-Federal judge talking about a State or State courts having rights."

Many States of the Union have had different constitutions. Others have made so many amendments that the original is left in name only, yet all adhere to the main ideas of American Government. Our Constitution has been amended 21 times.

Usually there is a demand for a law and then follows the law. If unconstitutional, then an amendment usually follows.

Three times in 20 years we have changed it on the matter as to whether or not a man could drink a glass of beer with his lunch. At first he could, then he couldn't, and now he can.

There have been many laws passed by Congress later declared to be unconstitutional and many laws passed by States declared to be unconstitutional in those States. But this New Deal legislation seemed to get closer to the hide of the class represented by the majority of members of the Liberty League than any other. They are afraid the will of the people of 36 States might approve a constitutional amendment which would enable the Government to give a poor man a chance for a decent living.

No one proposes to injure or detract from the power of courts to exercise their right to pass on legislation. Neither do the people propose to allow Wall Street to say that there shall be no more amendments to the Constitution if the people want to amend now or hereafter when the need arises.

No critic ever says what should have been done instead of what was done by the Roosevelt administration. They just criticize and offer nothing. Why not give a man credit for good intentions; a man with a heartthrob for the forgotten man—the farmer and the laborer?

It is a hard road to battle entrenched privilege and wealth. They have had the Government for a vehicle so long it is hard for them to abdicate. They invent many schemes to mislead the people in order to get back in power.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DOUGHTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 10630, the Interior Department appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE UNION LEAGUE CLUB AT PHILADELPHIA

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address made by our colleague, Mr. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, at the Union League Club in Philadelphia on Monday, January 27.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, of New York, at the Union League Club in Philadelphia on Monday, January 27:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, you have paid me a very high compliment in asking me to come here today to speak in the Lincoln room of this great old club. It is my first visit to this room, and while you were at luncheon I had an opportunity to look into your library behind us here. Certainly the traditions of this place are precious and certainly the influence of this organization upon the affairs of this old city and of the State, and indeed of the Nation, is important.

I rejoice at the information which has been given me here just before the luncheon, that the members of the Union League are enlisted for the duration. That is the kind of service we need and it would be well if gatherings of this kind could take place in city after city, town after town, country after county the country over.

Your president has been very generous in his introduction—greatly so.

I have not prepared what might be termed an oration. I thought perhaps you would permit me to ramble a bit. Things are happening pretty rapidly at Washington—all sorts of things. We started the season with a political rally in the House of Representatives [laughter], with spotlights and cameras popping over the gallery like machine guns over the top of a trench, and all the microphones and gadgets which are conducive of high-powered publicity. That was a message on the state of the Nation, as you may remember. [Laughter.] And it was only night before last that we had a dinner, not costing $50 a plate, and the state of the Nation was again discussed. [Laughter and applause.] But we should let our old-fashioned Democratic friends think that matter over.

Incidentally, I have been charged upon more than one occasion—and I may be guilty of heresy—on more than one occasion, in Washington, of being an old-fashioned Democrat. If that is true, I have been very lonely. [Laughter.]

A discussion of the finances of government does not arouse emotions. Audiences do not rise upon their hind legs and demonstrate when there is a discussion of the dollars-and-cents side of government; yet if we think twice, I think we cannot escape the conclusion that the dollars-and-cents side of government is of extraordinary importance. I want to touch on it for a little while here today.

You all are well aware of the fact, of course, that the Government of the United States has been running into a deficit for several years, and the national debt has been piling up billions upon billions. We were assured, as you may recall, 3 years ago, that the cost of government would be reduced by 25 percent. Perhaps some of you have had a chance to examine the Budget which was sent to the Congress something like 2 weeks ago. In it you will find this situation: That instead of the regular departments of government, the housekeeping items, if you please, being lower than they were last year, they are considerably higher. And then if you remember last year's Budget and the resultant appropriation bills, you will realize that the regular appropriations for last year were considerably higher than those of the year before; so it is now perfectly apparent that instead of the regular departments of the Government of the United States costing less than they did 4 years ago, they are costing a great deal more, the total increase approximating a billion five hundred million dollars. This is all outside of relief or emergency appropriations. These are the sums required or supposed to be required for the support of the ordinary departments of the Government.

It was contended in the Budget message that the Budget would be balanced by the end of the fiscal year 1937; that is the ordinary Budget. No estimate was made, however, as to the cost—the coming cost—of relief, and we are now promised these estimates within 6 weeks or 2 months. Everyone knows, of course, that that cost will be high. Whether it will be a billion or two billion or more, no one can tell. We have no estimates. In any event, if we are optimistic enough to believe that the regular departmental expenditures can be balanced in the Budget—outgoing against revenue—if we are optimists enough to believe that, we are still faced with the incontrovertible fact that whatever is appropriated for relief for next year, will force us into another deficit.

Today, unless I am very much mistaken, the Senate of the United States is to vote upon the question of overriding the President's veto of the bonus bill. It seems to be conceded the Senate will override the veto; the House has already done so, much to my regret.

In that event an expenditure of not less than $1,000,000,000, and probably approaching $2,000,000,000, will be incurred by the Federal Treasury. The bill provides that the money shall be borrowed in the form of baby bonds. Whatever is borrowed in that fashion, of course, will be added to the national debt.

The debt now figures around thirty-one billions; by that bill alone it may be raised to thirty-three billions. May I pause here and say that I rejoice in finding myself once more in company with my former colleague George Wharton Pepper [applause], who served his country with distinction in the United States Senate, but who served with even greater distinction when he made that splendid argument before the Supreme Court and assisted, no doubt, in that decision which goes far in saving our institutions.

As the result of that Triple A decision, it is now pretty thoroughly understood that probably five hundred million more of obligations will be put upon the Federal Treasury.

How long can this go on? It is a very, very serious matter. Can we go on borrowing and spending at the present rate?

The immediate prospect is that we shall go on borrowing. The debt some day must be paid, if we are an honorable Nation.

We have but two other alternatives—one, utter and dishonorable repudiation, or, two, inflation.

I am not an economist—far from it—but I will confess to you that I am deeply concerned at some of the signs in the economic field, and I am wondering if we are already started upon a very, very dangerous road with respect to the soundness of our governmental finances and the soundness of our currency.

There are signs and signals which should give pause to every thoughtful person. It is to be hoped, of course, that in this respect we put aside all partisanship; that this administration may so act as to save us from such peril.

But in any event, and at the best, these huge debts and these huge deficits must, if we are an honorable people, be paid by taxes, and already the Congress is discussing the possible imposition of additional taxes. When we realize that 20 percent of all the income of the American people goes toward taxes today—Federal, State, and local—we get an idea of how extraordinarily serious this question of taxation has become. People have said to me, and doubtless to many of you, that it would be a splendidly helpful thing for this country if the youth of the land would become more interested in the discussion of public affairs of the State and of the Nation. That is absolutely true, for I cannot help but realize, as these debts pile up, and these frightful obligations grow larger and larger, that it is the youth of today that will pay the price. We who have passed the middle century mark will shortly, comparatively speaking, shuffle off the stage. It is the young men and women in their twenties today who will carry this burden during all their working lives. It is a grim prospect at best, this dollars and cents side of government; and if I may say so, it behooves the youth of today to realize and understand the future that is before it, and to know the dire dangers that may beset them if this thing is not stopped—and stopped mighty soon.

An administration which shall stop this orgy and balance this Budget at the earliest possible moment must be one equipped with courage, the courage to say "no" to thousands of people; the courage to say "no" to those people who have come to understand and believe that the Government owes them a living; the courage to reject panaceas and nostrums; the courage to cut appropriations; the courage to face the music regardless of its political future. It is that kind of service that this country needs today, and let us hope that it will get it in the very near future. [Applause.]

Now, let us turn to another phase of the situation, and it is with a good deal of trepidation that I do turn to it, because it involves some constitutional features, and, being a layman, I think myself scarcely competent to discuss them in a profound way; and yet there are some simple aspects of it which I think are well within the understanding of the man on the street.

We have seen democracies in Europe perishing, step by step; great peoples high in the ranks of the civilized have abandoned the parliamentary form of government; have abandoned their democratic institutions and submitted themselves to dictatorships.

The true liberal of 20 years ago is amazed and utterly discouraged at what has been going on—the men and women who love liberty; and yet the movement, if we may call it such—the trend—is almost world-wide, and thoughtful people are wondering today whether democracy is going to disappear from the face of the earth. Only three of the really great nations still cling to it—Great Britain, France, and the United States. And we find in each of the three sure signs and indications that there are groups who would advise starting down the European path, substituting an authoritarian state for representative democracy.

I am not pessimist enough to believe that if we are wide awake this can happen in America, but I have seen and heard enough of the movement in this country to reach the conclusion that it is wise that we understand it and are prepared to resist it. And it should be resisted in its initial stages. Should it gather momentum, it may be difficult to stop. There are many people in this country who have reached the conclusion that the race has reached that stage at which it is wise and altogether better that the individual be subjected to the control of government as he attempts to earn his living; that the people would be happier, more prosperous, and more contented if a great central government should tell them from time to time how they are to proceed in this earning of a living. These people visualize the race in the future as marching along the highway of life guided, controlled, indeed, disciplined, by superior wisdom lodged in government. I grant that most of them are perfectly sincere in this belief, and it is in accordance with this belief and in conformity with it that the so-called New Deal has gone about its work.

True, the Supreme Court, in the N. R. A. decision and again in the triple A decision and in perhaps one or two minor cases, has called a halt to it; for in its interpretations of our Constitution it has set forth the doctrine once more, often set forth in the past, that no such power lies in the Federal Government at Washington to tell men and women how they shall earn their living, and by inference that until such power is definitely given to our Federal Government, that Government may no longer attempt such a program.

At a Jackson-day dinner in Washington 10 days ago it was announced on behalf of the New Deal, "There shall be no retreat." It must have become apparent to every thoughtful person that the so-called emergency measures which were passed in 1933, 1934, and the first part of 1935 were all a part of the program; they interlock in many ways; and it is the purpose of the President, the leader of this movement, and the purpose of his lieutenants to continue it if it is humanly possible. In some fashion or other they hope to get around the Supreme Court and perhaps through a system of subsidies produce the acquiescence of Americans to this new philosophy of government which teaches that all power resides at a central place and that the citizens must obey. This it is that lies underneath the whole program of planned economy which was well represented in the famous N. R. A. and again represented in the Triple A.

I wondered at the time the Bankhead Cotton Control Act, for example, passed the Congress, how it was that people did not rise up in protest against it, because in that Bankhead Act, for the first time, I think, in the history of our Government, the element of force was introduced, to be employed against the citizens. That act is still on the statute books; my lawyer friends tell me that it is unconstitutional, but just for the moment let me tell you what it does. Congress, in that act, in its superior wisdom, decided it would be unwise and improper for more than 10,000,000 bales of cotton to be produced in the United States in the crop year of 1934; then went on to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to allot to the cotton-producing States the number of bales that might be produced and sold in each State; further than that, it authorized him to go into each county in those States and allot the number of bales that could be sold in each county; then to go inside the county and step up to each cotton farmer and allot to him the number of bales he might produce and sell. Then the law goes on and states that if that man sells more bales than his permit calls for he shall pay a prohibitive tax on the excess number of bales—a tax not expected to gain revenue; a tax intended to compel obedience. And then, mind you, if he sells excess bales without paying the tax he may be fined or imprisoned, or both. That was the first instance of the employment of force; the lifting up of a Federal policeman's club over the head of the citizen as he endeavored to earn his living on his own land. [Applause.]

I mention that in an endeavor to indicate and to demonstrate what lies underneath this whole system.

The Tobacco Control Act is exactly like the Bankhead Control Act—individual allotments, taxes, and penalties. If the allotment is exceeded, a prohibitive tax; if the tax is not paid, fine and jail. And the same with the Potato Act, the inevitable successor—once you start this thing it cannot be stopped. Spinach will be next.

It contains the same penalties. If these people succeed with this present Congress in continuing their program by some devious method of getting around the decisions of the Supreme Court, inevitably the employment of force will appear; it must appear under any planned economy, because if government is going to do the planning of our lives, of course it must punish us if we refuse to abide by the plan.

Now, there is your philosophy of planned economy; it rests upon force, just as it does in Germany today, just as it does in Italy and in many other European countries. These measures were the initial steps which, if allowed to go undisputed and undisturbed, were to take us away from democracy over to despotism.

A great fundamental question confronts the American people: What kind of government are we going to live under? Far more important than that, what kind of government are our children to live under?

If you take the economic plan and put it alongside the Constitution you cannot escape the conclusion that as the first proceeds to success it will tear down the other. For example, if our economic system falls in a crash as the result of piling up these debts, as the result of these huge deficits, as the result of unbearable taxation, you know as well as I know that in such a crisis our political institutions themselves, no matter how wisely founded, may also fall in a crash.

Nation-wide disturbances, history tells us, are most frequent and most frequently approach and achieve violence when an economic system has been destroyed by unwise governmental action. And by the same token, the economic system can be destroyed, no matter how soundly or wisely it was founded, if the political institutions go through a revolutionary change and the whole relationship of the citizen to his Government is transformed. To me the thing seems perfectly simple. There is nothing mysterious about the American conception of liberty, nothing whatsoever. The Bill of Rights is so easy to understand. There are some today who would take away from the Supreme Court the right to pass upon the validity of an act of Congress. It is an extraordinary proposal—an extraordinary proposal if it comes from any person who loves liberty. For example, to make it perfectly simple, supposing Congress passes an act establishing a censorship over the press, and a newspaper publisher citing that provision in the Bill of Rights which guarantees the freedom of the press, protests against the act of Congress as an invasion of his liberty which the Constitution promises him—where can he go? Where can he go for the protection of his liberty? He cannot go to the Congress that passed the act, nor can he go to the President who signed it; obviously he must go to the courts; but they propose that the Supreme Court be hamstrung. That means the end of liberty.

It affects the humble man much more importantly than it affects the rich and the powerful, for the humble man—the poor man—would be helpless in such an event. Step by step a vast bureaucratic government would be built up with none to say it nay, and the liberties of a great people would slowly perish.

I am an optimist in that I believe we can make this next campaign in such fashion that he who runs may read; that every person in this land can understand the implications of the so-called New Deal, and the fundamental considerations which we have to face.

First we have to stop these orgies of spending or we shall all go over the precipice together; second, we must rededicate ourselves to the American conception of liberty—the liberty of the man or the woman earning a living—and incidentally, relieve the back of that man or woman of an impossible burden of future taxation.

These things, my friends, in this rambling fashion I have tried to impress upon you. No one can tell what the immediate future holds. My friend Congressman DARROW and I are at a loss to prophesy what this Congress may do; but, thank Heaven, it won't sit very long; and it may be it will not make many more mistakes. But the mistakes that have been made already are so serious, so menacing to everything that this country has ever held dear, that we must correct them.

Unless I am very much mistaken, we will do it next November. [Prolonged applause.]

TARIFF ACT, 1930

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the privilege of the House and present a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 406

Resolved, That the bill (S. 1421) to amend subsection (a) of section 313 of the Tariff Act of 1930, in the opinion of this House, contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring revenue bills to originate in the House of Representatives, and is an infringemnt on the prerogatives of the House, and that said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE NEW DEAL

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech I made at Grand Rapids, Mich., on January 8.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech, which I delivered at a Jackson Day banquet in Grand Rapids, Mich., on January 8:

Mr. Toastmaster, distinguished guests, and fellow Democrats, I appreciate the generous introduction of your most able toastmaster, Mr. Galt, before this splendid audience of Michigan Democrats. It is a great satisfaction to have this opportunity of speaking to you briefly upon a memorable day in the history of the Union, and especially after 3 years during which you have witnessed a marked improvement in business conditions. This afternoon I picked up a copy of one of your local newspapers and noted that you are having a convention of furniture dealers. In reading the account I discovered that even the Republican press is prone to admit that business is better. The dealers who have come to buy the products of your factories say the public is asking for a better product and a larger volume of it.

On the same front page of the same newspaper I noticed another article to the effect that General Motors reports a substantially better year in 1935 than in 1934, and another article indicating that the Pennsylvania Railroad paid a $1 dividend this year as compared to a 50-cent dividend last year.

As I look at the life of that great American, Andrew Jackson, and see the long, hard battle he fought against the national bank interests, it occurs to me that he had the same type of people opposing him that today are battling the New Deal and our great American President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. It was rather amusing to me to note an account recently of the fact that J. P. Morgan had just returned from one of his periodical grouse-shooting expeditions in Scotland, and stated that an American businessman was required to work 8 months of the year for the Government at present rates of taxation. Of course, I presume the distinguished American financier was not speaking of himself, because a recent Senate investigation brought out the fact that there were at least 2 years during which he paid no income taxes whatever, and I am wondering if he paid any for the year 1935, with its improved business conditions. We have only to look at the market sheets of the newspapers, even those which are critical, to verify the truth of the latter statement. There were over 87 percent more men at work in manufacturing industries in Michigan in November 1935 than in March 1933.

We have had a long road to travel under the banner of the New Deal to reach such satisfactory goals. I remember that dreary day in March 1933 when a new Democratic administration came into power in Washington, with the economic outlook of the Nation equally as overcast as the sky. Thousands of people had gathered at the east front of the Capitol and stood close together forming a vast sea of expectant faces centering their attention upon one man, Franklin D. Roosevelt, to whom they looked for leadership, and fortunately have not been disappointed. His brief inaugural brought a message of hope to the Nation, and even the business interests that were then on their knees pleading for help from the Government that they now condemn were encouraged.

The new President's first day in the White House was one of the most trying experiences in his career, as the Nation's banking system was tumbling about our ears and the country had scarcely ever experienced a darker day with the possible exception of "Black Friday" under the administration of Ulysses S. Grant. From 1921 to 1933, 10,321 banks had failed, involving deposits of over $5,060,000,000. Three hundred and six of those failures, involving deposits of approximately $167,600,000, had occurred in Michigan. Since the inauguration of the Federal deposit insurance law you have had only one failure involving about $48,000. I chose to give you the latter information lest your ambitious native son, who aspires to the Republican nomination for the Presidency, might forget to inform you of the fact. The financial situation I have described would not permit President Roosevelt to ponder or reason why, but demanded immediate action. He was enough of a statesman to issue a short, resounding declaration closing every bank in the United States and demonstrating to the American people that there was one way to clear up our banking situation, and that was to start over again with a clean slate.

In that action he brought more assurance to individuals and American business than had been theirs for many years. When the Democratic Congress followed upon the heels of the incident with the insurance of deposits, more commonly called the Bank Guarantee Act, confidence in the financial institutions of America was completely restored. The deposits that are now guaranteed up to $5,000 mean that every American home with a small bank account for its protection can rest more securely in knowing that there will be a tomorrow. Men can go forth to their work with the assurance that their little heap of savings will not be swept aside and their wives and children left hungry and in need of clothes.

The practically complete economic collapse in the United States at the end of 1932 and the beginning of 1933 necessitated emergency legislation in considerable volume. It was forthcoming from the Democratic Congress. At this point I might say that neither the Chief Executive nor the legislative branch of the Government expected every law to be perfect, but if we had stopped long to ponder the problem, the flames of revolt would have engulfed the Nation. Out of the entire New Deal program has come innumerable progressive acts, as has been the case with Democratic administrations since the days of Thomas Jefferson, who was himself a liberal and a progressive, and who once said, in effect, "that in a true democracy one might very well rewrite the constitution every 10 years."

One of the problems of foremost importance after the banking crisis had been met and dealt with was to offer the destitute, bankrupt farmers of this country a constructive program. For the first time in the history of all agricultural legislation, producers of raw products were offered a plan that actually brought them financial returns in a substantial amount. I can see in the eyes of many the question of unconstitutionality so recently raised against the program by the Supreme Court of the United States, about which I will deal in greater detail a little later on. For the moment let it suffice to say that the action of the Court impresses upon us vividly the fact that the Democratic Party continues to be progressive; that it continues in its full realization of the fact that this Nation is changing, growing every hour. Under the agricultural-adjustment program we have witnessed a rise in farm prices from 10-cent corn, 3-cent hogs, 4-cent cattle, 20-cent wheat, to 75-cent corn, 10-cent hogs, 14-cent cattle, and one dollar and a quarter wheat. Other farm commodities have risen in proportion, and the total farm income in the United States in 1935 was $8,110,000,000, as compared to $5,370,000,000 in 1932. In this great State of Michigan alone the corn-hog payments up to September 30, 1935, had totaled $3,868,266.95, and wheat payments $1,502,056.86.

The administration realized that not only the price of farm commodities was excessively low but the matter of protecting the financial status of farm producers was of the utmost importance. An act of Congress devised the Farm Credit set-up in the United States and offered a program of refinancing that, even though it has not been as extensive as some of us would have liked, has nevertheless brought a tremendous amount of relief to farm owners. This statement is true not only of refinancing mortgages but in the matter of a reduced interest rate that has been lowered from 5 percent to 3½ percent for the present year, following which it will be 4 percent for the 2 succeeding years, representing a saving in interest payments on the part of farmers of millions of dollars. In the United States today we have a total of 697,516 loans outstanding, representing a total of $1,854,000,000 plus. In the State of Michigan since the new set-up of 1933 we find a total of 31,299 land bank and commissioners' loans, representing a total of $56,208,000 that has been loaned to Michigan farmers at a substantial saving in interest rates. Your State has a total of 39,847 farm loans outstanding that have been made on the part of Federal Farm Credit agencies since the early days of the land bank in 1918, when the institution was inaugurated under the administration of Woodrow Wilson.

In 1933 thousands of home owners in the United States were about to lose their most treasured possessions that constitute, along with the farm units of the Nation, the foundation of America. The condition of banking institutions was such that they could not, and, furthermore, would not, make loans upon such properties. Private agencies of finance and mortgage companies were either unable or unwilling to assume the risk. Many of us are not for plunging the Government deeper and deeper into business, but when such a condition prevails it is necessary that something be done and immediately. The Congress passed the Home Owners' Loan Act. In many respects it has not functioned in as satisfactory a manner as might have been the case and perhaps mistakes have been made from time to time, but, generally speaking, the results have been beneficial. I find that up to December 26, 1935, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation had made a total of 968,944 loans representing a total value of $2,931,324,917. In other words, almost a million home owners would have been turned out into the street had it not been for the action of the new administration in coming to their rescue. The Government did not go into business except insofar as it was necessary to protect its citizens and to meet a situation that private finance could not, and would not, handle. In the State of Michigan, which has received more home owners' loans than any other State in the Union excepting Ohio, 76,341 homes have been saved, representing a total loan value of $221,217,637.

Another of our tremendous problems with which Mr. Roosevelt and the leadership in Congress were faced was the matter of feeding and clothing the millions of people who had been thrown out of work during the previous administration of Herbert Hoover as a result of an economic program that was evidently not intended for their general welfare. There has been considerable criticism of the administration of relief throughout the United States, and the hue and cry has gone up that the party in power would bankrupt the Nation. In the first place, the problem of caring for the unemployed was not a condition created by the Democratic Party but one that was saddled upon us at the very beginning of our administration, and that situation ought to be a fairly complete answer to many of the critics. Furthermore, if we had failed to rise and meet the occasion the cost of damages to property on the part of cold and hungry people might have totaled far more than our present bill for Federal relief or else local agencies of taxation and cities such as Grand Rapids, Mich., would have been forced to care for their own unemployed.

Now, just as soon as it was possible for us to devise a substitute program we launched the Public Works Administration and later the Works Progress Administration with a view to doing a number of things: In the first place, bringing an end to the business of relief, which is distasteful to the recipient, and at the same time furnishing jobs to the people who need them and offering the community affected a constructive program of public works that enhances the value of the property near them, as it increases the total value of national assets. Upon every hand we hear those who say that these things must be paid for, and that is true; but let us analyze the situation. It is better to pay for a failure to properly manage the economic affairs of the Nation with money than with blood. A considerable portion of the funds expended for that purpose will be repaid to the National Treasury, and the total investment will, as I said a moment ago, enhance the value of property and increase the Nation's assets. The entire program can and will be brought to an end just as soon as private industry is again able to reemploy the larger percentage of the people who are out of work.

The question of the constitutionality of the New Deal is of interest at this particular time. The fact that the N. I. R. A. and the Agricultural Adjustment Act have been set aside by the Supreme Court is an indication of the fact that the Democratic leadership of the Nation continues to be progressive and to recognize the fact that conditions are changing constantly from day to day, thus necessitating the drafting of legislation intended to meet and cope with them. A good example is the fact that all of our tillable free land of any value has been homesteaded or entered, the growth of the machine age has complicated the labor problems of the country, the development of rapid interstate transportation that could not have been foreseen in 1775 has given rise to the necessity of legislation of a type that I dare say our forefathers would be able to see themselves if they were to enter the Halls of Congress during the present session. In a nation of varied interests and far-flung borders that is governed by a written Constitution there must be a liberal interpretation of the document, or frequent amendments if the country is to continue its growth and development.

We have witnessed the adding of innumerable amendments to the historic document that is no more sacred to the Old Dealers of the 1932 panic that brought American business to the brink of chaos at the end of 12 years of their rule than it is to the New Dealers. The Bill of Rights was added in the early history of the Nation; provision has been made for the election of United States Senators by the electorates of the respective commonwealths; personal incomes have been made taxable, and women have been enfranchised. In the face of these facts, are there still those who stand at the wailing wall crying that the Constitution must not be touched? George Washington once wrote to a friend at the conclusion of the Constitutional Convention to the effect that in his judgment the document was far from perfect but that it constitued a good beginning.

A few days ago I met a reactionary on the streets, living in a dreamland of long ago, when personal liberty could be used to the extent of capitalizing upon the very souls of the masses who work for a living with their hands and who form the foundation of American past, present, and future. He told me that American business and the American public are afraid to go ahead because of the acts of the present administration. I said, "What are they afraid of? Are they afraid of having their bank deposits guaranteed up to $5,000, are they afraid of having their homes saved when private financial institutions fail to save them, are the people of America afraid of having the uncertainty of poverty in old age swept aside with social security legislation, are they afraid of being protected in their dealings in securities, are they afraid of having their national wealth increased with a program of self-liquidating public works, are they afraid of a power-development program to bring cheap electricity into homes that are warped with drudgery, are they afraid of legislation to prevent the overcapitalization of industry that heretofore has resulted in their being fleeced out of millions of dollars for worthless watered stocks and bonds, are the American farmers afraid of 75-cent corn, $1.25 wheat, 10-cent hogs, 14-cent cattle, 11-cent cotton, and 18½-cent tobacco, as compared to 9-cent corn, 20-cent wheat, 2-cent hogs, 4-cent cattle, 6½-cent cotton, and 10½-cent tobacco in 1932, are they afraid of having their farms refinanced at a saving of from 1 to 1½ percent, are they afraid of Federal loans on their agricultural products affording them an opportunity to await the arrival of satisfactory market conditions, is anyone afraid to have the unemployed of this Nation fed through the productive agency of the Public Works or Works Progress Administration until such time as American industry becomes sufficiently rehabilitated to absorb them, is either the American public or American business afraid of the generally improved economic conditions since the advent of the New Deal as evidenced on the market pages of every newspaper in the United States be it hostile or friendly to the program?"

If the program I have outlined to you and the results thus far are not acceptable to the critics, then what would they offer in its place? We gather, as President Roosevelt said in his recent message to Congress, "that they would take us all around the same old corner into the same old dreary street." God forbid! Let us continue to march to recovery. Let us trust our efforts to protect the right of the masses to toil, to earn their bread, and to live in the hope that tomorrow will be a better day may still prevail.

THE DEMOCRATIC RECORD UNDER FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by my colleague [Mr. HAINES] at Dover, Del., on January 23.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech delivered by my colleague, Mr. HAINES, before Booster Democratic Club, at Dover, Del., on January 23:

Very soon the people of this Nation will be called upon to vote for a President of the United States for the period 1937–41. Already we are in that campaign, and from now on you will hear a great deal concerning the accomplishments of the Democratic Party under the wise leadership of one of the greatest humanitarians of all time, Franklin D. Roosevelt. The record of Mr. Roosevelt is subjected to the most vicious attacks ever uttered against any man, and it is most fitting that I should upon this occasion refresh your memories and call to your attention the accomplishments of my party during the last 3 years. I think that the attacks upon Mr. Roosevelt are purely political and that it might be well for the voters to realize as they read and hear of the President's alleged shortcomings that the men who are assailing him belong to the same crowd who failed so miserably to solve the problems that confronted the Nation during a period of time prior to the administration of the Democratic Party. First of all, I want to have you observe that these men want to get to public office, are aspiring to high honors, for which they failed to prove themselves fitted during a period of the dark days of the recent past. Of course, they expect the people to listen to them; but, thank God, the electorate of this country are not going to be deceived, nor permit themselves to be exploited, for the selfishness of those who would want to destroy the efforts toward industrial and social security and the splendid gains we have made under this administration.

Now, my friends, lest we forget, let our memories take us back to the dark days preceding March 4, 1933, and examine the record and find what the condition of the country was under another administration. I say to you that the country was in utter despair and chaos, and also say to you that this is not an exaggeration. The awful picture of desolation that obtained at that time, a picture that one might paint in words, simply fails me, for we had a great mass of humanity that did not know what to do or where to go. We were a panic-stricken, bankrupt people in a great land of full and plenty on every hand, and yet we had hungry men and women and little children in our large centers of population destitute and homeless, roaming from one place to another, eking out a living by the generosity of another group almost as hopeless, and who saw no bright horizon that might offer them courage and inspiration. The ghastly specter of hunger and privation, bringing untold suffering, chilled the huge ranks of the unemployed with stark fear and burdening them with a sense of hopelessness and destruction. I say to you, ladies and gentlemen, it was the coming of Franklin D. Roosevelt at that time that saved the Nation and brought cheer and hope into the breasts of millions of fine Americans who were about to give up.

A voice rang out on that eventful day of March 4, 1933, saying "No one is going to starve in this country", and because that promise has been kept and men and women have been helped, men and women in every walk of life, Mr. Roosevelt is having an abuse heaped upon his head that comes to very few men, or has ever come to men at any time. It is not the first time, however, that men have been abused for taking up the cause of the masses. George Washington was abused, Lincoln was abused, Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson. Woodrow Wilson was crucified by powerful political enemies, and even today some men in high places would like to drag his fair name through the dirt and the slime, which is the most shocking thing that can come from men who call themselves patriots. It is not for me, however, to rise here and defend those great men, for their records have been made, and you and I have been made better by their having lived and toiled and sacrificed. Only recently a memorial was dedicated to the memory of another great American who was greatly abused in his day because he had the courage to go to the defense of the common people of our country and attempted to drive special-privileged classes from their high places, and who were contributing to inevitable economic disaster.

We are erecting monuments to their memory, and rightfully so, and I predict here and now that when the pages of history are written of this day in which you and I live no name will be more honored than our own beloved President. Great men in history are not so easily debunked. Washington, Lincoln, Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and Theodore Roosevelt are just as magnificent today as at any time, and will continue so. They stand today, and will continue to stand, as great statesmen, humanitarians, and idealists in public affairs, worthy leaders of the world's people and whose most painful griefs must have been their betrayal at the hands of their misled fellow countrymen.

What was the condition of our people in the 1931, 1932, and early 1933 period? The farmers, which comprise one-third of our population, could not sell their produce because the millions of city and town people could not buy. They had no purchasing power, for mark you, my friends, this country can no more go on half prosperous and the other half destitute than we could hope to go on half slaves and half free.

The farmers were bankrupt and a million farmers lost their farms during those dark days. Industry was practically at a standstill, and their plants stood still like stark sentinels of despair. Between the years 1920 and 1932 more than 10,000 banks closed their doors, and many of those banks did not reopen; in fact, some of them paid no dividends to their depositors and some of them had to call upon their stockholders to make good their losses, bringing untold hardship upon many persons unable to pay, taking from many of them all that they had accumulated during their lifetime. What a calamity that was, and will it ever be forgotten? I know something about this, my friends, for I heard from many men and women who were the victims of that financial crash. The courage of Mr. Roosevelt saved the day, and his action in declaring a bank holiday gave us a breathing spell and saved our people from making runs on banks that would have led to complete financial disaster.

You hear a lot of talk today about throwing away the taxpayers' money, and it is a lot of loose talk, to say the least. We hear a lot about our national debt, and let me say right here that it is doubtful if any country in the world can show a more constructive achievement for a like period than that accomplished by this administration. Since that bank holiday and the passage of one of the major New Deal acts, namely, the Federal deposit insurance law, bank failures have been few and far between, and when they do occur no one pays any attention to it, for each depositor knows that his or her money is secure, and in each such failure under this New Deal act depositors are paid off almost immediately. I want you to remember that under Mr. Hoover's administration from 1930 to 1933 there were 5,500 failures, which brought sorrow and death—many of them untimely—into many homes, and when I hear people say that they want to go back to that administration, back to that Old Guard, I ask myself the question, Are these people sincere? Today our banks are safe, safer than at any time in our national history, and the work of relief is progressing, even though we are faced with obstacles never dreamed of in March 1933. Those were the days, my friends, when thousands or more of my own people wrote me letters, sent me telegrams, urging me to back up the President; go along with anything he might request; and now I am sorry to say that some of that same group are very loud and vociferous in their abuse of the President. They want to make me feel that everything that was done is wrong, even though they have been rescued, and I sometimes feel like saying that they want to bite the hand that fed them.

Businessmen are not consistent, because the record is before us, and I note that unemployment has declined on January 1 over January 1, 3 years ago, 30 percent; cotton has advanced 92 percent; wheat has advanced 111 percent; corn, 152 percent; industrial production, 51 percent; steel, 25 percent; automobiles, 326 percent; wholesale prices, 33 percent; total exports, 33 percent; imports, 37 percent; listed stocks, 134 percent; and listed bonds, 22 percent; and a 19-percent advance in power production; and yet, if you read the headlines and editorial pages of newspapers, you would reach the conclusion that the country is going to the dogs. These are not substantiated by facts, but unfortunately more than 80 percent of the newspapers in this country are either controlled by our opponents or these editors have an ax to grind. Surely a study of these facts should convince any intelligent man or woman that we are on the way toward economic recovery. Back in 1930 we passed a tariff bill that was the beginning of the end in this country. A thousand economists and thousands of other businessmen begged the Congress not to enact that legislation, and an equal number appealed to Mr. Hoover not to sign it. It became a law, and immediately we felt its evil effects upon our economic structure.

Let me give you the record and you can draw your own conclusions: In 1929 we sold about five and one-fourth billions of dollars worth of American products to other countries. After this act we immediately experienced a loss of trade, so that it went to less than four billions in 1930, went down to less than two and one-half billions in 1931, and a little more than a billion and a half in 1932. Think of it, a loss in trade with other countries to the tune of almost $4,000,000,000 in 4 years. And yet we have a great many people in our country today who think that other nations will buy from us if we don't buy from them. It was Mr. Hoover's scheme to send American salesmen to other countries and sell our products, and, wise as he is, he failed to take this into consideration. As a result, many of our manufacturing plants that previous to that Tariff Act produced the finished article in this country found it necessary to take billions of American capital and erect plants in foreign countries, thus throwing out of employment millions of Americans. Please do not misunderstand me; I am not a free-trader.

I believe in an adequate tariff for the protection of American workmen, but I do not believe that we can hope to employ American workmen and sell our surplus to other nations unless we will, in turn, buy from these countries. Today we have a balance of trade with most of the countries in the world. They want our products and we can sell to them, but not upon a basis of a prohibitive tariff that will not permit the nationals of other countries to enjoy some of our markets. No group in America has been more affected than the farmer. He must buy his machinery in a highly protected market and sell at such prices as he can obtain at home without any market to unload our surpluses. Our party is not the enemy of legitimate business and never has been. It is the enemy of the exploiter and those who want everything for themselves without regard to the interest of the masses. Business has benefited under the New Deal, as is evidenced by these better trade figures. Let us briefly examine the record of the New Deal activity in behalf of business recovery. I represent a great industrial district in the United States. We make a greater variety of the finished product than perhaps any other section of the country.

I know that under the N. R. A. my people were benefited, although some few groups may not have had that experience. Since the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional labor in my district has had to work longer hours and at reduced rates of pay, and thus their purchasing power has been reduced. How can men buy from you if you don't put a purchasing power in their hands; and after years of personal experience I say to you that at no time does business make money when those who toil for them do not receive an adequate pay. They may have some temporary prosperity, but in the long run they experience just the reverse. I have some industries in my district right now that would like to go back to the N. R. A., and also have some industrial plants that are still operating under the codes they agreed upon and are just as successful and I am sure will have more permanency than those who are now exploiting men and women in their plants, working them long hours, and are giving them low pay. There are some things that businessmen simply won't learn, and one of them is that if their business is to prosper those who toil for them must prosper.

N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional and, of course, we are a constitutional government and abide by that decision. I believe that in this modern day of mass production and labor-saving machinery, labor-supplanting machinery, chain distribution we have no right to interpret the act of our fathers, those who founded this Nation, other than in the light of this modern day, for the day in which you and I live differs from their day as does night from day. I believe that if those men could come back they would say to us that they had in mind the general welfare of all our people, and that when the general welfare of our people cannot be secured under that document, it is time that it be interpreted in the light of what our founders had in mind. This administration has been and wants to be the friend of business, but it wants the small businessman to have an equal opportunity to build for himself and his posterity.

Let us look for a moment at the record under the New Deal, and then you draw your own conclusions. Recently a group of great businessmen—with great wealth, I mean—announced that they wanted to organize to defeat all who had any part in the New Deal. It is interesting to examine the record and see just how that group has prospered under the New Deal, and I want to read to you some facts that are interesting. Their own reports show how the New Deal has ruined their business. I want to mention four of these outstanding businessmen and their connections with business and show to you just how they prospered rather than suffered under the New Deal. These men have agreed to put their shoulders to the wheel because they say that they believe in a government of laws, not of men. They say that they believe in preserving for a younger and future generation the same opportunities for advancement that they have enjoyed. Now, let's see how badly they have suffered under the New Deal. The chairman of this powerful group is said to be Mr. William C. Bell, president of the American Cyanamid Co. You will note, please, that this is the company that tried to secure control of Muscle Shoals, and might have succeeded if it had not been for courageous Senator NORRIS.

On March 4, when President Roosevelt was inaugurated (1933), the common stock of that company was quoted at 3½. Recently it was selling at 30¼. The profits of the company in 1932 were reported as $1,542,908. For 1934 they report profits of $3,846,720, or more than 100-percent increase. The New Deal was certainly injurious to that concern. The second member of that powerful group, Mr. Ernest H. Weir, head of the National Steel Corporation—you will recall it was his concern (the Weirton Steel Co.) who led the fight against the collective bargaining provisions of the N. R. A. On March 4 National Steel common stock was 15½, and only recently it sold at 83¼. In 1932 the net income of that corporation was $1,662,920, but in 1934, under the New Deal, the net income was $6,050,721, and for the first 9 months of 1935 the net income is reported as amounting to $5,603,758, or nearly seven times what it was during the last year of the previous administration. The New Deal certainly did hurt (?) that corporation, and who can blame them for wanting to defeat Mr. Roosevelt?

Another member of the powerful group organized to defeat Mr. Roosevelt and his Democratic followers is Mr. Sewell L. Avery, president of Montgomery, Ward & Co. On March 4, 1933, the common stock of that company sold for 8⅞. Recently it sold for 40, and their own statement, issued January 1, 1933, showed a deficit of $5,598,554. Its last statement covering a 12-month period report ending January 1, 1935, the company showed a profit of $10,807,636, or a clear gain of more than $16,000,000. Did the New Deal hurt that corporation?

The fourth member of the war-chest committee—the committee who is to see that millions of dollars are collected to be used to defeat Mr. Roosevelt—is Mr. A. W. Robertson, chairman of the board of the Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Co. On March 4, 1933, the common stock of that company sold for 30¾. Recently it sold for 98½. The company's earnings statement shows that for the calendar year 1932 they lost $8,903,540, but for the first 9 months of 1935 they made a net profit of $8,822,640, or a gain of more than seventeen and one-half millions of dollars. Now, tell me, please, how can these gentlemen justify any organization to defeat a man or a party who has brought into their own coffers such increased profits?

These four concerns show profits of about $40,000,000 in excess of the last year under the previous administration. Let us ask, please, that if $40,000,000 won't please them, what will? The answer is clearly stated by a writer in a recent article in a great newspaper: "These men prefer power to profits; not that they love profits less but they love power more." Their real reason, therefore, is not that they have experienced an injury to their business but they are afraid that their power has been curbed, and that for once in the history of the Nation the people have some leadership that does not fear them or will allow them to dictate. The real reason, however, is that this administration wants those best able to pay taxes to make their fair contribution and has indicated that those least able to pay shall not be burdened. It is the fear on the part of these best able to pay that for one time they shall pay their fair share of the Government expenses, something they have never done.

Another charge that is aimed against Mr. Roosevelt and his administration is that we have broken our promises. What promises? We promised that no one should starve. Haven't we lived up to that? We promised a stable currency. The American dollar is the most stable money in all the world. Have you ever known the national credit to be better than it is today? Isn't it much better today than it was under Mr. Hoover, when Government bonds depreciated to 83? Now our bonds, with the lowest rate of interest ever paid, are selling above par and eagerly sought after by the investors. All the countries in the world are sending their gold to us and investing in our stocks, simply because they regard our future more secure than their own. They say we promised to balance the Budget. This is in process of fulfillment. Many of you men are business men and can appreciate that this cannot be done overnight. The national deficit was not invented by the Democratic Party, but, on the contrary, is a part of our inheritance. Now, let us examine the record:

The fiscal year under Hoover:

June 30, 1931, deficit	$902,717,000
June 30, 1932, deficit	3,153,097,000
June 30, 1933, deficit	2,163,760,000

or almost one and one-quarter billions more than we have spent on relief. A close examination of that deficit will reveal that most of the money was given to the great interests of this country to rehabilitate themselves, but just as soon as we go to the rescue of the smaller groups, the poor and the needy, those who have suffered most, we are the subjects of the vilest abuse on the part of the American Liberty and American Lobbyist League, the Economy League, and the Republican Party. I would have you know that in the previous administration they never worked on a balanced Budget. I believe it would have defeated the very purposes we are seeking had we increased our tax rates to the point where we could have worked on a balanced Budget, especially in a time when business was trying to recover and the Government had to go to the aid of the States and municipalities to save a revolution. Many of these States and municipalities could no longer care for their own, some of them had laws that would not permit them to borrow another dollar; hence, the strong arm of the Federal Government had to go to their rescue, and it ill becomes any class of people to find fault with a government who did so much for them; and deny it to others.

Do you know, my friends, that Mr. Roosevelt has cut the running expenses of your Government almost a billion dollars for the same kind of government, and had it not been for relief and the loans made to industry, railroads, banks, insurance companies, farmers, and small home owners, we would now be working on a balanced Budget. Much of this deficit under Mr. Roosevelt has been brought about through loans made, and your Government has recoverable assets running into more than $4,000,000,000, secured by the best security in the world, the farms, homes, and securities held as collateral. We are paying less interest on our present national debt than we paid on the debts of 1932, due to refinancing and the lower interest rates we have been able to obtain.

We have tried to reduce unfair trade practices among business men. We have tried to banish the sweatshop; we have tried to eliminate child labor, and have been working toward better working conditions for labor and better mutual understanding between employer and employees. We have by evolution, rather than revolution, tried to inaugurate a system of equitable distribution of net profits in business and industry, and laid the ground work for social and economic safety for employees and employers by planning unemployment insurance.

Whether we shall realize these fine objectives may rest with the Supreme Court. Have you heard it said that we should copy the plan of Great Britain and that she has made greater strides toward recovery? Well, let's examine the record once again, and we find that England was in a depression 10 years ahead of us and that she is only now emerging with some degree of success. It must be remembered that England had no great agricultural problem to solve; she had no great banking system break-down; she did not experience the unloading of more than $25,000,000,000 worth of bad securities on an unsuspecting investing public, for she has a securities act that prevented it; she had no labor troubles such as confronted the United States, as labor in England is better organized than in any other part of the world; and she has experienced a labor government in the past and is 25 years ahead of us in social security; indeed, we must hang our heads in shame and admit that we are the most backward nation in all the world among the great civilized nations; and yet, notwithstanding all of this, we have a well-organized and financed group in America who would try to prevent all of this humanitarian and advanced program for national security.

If we taxed our people as England does hers, we would never have had need to borrow a dollar and would today be working on a balanced Budget with no public debt. And yet England's public debt is $33,000,000,000 among 46,000,000 people, or a per capita debt of $717. France, with a population of 42,000,000 souls, has a debt of $22,000,000,000 and a per-capita debt of $524, while we here in this country, with a population of more than 125,000,000, have a per-capita debt of $238. The national resources of our great country are fairly estimated at about $350,000,000,000. We have a public debt of a little more than $30,000,000,000, which is less than 10 percent of our assets. What bank or bankers makes a safer loan than that to any person, firm, or corporation? No nation in all the world can show such a fine financial statement, and the increase of national income during the past 3 years has been responsible for this, so that today your country is as sound as it has ever been in its entire history. We had some boom days in the period from 1920 to 1929, but we now know it to have been unsound and was simply pointing the way to economic disaster.

When you realize that the profits of corporations and big business increased as much as 200 percent and that wages decreased as much as 62 percent you can easily solve some of the causes for the ills that have beset us on every hand. The New Deal has tried to correct these inequalities, and will do it if not prevented by the Supreme Court. Every political candidate has promised to help the farmer, but the A. A. A. Act passed in 1933 was the first successful plan for freeing the farmer from starvation prices and bitter poverty. Recently a farmer wrote me a letter advising me that he sent a truck load of corn to a dealer in my home town, for which he was paid $168. In 1932 that same truck load of corn would have yielded him just $54. That, I think, is an argument that needs little more defense on my part; but we all know that during the past 2½ years agriculture has been climbing out of the severest depression in the history of the country. All our wealth comes from the soil. Our factories simply process that which we obtain from the soil, from the forests, the mines, and the lower regions, which in our country seem to be generous with oil.

Deny to the soil that to which it is entitled and it affects every man, woman, and child in the towns and cities. You have never known the Nation to prosper unless these men who till the soil and work the mines are prosperous. When anyone criticizes something that is being done and says that it should not have been done, ask him: What acts operating would you now do away with? Do you want to do away with the Securities and Exchange Act? Do you want to do away with the Banking Act that for the first time in the history of your country gives the control of the money and the Nation's credit into the hands of the Government instead of Wall Street? Do you want to do away with the Deposit Insurance Act that has done more to restore confidence in our banks than anything else and which has made our banks the safest in our entire history? We don't want our people to hide their money in socks, or under the carpet, or in the ground. We want them to give it to our banks so that it can be used in commerce and business so as to give employment, and, having made our banks sound and safe for all our people, there is no need for any of our citizens to withhold their money from our financial institutions.

Would you want to do away with the agency made possible by the Farm Credit Administration that has saved more than a million farms from being sold under the sheriff's hammer? Would you want to do away with an act that has made possible the saving of more than 900,000 homes—small-home owners in America? Do you want to do away with an act that is the beginning of better days for our aged, our cripples, our blind, our under privileged; aid for the mothers and other humanitarian benefits to a group who can least aid themselves? Do you want to do away with an act that enables the unemployed to find work or prevents men, women, and children from starvation? Of course, we should like to do away with relief; but until our industrial leaders can give employment to that group and States and municipalities can take care of their own, I think under the New Deal we shall continue to manifest an interest in the people of America. England has had a dole and has contributed much to her economic difficulties, and she is beginning to realize it, for she is appropriating much greater sums, comparable to our own great country, than we have through public-work projects somewhat similar to our own.

Personally, I should much prefer giving a man a job than to hand him a dole, no matter what kind of a job it might be. Would you want to have your Government discontinue its aid to the great host of young men who are being rehabilitated in C. C. C. camps, taking these young men from the street corners and places of ill-repute, where the boy who has nothing to do will loaf? We have aided almost three-fourths of a million of these young men, sending many of them into fields of usefulness, have built them physically, but above all we have given them a job so as to contribute to their own self-respect. The New Deal has done all of this and more, too; so much, my friends, that I could go on and speak for a very long time, for I believe in the great work that is being done and which can continue to be done in behalf of a great country. When you hear of the great sums the New Deal has cost, point to what has been accomplished. While we have spent billions, we have also added to the wealth of the Nation to the tune of billions, but above all we have contributed to the moral uplift of men and women who were about ready to give up.

What suits you best, my friends, Hoover, who offers you nothing but promises and whose recent address on the farm solution was really a part of the New Deal, all of which the Supreme Court destroyed—Hoover and his kind, who will leave no stone unturned to destroy the affection the people of this Nation hold for their President; Hoover, misery and disaster—or Roosevelt, progress and hope? Which do you prefer; to stand pat with these reactionaries for privileges for the few or to move forward with Roosevelt to a sounder and more equitable prosperity than we have ever had before? "Where do you stand; with the dead past or the living present and the glowing future?" I hope that when given an opportunity you will be ready for the question and do your full duty for a greater and more prosperous Nation under Roosevelt.
